So a prescriptive right to use a stream as a place for depositing offal from a slaughterhouse cannot be secured by prescription. Bowen v. Wendt, 103 Cal. 236, 37 Pac. 149. To the same effect is Woodyear v. Schaefer, 57 Md. 1, 40 Am. Rep. 419. Nor can the right to pollute it with sewage. Nolan v. New Britain, 69 Conn. 668, 38 Atl. 703; Platt Bros. v. Waterbury, 72 Conn. 531, 48 L. R. A. 691, 77 Am. St. Rep. 335, 45 Atl. 154; Bloomington v. Costello, 65 Ill. App. 407; Kelley v. New York, 6 Misc. 516, 27 N. Y. Supp. 164; Com. v. Yost, 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 323, reversed on the facts in 197 Pa. 171, 46 Atl. 845.

The rule is stated generally in Farnham on Waters, p. 1534, that the right to maintain a public nuisance of this character cannot be acquired by prescription, citing a large number of cases.

The defendants could acquire by prescription rights in the river above and below their own premises.

Removing the sawdust in some other way than with a blower is so expensive as to entirely destroy the value of the property for sawmill purposes. These facts are sufficient to show that the orders constitute a taking of defendants' property and rights.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two complaints, one against each defendant, charging them severally with permitting sawdust to be discharged into the Konkapot river, on March 29, 1905, in violation of an order made by the fish and game commissioners, under Rev. Laws, chap. 91, § 8, dated August 1, 1904. The order, after reciting the authority given by the act, and stating that the mill here in question owned by the defendants had been examined by the board, and that it had been determined by the board that the fish in the brook are of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition of the discharge of sawdust into it, and that the discharge of sawdust from the defendants' mill into said brook materially injures the fish therein, directs the defendants (1) to erect a blower or take other means approved by the commissioners to prevent the discharge of sawdust from said mill into said brook directly or indirectly, and (2) not to accumulate a pile of sawdust on the bank of the brook, so that it may be liable to fall into the stream or be swept away by a rise of water. At the trial it was proved that this order was served on the defendants on or before July 1, 1904, and that the defendants continued to discharge sawdust into Konkapot river up to the time these complaints were instituted. It also appeared that there were edible fish in the river at the time the board passed the order in question.

The defendants offered to show, in substance, that the commissioners, in making the order, did not act on sworn evidence or personal knowledge as to the fish or the sawdust; that in the spring of 1905 the defendants asked for a hearing, which the commissioners denied; that the mill has been used as it is now used for more than thirty years under a claim of right; and that the right was admitted by the next mill owner below; and, finally, that a compliance with the order as to a blower would impair the efficiency of the mill about 25 per cent, that the sawdust could not be sold, and to cart it away would entirely destroy the value of the land for mill purposes. This evidence was excluded and an exception was taken. The defendants then made the following six requests for rulings, to wit: "First. That the act of the commissioners on fisheries and game, by which they determine that the fish in any brook or stream are of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition or regulation of the discharge of sawdust from any particular saw-mill materially injuring such fish, is a judicial act, which can be lawfully performed only after the hearing of evidence bearing upon the questions involved, viz., the value of the fish in such brook or stream and the effect of such sawdust as injuring such fish. Second. That the order in this case, having been passed by the commissioners without hearing any evidence, and without any knowledge by them of the value of the fish in the stream or the amount of water in the stream, or the amount of sawdust that is discharged by defendants' saw-mill into the stream, is not a lawful order under the statute, and is not binding upon the defendants. Third. That the defendants and the predecessors in title, having been discharging sawdust from their saw-mills for more than twenty years consecutively under a claim of right into the Konkapot river, have acquired by prescription a title to such right, and such right is their property, of which they cannot be deprived without compensation. Fourth. That § 8 of chapter 91 of the Revised Laws makes no provision for compensation to the owner of a sawmill who is forbidden by an order of the commissioners to discharge sawdust into a brook or stream, and said statute is therefore unconstitutional and void so far as these defendants are concerned. Fifth. That this order of the commissioners so interferes with the use of the property of the defendants as to amount to a taking of such property for public use, and the order is void, as no compensation to defendants for such taking is provided by the order, or by the statute under which the order is made. Sixth. That this order of the commissioners so interferes with the use of the property of the defendants as to seriously damage, impair, or injure such property, and the order is void, as no provision is made, either in the order or the statute under which the order is created, for compensating the defendants for such damage, impairment, or injury to their property."

The defendants' grievance is that, by an order of the board of fish and game commissioners, they have been deprived, without compensation being made therefor, of the right to conduct the business of sawing wood as they and their predecessors in title have conducted it for thirty years last past, that from this decision there is no appeal, and that not only was the order made without a hearing, but, when a hearing was asked for by the defendants, it was denied. Their contention is, first, that under the act they had a right to be heard at the trial in the superior court on the questions of fact determined by the board; second, that they could not be deprived by the board of their prescriptive right to discharge sawdust into Konkapot river without being heard, and by a finding not made on sworn evidence; and, third, that under any circumstances this right cannot be taken without compensation being made therefor. In support of their contention they argue that the board, in determining (1) that the fish in Konkapot river are of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition or regulation of the discharge of sawdust therein, and (2) that the discharge of sawdust from the defendants' mill materially injured such fish, was a judicial action; and, in connection with this argument, they rely on the distinction pointed out in Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 431, 96 Am. Dec. 650, between the action of a local board of health in making general regulations respecting articles capable of conveying infection or creating sickness and the authority of such a board to examine into the existence of any specific case of nuisance, filth, or cause of sickness dangerous to the public health, and to make an order for the removal of it. The former, being a rule for all, is legislative in character; the latter, being a determination as to a particular thing, resulting in an order to the owner of it to do a specified act, is judicial in character. For a later case, where it is pointed out that similar legislative and judicial powers are given to the state board of health in connection with the pollution of a body of water used as a supply of a city or town, see Nelson v. State Bd. of Health, 186 Mass. 330, 71 N. E. 693.

We agree with the defendants' counsel as to what the order here in question is not. We agree that it is not a general regulation. What is determined by it is that the discharge of sawdust from the defendants' mill materially injures the fish in Konkapot river, and it orders the defendants to erect a blower, and forbids the defendants making a pile of sawdust in connection with the mill; and it resulted in an order served on these defendants to do these acts. This is not a general regulation. But we do not agree that, because it is not a general regulation, it is a judicial action. The question to be decided here does not depend upon a choice between the two classes dealt with in Salem v. Eastern R. Co. and in Nelson v. State Bd. of Health, supra, and for these reasons: We are of opinion, in the first place, that it is within the power of the legislature to protect and preserve edible fish in the rivers and brooks of the commonwealth, and for that purpose, if they think proper, to forbid any sawdust being discharged into any brook containing such fish. The right to run a sawmill on the bank of a brook or a river is, like all rights of property, subject to be regulated by the legislature, when the unrestrained exercise of it conflicts with other rights, public or private. See Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 54; Rideout v. Knox, 148 Mass. 368, 2 L. R. A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560, 19 N. E. 390. The defendants' contention that they have a prescriptive right to discharge sawdust into the river, even if it kills or injures the fish therein, which prescriptive right cannot be taken away or impaired without compensation being made therefor, means this, and nothing more: Where the legislature, up to the passage of the act here in question (Stat. 1890, chap. 129, p. 106), had not regulated the business of sawing wood on the banks of streams having in them edible fish, and where, in the absence of such regulation, the defendants had discharged sawdust into the stream for thirty years, the people have lost the power to regulate the conflicting rights of sawmills on the bank of the stream, and to preserve fish in the stream itself. The statement of the proposition is enough to show that there is nothing in it. The decision in Atty. Gen. v. Revere Copper Co. 152 Mass. 444, 9 L. R. A. 510, 25 N. E. 605, relied on by the defendants, is confined to the gaining of prescriptive rights with 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) respect to property owned by the public under a statute of limitations, which puts the property rights of the public on the same basis as those of individuals.

We are of opinion, in the second place, that in case the legislature thought that in regulating the conflicting rights of individuals to run sawmills on the banks of a river, on the one hand, and of the public, on the other hand, to have fish live and increase in the same stream, it was not worth while to forbid sawdust being discharged into every stream in which there were edible fish, they could leave to a board having peculiar knowledge on the subject the selection of the brooks and rivers in which the fish were of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition or regulation of the discharge of sawdust. The right of the legislature to delegate some legislative functions to state boards was considered by this court in Brodine v. Revere, 182 Mass. 598, 66 N. E. 607. And, further, in case the legislature thought that an act which forbade any sawdust to be discharged into any of the streams selected by the board was an unnecessarily stringent one, they could, in our opinion, leave it to the board to settle in each particular case the practical details required to harmonize best these two conflicting rights. The power thus delegated to the board of fitting the details of regulation to the particular circumstances of each case is of the same character as that long exercised by the fish and game commissioners and their predecessors, the board of inland fisheries, in prescribing the details of the construction of the fishways to be constructed in dams where, by law, fishways have to be maintained. See Stat. 1866, chap. 238, §§ 2, 6, pp. 231, 232; Stat. 1867, chap. 344, p. 741; Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 91, § 4. See also 3 Province Laws, 1745, 1746, state ed. chap. 20, p. 267. These acts provide that the board, after examination of dams upon rivers where the law requires fishways, is to determine whether the fishways in existence are sufficient, and to prescribe by an order in writing what changes or repairs, if any, shall be made, and at what time the fishways are to be kept open, and to give notice thereof to the owners of such dams. The action of the fish commissioners under these acts is unquestionably legislative in character, and we cannot doubt that their action under them, exercised and acquiesced in by the public for this length of time, is valid. The result is that, in our opinion, the action of the board in the case at bar was the working out of details under a legislative act. The board is no more required to act on sworn evidence than is the legislature itself, and no more than in case of the legislature itself is it bound to act only after a hearing, or to give a hearing to the plaintiff when he asks for one; and its action is final, as is the action of the legislature in enacting a statute; and, being legislative, it is plain that the questions of fact passed upon by the legislature in adopting the provisions enacted by them cannot be tried over by the court. This court has been recently asked to try over the expediency of compulsory vaccination in an action under a statute requiring it. Com. v. Jacobson, 183 Mass. 242, 67 L. R. A. 935, 66 N. E. 719. On its declining to do so an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and its refusal to do so was held to be correct. Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 49 L. ed. 643, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358. See particularly page 30 of 197 U. S., page 651 of 49 L. ed., and page 363 of 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. See also Devens, J., in Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 531, 59 Am. Rep. 113, 11 N. E. 929.

The practical result is that the defendants are forbidden to conduct their sawmill as they had conducted it for thirty years by a board who have not heard evidence, and have refused the defendants a hearing; that the action of the board is final, and that no compensation is due to them. This result may seem strange. But it is no less strange than the practical results in cases which are decided law. Take the case before the court in Nelson v. State Bd. of Health, supra; namely, a farm on the banks of a pond used as the water supply of a town. The state board of health can pass a general regulation under § 113, chap. 75, Rev. Laws, forbidding privies within a specified distance from its shore; and, if the defendant had a privy there for thirty years, his right to maintain it would cease, although the order was made without hearing; and the action of the board is final. On the other hand, if the board had proceeded, under § 118, to investigate this particular privy, the defendant would have been entitled to a hearing, and, on appeal, to a jury, as provided by § 119. Again, take, for example, the regulation of a local board of health in question in Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 523, 59 Am. Rep. 113, 11 N. E. 929, requiring all rags arriving at the port of Boston from any foreign port to be disinfected at the expense of the owner before being discharged. The power of the local board of health to declare these rags a nuisance per se, so as to impose upon the owner without trial the expense of disinfecting them, was established by this court in that case. Had the local board undertaken to investigate the particular rags in question in Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. under their jurisdiction to inquire into sources of filth, and they had been authorized under that act to abate the nuisance if they found the rags to be a nuisance, by ordering them to be disinfected at the expense of the defendant, they would have had to give the defendant a hearing on notice, and from their decision the defendant would have had a right to a trial by jury. That is what was decided in Salem v. Eastern R. Co. supra. That is to say, on the one hand, where the law is general, and the question is whether, under it, the defendants are committing a nuisance, the facts are determined by judicial action; on the other hand, the determination of the same facts is legislative in case the legislature decides to make the thing a nuisance per se. And where it is legislative it is final, and no hearing is necessary; and where, as is the case here, it is made in the exercise of the police power, no compensation is due.

The delegation of such legislative powers to a board is going a great way. But the remedy is by application to the legislature, if a remedy should be given. In our opinion it is within its constitutional power, and the court can give no remedy. For similar cases, where the use which can be made of property has been left to the final determination of boards, see Newton v. Joyce, 166 Mass. 83, 55 Am. St. Rep. 385, 44 N. E. 116; Com. v. Roberts, 155 Mass. 281, 16 L. R. A. 400, 20 N. E. 522. See also in this connection, Re Wares, 161 Mass. 70, 36 N. E. 586. The difference between the majority and the minority of the court in Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L. R. A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850, 26 N. E. 100, was on the construction of the act there in question.

Exceptions overruled.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

S. F. HARRINGTON, Resp't.,

v.

A. L. DEMARIS, Appt.

(.... Or.)

1. Riparian rights—adverse user.

Use of water by a lower riparian owner without a recognition by the upper owner of the right is not adverse to the latter.

2. Same.

The right of a riparian owner to the flow of the stream through his land is not af-

Case Note.—The definition of a water course has caused the courts some trouble. A favorite definition is that there must be a stream flowing in a bed with banks to constitute a water course. This definition is, for most purposes, sufficient; but a too strict adherence to it has caused trouble in some cases. Farnham, Waters, p. 1562, says the distinguishing characteristic is the existence feeted by adverse use where the use shown is not sufficient to enable the one making it to invoke the statute of limitations in his favor.

3. Water course—absence of channel.

Water flowing in one direction over the surface of the ground without a well-defined channel, from a swamp fed by springs, to the channel of a stream, is a water course, which cannot be diverted to the injury of a riparian owner on the stream.

4. Same—artificial supply.

Where the owners of several parcels of land on a stream remove a barrier, and turn water from another source into the stream, it becomes subject to the rules of law applicable to riparian ownership.

5. Riparian right—division of flow of stream.

A riparian owner has no ground to complain of a decree awarding him one half the water flowing in the stream, as against the claims of a lower riparian owner, where the matter is settled solely by the riparian rights of the parties.

6. Appeal—error not complained of.

An award of damages, although erroneous according to the evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal if not complained of by the parties.

(July 18, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Umatilla County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin interference with the flow of a stream. Affirmed.

Statement by Moore, Ch. J.:

This is a suit by S. F. Harrington against A. L. Demaris to enjoin interference with the flow of water in the channel of a creek to plaintiff's premises. It is alleged in the amended complaint, in substance, that until August, 1900, a natural stream of water, consisting of about 480 inches, had its source from time immemorial in certain springs arising in and issuing from the land of one R. M. Dorothy, in Umatilla county, and flowed westward through defendant's land, thence across plaintiff's premises, and through the lands of "other persons," whereby plaintiff's premises were subirrigated, and he and his predecessors in interest had used such water for a beneficial purpose; that more than thirty-five years prior to the bringing of this suit his grantor dug a ditch from the channel of the stream, diverting therefrom 120 inches of water, which was conducted to the land now owned by him, and there continuously used adversely to the defendant and to all other persons for more than ten years prior to August, 1900, in irrigating crops and an orchard; that after such diversion and appropriation there remained in the channel of the stream 360 inches of water, which continued to flow across plaintiff's premises, "and on and to the lands of other persons," and which plaintiff used for stock and domestic purposes, and claims the right to have such quantity continually to flow across his land; and that in August, 1900, the defendant unlawfully placed a dam in the bed of the stream, and prevented the water from flowing to plaintiff's of a stream of water flowing for such a length of time that its existence will furnish the advantages usually attendant upon streams of water; and that a water course is the condition created by a stream of water having a well-defined and substantial existence. If this substantial existence is present, the fact that the stream is not strong enough to create for itself bed and banks is not sufficient to defeat its character as a water course. This is the logical conclusion which has been finally adopted by the majority of the cases, although there are a few cases which have taken the opposite view. From the note to Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. v. Brevoort, 25 L. R. A. 527, and Farnham, Waters, pp. 1558 et seq., it appears that the following cases, in addition to those cited in HARRINGTON v. DEMARIS, have adopted this view: West v. Taylor, 18 Or. 165, 13 Pac. 665; Gillett v. Johnson, 30 Conn. 180; Macomber v. Godfrey, 108 Mass. 219, 11 Am. Rep. 349; Hinkle v. Avery, 88 Iowa, 47, 45 Am. St. Rep. 224, 55 N. W. 77; New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hamlet Hay Co. 149 Ind. 344, 47 N. E. 1060, 49 N. E. 269; Mansford v. Ross, 4 New Zealand L. R. 290; Mitchell v. Bain, 142 Ind. 604, 42 N. E. 230.

Wis. 438, 20 L. R. A. 40, 54 N. W. 793, cited in the HARRINGTON CASE, has been cited in Blohowak v. Grochoski, 119 Wis. 195, 96 N. W. 551, holding that a stream does not cease to be a water course by spreading over low land before flowing again in a natural channel; and Rigney v. Tacoma Light & Water Co. 9 Wash. 580, 26 L. R. A. 427, 38 Pac. 147, holding that the spreading out of a stream over a large area of low ground does not deprive it of its character as a water course.

Conversely, White v. Sheldon, 35 Hun, 193, held that water issuing from springs, and flowing sluggishly, without determinate channel, over adjoining lands toward a natural creek, is mere surface water; so Livingston v. McDonald, 21 Iowa, 160, 89 Am. Dec. 563, held that it is not sufficient to constitute a water course that the water flows customarily in a known direction if there are no banks and channels.

If the water diffuses itself over the surface so that it never attains a regular course and channel, it cannot be regarded as a water course, although the source is permanent. Hawley v. Sheldon, 64 Vt. 491, 33 Am. St. Rep. 941, 24 Atl. 717.

premises, thereby injuring the grass, crops, and fruits trees growing thereon, to his damage in the suit of $2,000. The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint, and, for a separate defense, avers, in effect, that water originally collecting in a swamp on Dorothy's land never reached plaintiff's premises by any channel having a bed or banks, but that during the rainy season, when the accumulation was greatest, the overflow found its way westward on the surface to defendant's land, where it sunk in the ground and was lost, and another part found its way northward, emptying into an old channel of the Walla Walla river; that about fifteen years ago Dorothy caused the swamp to be drained by digging one ditch northward to such old channel, and another westward to the boundary of his land, where defendant appropriated the water flowing therein, and also extended the latter ditch northward to the old channel, in which he placed a dam, and, by means of another ditch, conducted all the water flowing from the swamp, in the irrigating season, to his premises, where it was appropriated to a beneficial purpose, and ever since has been used adversely to the plaintiff and to all other persons. For a further defense, it is alleged that from time immemorial the stream mentioned in the complaint has had its only source in a spring of water issuing from defendant's land, which, augmented by the flow of water from other springs, on his premises, originally consisted of a volume 12 inches wide and of the same depth, two thirds of which for more than twenty-five years has been adversely used by him and his predecessors in interest in irrigating crops, the remainder being permitted to flow to plaintiff's premises; that from natural causes the volume of water originally flowing in this stream has gradually diminished, and the surplus, after supplying the defendant's use, sinks into the porous soil before reaching plaintiff's land; that in April, 1900, defendant built a new dam in the stream to take the place of an old one therein, but diverts no more water thereby than formerly, "and that defendant's diversion and use of the water of said stream has at all times been, and now is, a right which belongs to him absolutely, as appurtenant to the land by him owned." It is also alleged that, in the fall of 1875 or 1876, defendant's predecessor in interest diverted and appropriated to a beneficial purpose two thirds of all the water flowing from springs on defendant's land, and ever since that time such water has been used adversely to plaintiff and to all other per- 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sons, and that during the last five years, owing to the diminution by natural causes of water flowing from these springs, the quantity now used by defendant is less than that originally appropriated by his predecessors. The reply having put in issue the allegations of new matter in the answer, a trial was had before the court, which found the facts, in substance, as alleged in the complaint, and, as conclusions of law deducible therefrom, that plaintiff was entitled to have all obstructions placed in the stream removed, so as to permit one half the water arising from the springs on Dorothy's lands, not exceeding 60 inches, to flow in the channel to his premises, where he could divert 48 inches into his ditch, and permit 12 inches to flow in the bed of the stream through his land, but in no event to take more than one half the entire flow, and that the defendant was entitled to use the remaining quantity after supplying that given to plaintiff, who was awarded damages in the sum of $700 by reason of his deprivation of the use of the water; and, having given a decree in accordance therewith, the defendant appeals.

Moore, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An examination of the pleadings, the substance of which is hereinbefore set out, shows that the controversy involved in this suit relates to the use of water from a stream by riparian proprietors; and, though appropriations of water are mentioned in the complaint and answer, no priority of possession of public land is alleged by either party as a foundation for a vested and accrued right to the use of such water (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2339, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1437); nor is it averred by either party that, after the necessary demands of a prior appropriator had been supplied, there remained a quantity which he appropriated. Simmons v. Winters, 21 Or. 35, 28 Am. St. Rep. 727, 27 Pac. 7; Carson v. Gentner, 33 Or. 512, 43 L. R. A. 130, 52 Pac. 506; Browning v. Lewis, 39 Or. 11, 64 Pac. 304; McCall v. Porter, 42 Or. 49, 70 Pac. 820, 71 Pac. 976. It will be remembered that the complaint states that plaintiff and his grantor had used the water in question more than ten years adversely to the defendant, but, as his land is situated on the stream below that of the defendant, and the testimony fails to show any recognition by the latter of his alleged right, his use has not been adverse to the defendant. North Powder Mill Co. v. Coughanour, 34 Or. 9, 54 Pac. 223; Bowman v. Bowman, 35 Or. 279, 57 Pac. 546. So, too, the answer alleges that the water issuing from the springs on Dorothy's land was used by defendant adversely to plaintiff more than ten years prior to bringing this suit. If the water from these springs was never tributary to the stream in question, defendant's use thereof could not have been adverse to plaintiff, who, as a riparian proprietor, was never entitled thereto. The testimony shows that, though the volume of water flowing in the stream to plaintiff's premises was annually diminishing, his use thereof was undisturbed until about 1898; and, if it be conceded that the water from the springs on Dorothy's land originally formed a part of this stream, the defendant's interference therewith not having been sufficient to enable him to invoke the statute of limitations, his use of the water could not toll the plaintiff's right thereto. This eliminates the question of adverse use by the respective parties, and confines the inquiry as follows: (1) What constitutes the waters of the stream flowing through the lands of the parties? 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(2) Has the defendant, as a riparian proprietor, taken more than his share of the water of the stream? and, if so (3), What damage has the plaintiff suffered in consequence thereof?

Considering these questions in their order, the testimony shows that one R. M. Dorothy owns the east half of section 21 in township 5 north, of range 36 east of the Willamette meridian, the defendant the west half of that section, and the plaintiff, the southeast quarter and the east half of the northeast quarter of section 20 in that township and range, except, however, 29 acres from the north end of the latter land, and also 1 acre therefrom on which a schoolhouse has been erected; that the Walla Walla river now flows westerly through the northern part of these sections near a bluff, but prior to 1870 it ran in an old channel, about 200 yards south of its present bed; that a small stream, known as "Spring Branch," is found on defendant's land, and flows southwesterly to and through plaintiff's premises, emptying into the river at a point below. This branch was probably an older channel of the river, for during freshets in the latter stream, before the channel was changed to its present bed, the water overflowed the banks on the south and passed down Spring branch, and, to prevent the stream from permanently following such course, plaintiff's grantor, George De Haven, and others, constructed a dam on the south bank of the river on the line of the overflow. About 15 acres of Dorothy's land was originally a swamp, in which brush and tules grew, and where the water during the entire year stood about 3 feet deep; but about 1884 he drained this marsh, and discovered that it was caused by three large springs therein. It is alleged in the complaint, and the court found, that the source of Spring branch was the springs on Dorothy's land, though defendant maintains that the fountain head of this stream is a spring on his premises, and that the water from the springs on Dorothy's land never reached Spring branch in any channel, and, this, being so, the court erred in making its finding to that effect, and in rendering the decree based thereon. Each party introduced in evidence a map on which is severally delineated the land owned by the plaintiff, by the defendant, and by Dorothy; but, no survey of the stream, river, old channel, or dams ever having been made, the charts do not coincide in important particulars, and hence, neither can be adopted as correct, except in so far as the representations thereon are corroborated. The plaintiff contends that the dam placed in the stream, constituting an obstruction to the flow of water from the springs on Dorothy's land to his premises, is built in the old channel. The defendant maintains, however, that the dam complained of is placed in Spring branch, and permits as much water to flow to plaintiff's land as passed an old dam which was supplanted by the new structure, and that Spring branch is separate from the old channel. Whether or not Spring branch is a part of the old channel of the Walla Walla river is of no consequence; but the identity of the dam that produced the injury of which plaintiff complains is important.

Considering whether the water from the swamp on Dorothy's land ever found its way originally into Spring branch, we think the preponderance of the testimony shows that it flowed westward therefrom on the surface into this stream, and also northward in the same manner into the old channel. When Dorothy drained this swamp, he dug a ditch therefrom northward, and conducted water into the old channel, and also made another ditch westward from the swamp to the boundary of his land, where defendant continued the conduit north, causing the water flowing therein to be discharged into the old channel. The marsh having been reclaimed, it was ascertained that the swamp was caused by three large springs, known as No. 1, which discharges its water westward, and Nos. 2 and 3, which emit their waters northward, and all now emptying into the old channel. This change in the flow of water from spring No. 1 probably causing a scarcity, George De Haven, plaintiff's grantor, Enoch Demaris, defendant's father and predecessor in interest, and one Highby Harris, who then owned land through which Spring branch flowed, about 1885, removed a part of the old dam, built on the bank of the old channel to prevent an overflow, and let the water issuing from these springs flow down such branch, in which, as we understand the testimony, the greater part thereof has continued to glide for more than fifteen years, until the summer of 1900, when the dam was replaced, and the water from the springs conducted in the old channel to a dam built therein, where by means of a ditch it is diverted and used in irrigating crops and an orchard growing on defendant's land.

Mr. Gould, in his work on Waters, 3d ed. § 263, in elucidating the principle that water which does not flow in a channel is not subject to the rules regulating the rights of riparian proprietors, says: "But if a well-defined natural stream empties into a swamp or lake, where all definite channel is lost, and emerges again into a well-defined channel below, it is a question of fact, dependent upon the extent of the swamp or lake, whether it is the same stream; and, if it is, the owners of land upon the lower stream have riparian rights, and an owner of land upon the stream above the swamp or lake is not entitled to divert water therefrom to their injury." In the next section the learned author discussing this question further, says: "A stream does not cease to be a watercourse, and become mere surface water, because at a certain point it spreads over a level meadow several rods in width, and flows for a distance without defined banks before flowing again in a definite channel." In Case v. Hoffman, 84 Wis. 438, 20 L. R. A. 40, 36 Am. St. Rep. 937, 54 N. W. 793, it was held that the flowing of water upon and beneath the surface of lands between a natural lake of about 60 acres in extent, and a creek into which they discharge, constitutes a water course, where the flow is all in the same direction, and a part of the way along a distinct and plainly marked channel, although for some of the distance it spreads over wide reaches of marsh and swamp lands, and percolates the soil in many and most places between the lake and the creek. To the same effect, see Cox v. Bernard, 39 Or. 53, 64 Pac. 860, and Mace v. Mace, 40 Or. 586, 67 Pac. 660, 68 Pac. 737. Though there is a conflict in the testimony respecting the character of the original outlet from the swamp westward,—some of the witnesses insisting that it was well-defined, and others that the water flowed on the surface,—we think it was in fact a water course emanating from the springs into a swamp of sufficient extent to render it and spring No. 1 tributary to Spring branch. The water flowing in the outlet from the swamp northward into the old channel never originally reached Spring branch, but when De Haven, Demaris, and Harris, by a concert of action, took out the dam, and let such water, together with that from spring No. 1, into the branch, they thereby made these springs tributary to such stream, and subject to the rules of law applicable to riparian ownership. Cottel v. Berry, 42 Or. 593, 72 Pac. 584. In that case Mr. Justice Wolverton, in discussing this subject, said: "It seems to be a rule of law that where owners of different parcels of land conduct water across the same in an artificial channel, and do not define their respective interests in the water, their reciprocal rights thereto are to be measured and determined as if they were riparian owners upon a natural stream." In Burk v. Simonson, 104 Ind. 173, 54 Am. Rep.

304, 2 N. E. 309, 3 N. E. 826, it was held that, where a change is made in the flow of a natural water course, either artificially or otherwise, and riparian owners acquiesce in the new state of the stream for so long a time that new rights accrue, or may be presumed to have accrued, such acquiescence is binding, and precludes a restoration of the stream and its surroundings to their original condition. In the case at bar, we think the testimony warrants the conclusion that, after defendant continued the west ditch north on his premises, so as to conduct the water from spring No. 1 into the old channel, the riparian proprietors removed a part of the old dam, permitting the water issuing from Dorothy's land to flow down Spring branch, thereby making it tributary thereto and entitling them to a reasonable use thereof.

The parties being riparian proprietors, and entitled to the reasonable use of the water flowing in Spring branch, including that issuing from the springs on Dorothy's land, the next question to be considered is whether the defendant has taken more than his share. In Jones v. Conn, 39 Or. 30, 54 L. R. A. 630, 87 Am. St. Rep. 634, 64 Pac. 855, 65 Pac. 1068, Mr. Chief Justice Bean, after reviewing numerous decisions involving the right of a riparian proprietor to use the water flowing through his land for irrigation, deduces the following conclusion as applicable to the arid region of the United States: "It is accordingly now quite generally held in this country and in England that, after the natural wants of all the riparian proprietors have been supplied, each proprietor is entitled to a reasonable use of the water for irrigation purposes." In enforcing this rule, it is further said in the opinion: "For the protection of the rights of the several riparian proprietors, it has even been held that a court of equity may, in a proper case, apportion the flow of the stream, after the natural wants of the several proprietors have been satisfied, in such a manner as may seem equitable and just under the circumstances." In Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 29 Pac. 325, it was held that the inquiry as to what constituted a reasonable use of the water of a stream for irrigating the land of a riparian proprietor was a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances appearing in each particular case; the court saying: "The larger the number of riparian proprietors whose rights are involved, the greater will be the difficulty of adjustment. In such a case the length of the stream, the volume of water in it, the extent of each ownership along the banks, the character of the soil owned by each contestant, the area sought to be irrigated by each,—all these and many other considerations must enter into the solution of the problem; but one principle is surely established, namely, that no proprietor can absorb all the water of the stream, so as to allow none to flow down to his neighbor." In the case at bar it is impossible to determine from the testimony any of these elements, though it will be remembered that the complaint states that, after this stream crosses plaintiff's premises, it flows "on and to the lands of other persons." If others have any rights in, or claims to the use of, the water flowing in Spring branch, it is needless to say that, not having been made parties, the decree herein cannot possibly affect them. If they are entitled to a reasonable use of water, defendant's rights as a riparian proprietor must necessarily be abridged just in proportion as theirs are judicially determined. The plaintiff having been decreed 60 inches of water, providing that does not exceed one half the volume flowing in the branch, the defendant has no cause to complain, because under no circumstances would he be entitled to more, assuming that the demands of the parties are equal. The testimony shows that in 1875 plaintiff's grantor dug a ditch so as to tap Spring branch on the east boundary of his land, and conducted water therein, which since that time, and until August, 1900, has been used in irrigating about 15 acres, which has been cultivated as an orchard, garden, lawn, and meadow. The plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, says that, if all the water from the springs on Dorothy's land flowed into Spring branch, the volume therein would be about 3 feet wide and from 7 to 8 inches deep, and, in speaking of the capacity of his ditch, said it was about 2 feet wide and from 2 to 3 inches deep; and, the court having awarded him 48 inches of water for the purpose of irrigation, we conclude the quantity so decreed is the measure of his right. The decree, however, does not prescribe how such quantity shall be ascertained; but, as plaintiff's testimony seems to imply that he estimates it to be square inches of the vertical cross-section of the stream as it ordinarily flows, he is entitled to that quantity, without pressure, to be measured in a box 12 inches wide, placed in his dam on a grade as near as possible with the fall of his ditch, and the 12 inches decreed him in the bed of the creek will be measured in the same manner at his dam in a box of the same dimensions, set as near as possible on the same grade as the average fall of the stream as it flows through his land.

We think the weight of the testimony shows that the dam which confines in the old channel the water issuing from the several springs on Dorothy's land is the primary cause of the injury complained of. Such dam, and also the new one built on defendant's land, will be removed sufficiently to permit the quantity of water awarded plaintiff to flow to his premises, provided, however, it does not exceed at any time one half the volume flowing in Spring branch.

This brings us to a consideration of the damages sustained by plaintiff. The trial court having visited his premises, with the parties and their attorneys, allowed him $700; but the considerations which led the court to award this sum are not contained in the transcript, although that comprises the entire testimony. The lowest estimate placed by any witness on the damage done was $1,000 and it would seem that such sum ought to have been awarded; but the plaintiff, not having insisted thereon at the trial in this court, is evidently satisfied therewith.

From these considerations, it follows that the decree is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Navigable river—title to bed.

The title to the bed of a navigable river in Nebraska is in the state, and the rights of a riparian proprietor on such stream are bounded by the banks of the river.

Headnote by OLDHAM, C.

Case Note.—It is to be regretted that a decision which sweeps away property rights in a considerable quantity of real estate should not be based on a consideration of fundamental principles, rather than upon a mere count of the cases pro and con, as seems to have been done in the above case. At common law all streams which were in fact capable of navigation were considered as navigable, whether the capacity was for floatage, for poling boats, for towing them back and forth, or for the more independent means of navigation. Thames, which is not a tidal river at the place in question. But, on the other hand, it is a navigable river,—that is, all the Queen's subjects have the right of passing and repassing on it, and it is what is called in the old books a 'King's stream,' by which is meant, not that the soil must belong to the King, but that it is a highway, and that the King is the natural guardian and conservator of the commodious and convenient passage of the river by his subjects."

The King's title never depended on the question of navigability, but upon the fact that the soil claimed by him was covered by tide water. This was upon the theory that the King, being the chief personage in the Kingdom, had the right to the most impor-

Oldham, C., filed the following opinion:

This was a suit in ejectment, which was tried to the court and a jury on the following stipulation of facts: "It is hereby stipulated by and between the parties hereto: That the plaintiff is, and in 1876 was, the owner of so much of the land described in his petition as was above the line of ordinary high-water mark of the Missouri river in May, 1876. That in May, 1876, the Missouri river, which is a navigable state boundary river, suddenly abandoned its permanent channel adjacent to plaintiff's said land, leaving its former channel and forming a new channel by suddenly cutting through a neck of land to the south of plaintiff's said land. That all the land in controversy in this action and occupied by the defendants, C. W. Turgeon, V. C. Turgeon, N. Turgeon, Charles Bray, and Caleb Marsh, at the time this action was commenced and at the present time, is wholly below and outside of the ordinary high-water mark of the Missouri river, as it flowed at the time of said sudden change, and cut off the permanent bed of said river, and is now the dry, abandoned bed of the said river. That the lands occupied by the defendants at the commencement of this action and at the present time constitute the abandoned river bed of the Missouri river as said river flowed prior to the cut-off in 1876, being that part of said bed between the center of the channel where said river then ran and the high bank of the land owned and occupied by the plaintiff on the Nebraska side and described in plaintiff's petition." The court directed a verdict for the defendant. There was judgment on the verdict, and to set aside this judgment plaintiff brings error to this court.

The stipulation of facts in this case is exceedingly meager, and the most that can be gathered from it is that in and since 1876 the plaintiff was the owner of riparian lands on the Missouri river, a navigable stream; that by a sudden change of the channel the waters receded from plaintiff's land and left an abandoned river bottom between the former high-water mark of the tant water, which was the sea. And the sea extended as far as the tide flowed. The King's title, therefore, depended on the tide, and not upon the question of navigability. Farnham, Waters, §§ 36 et seq.

As shown in the note to Goff v. Cogle, 42 L. R. A. 161, and Farnham, Waters, chap. 4, the rule of both the common and the civil law was that the propriety of the soil under fresh-water rivers was in the owners of the adjoining lands, Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 1, stating: "Fresh waters of what kind soever do, of common right, belong to the owners of the soil adjacent; so that the owners of the one side have, of common right, the propriety of the soil usque filum aquæ, and the owners of the other side the right of soil or ownership unto the filum aquæ on their side. And if a man be owner of the lands on both sides, in common presumption he is the owner of the whole river according to the extent of his land in length."

And in Murphy v. Ryan, Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 143, it was said that the title of the Crown to the bed of the river ceases at the point where the flow and reflow of the tide stops, and above that point the bed and soil are vested in the riparian proprietors notwithstanding the river is navigable, and has been immemorially navigated for commerce and other purposes.

Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. 443, 13 L. ed. 1058, and the cases which follow it, extending the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts to the limit of navigability, had no bearing whatever upon the question of the common-law test of navigability, or the title to the land under the streams, out dealt merely with the old quarrel between the English common-law and admiralty courts, in which the former had, by mere brute force, confined the admiralty jurisdiction to the high seas outside the body of the county. Under these circumstances, a decision which deprives the owners of lands on fresh water of their title to the land under the stream would seem to have no more justification than would any other decision which would take away private property merely because the court thought that the interests of the public might be furthered by such course.

The courts which have attempted to vest title to the river bottoms in the public have been in great doubt how far the public title ought to extend. The Tennessee court holds that the public title goes only as far as the water is capable of navigation by sea-going vessels. Stuart v. Clark, 2 Swan, 9, 58 Am. Dec. 49. While other courts have made the title depend on navigability, and then differed very largely on the test of navigability, as shown in the note to Willow River Club v. Wade, 42 L. R. A. 305.

river and the middle of its former channel, which is now occupied by the defendants. Plaintiff's claim to the land rests solely on the doctrine that the riparian owner of lands bordering on the Missouri river takes to the middle thread of the stream, notwithstanding the fact of its navigability. Had the addition to these lands been formed by gradual accretion or reliction, a different question would have been presented, since even the riparian owners on tide-water rivers at common law took the alluvion formed by slow and imperceptible accretion. But under the stipulation the lands in question were admitted to have been formed by a sudden change of the channel of the river. Consequently plaintiff's claim to the bed of the river turns on his right as a riparian owner to take to the middle thread of a navigable river that bounds his land. At common law the title to the bed of navigable tide-water rivers is in the King, who holds it in trust for his subjects. In the states of the American Union in which the English common law prevails there is a conflict of opinions in the courts of last resort as to whether the title to the beds of fresh-water rivers, which are navigable in fact, remains in the state or is in the riparian owners of the stream. This conflict arose when some of the colonial courts, and later the Supreme Court of the United States, made a departure from the common-law test of navigability (that it should be a stream in which the tide ebbs and flows, or an "arm of the sea"), and made the test a practical question of fact as to whether or not the stream was actually navigated. When this departure was made, the conflict arose in the different states as to what rule should be applied to the ownership of the beds of streams which were navigable in fact, but not at common law.

As has been stated, at common law the bed of a river in which the tide ebbed and flowed was held by the King, while the title to the bed of all fresh-water rivers was in the riparian owners. Some of the American courts, notably Illinois, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, and Maine, applied the doctrine that, as these fresh-water streams were non-navigable at common law, the common-law rule as to the title to fresh-water streams should apply, and consequently that each riparian owner took to the middle thread of the stream. Adams v. Pease, 2 Conn. 481; Braxton v. Bressler, 64 Ill. 488, 493; Delaney v. Boston, 2 Harr. (Del.) 489; Hendrick v. Cook, 4 Ga. 241. The opposite view found favor in the decisions of the supreme courts of Pennsylvania, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Minnesota, California, Nevada, Arkansas, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Alabama, Tennessee, Indiana, and others. McManus v. Carmichael, 3 Iowa, 1; Carson v. Blazer, 2 Binn. 475, 4 Am. Dec. 463; Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 682, 40 Am. Rep. 330; Lamme v. Buse, 70 Mo. 463; Schurmeier v. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 10 Minn. 82, 88 Am. Dec. 59, Gil. 59, Affirmed in Supreme Court of the United States, 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74; Packer v. Bird, 71 Cal. 134, 11 Pac. 873; Shoemaker v. Hatch, 13 Nev. 261; Bullock v. Wilson, 2 Port. (Ala.) 436; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey, 53 Ark. 314, 8 L. R. A. 559, 22 Am. St. Rep. 195, 13 S. W. 931; Elder v. Burrus, 6 Humph. 358, 367; Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 29 Ind. 364, 95 Am. Dec. 644. This line of decisions proceeds on the theory that as these streams, although not "arms of the sea" have been determined to be in fact navigable, the rule applicable to the bed of navigable tide-water streams at common law should govern them; and that, as the beds of navigable streams were reserved by the states when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the title to the beds of those rivers is in the states. The Supreme Court of the United States has held, in Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224, and Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S. 661, 34 L. ed. 819, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210, that it is for the states to determine the question of the title to the beds of these rivers, as between itself and the riparian proprietors.

It is plain that we stand at the parting of the ways in regard to the decisions of the state courts of this country on the question of title to river beds of the class in dispute. It is also apparent that each of these two divergent lines of authority starts from a basis both sound and sane, and that the results of each of these lines of decisions have been sanctioned and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. It then devolves upon us to examine carefully the decisions of our own court, and determine from them, if possible, which of the diverging paths we shall follow. The first decision of this court called to our attention is the case of Lammers v. Nissen, 4 Neb. 245. This was a dispute over the lands on the banks of the Missouri river, claimed as accretions by alluvial deposits. The case, however, was determined on the evidence, which tended to show that the lands had not been formed as alluvion after the survey by the general government. The case also involved a question of meandered lines, not in point in the instant case. The next case cited is Bissell v. Fletcher, 19 Neb. 726, 28 N. W. 303. This was a controversy over riparian rights on a non-navigable stream, and turned on a question of fact as to whether or not the lands claimed were formed by accretion. The question of riparian rights was next brought before this court in Wiggenhorn v. Kouyatz, 23 Neb. 690, 8 Am. St. Rep. 150, 37 N. W. 603. There the dispute arose over the cutting of timber from an island in the Platte river. While the case was carefully considered and the authorities reviewed by the court, yet the question as to the title to the bed of a navigable river was not in issue and in no way adverted to. Consequently this case is of little assistance in reaching a conclusion. In Gill v. Lydick, 40 Neb. 508, 59 N. W. 104, again the question was as to the right to accretions on the Missouri river, when the river recedes "slowly and imperceptibly, changing the channel of the stream and leaving the land dry theretofore covered by water." It was held that the alluvion so formed belonged to the riparian owner, but that, if the alteration takes place suddenly, the ownership would remain according to the former bounds. This case, while not in point, excludes any claim to the land by plaintiff in this cause of action on the doctrine of accretion. The next case (Bouvier v. Stricklett, 40 Neb. 793, 59 N. W. 550) was a dispute over an island in the Missouri river claimed by the riparian owner as an accretion to his land. A judgment entered in the court below in favor of the defendant was affirmed by this court. In reaching the conclusion many authorities are quoted in the opinion relative to the character of testimony necessary to establish the formation of land by accretion. For this purpose the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in St. Clair County v. Livingston, 23 Wall. 46, 23 L. ed. 59, is quoted from, because it discusses with great learning the peculiar character of the Missouri river with reference to changes in its channel. The result reached by the opinion was that the evidence in the case then considered was not sufficient to show that the island had been formed by accretion. But, plainly by some oversight, it is said in the first lines of the fourth paragraph of the syllabus: "Where the middle of the channel of a stream of water constitutes the boundary line of a tract of land. . . ." While the syllabus as a whole properly states the law, yet so much of it as seems to hold that the title to lands on the banks of the Missouri river extends to the middle of the stream is purely obiter dictum, and unfounded on any question necessarily decided in the opinion. In Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. 45 Neb. 798, 64 N. W. 239, a contest between a millowner and an irrigation company over the waters of the Republican river, Post, J., speaking for the court, clearly indicated his adherence to the doctrine that the title to the beds of navigable rivers is in the state, and not the riparian owners. But this question was not adjudicated, because it was held that the Republican river was a non-navigable stream in fact, as well as at common law. In Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 60 Neb. 754, 84 N. W. 271, 61 Neb. 317, 85 N. W. 303, 67 Neb. 325, 60 L. R. A. 889, 93 N. W. 781, again the contest was between a millowner and an irrigation company over the use of the waters of a non-navigable stream. The opinion in this case gives a very thorough and lucid discussion of the law of running waters, and, while the bed of a navigable stream was not in issue, the author clearly expressed his views on this question. Citing many authorities for his position, he said: "While this subject received slight attention in the case of Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. supra, it was not determined, as a decision of the case turned on another point. As to navigable streams, the doctrine seems to be that the water and the soil thereunder belong to the state, and are under its sovereignty and domain, in trust for the people, and cannot, therefore, be the subject of a claim of property therein or the right to the use thereof by an adjoining landowner. When the government in its survey runs meander lines along the banks of a stream and parts with its title to the adjoining land, the boundary of which would be high-water mark, then it would seem permissible to classify the stream as navigable, in which case the waters thereof and the bed thereunder would belong to the state, and be held by it in trust for the people. The waters in such streams would be held to be publici juris, and not subject to riparian claims by the adjoining landowner." In McBride v. Whitaker, 65 Neb. 137, 90 N. W. 966, the controversy was over an island in the Platte river. The learned commissioner who wrote the opinion in the case specifically called attention to the fact that he was only determining the rights of the litigants in that case, from which no impression should go out that any claims of the state to the bed of the Platte river, or any unsurveyed island therein, were to be affected.

While it is probably true, as contended by counsel for plaintiff in error before us, that there has never been a final adjudication by this court of the rights of a riparian owner to take to the middle thread of the stream of the Missouri river, yet we think that the language used in rendering the opinions in Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irrig. & Improv. Co. and Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, supra, leaves little reason to doubt that Nebraska should be added to the list of states which hold that the title to the beds of fresh-water rivers which are navigable in fact is in the state, and that the right of the riparian owner is bounded by the banks of the stream.

We therefore recommend that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Ames and Letton, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE, Appt.,

v.

JOHN McATEER et al.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE, Appt.,

v.

LOUISVILLE WATER COMPANY.

(.... Ky.)

1. Corporation—sole stockholder—ownership of property.

That one owns all the stock of a corporation does not make him the owner of its property.

2. Water company—taxation of.

The property of a water company the stock of which is all owned by the municipal corporation is subject to municipal taxation where the company was organized to sell water to private consumers, and the Constitution limits tax exemptions to public property used for public purposes, while the statutes provide for taxation of all property not exempted by the Constitution, and require municipal corporations to tax for local purposes all property subject to state tax.

3. Same.

The principle of equal taxation requires the taxation of the property of a water company organized to sell water to private consumers at the lowest rates, although all its stock is owned by the municipal corporation itself, where only a fraction of the inhabitants of the city patronize the company; since its exemption would cast a portion of the burden which should rest on the patrons of the company upon all the inhabitants of the city.

4. Same—credit on tax bills.

A water company taxed for municipal purposes may credit upon the tax bills the reasonable price of water which has been furnished to and used by the city for the years for which the tax is asserted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry L. Stone for appellant.

Case Note.—The doctrine of the Kentucky court that a water company belonging to the city is engaged in a private business is not in harmony with that of most of the courts that have passed upon the question. It is true that in the above case of LOUISVILLE v. McATEER and several other Kentucky cases the waterworks were owned by a separate corporation, but the real ownership belonged to the city, as there were no stockholders except the city itself. Indeed, in Newport v. Com. 106 Ky. 434, 45 L. R. A. 518, 50 S. W. 845, 51 S. W. 433, it appeared that there was no separate corporation, but what was called "the Newport Waterworks was used and operated as a water company, and had a secretary, duly elected by the city." But in that as in the McATEER CASE it was held that the municipality occupied, as to its waterworks, "the same position as would a private corporation owning such works;" and therefore it was held that it could be taxed under the state statute for its franchise to carry on that business. But, as declared in L.R.A. (N.S.)

Farnham on Waters, vol. 1, page 894: "The general rule is to exempt from taxation property owned by the public; and property held and used for the purpose of furnishing a water supply is within the rule; and it is immaterial that a charge is made for water furnished private consumers so that some revenue is obtained from the plant. Smith v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L. R. A. 469, 12 S. W. 924; State, Water Comrs., Prosecutors, v. Gaffney, 34 N. J. L. 131, 133; Wayland v. Middlesex County, 4 Gray, 500." The author points out that the Kentucky court has taken a different view of the matter, referring to the decision in Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, 14 S. W. 502, which is followed in the McATEER CASE. This held that such property, being owned and operated for the comfort and advantage of individuals, could not be deemed to be operated by the municipality in its governmental character. The ground of exemption contended for by the author is not that the property is owned and used by the municipality in its governmental

Mr. R. L. Greene also for appellees.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for decision in this case is whether the property of the Louisville Water Company is liable for taxation by the city. For five years before the beginning of these suits the water company had not been assessed on any of its property for taxation for city purposes. It claims that its property is exempt from city taxation because the city owns all its stock, or did own all but one or two shares for the years in question. The Louisville Water Company is a corporation created by an act of the legislature approved March 6, 1854 (Acts 1853-54, chap. 507, p. 121). Its location, and that of most of its property, is within the city of Louisville. Its business is to furnish water to the citizens of Louisville and vicinity for which it charges rates based upon the quantity of water used. Many years ago the city, by authority conferred by the legislature and exercised by the city council, subscribed and otherwise acquired the great majority of the capital stock of the corporation, and now owns all of the stock. This stock is owned by the sinking fund commissioners of the city. The water company owes a large bonded debt, secured by mortgage on its plant. The income of the water company is used to pay the expenses of operating and maintaining the plant, then to pay the interest on its bonded debt, and then to provide a sinking fund for the ultimate payment of its debt. Rates to consumers are fixed so as to meet these fixed charges. No dividends are paid on the stock. The plan is and has been to operate the plant so as to place the price of water to consumers at the lowest possible figure. As the net income increases, rates are lowered. The contention of the water company in these cases is that, as the city owns all the stock, it in effect owns the plant; that to tax the plant is to tax the city, which it must pay by levying and collecting other taxes from its taxpayers, thus doing the absurd thing of going to the trouble and expense of taking money from one pocket to put it in the other.

It is not true, in law, that the owner of all the stock of a corporation owns the property of the corporation. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629; Fietsam v. Hay, 122 Ill. 293, 3 Am. St. Rep. 492, 13 N. E. 501; People ex rel. Bank of Watertown v. Assessors, 1 Hill, 616; State ex rel. Watson v. Standard Oil Co. 49 Ohio St. 137, 15 L. R. A. 145, 34 Am. St. Rep. 541, 30 N. E. 279. Even if there was not the weight of authority for the last statement, the city would scarcely want to take the full effect of its contention, for, capacity, but that it is held by all the people in such a way that the burden of the tax, while apparently shifted by placing it upon the public property, is not really shifted. In opposition to this, the McATEER CASE contends that only those who consume the water pay for it; and says: "Many thousands of citizens who are taxpayers do not patronize the water company at all, but depend for their water supply on private wells and cisterns, or upon the public wells. If the water company is compelled to pay a municipal tax, it must collect the money with which to pay it, not by taxation, but from its water rates,—from its customers." The court added that, if water was furnished to everybody alike by the city, it would be truly an idle thing for the city to collect taxes from its water company. There may be some ground of distinction between the case which the court had in hand and that of the water companies of most cities, where a different doctrine obtains, in the facts as to the generality of the use of the water supply by the inhabitants. But it has been 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

assumed in most cases that the water supply is in a fair sense for the general use of the inhabitants of the city as truly as are the streets and fire protection, which do not indeed benefit all alike, but which are furnished impartially to those who have need of them. As emphasizing the doctrine that municipal waterworks are exempt from taxation on the ground that to tax them would not really change the burden of the taxpayers, a considerable number of cases have limited the exemption to the municipality within which the waterworks are situated, so that property or appurtenances connected with waterworks, but lying outside of those limits, is not exempt from taxation outside. As illustrating, see Newport v. Unity, 68 N. H. 587, 73 Am. St. Rep. 626, 44 Atl. 704; Rochester v. Coe, 25 App. Div. 300, 49 N. Y. Supp. 502; People ex rel. Rochester v. DeWitt, 59 App. Div. 493, 69 N. Y. Supp. 366; People ex rel. Auburn v. Duryea, 59 App. Div. 488, 69 N. Y. Supp. 388; People ex rel. Amsterdam v. Hess, 157 N. Y. 42, 51 N. E. 410.

if it did, then it would follow that the company's debt was the city's debt; adding the bonded debt of the water company, of about one and one-half millions, to the city's other authorized debt, might operate to invalidate some of its recent bond issues. If, upon a foreclosure of the mortgage upon the water plant, it was insufficient to pay the bonded debt, the city would not care to be bound for the balance because it happened to own all the debtor corporation's stock.

There is another fallacy in appellee's position: This is not an effort to tax the capital stock or shares of the water company. If it were, then the question would be here whether the city could tax its own property for its own uses. There is a marked distinction, though, between taxing the property of a corporation and taxing its shares of stock. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, §§ 7, 567; Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 163 U. S. 416, 41 L. ed. 211, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1113; Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645. Cases from other jurisdictions are cited as authority for the proposition that a municipality cannot tax its own property for city purposes. Strictly, these cases are made to turn upon the legislative intent, as, in our opinion, this one must also turn. It is generally held that, unless expressly authorized or directed by statute, it will not be considered that a municipality was authorized or required to list its own property for taxation for its own purposes.

If it be conceded that taxing the plant of the water company, all the shares of which are owned by the city, is indirectly a taxing by the city of its own property, it brings us directly to consider the source of appellant's power and the extent of its duty to tax alike all property within its jurisdiction. Section 171 of the Constitution of this state requires that taxes "shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws." Section 170 of the same instrument creates and limits the exemptions from taxation. It provides: "There shall be exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes." This is the only reference to property owned by a municipality. Property owned by or on behalf of the public, but not used for public purposes, is not exempt. "The express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of another." That the water company, if owned by the city, is public property, is not questioned. But although its stock is owned by the city, and the property is used in supplying the citizens water, the waterworks are not "used for public purposes," within the meaning of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

§ 170, supra, and are subject to taxation for state and county purposes. Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624; Negley v. Henderson, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1394, 55 S. W. 554, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 912, 59 S. W. 19; Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 522, 14 S. W. 502. In the case last cited this court said, in speaking of the dual character of a city's government, and of property owned by it: "A municipal corporation has a double character. In one it acts strictly in its governmental capacity. In the other, for the profit or convenience of its citizens. Considered in the latter light, it occupies the attitude of a private corporation, merely, while in the former it is an arm of the state government, or a part of its political power. It is an imperium in imperio. The property necessary to the exercise of those duties which are strictly governmental is exempt from taxation, but this is not so of that which is held by the municipality for the comfort of its citizens, individually or collectively, or for money-making purposes merely." Following the requirement of § 171 of the Constitution, which defines property subject to taxation for state purposes, the statute is (Ky. Stat. 1903, § 4020): "All real and personal estate within this state, and all personal estate of persons residing in this state, and of all corporations organized under the laws of this state, whether the property be in or out of this state, including intangible property, which shall be considered and estimated in fixing the value of corporate franchises as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to taxation unless the same be exempted from taxation by the Constitution."

Louisville, a city of the first class, gets its authority for levying and collecting taxes under § 2980, Ky. Stat. 1903, in which is this provision: "Each city shall raise a revenue from ad valorem taxes, and a poll tax and license fee, and to that end the common council of each city is hereby authorized and empowered to provide each year, by ordinance, for the assessment of all real and personal estate within the corporate limits thereof subject to taxation for state purposes, and shall levy an ad valorem tax on same, not exceeding," etc. By ordinances duly adopted for each of the years in question, the city levied an ad valorem tax upon "all lands, improvements, personalty, and franchises subject to taxation in the city of Louisville." These ordinances were comprehensive enough to embrace the property of the Louisville Water Company, if it would cover the property of any corporation subject to taxation within the city. It was not necessary to set out each piece of property, or the names of the owners, in the levy ordinance. The office of that ordinance was to fix the rate of taxation. Its subjects had already been fixed by the statute and the Constitution.

Thus we find an express authority for the city's levying this tax. It is made as clear as language could make it, without enumerating the particular property or its owners. We might leave the case with this statement. But counsel have laid such earnest stress upon the proposition that the act of collecting this tax would be a foolish enterprise—taxing the city's property to support the city government—and therefore presumably not within the contemplation of the constitutional convention or the legislature in enacting the provisions above quoted, that we will notice briefly why the convention who framed the Constitution may have employed both the language and the thought we find in the exemption clause quoted from § 170, with the full purpose of having it applied as is here done. Probably the most prominent feature of the present Constitution is its effort to equalize the burdens of government upon all who enjoy its privileges. Class legislation, and special exemptions and rights which amount to that, are strictly forbidden, and guarded against. To grant the exemption claimed by appellee, even if we could by implication enlarge the exemption clause of the Constitution, would of itself work an unjust discrimination in favor of some and against others of the citizens of Louisville who are taxpayers. It has already been noticed that the water company maintains a separate corporate existence, as if the city owned none of its stock. Only those who consume its water pay for it. Many thousands of citizens who are taxpayers do not patronize the water company at all, but depend for their water supply on private wells and cisterns, or upon the public wells. If the water company is compelled to pay a municipal tax, it must collect the money with which to pay it, not by taxation, but from its water rates,—from its customers. This will result in those who use that water paying a slightly increased rate for it. It may be well supposed that many manufacturing concerns, the owners of improved property, and the wealthy generally, are patrons of the water company. If the water company were not compelled to pay taxes to the city, it would need just that much less revenue from its customers. If this were all, it would not be so bad, though it could scarcely be said that it is just to tax everybody to buy a water plant which less than all have the whole benefit of. But that is not all. For the city is compelled to raise annually by ad valorem taxation so much money to support its fire department, its public parks, its schools, and its government generally.

1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If one class of property escapes taxation, to the extent of its value all other classes that are taxed must bear the additional burden. Therefore, if appellee water company is not taxed by the city, an equivalent in the taxes it would pay must be paid by other property and citizens. So that those who do not, by reason of the location or nature of their property, or for other cause, patronize the water company, have to pay an additional tax to maintain the city government, in order that those who do patronize the water company may have cheap water. That would amount to the taking of one person's property for the benefit of another. If the water company pays taxes as other corporations are compelled to do, their sum will be apportioned among the various funds; e. g., a certain per cent for school purposes, so much for police, and so on. Thereby those who get the benefit of the waterworks will contribute to it in rates, in the proportion they use the water, enabling it to pay all its fixed charges, including taxes. If water was furnished to everybody alike by the city, as it does police and fire protection, and the use of its streets, parks, and schools, it would be just and proper that the waterworks should be maintained by general taxation, as are the public agencies and institutions named. In that event it would be truly an idle thing for the city to collect taxes from its water company. The line of thought just presented brings us to this further proposition: If it were not contemplated that a city's property not used for public purposes, but used as a private corporation, was not to be taxed by the city, on the ground that the city would be thereby indirectly taxing itself, and that such a thing is not to be thought of, then it would follow that, if the city owned less than all the capital stock of any corporation within its limits, it should not tax that corporation,—at least to the extent that it owned stock in it. This would result in the city's not taxing the gas company, if it owns stock in it, as it doubtless does. And if its sinking fund commissioners have invested part of the sinking fund in the stock of a bank within the city, or in city railway stock, the property of those concerns ought not to be taxed,—at least to the extent of the city's stock. It is a historical fact that certain of the state's sinking funds have for many years been invested in the shares of certain banks and other corporations in this state. It has not been urged that on that account those institutions were exempt from state taxes to any extent. The reason is obvious. Its application and the analogy to the case in hand are equally clear.

The record discloses that, for many years prior to the period of the default, appellee water company had paid taxes to the city, and charged the city contract rates for water furnished its various departments. The last contract does not seem to have been renewed, although some of the departments, notably the city schools and park board, have been paying their water rates to the water company as heretofore. So long as the water company maintains a separate corporate existence, owning its corporate property and exercising its franchises, it ought to be managed and maintained as a separate concern, dealing at arm's length with the city on business principles, as other corporations in which the city owns an interest deal with it. No inequality among, nor injustice to, the taxpayers can then occur from the city's operating this private corporation for the benefit mainly of those who can pay for its service.

In this suit the city should credit upon appellee's tax bills the reasonable price of the water it has used for the years for which the tax is being asserted, and for which it may not have paid. The basis of this credit should be upon just such terms as the court may find from evidence, if the parties cannot agree upon it. Credit should be given on the city's tax bills for each year's water rents, so as to avoid penalties and interest, so far as such water rents may go to extinguish the annual bills.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the Circuit Court in the suit against Mc-Ateer, etc., refusing the mandamus against the board of equalization to compel them to pass upon the assessment of the water company's property as returned by the assessor, and the judgment of the Circuit Court in the franchise tax case, dismissing the city's petition, are each reversed, and they are remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF CHICAGO, Appt.,

v.

NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. Municipal corporation—water rates—liability of property owner.

A municipal corporation engaged in the business of furnishing water to its inhabitants for pay cannot, after losing by lapse of time its lien on a parcel of property for water furnished thereon, compel its owner to pay for water furnished before he acquired title.

2. Water rates—payment under duress.

Payment of water rates under protest, to avoid the shutting off of the water, which would be a great detriment to the property owner, is under duress, within the rule that payments so made may be recovered back.

3. Interest—liability of municipal corporation for.

A municipal corporation is liable for interest where it wrongfully exacts money which it holds without just right or claim.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money which had been paid for water rates under protest. Affirmed.

Statement by Wilkin, J.:

Appellee brought an action of assumpsit against appellant in the superior court of Cook county, to recover for certain water charges paid by it under protest. An agreed state of facts was entered of record, and, upon the case being submitted to the court without a jury, judgment was entered against appellant for $1,849, together with interest and costs of suit. This judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court, and a further appeal has brought the case to this court. The agreed state of facts shows that the city of Chicago has for more than ten years been operating a water system and furnishing its inhabitants with water, and it is the only corporation, firm, or person within the limits of the city owning or operating a waterworks system. Section 32 of the ordinances provides that any person failing to pay his water rates within the time prescribed shall not be entitled to any discount; and, if the rate is not paid within sixty days after the first day of the current assessment period, the water shall be shut off from the premises; and in case of failure of the water bureau to shut off the supply on or before thirty days prior to the expiration of the current collection period, the water bureau shall lose any lien it may have against the premises as to 75 per cent of the frontage rate and all extra fixtures, and shall collect the same by an action at law. The appellee is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and obtained title to a number of pieces of property in the city of Chicago at various times through foreclosure proceedings. The city of Chicago presented to appellee separate bills for water supplied upon each piece of property, thus seeking to charge appellee not only for the water supplied to it upon the particular property to which said bill related, but, in addition thereto, seeking to charge it with back water rates for water supplied to former owners or tenants prior to the ownership or occupancy of appellee, and which the former owner or tenant had failed to pay. In each case, upon the presentation of the bill, appellee tendered to appellant the amount of charges for water furnished since the particular piece of property had been transferred to appellee, and denied any liability for the back water rates furnished other tenants or occupants; and appellee remonstrated with the authorities of the city of Chicago against the charges for back water rates, but was informed by appellant that, unless the particular bill or bills were paid as rendered, the appellant would proceed at once to shut off the water from the particular premises; and in some instances the water was shut off from certain premises by the appellant. Thereupon appellee made payment to appellant of each of said water bills, aggregating the sum of $1,564.94, including the back water rates, and also including a charge for shutting off the water in places where the water had actually been shut off. Each of said payments was made by a check inclosed in a letter stating that said payment was made under protest, and for the sole reason that appellant had threatened to shut off, or had shut off, the supply of water from the premises to which the particular bill so paid related. Each of the particular pieces of property to which the several bills related was improved, at the time, with buildings used as stores, flats, and residences, furnished with tubs, boilers, washbasins, and a system of water pipes and faucets connected with and supplied by water from the system of water pipes of appellant.

Mr. Edgar B. Tolman, with Mr. William D. Barge, for appellant:

As appellee was not under duress when making the payments, no recovery can be had.

Messrs. Hoyne, O'Connor, & Hoyne, for appellee:

The circumstances under which appellee

Case Note.—The right of a municipal corporation or water company to compel a property owner to pay for water furnished to a former occupant seems to depend on the existence of a lien against the property. In the absence of such lien, the water company is not allowed to enforce a contract obligation of one person against another who has not in any way assumed it, except where the water is actually turned off at the time of the purchase, so that the new owner may obtain an adjustment of the equities before he pays the purchase price for his property.

Turner v. Revere Water Co. 171 Mass. 329, 40 L. R. A. 657, 68 Am. St. Rep. 432, 50 N. E. 634, holds that to create a lien the authority of the legislature is necessary, and a mere regulation of the water company is not sufficient.

A purchaser of property will, however, take it subject to a statutory lien existing against it for water furnished the prior occupant. Vreeland v. O'Neil, 36 N. J. Eq. 399. Affirmed in 37 N. J. Eq. 574; Hudson Trust & Sav. Inst. v. Carr-Curran Paper Mills Co. 58 N. J. Eq. 59, 43 Atl. 418.

It has, however, been held that, if the water has actually been turned off for default of a landowner, a successor in title cannot require it to be turned on again 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

without the settlement of the arrearages; it being held that his remedy is against his grantor for indemnity for the amount due. Jones v. Nashville, 109 Tenn. 550, 72 S. W. 985; Altoona v. Shellenberger, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 544; Girard L. Ins. Co. v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 393; Howe v. Orange (N. J.) 62 Atl. 777. And this rule may be enforced by a private water company. Brumm v. Pottsville Water Co. 9 Sadler (Pa.) 483, 22 W. N. C. 137, 12 Atl. 855. And this is especially true if such course is authorized by the legislature. Atlanta v. Burton, 90 Ga. 486, 16 S. E. 214.

However, under a statute imposing a penalty on a water company for failure to furnish a supply to anyone who has paid or tendered the rates, the company cannot withhold water from one who has complied with the conditions because of arrearages due from a former occupant. Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Wilkinson, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 411, 48 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 145.

Under the English statute 50 & 51 Vict. chap. 21, § 4, a personal action may be brought against a purchaser for arrears of water rents accruing before the date of his purchase. East London Waterworks Co. v. Kellerman [1892] 2 Q. B. 72, 67 L. T. N. S. 319, 56 J. P. 773.

Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Alexander Miller and Rusaw Miller, the appellants, and their mother, Betsy Pennington, widow of Anthony Pennington, deceased, filed their bill in this case in the circuit court of Wayne county against the appellees, who were children and grandchildren of said Anthony Pennington, praying for the assignment of dower and homestead to said Betsy Pennington in the lands of which Anthony Pennington died seized, and for partition of said lands among appellants and appellees as heirs-at-law. The adult defendants answered, admitting the death of Anthony Pennington, that he was seized of the lands described in the bill, and that the complainant Betsy Pennington was his widow and entitled to dower and homestead, but denying that her children, Alexander Miller and Rusaw Miller, were children and heirs of Anthony Pennington. The minor defendants, by their guardian ad litem, filed a formal answer, neither admitting nor denying the allegations of the bill, but calling for proof. Replications having been filed, the cause was heard and a decree was entered assigning homestead and dower to Betsy Pennington, but dismissing the bill as to the complainants Alexander Miller and Rusaw Miller. The record has been brought to this court by appeal.

The facts proved at the hearing are as follows: In the year 1864 Anthony Pennington, a farmer and stock dealer, was living with his first wife, Phœbe Pennington, and they had four children. Betsy Miller was an unmarried woman and cousin of Phœbe Pennington. Rusaw Miller and Alexander Miller, who will be hereafter termed the complainants, were born to her,—Rusaw on March 14, 1864, and Alexander on April 24, 1865,—and Anthony Pennington was their natural father. Subsequently four more of no rule of construction, and certainly there is no reason, requiring a different meaning should be given to the words in one section to that given them in another.

... We do not see the force of the reasoning that would so restrict the meaning of the section as to exclude from its operation parents, one or the other of whom has violated his or her marriage obligations in the procreation of the child. The child of such parents is not less innocent or unfettered than the child of parents who were unmarried at the time of the copulation, and the ground upon which the insistence is based that a distinction should be made—that the child shall be punished for the sins of the parents—shocks every sense of justice and right. The degree of moral or criminal delinquency of the parents does not enter into consideration in construing the section."

Under a statute legitimating the issue of marriages decreed null in law, it was held, in Stones v. Keeling, 5 Call (Va.) 143, that the children of a woman who left her husband to marry another man, by whom the children in question were begotten, became the heirs of the latter, and entitled to administration upon their father's estate.

The correctness of this decision is recognized and sanctioned obiter in Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh, 368.

In Ives v. McNicoll, 59 Ohio St. 402, 43 L. R. A. 772, 69 Am. St. Rep. 780, 53 N. E. 60, the supreme court of Ohio, construing precisely the same statute as that in force in Kentucky, came to a contrary conclusion, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

expressly disapproving the decision in Sams v. Sams. "The adulterous connection," says the court, "is not had with a view to subsequent marriage and legitimating children, but with a view to present pleasure; and the ardent hope and desire usually exists that no offspring should result therefrom; and this section was enacted to enable parents, when all impediments to a legal marriage should be removed, to intermarry and recognize and acknowledge their offspring, and thereby in a measure atone for the sins of the past, and do justice to their innocent and unfortunate children."

The same interpretation to the statute is given in the earlier case of Sutphin v. Fox, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 90, where the child of a woman, born to a stranger during her coverture, was held to be legitimated by her marriage to such stranger after divorce from the first husband.

So, the marriage of a man, after the death of his wife, to a woman who bore children to him while he was yet in coverture, is held, in Hawbecker v. Hawbecker, 43 Md. 516, under a similar statute, to legitimize them, the court refusing to exclude such offspring from the benefit of the statute, in the absence of an expressed intent of the legislature to deprive them of it.

No adoption can be presumed where the illicit relations began during the coverture of the woman, and continued after her divorce from her husband, but without establishing a marriage with the putative father. Sbarboro's Estate, Myrick, Prob. Ct. Rep. (Cal.) 255.

children were born to Anthony Pennington and his said first wife. Phœbe Pennington, the first wife, having died, Anthony Pennington married Betsy Miller, the mother of the complainants, on April 2, 1902, and he lived with her as his wife until his death, on September 9, 1904. Prior to the death of his first wife he frequently denied the paternity of the children, but when he determined to marry their mother, and after the marriage, from time to time, and within a short time before his death, he acknowledged to many different persons that they were his children. He told several persons that he was going to marry Betsy Miller, that they were his children, and he thought he was doing right. When he went to the justice to get the license and procure his attendance at the ceremony, he told the justice he wanted him to come down and marry him, that he thought it was the right thing for him to do, and that the complainants were his children. After the marriage, at different times, he made the same statements as to the parentage of the complainants, with expressions of opinion that he had done right in marrying their mother, saying that after Phœbe died he concluded to marry Betsy, and that he did not think it any more than right that he should marry her. These acknowledgments were made to about twenty-five disinterested persons who testified in the case. There was also evidence of other witnesses, not so numerous, and several of whom were relatives of his first wife's children, that Anthony Pennington denied to them that he was the father of complainants, and these denials were made both before and after he married their mother. It appears that he was somewhat addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, and that he was more likely to refer to the subject of the paternity of the children and his marriage to their mother at times when he had been drinking to some extent, which was perhaps natural enough, but it is very clear from the evidence that at such times he was entirely capable of intelligently making the acknowledgment. He made the statements to some witnesses when he had not been drinking and to others when he had; but he was a capable business man of considerable property, a stock buyer and farmer, and the force of his statements and acknowledgment is in nowise affected by the fact that on some occasions he had been drinking.

At the common law, an illegitimate was of kin to no one, and therefore was incapable of being the heir of any person, and the common law was in force in this state until changed by statute. Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, 15 Am. Rep. 339. But this state, like many others, has abrogated the common-law rule by statute. The civil law, which is 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

now recognized as more humane and just than the common law, enabled the father of an illegitimate child to make some reparation by securing to the innocent and unfortunate the rights of inheritance to which it is naturally entitled. There were several methods under the civil law by which an illegitimate child might be made legitimate, one of which was the mere marriage of the father and mother; and in some states their marriage alone, without any acknowledgment of paternity, has this effect. In others, children born out of wedlock become legitimate by the marriage of their parents and the recognition of the children by the parents as their own. In others, the subsequent marriage and recognition by the father, before or after marriage, is sufficient, and, in others, the acknowledgment is required by the statute to be in writing. By our statute two of these methods have been adopted as applied to different conditions. Where there has been a judicial finding of the paternity of the child, the marriage of the parents without any acknowledgment of paternity renders the child legitimate. Section 15 of the bastardy act provides that if the mother of any bastard child and the reputed father shall, at any time after the birth of the child, intermarry, the child shall in all respects be deemed and held legitimate. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, chap. 17, p. 205. Other cases of illegitimacy are provided for by the statute of descent. Section 3 of that act is as follows: "An illegitimate child, whose parents have intermarried, and whose father has acknowledged him or her as his child, shall be considered legitimate." Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, chap. 39, p. 653. The rights of the complainants as heirs of Anthony Pennington are to be determined under the latter statute, and it was necessary for them to establish, by the proof, three facts: First, that Anthony Pennington and Betsy Miller were their parents; second, that their said parents intermarried; and, third, that Anthony Pennington acknowledged them as his children. Each of those facts was clearly and indisputably established by the evidence, and, the conditions of the statute having been fully complied with, they are thereby declared to be legitimate. The fact that the children were the result of adulterous connection makes no difference. Robinson v. Ruprecht, 191 Ill. 424, 61 N. E. 631. The civil law excluded illegitimates who were the result of adulterous connections, but the provision which existed in the civil law is not contained in our statute, and, where that is the case, all illegitimates are included. Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh, 368; Ives v. McNicoll, 59 Ohio St. 402, 43 L. R. A. 772, 69 Am. St. Rep. 780, 53 N. E. 60.

is to the effect that the acknowledgment required by the statute is a general and public one; that the father must show, by his acts, words, and treatment of the child, that he regards, and desires the public to regard, it as his legitimate offspring; and that all his acts and words, taken together, must show that he intends to make the child legitimate and capable of inheriting his estate. Counsel say that, although Anthony Pennington told many persons that the complainants were his children, he told others that they were not, and that, considering the whole evidence, it cannot be said that he intended they should be included among his heirs. At the time of the marriage of their mother they were grown men with families of their own; and, if the argument were sound as applied to children of tender years, there could be no inference from the fact that they were not received into the family as children, but lived by themselves. We do not understand, however, that we are authorized to add anything to the statute, or to enlarge or restrict the meaning of its words, and the statute does not contain the conditions contended for by counsel. They cite cases from California and Iowa, and quote from the decision in the case of Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 6 L. R. A. 594, 22 Pac. 742, 1028, 21 Pac. 976, where the acknowledgment was held not to be sufficient under the California statute. The statutes of the different states providing for the legitimation of illegitimate children are widely different, and an examination of that case shows that the statute is entirely different from our own. One provision of the California law is that a child born before wedlock shall become legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents, and under that provision no acknowledgment is required. Another provision is that an illegitimate child is the heir of any person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child. Another section provides for legitimation without the marriage of the parents, and is as follows: "The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed, for all purposes, legitimate from the time of its birth." That section relates only to minor children. Re Pico, 52 Cal. 84. Under those statutes neither an oral admission nor proof of paternity will constitute an illegitimate child an heir, and the section providing for an acknowledgment requires it to be public, and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the child shall be received by the father as his own with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise be treated as his child. There must be a public acknowledgment and such treatment as a father would naturally give his child. Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40, 31 Pac. 915. But there is no such provision in our statute and no requirement for a written acknowledgment, so that an oral acknowledgment, when clearly and satisfactorily proved, is sufficient. So, also, the Iowa Code provides that to entitle an illegitimate child to inherit from the father, the recognition of the child by the father must have been general and notorious or in writing. Watson v. Richardson, 110 Iowa, 673, 80 N. W. 407. Our statute does not require either, but is similar to the Indiana statute, which provides that if the father shall marry the mother of a bastard child, and acknowledge it as his own, the child shall be regarded as legitimate. In construing that statute, the supreme court of Indiana has held that an acknowledgment by the father removes from the child the status of illegitimacy, no matter what the purpose of the acknowledgment was, or whether the father intended to make the child his heir; and that it fixes the status of the child, which cannot be changed by anything the mother or father might afterward say. The court said: "Having removed the 'bar sinister,' they cannot replace it." Brock v. State, 85 Ind. 397; Binns v. Dazey, 147 Ind. 538, 44 N. E. 644. That seems to us to be the correct interpretation of our statute, the purpose of which is to fix the status of the child as legitimate. It seems to us that it would be an unjust and unwarranted construction of the law to say that the father of an illegitimate child, who has legitimated it by marrying its mother and acknowledged it to be his, can thereafter change its status by any subsequent declaration. All that the statute requires in respect to the acknowledgment is that the father shall own or admit the child to be his; and the fact that Anthony Pennington very frequently acknowledged these children to be his is beyond dispute or controversy. It follows that the court erred in dismissing the bill as to the complainants, who asked for a partition of the lands.

The decree is reversed and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with directions to grant the prayer of the bill, and to enter a decree for the partition of the lands therein described in accordance with the views above expressed.

OSCAR F. RILEY et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.

F. HARRIS YOST.

(.... W. Va.)

1. Profert—oyer—unsealed instrument.

Profert cannot be made, or oyer demanded, unless the declaration avers a sealed instrument.

2. Pleading—profert.

The fact that a declaration makes profert does not alone make the writing part of the declaration, without a demand of oyer.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Taylor County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due under a contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Davis & Davis and E. D. Lewis, for defendant in error:

In an action in assumpsit on special contract to recover damages, the entire consideration and the entire act to be done must be stated in the declaration.

Brannon, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Oscar F. Riley and Columbus N. Mason

Headnotes by BRANNON, P.

Case Note.—Under the Code practice prevailing in New York and many of the other states, profert and oyer are obsolete, and the requirement that a document forming the foundation of an action must be set out as part of the declaration, or as an exhibit attached thereto, has taken their place. See, for the operation of Code rules, 1 Abbott, Trial Brief, Pl. §§ 246 et seq.

The well-established common-law rule, that neither profert can be made, nor oyer demanded, of an unsealed instrument, is well stated in RILEY v. YOST. The reason of the rule is given by Gould, Pl. chap. 8, p. 423, as follows: "As a general rule profert is required of no other instruments than deeds, these being the only private writings which, by the original principles of the common law, are considered as instruments on which an action or defense can be directly founded. And, consequently, he who pleads a writing not under seal—as a bill of exchange, promissory note, or other unsealed written agreement—is not bound to make profert of it; for written contracts not brought an action of assumpsit in Taylor county against F. Harris Yost. The declaration contains the common counts and one special count upon a written contract. Under a demurrer there was a judgment of nil capiat, and the plaintiffs brought the case here.

The defendant says that the written contract does not support the action as stated in the special count upon it; but we must take that count without considering the written contract. That count avers the executing of a written contract and makes profert of it. We cannot consider it for these reasons. The count does not say that the contract is under seal. There can be neither profert nor oyer of a contract not under seal, and, though profert be made, it is unavailing to make the writing part of the declaration. There cannot be profert, because the declaration does not profess to declare upon a sealed instrument; and, there having been no oyer demanded, we could not read the contract, even if said to be sealed, because to read it there must be, not only profert, but oyer. Duval v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24; 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1087. There can be no profert or oyer, except of certain sealed instruments. Andrews' Stephen, Pl. 159; 1 Barton, Law Pr. 316; 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1083. Such is the common-law rule of pleading. There seems to be an erroneous idea with some that a profert of an instrument, sealed or unsealed, makes it a part of the declaration, and we meet with declarations sometimes which file writings marked as exhibits, just as if the case were in chancery. That does not make such paper part of a common-law pleading, though it does in the case of equity pleadings. A declaration at law on a writing must give under seal are regarded by the common law, not as instruments on which actions are founded, but merely as simple contracts, or, more precisely, as evidence of parol contracts. Of such instruments, therefore, oyer is not demandable."

Illustrations of the application of this rule in the courts appear in Commercial Ins. Co. v. Mehlman, 48 Ill. 313, 95 Am. Dec. 543, where the lower court's refusal to grant oyer of an unsealed insurance policy, upon which the action was based, was held no error; Gatton v. Dimmitt, 27 Ill. 400, where oyer of a promissory note declared on was refused. To enable the court to examine it, the defendant must bring it before the court by bill of exceptions, demurrer to evidence, agreed case, or special verdict; Chapman v. Harper, 7 Blackf. 333, and Russell v. Drummond, 6 Ind. 216, in both of which cases the rule is recognized, but deemed waived by the plaintiff, who made profert of an unsealed negotiable instrument without objection on demand of oyer.

the legal effect of the writing, and to do so must state so much of it as will support the action; but that does not make the instrument a part of the pleading. It is not generally the office of common-law pleading to incorporate writings. Perhaps, where the declaration sets out the instrument by its tenor,—and that is, in its very words,—it becomes a part of the declaration, but not where the tenor is not given. 8 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 740. It may be asked, How can a variance between the declaration and writing be taken advantage of? By objection to the introduction of the paper in evidence; if a sealed instrument, also by oyer and demurrer; or, where it is claimed that the writing does not support the action, a demurrer to the evidence would raise that question.

Looking, then, at the special count, and not reading the writing, we find that it states that the plaintiffs owned various options giving them the right to purchase the coal in various tracts of land, and that they sold and assigned to the defendant all their rights in said options in consideration of $150 cash and other considerations, one of which was that the plaintiffs were to receive from the defendant the difference between $18 per acre and the purchase price per acre of the option for each and every acre of coal the defendant "may purchase under said option." It is claimed that this gave the defendant only the option to purchase the tracts—that is, option to consummate the options assigned to him—without obligation to pay the plaintiffs the difference between the purchase price named in the option and $18 per acre, unless he should purchase the land under the option; and that the declaration should have averred such purchase. But the declaration goes on and avers that by the writing the defendant "agreed to pay plaintiffs the difference between $18 per acre and $15, the purchase price under the option, to wit, $3 per acre, for each and every acre of coal which the defendant could and might purchase under said options, whenever the number of said acres of coal should thereafter be ascertained and determined during the life period of said option as limited on the fact thereof, or as extended at the special instance and request of the defendant, whose duty it became to keep alive said option until considerations for the transfer thereof were fully paid and satisfied, and his purchase could be fully compensated thereunder." The count then avers that the number of acres of the coal had been ascertained to be not less than 2,000. Now, from that count on its face Yost did not have the right to determine not to purchase under said option and refuse the plaintiffs the $3 per acre; for the declaration says that the defendant was to pay the plaintiffs $3 for every acre which he "could and might purchase under said option," and that he was to make such payment whenever the number of acres of coal should be ascertained. The count says that the instrument bound Yost to keep alive the options until the consideration should be paid, thus importing intent to impose absolute liability for the consideration. Testing the matter by the declaration alone,—that is, by its version and legal effect of the legal contract,—an absolute liability was imposed on Yost to pay that $3 per acre to the plaintiffs, whether he purchased the coal under the the options or not. I repeat that we do not say whether or not that liability is imposed on the defendant by the written contract.

We reverse the judgment, overrule the demurrer, and remand the cause.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

MINNIE BROWN, alias MINNIE BLAKE, Appt.,

v.

B. F. BECKWITH, Constable of White County, et al.

(.... W. Va.)

1. Exemption—loss by removal.

A person who has acquired, under the provisions of chapter 41 of the Code of 1899, the right to have personal property exempted from forced sale, does not forfeit it on the ground of nonresidence until he be-

Headnotes by POFFENBARGER, J.

Case Note.—The question when a person who intends to leave a state permanently, but has not yet done so, becomes a non-resident, has arisen mostly, if not wholly, in two classes of cases, those involving the right to exemptions, and those relating to the issuance of attachments.

In the first-named class, it has been held, in conformity with the rule that, to effect a change of residence, there must be both intention and act, that an intention to remove from the state at a future time will not defeat a claim to an exemption. Springer v. Lewis, 22 Pa. 191; Urquhart v. Smith, 5 Kan. 447; Winslow v. Benedict, 70 Ill. 120.

But where the intention exists the question arises, What act may be deemed sufficient to make it effective? That preparation to leave, such as delivery of one's furniture to the railroad for shipment (Wood v. Bresnahan, 63 Mich. 614, 30 N. W. 206; Herzfeld v. Beasley, 106 Ala. 447, 17 So. 623), or sending one's family to another state with the intention of following when one's property is disposed of (Stirman v.

gins to remove his person from his place of abode in this state to another state or country, with intent to fix his residence in such other state or country, although he may intend to leave the state permanently, and has made complete preparation so to do, and delivered his personal property and effects for shipment to a point outside the state.

2. Judgment—finding of nonresidence—effect.

A finding of nonresidence on a suggestion and motion to require security for costs in a pending action is not res judicata in another action between the same parties. Such proceeding is a collateral one, not reaching the merits of the case.

3. Exemption—evidence.

An exemption list and claim, irregular in form, considered, and pronounced sufficient.

4. Attachment—exemption.

An order of attachment is process, within the meaning of §§ 23 and 24 of chapter 41 of the Code of 1899, against which the right to exempt personal property may be exercised.

(October 24, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wood County dissolving an injunction which had been issued to prevent an attachment sale of her property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter E. McDougle, for appellant:

Plaintiff was not a nonresident.

Dean v. Cannon, 37 W. Va. 123, 16 S. E.

Smith, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 781), will not deprive one of the benefit of exemptions secured to residents of the state, is undisputed.

It is not so clear whether an actual inception of the journey is such an act. In Anthony v. Wade, 1 Bush, 110, it was held that an avowed intention to remove from the state, and a packing up for that purpose, will not deprive a person of the character of housekeeper; nor does he cease to be such while in transitu.

But in State use of Burt v. Allen, 48 W. Va. 154, 50 L. R. A. 284, 86 Am. St. Rep. 29, 35 S. E. 990, it was held that nonresidence, within the meaning of the exemption law, has the same meaning as nonresidence under the attachment law; and that one becomes a nonresident directly he begins the removal of his person from the place of his residence, even before he gets outside the state.

In view of the difference in spirit existing between attachment and exemption laws, and of the rule that the latter are to be construed liberally to effectuate their humane purpose, it may be doubted if the foregoing case is supported by reason; and, as will appear from cases hereinafter discussed, it is not wholly sustained by authority.

Messrs. H. B. Dodge and L. R. Via, for appellees:

Plaintiff was a nonresident.

Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284; Clark v. Ward, 12 Gratt. 440.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Minnie Brown complains of a decree of the circuit court of Wood county dissolving an injunction by which she attempted to prevent the sale of certain personal property claimed by her as exempt under the provisions of §§ 23 and 24 of chapter 41 of the Code of 1899, and dismissing her bill. The property consisted principally of household goods, and B. F. Beckwith, constable, was proceeding to sell the same under orders of a justice of the peace in attachment proceedings instituted by three several creditors of the plaintiff, Samuel L. Koonse, Samuel Cross, and A. E. Beatty. The attachments were levied on the 9th day of December, 1902, exemption claims were delivered to the officer on the 13th day of December, 1902, judgments were rendered and orders of sale made on the 18th day of December, 1902, and on said last-named day the debtor served on the constable written instruments demanding the release of the property, notifying him that, in case of his refusal to do so, she would claim the damages allowed by law for deten-discussion in cases of attachment is stated in 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 434, as follows: "A resident of a state becomes a nonresident by actually leaving the state with the intention of becoming a nonresident."

A mere intention to remove from the state, unaccompanied by any act, does not make a person a nonresident within the meaning of the attachment law. Mann v. Taylor, 78 Iowa, 355, 43 N. W. 220; Lyle v. Foreman, 1 Dall. 480, 1 L. ed. 232; Degnan v. Wheeler, 2 Nott & M'C. 323.

Nor will preparation to send household goods away. State, Stafford, Prosecutor, v. Mills, 57 N. J. L. 570, 31 Atl. 1023.

Nor surrender of the premises occupied by him, although he leaves on the following day. Kugler v. Shreve, 28 N. J. L. 120.

Foreign attachment cannot be maintained against the estate of a person who, having been a resident of a state for many years, suddenly disappears, alleging an intention to remove from the state, but who only goes to another part of it, returning in about ten days. Shipman v. Woodbury, 2 Miles (Pa.) 67.

A resident who has left his home with the intention of leaving the state does not become a nonresident, within the meaning of the attachment law, until he gets outside of the state. Ballinger v. Lantier, 15 Kan. 608.

tion thereof. By some collateral proceedings which need not be here detailed, action was delayed, so that the time fixed for sale was the 5th day of March, 1903, on which day a preliminary injunction was awarded on the plaintiff's bill against the justice, constable, and creditors, restraining the sale. Answers were filed by the defendants, depositions were taken and filed, and on the 20th day of August, 1903, the order complained of was made and entered.

The defense relied upon mainly is the alleged nonresidence of the plaintiff at the time she presented her claim of exemption. She had occupied as tenant a certain house in the city of Parkersburg, from which, on the day on which the actions were commenced and her property seized, she had removed all her property and effects, including her wearing apparel not in actual use, to the wharfboat at said city, and had them consigned to herself at Marietta, in the state of Ohio, and had vacated the house in which she had resided. She testifies that she stayed at the De Witt hotel, in Parkersburg, on the night of the day on which her property was sent to the wharfboat and levied upon, and later went to the residence of a Mrs. Core, in Parkersburg with whom she stayed for some time and then went to another place in said city. She denies that she ever had any intention of leaving the city, and explains the shipment of her property by saying she had rented it to certain persons in Marietta. In addition to the fact of the removal of plaintiff's property and the evidence of intent on her part to take up her residence at Marietta, the defendants rely upon testimony showing her presence at Marietta at a time subsequent to the presentation of her exemption claim, and also an admission made by her in an action which she prosecuted in a justice's court against the constable for damages for the detention of the property. This trial was had at Williamstown, directly opposite the city of Marietta, and a witness testifies that she came to Williamstown on the morning of the trial from Marietta. On that occasion she testified that she had no legal residence. If it be conceded that the

On the other hand, it was said, obiter, in Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284, that, upon an equitable construction of a statute reciting that, "whereas creditors had experienced great difficulties in the recovery of debts due from persons residing out of the jurisdiction of this commonwealth;" and going on to provide for attachments "upon affidavit that such defendant or defendants are out of the country, or that, upon inquiry at his, her, or their usual place of abode, he, she, or they could not be found, so as to be served with process,"—that, "where a debtor has actually left his usual place of abode and set off for a distant state, with the intention not to return to his residence, but in future to reside out of the state, an attachment sued out after his departure might be sustained, although it chanced he had not actually passed the state line at the time the subpoena issued."

In the case of Clark v. Ward, 12 Gratt. 440, where the point was directly presented, this view was adopted.

Upon the strength of these cases, it was held in Spalding v. Simms, 4 Met. (Ky.) 285, that, where absence from the state for four months is ground for attachment, one who leaves home with the intention of leaving the state, and who actually consummates his purpose, but who is unavoidably detained within the state for a few days, should be regarded as absent from the state from the time he left home.

In Waples on Attachment, 2d ed. § 46, it is said, citing the above cases as favoring the view: "As previously remarked in another connection, one immediately becomes a nonresident if he leaves his state with the design of becoming such, though the design has been held not to be decisive on this question until accompanied with the act of leaving, until he has passed beyond 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the state bounds. But, if he has broken up his home, so that process can no longer be served there and be binding upon him, must his creditor be confined to personal service upon his debtor as the only means of reaching him? The case is not that of an absconding debtor; the plaintiff cannot truthfully set up the ground, in his affidavit, that the defendant is running away to avoid process, concealing himself, hiding his goods, etc., in fraud of creditors. The defendant avowedly means to abandon his residence, which he may lawfully do, and has broken up his home, and is openly traveling towards the state bounds to depart permanently. Why should not the extraordinary process be invokable on the ground of nonresidence?"

The decision in State use of Burt v. Allen, supra, that a person becomes a nonresident, within the meaning of a statute allowing attachment on the ground that a party "is a nonresident," the moment he begins the removal of his person from the place of his residence, with intent to acquire a residence in another state, is based largely on the argument in Waples on Attachment, and the cases above stated. The question in issue, however, did not arise over the construction of the attachment, but of the exemption law.

It is thus apparent that the doctrine that nonresidence begins at the inception of removal is based in authority on the cases construing the Virginia statute above stated, which, in addition to permitting attachments against persons who were out of the country, extended the remedy to cases where the defendant could not be found at his usual place of abode; but it may be doubted if this foundation is sufficient to support the broad conclusions which have been drawn.

evidence justifies the finding by the court of a fixed intention on the part of the appellant to remove from Parkersburg to Marietta, and of preparation by her to do so, we are confronted with the question whether there does not yet remain to be supplied one essential element of change of residence, namely, actual commencement of removal, not of the property, but of the person,—personal departure from the old place of residence in the state for the new outside of it. State use of Burt v. Allen, 48 W. Va. 154, 50 L. R. A. 284, 86 Am. St. Rep. 29, 35 S. E. 990, decides that within the meaning of the attachment laws a person becomes a non-resident the moment he begins the removal of his person from the place of his residence with intent to acquire a residence in another state, even before he gets outside the state. To the same effect are Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 289, and Clark v. Ward, 12 Gratt. 440. According to many authorities, such commencement of removal, coupled with an intent to abandon the state, falls short of the requisites of nonresidence. Shinn on Attachments, § 96, says it is necessary that the defendant acquire a residence and place of abode outside of the state. Drake on Attachments, § 64, says a mere purpose to change residence, evidenced by acts of the removal of the party's property, will not make him a nonresident of the state from which he purposes to depart until he shall have begun at least the removal of his person. Wade on Attachments, § 78, accords with the proposition last above stated. No case has been found which propounds a doctrine more rigid and illiberal toward the defendant. Hence it may be safely said that by the great weight of authority nothing short of such act of removal, accompanied by intent to abandon the state, will render the party amenable to an attachment on the ground of nonresidence.

This proposition seems to be in accord with the general principles of the law relating to domicile and residence, enunciated by this court in White v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790, 13 Am. St. Rep. 896, 8 S. E. 596, as follows: "The original domicile continues until it is fairly changed for another. It is a legal maxim that every person must have a domicile somewhere; and he can have but one at a time for the same purpose. From this it follows that one cannot be lost or extinguished until another is acquired. Baird v. Byrne, 3 Wall. Jr. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 757. When one domicile is definitely abandoned and a new one selected and entered upon, length of time is not important. One day will be sufficient, provided the animus exists. Even when the point of destination is not reached, domicile may shift in itinere, if the abandonment of the old domicile and the setting out for the new are plainly shown. Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 405. Thus a constructive residence seems to be sufficient to give domicile, though an actual residence may not have begun." Burt v. Allen, cited, further declares that the elements of nonresidence in the law of attachment and the elements of nonresidence within the meaning of the statutes conferring a right to exempt personal property from forced sales are the same. This position seems to be supported by both principle and reason. Surely the law is not less favorable to the claimant of a constitutional right of a character so high that the statutes providing for its vindication are by the courts of almost all the states liberally construed (12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 75) than to the right of a debtor to defeat an attachment. In the former case the law impresses upon the property a status, immunity from forced sale, and withdraws it from the reach of the creditor; in the latter, the party is only given the benefit of a strict construction of remedial statutes, designed to give the creditor a means of obtaining from him what he is entitled to have,—satisfaction of his debt out of the property. In both instances the law is liberal to the debtor. Hence it would seem that in both cases the same rules for determining the question of nonresidence ought to govern.

What evidence in the case supplies this element of personal removal? Nobody testifies to any departure by the appellant from Parkersburg. A witness states that she came from Marietta to Williamstown to attend the trial of an action brought by her against the constable, and that on that occasion she said she had no legal residence. Her coming from Marietta is in no sense inconsistent with the retention of her residence in Parkersburg at the time, which she establishes by the testimony of herself and other witnesses. The statement that she had no legal residence must be subject to the rule that she did have a legal residence somewhere; for, having had a residence in this state, it continued until she acquired one elsewhere. The language in State use of Burt v. Allen, importing that one need not acquire a domicile or residence in another state in order to render him a nonresident of this state, means that there need not be an actual domicile or residence in another state. There may be a constructive residence in either state for the purpose of working out the legal rights of parties. Appellant not having acquired either an actual or constructive residence elsewhere, her residence in this state must be deemed to have continued. Our conclusion is that the evidence wholly fails to establish the element of actual removal to a place out of the state, and also the inception or beginning of such removal within it. On the question of residence, the principle of res judicata is relied upon. In the action by the appellant against the constable, an affidavit of her nonresidence was filed and a demand made for security for costs. This motion was resisted and evidence was heard upon it, and the justice, believing nonresidence to have been established, required security to be given, and, in default thereof, dismissed the action. This was not a hearing on the merits, but one upon a mere collateral motion. "A judgment not based upon the merits is not final and conclusive in the sense that a plea of res judicata may be founded on it." 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 266. A nonsuit is not res judicata. Id. p. 271. The dismissal in equity for want of jurisdiction, or any cause precluding inquiry into the merits, is not res judicata. Id. p. 271.

But one other proposition remains to be disposed of, namely, that the claim of exemption is insufficient, which contention is based upon two grounds, one of which is predicated upon the following language in the affidavit: "That she is entitled to have and claims all the above-listed property claimed by her as husband and parent exempt from execution or other process in the above cause." The point made is that she does not specify the character in which she claims. To determine this question it is necessary and proper to read the language above quoted in connection with another part of the affidavit in which the appellant says she is a parent and resident of the state. This language established her character as a female parent, and is wholly inconsistent with the character of husband. Moreover the word "husband" was used by way of recital and description of the property, and its use appears to have been a mere inadvertence. So read, the affidavit plainly asserts a claim as parent and residuent. In this respect the demand is sufficiently certain in a legal sense.

The other is based upon the assertion that at the time the officer received the lists and claims of exemption he held no execution or other process authorizing a sale of the property. The statute clearly includes an order of attachment within the term "process." In § 25 of chap. 41, attachment is specifically mentioned, and provision made for release by the officer of claims and demands garnished under the order of attachment. While there is no specific direction to him as to property levied upon and taken into his possession under an order of attachment, the provision for the release of claims and demands suggested and garnished shows a clear legislative intent that the officer shall not, after the delivery to him of the lists specified in the statute and the lapse of the time prescribed for appraisalment, withhold 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the possession of the property taken under process of any kind, unless it be in respect to claims which are excepted from the operation of the exemption laws.

The conclusion resulting from this examination of the record and authorities is that the Circuit Court erred in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, and that the decree must be reversed, with costs in this court to the appellant, the bill reinstated, and a decree entered perpetuating the injunction and requiring the appellees to pay to the appellant her costs in the Circuit Court.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

MARGARET L. ROBERTS, Appt.,

v.

JOHN M. ROBERTS et al., Trustees, etc.

MARGARET A. LONDON et al., Appts.,

v.

CATHERINE E. REESE et al.

(.... Md.)

1. Devise for life—power of disposition.

There may be a valid devise to one for life with power of disposition, which will not affect the remainder over unless the power is exercised as authorized.

2. Remainder—contingent.

The remainder created by a clause in a will which, after giving the estate to testator's wife for life with power of disposition, disposes of the estate "remaining at her death," is not necessarily contingent.

3. Same.

An intention to create a contingent remainder is not shown by a clause in a will which, after giving an estate with power of Case Note.—In ROBERTS v. ROBERTS the court applied the common-law rule that a devise or bequest for and during the term of the natural life of the devisee or legatee, with limitation over, conveys a life estate only, notwithstanding such person has the power to use and dispose of the estate during his life, and the limitation over relates only to what may remain upon his death. The rule is recognized by text writers (Gardner, Wills, p. 476; Page, Wills, 670; Jarman, Wills, *1131), and adopted by the overwhelming weight of adjudicated cases, among which are the following: Denson v. Mitchell, 26 Ala. 360; Weathers v. Patterson, 30 Ala. 404; Morffew v. San Francisco & S. R. Co. 107 Cal. 587, 40 Pac. 810; Adams v. Lillibridge, 73 Conn. 655, 49 Atl. 21; Wetter v. Walker, 62 Ga. 142; Walker v. Pritchard, 121 Ill. 221, 12 N. E. 336; Eubank v. Smiley, 130 Ind. 393, 29 N. E. 919; Greve v. Camery, 69 Iowa, 220, 28 N. W. 564; Shaw v. Hussey, 41 Me. 495; Johnson v. Battelle, 125 Mass. 453; Gregory v. Cowgill, 19 Mo. 415; Harbison v. James, 90 Mo. 411, 2 S.

disposition, and providing that the estate remaining at the death of the life tenant shall be distributed among testator's children, share and share alike, directs that the child or children of a deceased child shall stand in its or their parent's place and stand, and receive and have the share its and their parent would have been entitled to if living.

4. Same—vested.

Vested, and not contingent, remainders are created by a will which gives testator's estate to his wife during life in trust for the use of herself and "her children," with power to sell property and invest the proceeds, and lease real estate, and use whatever is necessary for support and education, and make advancements; and directs that all property "remaining at her death" shall be divided among such children, share and share alike. The child of a deceased child to stand in its parent's stead and receive and have the share which its parent would be entitled to if living.

W. 292; Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267, 13 Am. Rep. 23; Leggett v. Firth, 132 N. Y. 7, 20 N. E. 950; Dillin v. Wright, 73 Pa. 177; Pool v. Pool, 10 Lea, 486; McCullough v. Anderson, 90 Ky. 126, 7 L. R. A. 836, 13 S. W. 353.

This rule, while adhered to by nearly all the authorities, is not strictly followed in all jurisdictions; thus, in Virginia and Tennessee it is held that the devisee takes a title in fee where the power of disposal is absolute, even though the will otherwise purports to give but a life estate. May v. Joyner, 20 Gratt. 692; Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 430, 21 S. E. 810; Davis v. Heppert, 96 Va. 776, 32 S. E. 467; Bradley v. Carnes, 94 Tenn. 27, 45 Am. St. Rep. 696, 27 S. W. 1007; Hair v. Caldwell, 109 Tenn. 148, 70 S. W. 610. But, to come within the rule of these Virginia and Tennessee cases, the power of alienation must be absolute and unrestricted. Thus, in Johns v. Johns, 86 Va. 333, 10 S. E. 2, where the power of disposal was not absolute in the devisee for her sole benefit, but was also for the benefit of her children, it was held that the estate was limited to one for life. And in Miller v. Potterfield, 86 Va. 876, 19 Am. St. Rep. 919, 11 S. E. 486, where the power of disposal was for the benefit of a third person as well as the devisee, the devisee took but a life estate.

The statutes of some of the states have modified the rule somewhat; but the decisions arising under these statutes will not be discussed, as the existence and effect of the common-law rule is the question here involved.

Of course the rule under discussion here is limited to those cases where the will expressly gives a life estate, with limitation over after the death of the life tenant, and an attempt is made to add to such life estate by the subsequent language in the will, which gives a right to use or dispose of the property; and does not include those cases in which the will either uses general lan-

5. Deed of trust—identity of property granted.

A deed of trust for benefit of creditors, of, "all and singular, the real and personal estate" and "all other property, of every nature, kind, and description, whosoever situate," of the grantors, signed by a man and wife, is sufficient to identify with reasonable certainty, as required by statute, a vested remainder belonging to the wife under a will.

6. Same—separate estate.

A deed of trust signed by a man and his wife, conveying, all and singular, the real and personal estate, and all other property of every nature, kind, and description, "of us," is not limited to their joint estates, but will convey her separate property.

7. Same—vested remainder.

A vested remainder will pass by a deed of trust for benefit of creditors of all the property of the grantor.

guage or expressly gives an absolute fee coupled with language giving a right to dispose of the property with limitation over as to the remainder. In these latter cases it is uniformly held that the language giving the right to use and dispose of the property, and attempting to devise or bequeath the remainder, cannot cut down the absolute title into a life estate so as to make the limitation over valid. Howard v. Carusi, 109 U. S. 725, 27 L. ed. 1089, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 575; State v. Smith, 52 Conn. 557.

This distinction is well brought out in Jackson ex dem. Livingston v. Robins, 16 Johns. 588, where Chancellor Kent says: "We may lay it down as an incontrovertible rule, that, where an estate is given to a person generally, or indefinitely, with a power of disposition, it carries a fee; and the only exception to the rule is, where the testator gives to the first taker an estate for life only, by certain and express words, and annexes to it a power of disposal. In that particular and special case, the devisee for life will not take an estate in fee, notwithstanding the distinct and naked gift of a power of disposition of the reversion. This distinction is carefully marked and settled in the cases;" citing Tomlinson v. Dighton, 1 Salk. 259, 1 P. Wms. 149; Crossling v. Crossling, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 396; Reid v. Shergold, 10 Ves. Jr. 370; Goodtitle ex dem. Pearson v. Otway, 2 Wils. 6.

Like all rules relating to the construction of wills, the general rule above set forth is subject to that cardinal rule of construction that the intention of the testator must govern.

There is another rule that must not be overlooked in considering questions of this kind, and that is that, where a fee is given by a fair construction of the will, it cannot be cut down by subsequent language imposing limitations or creating remainders in favor of others, as such a clause is repugnant and void. Gardner, Wills, 375.

or for the education or advancement in life of the latter. In Benesch v. Clark, 49 Md. 497, it was said that, where an estate is given to a person generally or indefinitely with the power of disposition, such gift carries the entire estate, and the devisee or legatee takes the property absolutely; but when the property is given to one expressly for life, and there be annexed to such gift a power of disposition of the remainder, the rule is different, and the first taker takes only an estate for life, with the power annexed. That has been approved in Foos v. Scarf, 55 Md. 310, Russell v. Werntz, 88 Md. 214, 44 Atl. 219, and other cases. It is clear from those decisions and authorities cited in them that there may be a valid devise to one for life with a power of disposition, which will not affect the remainder over, unless the power is exercised as authorized; and as to any part of the estate upon which the power is not exercised the remainder is unaffected. It is equally clear that the clause in the will last quoted does not of itself make these remainders contingent. The testator, having given his widow a power of disposition, naturally and properly spoke of his estate "remaining at the death of my said wife;" but that would not convert what would otherwise have been a vested into a contingent remainder. The remainder may vest subject to the power, and the uncertainty as to whether the power will be exercised as to all or part of the estate does not make it a contingent remainder. As was well said in Ducker v. Burnham, 146 Ill. 10, 37 Am. St. Rep. 135, 34 N. E. 560: "If the remainder is contingent because it may consist of what remains after the exercise of the powers of sale and use conferred upon the life tenant, then, in case the life tenant should fail to sell any of the estate, or to exhaust for her own use any of the principal thereof, the remainder would still be contingent, because it would consist of what remains after paying off the charges created upon the property by the directions to pay the debts and the bequests. To hold that a remainder is contingent, because it cannot be known how much will be left until the debts and funeral expenses and other charges are paid, would make every remainder given by will a contingent one. But it is well settled that a devise to a person after the payment of debts and legacies is not contingent until such debts and legacies are paid, but confers an immediately vested interest. Scofield v. Olcott, 120 Ill. 362, 11 N. E. 351. In such cases the remainder vests subject to the payment of debts and legacies, and subject to the exercise of the power to use and sell, but liable to be divested as to so much of the estate as may be disposed of for the payment of debts and legacies, and by the execution of the power. The remainder is not made contingent by uncertainty as to the amount of the estate remaining undisposed of at the expiration of the life estate, but by uncertainty as to the persons who are to take." See also Heilman v. Heilman, 129 Ind. 59, 28 N. E. 310; Woodman v. Woodman, 89 Me. 128, 35 Atl. 1037; Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267, 13 Am. Rep. 23, and other cases cited in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 389.

It is not necessary to go beyond our own decisions to find authorities on the subject, but the above quotation from Ducker v. Burnham seems to be very apt. In Taylor v. Mosher, supra, the testator, after making certain devises, bequests, and dispositions in favor of his wife and servants, devised his estate not otherwise specifically disposed of to trustees. He directed them to pay certain annuities, and then to invest "the clear income of my estate, if anything remain after the application annually or otherwise of the several sums of money hereinbefore charged thereon," and provided: "Upon the death of my son William, I will and desire that a distribution of my estate be made among all my grandchildren, to wit, the children of my late son, James Mosher, and the children of my aforesaid son, William, provided any child he shall leave. All my said grandchildren to take per capita." The court said: "It is doing no violence to this language or to any rule of law to hold that the children of James, who were in esse at the date of the will and of the testator's death, took vested interests, liable to be divested pro tanto for the purpose of letting in for a share any child that William, who then had none, might, by possibility, have and leave surviving him. The fact that an estate is liable to be divested in whole or in part upon a contingency, does not make it a contingent estate." See also Dulany v. Middleton, 72 Md. 67, 19 Atl. 146, for a similar decision. It would seem, then, to be clear that the reference to the estate "remaining at the death of my said wife" did not make the remainder contingent.

But it is argued, and was so held by the learned judge below, that the rest of this clause shows that the interests left to the children were contingent,—that their right to participate in the distribution of his estate was contingent upon their surviving the testator's wife. But we cannot see how that clause indicates an intention on the part of the testator to create contingent remainders. The wife might in her lifetime have given one child more than she gave another, and that child might have survived her mother, while the other who received very little might have died, without issue, before her mother. It would seem to be more in accordance with the intention of the testator and more natural for him to vest the remainder in his children at his death. We have seen what confidence he had in his wife's judgment and sense of justice, and he was willing for her to decide what was necessary to be expended for the support of herself and children, and for their education or advancement in life. He did not direct that any charge should be made against them for sums thus advanced in excess of what was given others; and, even if the remainder be treated as contingent, those thus favored might survive their mother, and receive a share of the remaining property. The equality of distribution does not in any way depend upon whether the remainders were contingent or vested. It is a familiar but important rule that the law favors the early vesting of estates, and it is likewise a well-recognized rule of construction that, in doubtful cases, the interest should be deemed to be vested in the first instance, rather than contingent, unless the instrument under consideration does not admit of such construction. It cannot be doubted that Mr. Shriver did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate. He prefaced his will with the statement: "Subject to the payment of my debts and funeral expenses, I dispose of all my estate in manner and form following." Yet it was quite possible, although not probable, that all of the children by his second wife might have died without leaving issue before his wife died, and in that event there would have been an intestacy as to the remainder, if it must be regarded as contingent. The children provided for during the lifetime of his wife ("our children;," that is, those of his second wife and himself) were the same who were referred to in the clause under consideration ("my children by my said wife"). Mrs. Reese was one of those children, and left two children who would admittedly have been entitled to their mother's share if they had survived their grandmother. The testator did not leave the remainder to such of his children as survived his wife, or to such children and grandchildren (children of a deceased child) as survived her. He did make provision in that clause for the share and interest of a deceased child who had died leaving a child or children, but made none as to the share of a deceased child who died without leaving issue. The provision that "the child or children of a deceased child shall stand in its or their parent's place and stead, and receive and have the share and interest its and their parent would have been entitled to if living" is not of controlling effect on this question, by reason of the use of the words "receive and have." That was speaking of the period of distribution, and whether vested or contingent, the remaindermen were not entitled to "receive and have" their shares until that time arrived. The trustee was to receive, have, and hold the estate until then, excepting such part as she previously disposed of under the other provisions of the will. Without further discussion of this clause, it is sufficient to say that we do not find anything in it which necessarily indicates an intention on the part of the testator to create contingent remainders, and it will be well to now see what this court has said about the effect of similar or analogous provisions in other wills.

In Meyer v. Eisler, 29 Md. 28, the testator after making certain bequests and legacies, gave all the rest of his estate to his wife and another in trust, to hold the same with surplus or unappropriated revenue or income arising from the same, etc. He then authorized them to receive all rents, issues, interest, and profits arising or growing out of the property, and from the amounts so received to pay insurance, taxes, and repairs, and out of the residue to pay his wife for her use and benefit one third part, and directed the balance of the income to be invested in Baltimore city stock to be held in trust with the other property, until the end of twenty years after his death, or until his youngest child should arrive at the age of twenty years, and then the whole, including principal and interest, to be divided and paid over as follows: To his wife one-third part "and the other two-third parts to all my children, share and share alike; . . . and in the event of the death of either of my said children, leaving lawful issue, such issue to have and receive the share or proportion that the deceased would have been entitled to if living." He then provided for a similar distribution of the third left to his wife, in case she "shall be dead at the time of such division." Elizabeth, one of the children, after the testator's death, married John Rose, and subsequently died before the time had arrived for a division of the estate, intestate, and without issue. The widow also died before that time. This court held that the children took a vested interest in the property devised to them, and that John Rose, as husband of Elizabeth, was entitled, under the statute then in force, to a life estate in her share of the realty, and absolutely to her share of the personalty. That case is strikingly similar to the one under consideration, and has been fully approved in Taylor v. Mosher, 29 Md. 451, Small v. Small, 90 Md. 568, 45 Atl. 190, and Daughters v.

Lynch, 93 Md. 305, 48 Atl. 1055, and other cases.

In Cox v. Handy, 78 Md. 108, 27 Atl. 227, 501, the testator left certain real and personal property to his wife for life, and his will contained this clause: "It is my will that after the death of my wife, Mary Ann Handy, that all the property devised to her for life . . . shall be sold if necessary for equal partition, or, if the same can be accomplished without a sale, shall be divided amongst my children, share and share alike; the child or children of any deceased child to take the portion to which the parent, if living, would have been entitled." This court held "that a share of the property vested in each of the children of Wm. W. Handy, who survived him; but if any such child should leave children at his death, his share was divested in favor of his children; and that it was not divested by the death of the child in the lifetime of the tenant for life without leaving children;" and in the opinion delivered after a motion for reargument, it was said: "A share of the property vested in each of the children who were living at the time of his death, and if any child died before the period of distribution, leaving children, they were substituted in his place; his share, however, was not divested if he left no children, but it went to his representatives." That case has been recently approved in Hoover v. Smith, 96 Md. 393, 54 Atl. 102, and in Re Rogers, 97 Md. 674, 55 Atl. 679.

The cases we have cited would seem to conclusively show that these remainders were vested, and not contingent. This opinion has already reached such length as to make it undesirable to attempt to discuss in detail the authorities relied on by the appellees, such as Demill v. Reid, 71 Md. 175, 17 Atl. 1014; Larmour v. Rich, 71 Md. 369, 18 Atl. 702; Small v. Small, 90 Md. 550, 45 Atl. 190. In the latter, Judge Fowler referred to Larmour v. Rich, and said: "The distinction is clearly drawn between that class of cases where the estate or interest vests at the death of a testator, because of an absence of any expressed intention that it vest later, and those where the testator by his will fixes a more distant period for the vesting." It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the testator did not by his will express or indicate an intention that the remainder of his estate should not vest until after his wife's death. In the very recent case of Ridgely v. Ridgely (Md.) 59 Atl. 731, many of the cases affecting this question are cited. Engel v. State, 65 Md. 539, 5 Atl. 249, Small v. Small, and Lar- mour v. Rich, are there included in the class of cases where gifts were made for life and then over to survivors, in which cases the period of survivorship is generally referred to the period of distribution, and not the death of the testator. There is no reference to survivorship in this will. In Daughters v. Lynch, supra, we repeated what had been said in Tayloe v. Mosher, that "estates will be held to be vested wherever it can fairly be done without doing violence to the language of the will, and, to make them contingent, there must be plain expression to that effect, or such intent must be so plainly inferable from the terms used as to leave no room for construction." We are therefore of the opinion that the court erred in rejecting the claims of Margaret A. Landon and Clymer Whyte, administrators, for the shares claimed by them respectively,—the one being for this interest in the real property, and the other for that in the personalty distributed.

2. This brings us to the consideration of the appeal of Margaret L. Roberts. Having held that the children of Mr. and Mrs. Shriver took vested estates, it will not be necessary to determine whether a deed of trust such as that made by Mr. and Mrs. Roberts to Messrs. Reindollar and Roberts, trustees, would include a contingent remainder. The appellant contends that the deed of trust did not pass the interest of Mrs. Roberts for several reasons which we will briefly refer to.

(a) It is claimed for her that it does not contain a description of the real estate sufficient to identify it with reasonable certainty, as provided in § 9 of article 21 of Code Pub. Gen. Laws. The description in the deed of trust is "all and singular the real and personal estate, wheresoever situate, . . . and all other property of every nature, kind, and description and wheresoever situate [except so much thereof as is exempt from execution] of us the said" William and Margaret. It is difficult to understand how it would be possible to identify property intended to be conveyed more thoroughly than is done by that description. The intention manifested on the face of the deed was to convey and assign all of their property of every nature, kind, and description. If they had undertaken to specify it, some might have been omitted, and to show on the face of the deed that they intended to make an assignment of all property, it would have been necessary to have added some such clause as the one that was inserted. This court decided in Maughlin v. Tyler, 47 Md. 545, and other cases, that a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors, creating preferences and exacting releases, is void, unless it appears on its face to convey all the property of the debtor. It is true this deed does not create preferences or exact releases, but, if the position of the appellant be correct as to the effect of this statute, it would be difficult to ever comply with the requirements of the law as announced in Maughlin v. Tyler. If a grantor intends to convey part of his property, of course he must describe it specifically, but, if he intends to convey all of it and uses such language as is in this deed, who could be misled or in doubt as to what he conveyed? The object of § 9 is to require sufficient notice to the public and certainty as to what is conveyed. As well might it be required of a testator to specify his property in detail in a residuary clause in his will as to require a debtor making an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to do so. This statute has never been construed to require a schedule or list of the grantor's property to be set out in such a deed, and, so far as we are aware, it is the universal custom throughout the state to use terms similar to those in this deed, when it is intended to make a general assignment of all the debtor's property. In Carey's Forms & Precedents, p. 371, a very similar description of property is given for such a deed of trust, and there have been many cases in this court where such descriptions were given and never questioned. The case of Farquharson v. Eichelberger, 15 Md. 63, is conclusive of the question. It is said by the appellant that, as it was decided prior to Acts 1856, chap. 154, § 24, p. 255, which is now the section of the Code above mentioned, the effect of the statute was to change that decision. But that was "An Act to Simplify and Abridge the Rules and Forms of Conveyances," and if such a description was valid before the rules and forms were simplified, surely it is now. In our opinion, the statute does not in any wise invalidate this instrument.

(b) It is further contended on behalf of Mrs. Roberts that the deed of trust only conveyed the joint estates of her husband and herself,—that she united in the deed simply to convey her potential right of dower. We find nothing in the deed that sustains that contention. It recites that they are "indebted unto sundry persons and corporations in several sums of money, and, being unable to pay the same in full, have proposed and agreed to assign all our property . . . in trust for the benefit of our creditors, as hereinafter mentioned." It then assigns the property as we have stated, and, after giving the trustees authority to convert it into money, and providing for costs, etc., directs them to apply the residue of said moneys in payment "of the several debts due to the creditors aforesaid of us, the said William Jesse Roberts and Margaret L. Roberts, his wife, pari passu, and without any preference or priority of payment," and, after the payment of debts, costs, expenses, and commissions, "then in trust to apply the surplus (if any) unto the said William Jesse Roberts and Margaret L. Roberts," etc. It seems clear to us, therefore, that Mr. and Mrs. Roberts not only conveyed and assigned any property owned by them jointly, but all they owned individually. Whether or not she owed any individual debts which are entitled to be paid we have no means of knowing, and we do not intend to determine how the money realized from her father's estate is to be distributed by the trustees. That can be disposed of in the proceeding in which they make distribution.

(c) After having determined that the interests of the children of Mr. Shriver under his will were vested remainders, we do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the question as to whether Mrs. Roberts's interest passed by the deed of trust as we think it did. A vested remainder can be devised, mortgaged, or conveyed. It also is liable to execution by a judgment creditor. Armiger v. Reitz, 91 Md. 334, 46 Atl. 990. We are of the opinion, therefore, that Mrs. Roberts's interest should be distributed to the trustees named in the deed of trust, and it can then be determined what creditors are entitled to it. As the court below so decided, although on a different ground, as to Mrs. Roberts's interest that part of the decretal order will be affirmed, but, as we do not agree with the court as to the interest that would have gone to Carrie Reese, and is now claimed by Margaret A. Landon, and Clymer Whyte, administrator of Augustus Shriver Reese, and of William Reigart Reese, the portion of the order appealed from by them will be reversed. Of course we do not mean to disturb the portions of the decretal order not appealed from.

Decretal order affirmed in part, and reversed in part,—the costs in No. 18 (office docket) to be paid by the appellant in that case, including one half of the cost of transmitting and printing the record, and the costs in No. 19 (office docket) to be paid out of the estate of Augustus Shriver, including the other half of cost of transmitting and printing the record (one half by the trustees, and the other by the receiver),—and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

HARRIS BANKING COMPANY

v.

HELEN A. MILLER, Interpleader, Resp't.

WILLIAM JOHNSON et al., Exrs., etc., of Giles Burlingame, Deceased, Appts.

(.... Mo.)

1. Appeal—equity case—review of evidence.

The supreme court will weigh for itself the testimony in an equity case where it is practically undisputed, and draw its own conclusion as to the rights of the parties, notwithstanding the finding of the trial court.

2. Gift—bank deposit.

A gift inter vivos is not established by depositing a fund in bank with the statement that it is intended for the donee, taking back a certificate of deposit, and placing thereon an indorsement to pay the amount to the donee, handing the certificate to the donee to read, with the statement "It is yours," and then taking and retaining the certificate till death, to enjoy the use of it during life.

3. Trust—parol proof.

A trust in a fund in bank may be established by parol.

4. Gift—failure of proof—trust.

Failure to establish a perfect gift inter vivos does not preclude the donee from showing and having enforced a perfected, valid trust.

5. Trust—bank deposit.

A valid, executed trust is established by depositing a fund in bank, and, upon advice as to the method of transferring the fund to the cestui que trust, taking back and indorsing to him a certificate of deposit, and then notifying the bank and cestui que trust that the certificate is held by the depositor for the latter, although the depositor retains the right to use the income during life.

Case Note.—The circumstances attending a deposit of money in bank in trust for a third person may be such as to effect a perfected trust in favor of that person. In such cases there can be no question that the title to the funds will pass to him. In case the depositor's acts are equivocal, the rule seems to be to seek his intention, and let that govern. Perry on Trusts. Vol. 1, § 82, says: "In case of a deposit in bank in trust for another, there must be an intent to pass the beneficial interest during the life of the donor, and not merely a testamentary intent that the person named as cestui shall have the money at the decease of the donor, who retains complete control of the fund during his life. The general rule is that a deposit of money in the name of the depositor, in trust for another, transfers the title to the latter."

Upon the question of what is sufficient to establish a completed trust there is some conflict among the authorities. One line of cases holds that, to perfect the trust, knowledge of the deposit must be communicated to the beneficiary; and that the mere deposit, without more, is without effect.

In Massachusetts the courts require the depositor to inform the person in whose favor the deposit is made, and to state to him that it is to be his after the depositor's death. Gerrish v. New Bedford Inst. for Savings, 128 Mass. 159, 35 Am. Rep. 365.

In Jewett v. Shattuck, 124 Mass. 590, it was held that if the beneficiary did not know of the trust, it would not be enforced.

In Brabrook v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, 6 Am. Rep. 222, it was held that no trust was created where a depositor made two deposits in a savings bank, one in his own name and the other in his name as trustee for his daughter, a pass book being issued to him, which he always retained. The court said that there must be some act of delivery out of the possession of the donor, for the purpose and with the intent that the title should pass thereby. The doctrine of Brabrook v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank was considered decisive in the case of Clark v. Clark, 108 Mass. 522.

In Stone v. Bishop, 4 Cliff. 593, Fed. Cas. No. 13,482, it was held that a deposit in trust for a third person will not pass to him if he is ignorant of the deposit until after the depositor's death, and where the laws of the bank require presentation of the pass book before money can be withdrawn.

In Bartlett v. Remington, 59 N. H. 364, the court held that a fund deposited in a savings bank in the name of the depositor, in trust for another, who was not a party to the transfer, the depositor retaining the title and control of the fund, created an unenforceable executory trust.

Another line of cases, which represents the weight of authority, holds the deposit to be sufficient of itself to vest the title in the beneficiary, and that a declaration of trust may be completed though the pass book is retained by the depositor. Thus, in Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446, the following facts are presented: A deposit was made in a savings bank, the depositor declaring at the time that she wanted the account to be in trust for a certain person. A pass book, which the depositor retained, was issued, stating that the account was in trust for such person. The money remained in the bank until the depositor's death, except one year's interest, which was drawn out. The cestui que trust was ignorant of the trust until after the depositor's death. In an action by the beneficiary to recover possession of the pass book, and to recover the deposits, the court held that the transaction was a valid and sufficient declaration of trust, and passed the title to the deposits, that the retention of the pass book was not inconsistent with the completeness of the gift, and that notice to the cestui que trust was not necessary.

APPPEAL by the defendant executors from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Putnam County in favor of the defendant cestui que trust in an interpleader proceeding to determine the right to a fund deposited by Giles Burlingame in the plaintiff bank. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. B. Davis, Higbee & Mills, Robinson & Robison, and N. A. Franklin, for appellants:

The delivery must be absolute.

There was neither a complete gift nor a trust shown by the evidence.

Mrs. Miller declares upon a gift. She can have no relief upon the theory of a trust.

Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 422, 36 Am. Rep. 634; Wadd v. Hazelton, 137 N. Y. 215, 21 L. R. A. 693, 33 Am. St. Rep. 707, 33 N. E. 143; Williams v. Chamberlain, 165 Ill.

But in Cunningham v. Davenport, 147 N. Y. 43, 32 L. R. A. 373, 49 Am. St. Rep. 641, 41 N. E. 412, it was held that an irrevocable trust in favor of another was not established by a deposit in a savings bank of the depositor's own money, in his own name, which he afterwards changed to his own name as trustee for his brother, when the depositor stated that he changed the account back to his own name three days after the death of his brother, who was never informed of the deposit, and that he never intended to give his brother the money. In some jurisdictions this case is cited as modifying the New York doctrine, but none of the New York cases cite it to that effect. But some of the New York cases distinguish it on the ground that the beneficiary died before the donor, and that the latter declared he never intended to create a trust. The intention, under the New York cases, is deemed a material element, and a presumption of intention to create a trust in such a case is held rebuttable by the depositor's statements to the contrary. Re Barefield, 82 App. Div. 465, 81 N. Y. Supp. 843.

The case of Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 25, 54 Pac. 370, is very similar to HARRIS BKG. CO. v. MILLER. A depositor in her lifetime changed a deposit in a bank so as to make it payable to the individual order of either of her sisters, or of herself, for the purpose, orally made known to the bank, of arranging the account so that her sisters could draw it at her death, and have the immediate benefit of it without probate; she then addressed a letter to them, stating what she had done, and that upon her death they could draw the residue remaining in the bank. The court held that a valid trust was created, although it was not in writing, and that the power of the trustor to draw the funds did not affect the validity of the trust as to the remainder, and that her possession of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) bank book until her death was immaterial. The court also held that under the statute the beneficiary need not be informed of the trust, or express an acceptance of it; as a demand by the beneficiaries upon the bank is sufficient acceptance.

In Milholland v. Whalen, 89 Md. 212, 44 L. R. A. 205, 43 Atl. 43, it was held that a deposit in a savings bank in trust for the owner of the money and another person, as joint owners, subject to the order of either, and the balance, at the death of either, to belong to the survivor, constitutes a valid declaration of trust, which transfers to the trustee the legal title for the benefit of the survivor as to the balance of the fund remaining in the bank at the death of either, even though the settlor retains possession of the bank book. In the case of Hoboken Bank for Savings v. Schwoon, 62 N. J. Eq. 503, 50 Atl. 490, the same doctrine was applied. The court held that a complete declaration of trust was established where one who had a deposit in a bank signed a statement directing that the deposits should be placed in the name of another jointly with herself, and that either of the parties, or the survivor of them, was at liberty at any time to draw any or all of the deposit, and thereafter a new pass book was issued to her, containing the same directions, which she placed in the hands of a friend, with the instructions to deliver it to the other after her death.

In Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn, 88 Me. 122, 32 L. R. A. 377, 51 Am. St. Rep. 382, 33 Atl. 836, the facts show that the depositor retained the bank book until his death, and that he never communicated to the cestui his intention as to the deposit. The court held that the words "in trust for" in the entry of a savings bank deposit, with the same form used on the depositor's book, is sufficient to create a prima facie trust which will be a complete trust in favor of the donee, where all the donor's declarations and

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 25, 1901, Giles Burlingame, of Putnam county, Missouri, died testate at said county, and on July —, 1901, his will was duly probated, and letters testamentary were issued to the defendants William Johnson and James E. Davis, who were duly qualified and are acting as such executors of said estate. On August 26, 1902, the Harris Banking Company filed its petiacts are consistent with the presumption arising from the entry itself. The court said that "it is not necessary, therefore, that he who declares a trust should divest himself of the legal title, if perchance he so does it as to transfer the real or equitable title to the cestui. . . . He may retain the legal title, giving him the control, but for the benefit of the cestui, according to the terms of the trust."

In Sayre v. Weil, 94 Ala. 466, 15 L. R. A. 544, 10 So. 546, the court held that a trust is complete and irrevocable when a person makes a deposit of money to the credit of himself as trustee for certain children named, and nothing remains in him but the mere naked legal title.

In Atkinson's Petition, 16 R. I. 413, 3 L. R. A. 392, 27 Am. St. Rep. 745, 16 Atl. 712, it was held that a deposit of money in a bank in the name of another, with depositor's name as trustee following it, and a statement by him to the other that he had made the deposit, which would belong to the other at his death, constituted a deposit in trust, which would be valid although the depositor retained the deposit books until his death. The same view was taken in Ray v. Simmons, 11 R. I. 266, 23 Am. Rep. 447, and in Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, 16 Am. Rep. 69.

In Gaffney's Estate, 146 Pa. 49, 23 Atl. 163, the court held that a prima facie trust was established in favor of the beneficiary, although he never had possession of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bank book, where one deposited money to the credit of himself as trustee, and the money remained until his death.

In Blasdel v. Locke, 52 N. H. 238, it was held that a gift inter vivos was not completed. The facts showed that a deposit was made in a savings bank in the name of one who was the niece of the depositor, the latter intending that it should be a gift, but retaining the bank book until her death. During the depositor's last illness she informed her niece of the gift for the first time. In an action by the beneficiary against the bank to recover the deposit, the court held that the deposit created a trust in favor of the niece, and her acceptance of it rendered her title absolute, although there was no delivery of the bank book.

In Robertson v. McCarty, 54 App. Div. 103, 66 N. Y. Supp. 327, it was held that a deposit by one in trust for his brother created an irrevocable trust in the entire deposit, although the depositor retained possession of the bank book, and the beneficiary did not know of the trust until after the donor's death. Cases to the same effect are: Millard v. Clark, 80 Hun, 141, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1012; Jenkins v. Baker, 77 App. Div. 509, 78 N. Y. Supp. 1074; Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 421, 6 L. R. tion in the circuit court of Putnam county, stating that it was and still is a banking corporation, with its banking house in the town of Harris, Sullivan county, Missouri; that for several years prior to his death said Burlinggame had kept a considerable sum of money upon deposit in plaintiff's bank, bearing interest; that on May 22, 1901, the plaintiff issued to said deceased a certificate of deposit for $8,080.91, which was dated June 11, 1901, and which said Burlinggame on said May 22, 1901, by written indorsement, assigned to Helen A. Miller: that plaintiff is informed and believes said Burlinggame delivered said certificate of deposit to said Helen A. Miller soon after said assignment and before his death; that plaintiff is informed and believes that said certificate of deposit was in the possession of said Burlinggame at the time of his death, and whether he held the same for himself or for Helen A. Miller plaintiff does not know; that said Helen A. Miller claimed same as her absolute property, but said executors inventoried same as the assets of the estate of said Burlinggame, and refused to deliver it to her; that said executors, on the one hand, and the said Helen A. Miller, on the other hand, are now each demanding plaintiff to allow amount due on said certificate of deposit and were threatening to sue the plaintiff if the sum was not paid to each of them, respectively, in full; that plaintiff was ready and willing to pay the amount due on said certificate of deposit to the party legally entitled thereto, or to pay the sum into court for such party as shall be adjudged entitled to the same; that it would be unsafe for plaintiff to pay the sum to either claimant without its being judicially determined to which of the claimants it should be rightfully paid,—and prayed that said Helen A. Miller and the said executors be required to interplead, setting up their respective claims to said certificate in order that it might be judicially determined to whom plaintiff should pay the sum, and for all proper relief. At the October term of said court, 1902, Helen A. Miller filed her interplea, alleging that she was the owner and rightfully entitled to the said certificate of deposit and the fund evidenced thereby, and that the said Giles Burlinggame had no right, title, or interest therein; that on or about the — day of —, 1894, at the special solicitation of the said Giles Burlinggame, said Helen A. Miller moved from her home at Springfield, Missouri, to the residence of said Giles Burlinggame and his twin brother, Miles Burlinggame, both of whom were old and infirm, living alone, both being bachelors and her cousins, and undertook to keep house, wait on, and nurse them: that said Miles was then, and has continued to be, without means of support, and was living off the bounty of his brother, the said Giles Burlinggame, and that solely at the solicitation of said Giles Burlinggame she entered upon the work, service, and duties she had so assumed, and from that date continued in the discharge of the duties in keeping house, waiting on, and nursing said Burlinggames, until the death of said Giles Burlinggame on July 25, 1901; that in recognition of the kindness she had so shown said Giles Burlinggame and his brother, and because of the work and the labor so performed, and the care and the attention she had bestowed upon said Burlinggames during all that period, the said Giles Burlinggame, having deposited in the plaintiff's bank the sum of $8,080.91, and having received the said certificate of deposit therefor from said bank, gave the same and the right to have and receive said money so on deposit to said Helen A. Miller, and indorsed and signed said certificate of deposit to her on May 22, 1901, and that certificate of deposit is now wrongfully withheld from her by said Johnson and Davis, executors of the will of said deceased, because they, as such executors, have no right thereto and no interest in said fund. Wherefore she prays judgment for said sum of $8,080.91, and that the plaintiff bank be required to pay the same to her, and that the court will make such orders and render such judgment as may be proper. On the same day Johnson and Davis, the executors, filed their petition as interpleaders, and admitted that they were the executors of the last will and testament of Giles Burlinggame, deceased, and alleged that said banking company duly issued its certificate of deposit to said deceased on date June 11, 1901, for the sum of $8,080.91, bearing 3 per cent interest to maturity only; that said certificate ever afterwards remained the property of said Burlinggame, and was his property at his death; that said money was due from said banking company to said Burlinggame, with all interest thereon, and was wholly unpaid at his death, and was a part of the assets of his estate; that said certificate was duly taken possession of by them, as executors of the last will of said deceased, and duly inventoried by them as assets of said estate, and they are now the owners and holders thereof as such, and said certificate and said sum of $8,080.91, with all interest, is now due, for which they pray judgment, and that this court order the same paid to them, and for all proper orders. On January 13, 1903, Helen Miller filed her answer to the petition of said executors as follows: "That it is true that said executors were duly qualified and are now acting as such executors, and that the deceased was a resident of Putnam county at the date of his death, July 25, 1901. That said executors obtained possession of said certificate of deposit from her, and afterwards improperly and wrongfully inventoried same as assets of said estate. Denies that said certificate of deposit was the property of said deceased at the time of his death, but that same was then her property and has been her property since the assignment thereof, as alleged in her interplea. That upon making said deposit in said bank, and making the assignment of said certificate to her on the back of same, the said Giles Burlinggame declared to the officers in charge of said bank that the said certificate of deposit belonged to this interpleader, Helen A. Miller, and for said bank to pay the money evidenced by said certificate to her and to no other person, and then and thereby placed said funds in said bank, and left the same therein in trust for the sole use and benefit of the said Helen A. Miller, and prayed judgment as asked in her interplea." On the same day the executors filed their answer to the interplea of Helen A. Miller, and alleged that the deceased, at his death, had and held the said certificate of deposit for $8,080.91, and that these defendants have had, and still have possession thereof ever since the death of said deceased, and denied all the other allegations in the petition of said Helen A. Miller, and prayed judgment as in their interplea. The cause was tried by the court without a jury on January 13 and 14, 1903, upon the foregoing pleadings, and judgment was rendered for Helen A. Miller, interpleader, and the plaintiff bank was ordered and adjudged to pay said sum of $8,080.91 to her, and the costs were adjudged against the executors, Johnson and Davis. Within due time, the executors filed their motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment, which was overruled, and thereupon the executors in due form appealed to this court.

On the part of the interpleader Helen A. Miller the evidence was as follows: Overton Harris testified that he resided at Harris, Missouri; was a farmer and banker. He knew Giles Burlinggame twenty-five or thirty years. He died in about one month after his last visit to our town on June 13, 1901. Witness was, at the time of giving his evidence, and had been, president of the Harris Banking Company for three years. At the time of his death Giles Burlinggame had $8,080.91 on deposit in the bank. He had been a depositor for several years. The certificate of deposit for $8,080.91 was drawing 3 per cent for twelve months. At the time he made this deposit Burlinggame told me and my son, Cliff Harris, the cashier of the bank, that he wanted to wind up his business, and asked us to fix this deposit so that Helen A. Miller could be the absolute owner of said property. We told him that he could make an indorsement on the back of it and sign it over to her. Cliff wrote the indorsement and handed the certificate to him, and Giles Burlinggame signed the same. He then said, "This winds up my business, with the exception of about $3,500" that he had on deposit in a Lucerne bank, which amount he expected to bring down and fix the same way that he had the $8,080.91; that he wanted her to have this last amount as well as the first he had given her. On June 13th, 1901, he came back to Harris to our bank and brought $500. I asked him if he wanted a time certificate for it. He said "No;" that he would be down in a few days and bring the balance; he would then fix it as he did the other. He said for us to pay this to no one but Helen Miller. Just about a year before he made this deposit, his deposit ne made at that time was $7,855.26. He told us at that time, in case of his death, that Helen Miller would come to the bank for said amount, and, upon identification, to pay her the same; but at the last time of making the deposit, after signing the indorsement of the certificate, he told us then to pay it to no one but her. My son made the indorsement on the certificate, and he (Burlinggame) signed it and afterwards put it in his pocket. He said it belonged to Helen A. Miller. After stepping out of the bank we sat down in front of the bank, Mr. Burlinggame taking his certificate out of his pocket, and asked me if I would hold the certificate. I told him I would rather not. He then put the certificate back into his pocket. He told me at different times he wanted her to have it, that she had been keeping house for him for six or seven years, and that he didn't want John, his brother, nor Phil Burlinggame's heirs, to have any of his estate; that his twin brother, Miles, that lived with him, was wholly incompetent to manage his affairs; and that he had the utmost confidence in Mrs. Helen Miller of taking care of himself and his twin brother and his blind sister. He further said, if his twin brother was to get hold of it, him being a drunkard, that they would soon get it away from him. He said that Phil Burlinggame's heirs, he thought, had been furnishing him some money now, as he had come home several times drunk, and that he was going to fix his affairs so the parties furnishing him this money to get drunk on would have to lose it.

On cross-examination he was asked:

Q. Did you write this letter of June 11, 1901?

A. I signed it. It was written at my dictation. At the time I wrote this letter I had a chance to make a loan of $5,000, and, as Mr. Burlingame had told me a few weeks before he intended to bring the $3,500 down and make a time deposit of it to Helen Miller, as he had the other, I figured that in doing so we could carry the loan.

Said letter read as follows:

Harris Banking Company,
Harris, Mo., June 11, 1901.

Giles Burlingame, Esq.,
Lucerne, Mo.

Dear Sir:-

Regarding the matter we were talking about, I wish you would come down this week, if possible, as we have a chance now to make a nice $5,000 loan on 1,000 acres of land. This is a loan we want to make, and, if we use your funds in making it, we want to have them soon. I think now that I will have to be away from home next week, and, if your health is good, you had better come down this week. Please answer and let us know when you will be down. I will be at home all this week.

Very truly yours,
O. Harris.

C. R. Harris testified as follows: "I reside at Harris, Missouri, and am a son of Overton Harris, and cashier of the Harris Banking Company, and have been for five years." He testified that Giles Burlingame had been a depositor in their bank ever since he had been cashier, that he would come around about the 1st of June to collect his interest on his old certificate and renew it, or make a new deposit. He came down on May 22, 1901,—the certificate matured June 11th; said he wanted to wind up his business; wanted to leave his money to Mrs. Miller; that he wanted to leave some more money in connection with his time certificate he was then carrying; plus the accrued interest. The other amount was about $3,500 he then had in the bank at Lucerne, his home bank. He would bring that down in small sums, to leave the impression he was loaning it. "We arranged his new certificate upon his request, payable to himself, for $8,080.91, at 3 per cent for twelve months. He said he wanted this, as he had previously instructed us, so that Helen A. Miller could draw it at the time of his death; that he wanted her to have it, and asked how he could fix the paper, and my father and myself suggested that he just assign it, like any other negotiable instrument, to her. I prepared the assignment and he signed it. He said we were to pay it to no one else but Helen A. Miller: that it was her property, as he had instructed 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

us previously. He instructed us frequently. The year before, when he came to renew his deposit and collect his interest, he told us he was getting old and might die at any time, and that, in case he did die, Mrs. Miller would present the certificate for payment; that Mrs. Miller would visit Mrs. Titus [his sister], and Mrs. Titus would identify her." Burlingame then asked Overton Harris, president of the bank, to hold the certificate for Mrs. Miller, and he declined, and Burlingame put the certificate back into his pocket.

Frank C. Miller testified he was a son of Mrs. Helen A. Miller, interpleader; that some twelve years, he said, before his mother went to live with Giles Burlingame, he had a conversation with Giles Burlingame, in which the latter said to him: "I would like to have your mother come and live with me, or, in other words, take care of me. I am getting old. I will give her all I have. Do you think she would come?" "I said, 'I do not know,' but said I would write to her about it; and he said, 'All right,' he wished I would. He said there was only two women in the world he cared anything about, and one of them was my mother. That was about all of the conversation at that time. I wrote her the statement he made to me. I suppose he was about sixty-five years old at that time."

Thos. Scott testified: "My name is Thomas Scott; age, fifty-four years; residence, Wintersville, Sullivan county, Missouri; occupation, farmer. I have known Giles Burlingame for ten years. I saw him at Harris the latter part of May, 1901. I told him I had a life policy in the Woodmen, and had come to have it changed, and he said he had come to get his business fixed up; that he got Cliff Harris to write out a certificate for a little over $8,000, that he was going to give it to his housekeeper, Mrs. Miller, that she had been keeping house for him for six or seven years; and I said that was more than I was able to give mine. About three weeks later I seen him at Harris again. I said, 'Did you give her that money, a little over $8,000?' and he said, 'Yes, sir.' 'How did she take it when you gave it to her?' He said it did not surprise her at all, as he had said he had told her that he was going to give it to her before he got all his business straightened up and was going home. In the first conversation he said he got Cliff Harris to write out the certificate of deposit, and that he was going to take it home and give it to her. That's what he told me. The next, I asked him if he had given it to her, and he said, 'Yes, sir.'"

Mrs. Miller also read in evidence a passage from the inventory filed by the said executors, as follows: "Certificate of deposit No. 132, issued by the Harris Banking Company, of date June 11, 1901, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, for the sum of $8,080.91; interest due on the above to date, $40.60." In parenthesis: "(Above certificate indorsed to Helen A. Miller.)" Also read in evidence said certificate as follows: "$8,080.91. Hartis Banking Company, Harris, Missouri, June 11, 1901. Giles Burlinggame has deposited in this bank eight thousand and eighty dollars and ninety-one hundredths, subject to the order of himself on the return of the certificate properly indorsed. [Signed] C. B. Harris, Cashier, No. 132. This certificate is not subject to check. Three per cent interest to maturity only;" and on the back the following indorsement: "For value received I hereby assign this certificate to Helen A. Miller, and authorize her to draw the same. [Signed] Giles Burlinggame."

S. S. Johnson, a tenant of Burlinggame, testified that he saw him in June, 1901, about a week after Burlinggame had got back from Harris; told him he was getting old—he ought to have his business fixed up; and Burlinggame said he had it fixed up right here, and put his hand on his left breast. Witness could see the bulk of something there about the size of a bill book. Burlinggame said he aimed for Mrs. Miller to have the biggest part of it (his estate); that he wanted his brother Miles and his blind sister to be taken care of; that he had the papers fixed up, but he didn't aim to turn them over; that she (Mrs. Miller) might die first and leave him out, or throw him out; that Mrs. Miller was to have the money in the bank after his death, and he the interest on it for his own support; that she was to draw it after his death, but he wanted the use of the money and the interest on it while he lived; the bulk of his property he would leave to Mrs. Miller; that he had already fixed it and mentioned as having it in his pocket.

Charles Burlinggame, nephew of the deceased, testified he was at his uncle's a few days before his death. "He had something like a little book, wrapped up in a piece of leather, and he was very weak and tried to sew that into his bosom. Mrs. Miller offered to help him, and he said, if he wanted any help, he would ask for it. I was there the day the executors got the papers. Mrs. Miller said they came and got Giles' papers, and that there was a certificate of deposit for $500 among them, and she gave it to them. She did not mention the $8,000 certificate."

A. H. Lowry testified: "I was at Burlinggame's the morning he died. A few minutes before he died Mrs. Miller said for me to take charge of the papers in his shirt pocket and give them to her,—that was Burlinggame's request. She said there was a paper in there that really belonged to her; that he had showed it to her, but that he wanted to keep it in his possession to draw the interest on it. I don't know whether she said it was a paper or certificate. I went and got Uncle Billy Wilson, and amongst us we took the papers off. As I remember the book, it was a kind of leather slip, and it was in his shirt pocket. They seemed to be stitched in with some kind of thread or twine. Mr. Wilson took the book out of his pocket and handed it to Mrs. Miller. She did not open it or say anything at the time. I was at the inventory. Mrs. Miller said Burlinggame showed her this certificate of deposit and said that he wanted to keep it; that he might want to draw the interest on it; that he wanted to retain it, so that he could get the interest on it."

James E. Davis, executor, testified he was at the inventory; that "Mrs. Miller said that, when Burlinggame came from Harris, he showed her the certificate of deposit; and my impression is that he told her that at his death it was hers,—that he would keep it and draw the interest while he lived. There was a will and some notes, and a memorandum of deposit of $500, in that book. They were all inventoried. I believe I heard Mrs. Miller say something about the paper being hers at his death. I think she said that he would keep it until his death and he would draw the interest. She said that he had shown it to her when he came from Harris, and said that it was hers at his death, but that he would keep it until his death and draw the interest."

William Johnson, one of the executors, testified that he was sent for, and Mrs. Miller got the papers. "She said they were on Mr. Burlinggame's body. She named about them being pinned on or sewed on his shirt or on his breast, and says that he said that he would keep them right there. A day or two afterwards we went back to get the papers. Mrs. Miller handed them to Mr. Currey, and he opened the papers and this certificate was among them. She said he was giving her that to take care of Miles—that certificate she was claiming; that he was afraid, if Miles got it into his possession at his death, these other brothers and folks would get the proceeds from Miles. She said he expected to get it all arranged by the 1st of September, following,—this arrangement in regard to Miles, giving her the certificate,—and would get all arranged by September. She said that was the package as it came off Mr. Burlinggame's body. She never claimed it was hers. She said it ought to be hers."

Dr. Parish testified: "I was at Burlingame's the night he died. He was very sick and kept holding his hand on his left breast. I asked him if anything was hurting him, and I thought he mentioned his money. I noticed a bulk in his shirt, and it looked like it was sewed in. After his death I asked Mrs. Miller what had become of those papers, and she said, 'We called in some parties and took them off.'" In rebuttal, William Wilson, a witness for Mrs. Miller, testified that Mrs. Miller said that, when Burlingame came home from Harris, he took out that certificate and handed it to her, and told her he wanted her to read it, and he said, 'Now, that is yourn, but I want the use of it while I live.' I was at Burlingame's directly after his death, and found a bundle of papers sewed up in his shirt pocket. I ripped the pocket open and took the papers out. I didn't notice the papers. They were tied up with a twine string, solid,—all in a bunch,—and I handed them to Lowry, and he handed them to Mrs. Miller and told her to put them away, and she put them in her trunk. After the burial she asked me to open the package. She did not want to hold it. I found the two certificates,—one for $8,080.91, and one for $500,—some notes payable to Burlingame, and the will, and about $95 in cash. And she said that Burlingame had them in his pocket while he lived, and had her sew them in. She said that he wanted her to wear them on her person, and she did not like to do it; that he put them in his pocket when she did not want to take them, and put them in there and had her sew them in, and I came in while she was sewing them in, and saw her sewing them."

1. This is an equitable proceeding by the plaintiff banking company, as a stakeholder, seeking the protection of a court of equity against rival claimants to the certificate of deposit issued by it. As the plaintiff is in the position of a mere stakeholder, claiming no right in the subject-matter, but being liable to be vexed by two or more suits by the different claimants of the said certificate at the same time, the jurisdiction of equity is well established. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 806, 821; Hathaway v. Foy, 40 Mo. 540. The issue is a simple one, to wit: Who is the rightful owner of the said certificate? Mrs. Helen A. Miller, on the one hand, or the executors of the last will of Giles Burlingame, deceased, on the other hand? The facts are few and not complicated. It is not disputable that the deposit of $8,080.91 in the plaintiff bank, of date June 11, 1901, was originally made by the said Giles Burlingame in his own name, and a certificate of deposit issued directly to him. Mrs. Miller asserts title to the said certificate and the fund which it represents on two grounds: First, an executed gift inter vivos; and, second, an executed parol trust created by Giles Burlingame in her favor to the said fund. The executors insist that the gift was invalid for want of a delivery of the certificate after the assignment thereof on its back to Mrs. Miller, and that there was no evidence of any intention to create a trust in said fund in favor of Mrs. Miller. The learned circuit court made a special finding of facts, and found that the evidence established a valid executed gift inter vivos from the said Burlingame to Mrs. Miller, and that, by his assignment of the deposit certificate to Mrs. Miller and his subsequent acts, relinquished all control over the said certificate of deposit, to hold the same as the property of Mrs. Miller. The first inquiry, therefore, must be as to the propriety of this finding of the circuit court. The question is one of equity, and the finding and conclusion of the circuit court are open to review by this court; and while it has been the uniform practice of this court to defer in a large measure to the judgment of the circuit court on a question of fact, on account of its superior advantage in weighing the testimony of the witnesses, yet, where the evidence is practically undisputed, as it is in this case, this court has never abdicated its right to weigh the testimony and draw its own conclusion as to the equitable rights of the parties litigant.

Addressing ourselves, then, to the question whether the facts developed on trial establish a valid executed gift inter vivos from Giles Burlingame to Mrs. Helen A. Miller, the testimony, in our opinion, establishes, first, that Giles Burlingame deposited $8,080.91 of his own money in plaintiff's bank on the 22d day of May, 1901, and took a certificate of deposit therefor in his own name; and at the same time he indorsed on the back of said certificate the following words: "For value received I hereby assign this certificate to Helen A. Miller, and authorize her to draw the same. Giles Burlingame." And at the time of the execution of said assignment the said Giles Burlingame directed the plaintiff banking company not to pay said deposit to anyone else, but to pay the same to Helen A. Miller; and requested Overton Harris, the president of the said banking company, to hold the said certificate of deposit, but the said Harris declined to do so; that thereupon the said Burlingame replaced said certificate in his pocket, and returned to his home with it in his possession. As to what occurred between Giles Burlingame and the interpleader, Mrs. Helen A. Miller, in regard to said certificate of deposit after his return to his home, Mrs. Miller was not competent to testify, and we are forced to accept the evidence as to her statements of what occurred by proof aliunde. It is conceded on all hands that when Giles Burlinggame died this certificate of deposit, together with another for $500, and his will, were found on his person, wrapped in a leather bag and sewed to his shirt, and was turned over to his executors by Mrs. Miller soon after his death. Mrs. Miller told the witness Lowry, while Burlinggame was in articulo mortis, that it was Burlinggame's request that she should take charge of the papers in his shirt pocket; that there was a paper in there that really belonged to her; that he (Burlinggame) had showed it to her, but that he wanted to keep it in his possession to draw the interest on it. He further testified that he was present at the making of the inventory, and on that occasion Mrs. Miller said that Burlinggame showed her this certificate of deposit, but said that he wanted to keep it; that he might want to draw the interest on it; that he wanted to retain it, so that he could get the interest on it. James E. Davis, one of the executors testified that he was present at the making of the inventory, and Mrs. Miller said that, when Burlinggame came from Harris, he showed her the certificate of deposit, and his impression was that he told her that at his death it was hers; that he would keep it and draw the interest while he lived. William Johnson, the other executor, testified that he was sent for after Burlinggame's death, and Mrs. Miller got the papers and turned them over to him. He said they were on Mr. Burlinggame's body when he died,—pinned on or sewed on his shirt,—and said that he said that he would keep them right there; that, when he opened the package, the certificate in controversy was among them. William Wilson testified that Mrs. Miller said that when Mr. Johnson, the executor, came down there and got the papers, Mrs. Miller asked if he thought he ought to take the certificate that was signed over to her, but he said that, as it was found among the other papers, he thought he ought to take it to Unionville with him, but that he thought it ought to be sent back to her; that Mrs. Miller said that, when Mr. Burlinggame came back from Harris, he took out that certificate and handed it to her to read it, and said, "Now, that is yours, but I want to use it while I live." Mr. Wilson further testified that "after the burial of Mr. Burlinggame, Mrs. Miller requested me to open the bundle or package of papers," and he found this certificate among other papers in it; that Mrs. Miller said to him that Mr. Burlinggame had them in his pocket while he lived, and she sewed them in; that he wanted her to take them and wear them on her person, and she did 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not like to do it. Mr. Clifton R. Harris testified that at the time the certificate of deposit was issued Mr. Burlinggame said he wanted this fixed, so that Helen A. Miller could draw it at the time of his death. That Giles Burlinggame intended to give Mrs. Helen A. Miller the certificate of deposit, or rather the fund which it represented, at some time, does not admit of doubt. Courts are ever desirous of carrying out and effectuating the intention of parties as manifested by their agreements or declarations of trust, and we will do so whenever it can be done consistently with the established rules of law. To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, there must be an intention to give and a delivery to the donee, or to someone for him, of the property given. An intention of the donor to give is not alone sufficient. The intention must be executed by a complete and unconditional delivery. Neither will a delivery be sufficient, unless made with an intention to give. The transaction must show a completely executed transfer to the donee of the present right of property and the possession. The donee must become the owner of the property given. Re Soulard, 141 Mo., loc. cit. 657, 43 S. W. 617; Dunn v. German American Bank, 109 Mo. 97, 18 S. W. 1139; McCord v. McCord, 77 Mo. 166, 46 Am. Rep. 9; Walter v. Ford, 74 Mo. 195, 41 Am. Rep. 312; Tomlinson v. Ellison, 104 Mo. 105, 16 S. W. 201. A gift cannot be made to take effect in the future. Such a transaction would only amount to a promise to make a gift in the future, and, being without consideration, is void. Spencer v. Vance, 57 Mo. 429; School District v. Sheidley (School District v. Stocking) 138 Mo. 672, 37 L. R. A. 406, 60 Am. St. Rep. 576, 40 S. W. 656.

In view of these well-settled principles of law, can it be said that Giles Burlinggame made an unconditional gift and delivery of the certificate of deposit in this case to Mrs. Miller? While we think it is plain from his conversation with the Messrs. Harris at the time of the execution of the certificate of deposit by them that it was his intention to give Mrs. Miller this fund, and while the assignment fully corroborates their testimony as to the intention which he expressed at the time, the physical fact that Giles Burlinggame retained this certificate of deposit in his own possession until his death stands admitted and conceded. Not only this, but the claim asserted by Mrs. Miller to the executors, and to the witnesses who were present at the time of Mr. Burlinggame's death, falls short of a claim that Mr. Burlinggame had parted absolutely with the present and future dominion and right of control over the certificate of deposit. Her evidence falls short of a statement of an unconditional delivery to her. On the contrary, she says that he showed it to her and permitted her to read it, but said he wanted to keep it in his possession to draw the interest on it; that it would be hers at his death, but he would keep it and draw the interest while he lived. Her own witness, Mr. William Wilson, says that she told him that Mr. Burlingame handed the certificate to her and told her that he wanted her to read it, and said, "Now, that is yours," but he wanted the use of it while he lived. We cannot escape the conclusion that this evidence does not establish a valid executed gift inter vivos. In our opinion, the retention by the deceased of the actual possession of the certificate of deposit, with the expressed intention of reserving to himself the right to collect and retain the interest accruing thereon, negatives the claim of an unconditional gift. The authorities above cited from this court are supported by numerous others, and by the great weight of authority, both in England and in the United States.

2. Notwithstanding the conclusion we have reached that the transaction by Mr. Giles Burlingame cannot be enforced as an executed gift inter vivos, her contention that it can be enforced as an executed express trust in her favor remains to be determined. In her defense to the interplea of the executors, she asserts that at the time he deposited said fund in said bank said Burlingame declared to the officers of said bank that said certificate belonged to interpleader, Helen A. Miller, and directed said bank to pay the money evidenced by said certificate to her alone, and no one else, and thereby placed the same in said bank in trust for the sole use and benefit of said interpleader, Helen A. Miller. To this claim of an executed trust, objections are made by counsel for the executors.

It is first insisted that the claim of executed trust cannot be maintained, for the reason that it must have been evidenced by a writing, and cannot be established by parol evidence. Mr. Perry, in his learned and exhaustive treatise on Trusts, in the first volume (§ 86) thus states the doctrine: "There does not seem to be any objection, however, to the establishment of a trust in personal property by parol. The owner, in the absence of a statute, has entire control of it. He can sell and transfer it without writing and by parol; and, if he can transfer it by parol, there is no reason why he may not by parol transfer it upon such lawful terms and to such uses and trusts as he may desire. It has been so ruled in express decisions in the United States. When a person sui juris, orally or in writing, explicitly or impliedly, declares that he holds personal property . . . for another, he thereby constitutes himself an express trustee." Section 3416, Rev. Stat. 1899, in force at the date of the making of the deposit and the assignment of the certificate therefor, in this case is to all intents and purposes identical with §§ 7 and 9 of the English Statute of Frauds of 29 Charles II. By its terms personal chattels are not included within it, and such has been the uniform judicial construction of these sections in our sister states. Gilman v. McArdle, 99 N. Y., loc. cit. 456, 457, 52 Am. Rep. 41, 2 N. E. 464; Thacher v. Churchill, 118 Mass., loc. cit. 110; Patterson v. Mills, 69 Iowa, 758, 28 N. W. 53; Cobb v. Knight, 74 Me., loc. cit. 257; Danser v. Warwick, 33 N. J. Eq., loc. cit. 135, 136; Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal., loc. cit. 445, 25 Pac. 22. The English cases fully sustain this view. Benbow v. Townsend, 1 Myl. & K. 506; Jones v. Lock, L. R. 1 Ch. 25. Such, unquestionably, was the opinion of this court in Lane v. Ewing, 31 Mo. 86, 77 Am. Dec. 632.

But we are cited to two decisions of this court holding that an express trust cannot be created by parol, under § 3416, Rev. Stat. 1899. Mt. Calvary Church v. Albers, 174 Mo. 331, 73 S. W. 508; State ex rel Rife v. Hawes, 177 Mo. 360, 361, 76 S. W. 653. The announcement of this rule in Mt. Calvary Church v. Albers, 174 Mo. 331, 73 S. W. 508, was predicated on the decisions in Rogers v. Ramey, 137 Mo. 598, 39 S. W. 66, and Woodford v. Stephens, 51 Mo. 448. A careful reading of both decisions will demonstrate that neither supports the proposition that an express trust as to personal property cannot be created by parol. Each of said cases involved a claim of trust to real estate alone, and, of course, the language used had reference alone to the subject-matter; to wit, real estate. The statement in State ex rel. Rife v. Hawes is based upon Mt. Calvary Church v. Albers. The writer, who is responsible for the statement in the Hawes Case, is convinced that this statement of the law as to the creation of a trust in personalty is opposed by the unbroken line of authority in England and in the United States, and has no hesitancy in taking this first opportunity of confessing his error. He is still of opinion that Mt. Calvary Church v. Albers and State ex rel. Rife v. Hawes were both correctly ruled on all other points, and that it was not necessary to have announced that a trust in personalty could not be created by parol. We think those cases are in conflict with the earlier decisions in Lane v. Ewing, 31 Mo. 86, 77 Am. Dec. 632, and Huetteman v. Viesselmann, 48 Mo. App. 582. In the latter case it was conceded by both parties that a trust in respect to personalty need not be proved by a writing; and such, we are satisfied, is the general understanding of the bar of this state. Accordingly we hold that the trust, if any, in favor of Mrs. Helen A. Miller, can be established by parol evidence, and we must decline to follow the rulings to the contrary in Mt. Calvary Church v. Albers, 174 Mo. 331, 73 S. W. 508, and State ex rel. Rife v. Hawes, 177 Mo. 360, 76 S. W. 653.

But it is further urged that this assertion of a trust is antagonistic to the claim of an executed gift inter vivos, and we are cited to the language of the court of appeals of New York, in Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 437, 36 Am. Rep. 634, approved in Re Soulard, 141 Mo. 650, 43 S. W. 617, to the effect that "it is well settled that equity will not interpose to perfect a defective gift or voluntary settlement made without consideration. If legally made, it will be upheld, but it must stand as made, or not at all. When, therefore, it is found that the gift which the deceased attempted to make failed to take effect for want of delivery or a sufficient transfer, and it is sought to supply this defect and carry out the intent of the donor by declaring a trust which he did not himself declare, we are encountered by the rule above referred to. . . . It is established as unquestionable law that a court of equity cannot, by its authority, render that a perfect gift which the donor has left imperfect, and cannot convert an imperfect gift into a declaration of trust merely on account of that imperfection." Conceding and agreeing to this statement, it does not follow that, because a party is not able to establish a perfect gift inter vivos, he or she may not show a perfect, valid trust, and have it enforced. The decision in Soulard's Case is a complete refutation of such a position. In that case it was ruled there was no valid gift, and yet it was held that a valid express trust had been created, and it was enforced. Judge Macfarlane, speaking for this court, said: "As has been said, the transaction in question does not amount to a perfect gift. That is evident from the terms of the settlements themselves. Yet it is evident that the donor intended to make a complete disposition of the property, by which the income should be paid to himself during life, the proceeds of the notes, when paid, should be reinvested under his direction, the beneficiaries should have no power to dispose of the principal during his life, but at his death they should have the principal fund absolutely, whether then in bonds, notes, or money. We must assume that the donor intended to do what these settlements show he attempted to do. If the settlements, together with what was done under them, amounted to a valid executed trust, then they should be carried out in favor of the beneficiaries." In Hallowell 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Sav. Inst. v. Titcomb, 96 Me. 62, 51 Atl. 249, the case was one of interpleader in equity, just as in the suit at bar, and the interpleader set up a gift inter vivos, subject to a parol trust for his children, or, if not a gift, then a trust created by the donor in favor of interpleader's children. The supreme court of Maine held, as this court did in Soulard's Case, that the evidence did not establish a valid gift inter vivos, but that it did sustain a valid executed trust, and enforced it. The court said: "It still remains to inquire whether he created a valid trust. We think he did. It is true, if the transaction was intended as a gift in presenti, but was imperfect as for want of delivery, a trust cannot now be substituted for the gift. If it was intended to be a gift inter vivos, whether it was perfect or imperfect, it was not a trust. Norway Sav. Bank v. Merriam, 88 Me. 146, 33 Atl. 840. On the other hand, if the transaction was not intended to be a gift, it might constitute a trust." The pleadings of Mrs. Miller in this case are tantamount to the pleading of the interpleader in Hallowell Sav. Inst. v. Titcomb, and the evidence was offered to sustain her right to the deposit in the alternative. The cause was and is one of equity, and, as a court of equity, we think there was sufficient assertion of a trust to justify the circuit court and this court in determining whether there was an executed trust in her favor to the deposit in controversy, and, if so, enforce it in her favor.

We recur, then, to the main proposition in this case, and this is, Did the evidence establish an executed parol trust as to this certificate of deposit for the benefit of Mrs. Miller? If a complete, valid, executed trust is established, it will be enforced, notwithstanding it is purely voluntary. Leeper v. Taylor, 111 Mo., loc. cit. 324, 19 S. W. 955; Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. §§ 996, 997; Re Soulard, 141 Mo. 660, 43 S. W. 617. It is a well-settled law that no particular words are necessary to declare a trust. If the language sufficiently expresses an intention to create a trust, that will be sufficient. This is recognized by all the authorities. Perry, Tr. § 82. The donor or trustor may accomplish this result "by actually transferring the property to the persons for whom he intended to provide, and the provisions will then be effectual; and it will be equally effectual if he transfers the property to a trustee for the purpose of the settlement, or if he declares himself a trustee for those purposes." Giving full credence to the witnesses who testified to the statements of Mrs. Miller as to what occurred between Mr. Burlingame and herself on his return from Harris with the certificate of deposit in his pocket and the assignment indorsed thereon, together with the testimony of the Messrs. Harris, we think no other rational conclusion can be drawn than that Mr. Burlingame intended that Mrs. Miller should have the fund represented by the certificate of deposit at his death. This is made entirely clear by his consulting Mr. Overton Harris as to the method he should pursue—to use his own language—"so that Helen A. Miller could be the absolute owner of said property," and "that in case of his death she could come to the bank for said amount, and, upon identification, the bank was to pay her the same, and to pay it to no one but her." By the execution of the assignment on the certificate, he further evidenced his intention. Had he delivered her the certificate thus indorsed, no doubt could exist that it would have been a perfect gift of this fund inter vivos; but his retention of the certificate, and his expressed intention to her that he desired to keep it and draw the interest on it during his lifetime, negatived the idea of a gift in presenti. He did not intend to divest himself of all beneficial interest in the deposit. He then had two purposes in view,—one, to secure to her the amount of the deposit after his death, and the other, to retain for himself the interest on it during his lifetime. Moreover, he notified both his debtor, the Harris Bank, and the beneficiary of the trust, Mrs. Miller, that he had thus constituted himself a trustee for these purposes. In unequivocal terms he told Mrs. Miller and the Messrs. Harris that this fund was set aside for Mrs. Miller at his death. In Hallowell Sav. Inst. v. Titcomb, 96 Me. 69, 51 Atl. 252, it is said: "The creation of a trust is but the gift of the equitable interest. An unequivocal declaration as effectually passes the equitable title to the cestui que trust as delivery passes the legal title to the donee of a gift inter vivos. One may constitute himself trustee by mere declaration. Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn, 88 Me. 122, 32 L. R. A. 377, 51 Am. St. Rep. 382, 33 Atl. 836. . . . In the case at bar there were both deposit and declaration.

By this statement we are not to be understood as holding that a voluntary executory agreement to create a trust could be enforced, but that, by a declaration of an executed trust, after the donor had done all he could, so that nothing remained to be done, then the trust was executed. Looking at the substance of things, and not mere forms, we are constrained to hold that this was a valid execution of a trust as to this fund for Mrs. Miller. In Soulard's Case, 141 Mo. 663, 43 S. W. 617, it was said: "It is true he retained a beneficial interest in the property, the right during his life to the interest and income therefrom, and reserved the right to direct the reinvestment of the proceeds. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But these are parts of the declared purposes of the trust. The trustee could as well make the income payable to himself for life as to any other party." In Stone v. Hackett, 12 Gray, 227, the income of the property was to be paid to the donor during life, and upon his death the principal was to be divided among various charities, and the validity of the trust was upheld. In Davis v. Ney, 125 Mass. 590, 28 Am. Rep. 272, a voluntary trust was sustained which allowed the donor to receive, not only the income, but such part of the principal as she might need during her life. "Three things," it has been said, 'must concur to raise a trust,—sufficient words to create it, a definite subject, and a certain and ascertained object;' and to these requisites may be added another; viz., that the terms of the trust should be sufficiently declared." Bispham, Eq. § 65. In this case the deceased donor said to Mrs. Miller, after showing her the certificate duly assigned to her, and after she had read it, "Now, that is yours, but I want the use of it while I live." This statement is fully corroborated by the testimony of the Messrs. Harris as to his inquiry now he could make it her absolute property, and, when advised to accept a certificate and then indorse it to her, he did so, and then and there directed them not to pay it to anyone else. This was not a mere executory promise, but, considered altogether, was a declaration of a trust in favor of Mrs. Miller in the present tense, and doubtless considered by Giles Burlingame as a completed transaction, inasmuch as when it was done, and his directions given to his bankers to pay it to no one else, he said that it was her property,—not that he intended to give it to her, but it was now hers, subject only to the right in himself to receive the interest thereon. He further declared that he was winding up his business, and he unquestionably regarded that as to this fund he had made a final disposition of it by creating a trust, of which he himself was the trustee, for Mrs. Miller. In Gerrish v. New Bedford Inst. for Savings, 128 Mass., loc. cit. 159, 35 Am. Rep. 365, it was said: "There is in the case at bar no formal written declaration. But no particular form of words is required to create a trust in another, or to make the party himself a trustee for the benefit of another. It is enough for the latter purpose if it be unequivocally declared in writing, or orally, if the property be personal, that it is held in trust for the person named. Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. Jr. 140; Wheatley v. Purr, 1 Keen, 551; McFadden v. Jenkyns, 1 Hare, 458; Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. & J. 264. When the trust is thus created, it is effectual to transfer the beneficial interest, and operates as a gift perfected by delivery." In that case the court commented upon the effect of notice to the donee, and said: "Notice to the donee is, indeed, not necessary, when other acts or declarations of the donor are sufficient and complete in themselves, but where the transaction is capable of two interpretations, and the settlement is merely voluntary, it is plain that notice given by the donor to the donee of the existence of the trust would in most cases be decisive on the question of intention. It takes the place of that delivery which is necessary to perfect a gift of personal property. It is not only satisfactory evidence of an executed intention, but it is a declaration in the nature of an act necessary to complete the transaction and create the trust." In this case the donor not only gave notice to the donee, and announced to her, in view of the deposit and the assignment in writing to her, that it was hers, and that he was holding it for her until his death, but he went further, and notified the bankers who owed the deposit that it was her absolute property, and not to pay it to anyone but her.

In view of the able and exhaustive discussion of the law applicable to this class of cases in the Souldard Case, 141 Mo. 642, 43 S. W. 617, it seems a work of supererogation to extend this opinion further by the citation of precedents. In our opinion, the facts of this case establish a clear, executed parol trust by Giles Burlingame in favor of Mrs. Miller to the deposit of $8,080.91, represented by the certificate of deposit issued by the Harris Banking Company to Giles Burlingame, and by him assigned to Mrs. Miller. This trust was a clear recognition of the debt of gratitude which the donor owed to Mrs. Miller for the invaluable services which she had rendered him and his twin brother in his old age, when he had no wife or children or other near relative to minister to his wants. As already said, that it was his intention that she should have this fund does not admit of a reasonable doubt. And in our opinion his acts and declarations to secure it to her by creating a trust in her favor, of which he was the trustee himself, were amply sufficient to meet all the requirements of the law; and in carrying out and effectuating his intention no violence or injustice has been done any other person.

While in our opinion the Circuit Court erred in holding it a valid gift inter vivos, all the facts are before us as a court of equity, and the judgment and decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed, notwithstanding the reason upon which it is based is not approved.

All concur.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

HIRAM H. BARKER et al.
v.
CHARLES B. BARKER.

1. Trustees—removal of.

Unsuitable trustees may be removed from the exercise of the office, in the sound discretion of the court.

2. Same—change in number.

Equity may change the number of trustees from that designated by the originator of the trust if changed conditions in the estate render it necessary.

3. Same—interest of trustee.

The removal of a trustee is not prevented by the fact that he will thereby be deprived of the opportunity of passing upon his own qualification to take a benefit under the terms of the trust.

EXCEPTIONS by petitioners to rulings of the Superior Court for Strafford County changing the trustees under the trust established by the will of Hiram Barker, deceased. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Alfred S. Hayes and William S. Bangs, for petitioners:

The testator having manifested an intention to confide the management and dis-

Case Note.—Much conflict of opinion exists as to the power to change the number of trustees designated in the instrument creating the trust. An increase in number was allowed where the instrument did not disclose a contrary intention in Plenty v. West, 16 Beav. 356; D'Adhemar v. Bertrand, 35 Beav. 19; Meinertzhagen v. Davis, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 335, 8 Jur. 973; Birch v. Cropper, 2 De G. & S. 255; Re Welch, 3 Myl. & C. 292; Sands v. Nugee, 8 Sim. 130, and Re Gregson, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 209.

The number has in like manner been decreased to a number not less than two in Emmet v. Clark, 3 Giff. 32; Re Bathurst, 2 Smale & G. 169, 18 Jur. 568. And a decrease was held to be valid, though improper, in Reid v. Reid, 30 Beav. 388. And two trustees were appointed in place of three, on its being clearly made to appear that it was impossible to find a third person to act, in Bulkeley v. Eglington, 1 Jur. N. S. 994.

The remaining trustees have also been appointed on the death or retirement of one of them in place of the original trustees, under the English trustee act of 1850, § 32, in Re Harford, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 135; Re Stokes, L. R. 13 Eq. 333, and Re Shipperdson, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 619.

But such an appointment was refused in Re Aston, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 217, and Re Col- bursement of the trust estate to a board of seven, this discretion so reposed in the trustees will not, without strong reason, be interfered with by the courts.

The jurisdiction of courts of equity to remove and appoint trustees is merely ancillary to their paramount duty to see that trusts are properly executed.

yer, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 79, and under the similar provision in the act of 1893, § 25, in Re Chetwynd [1902] 1 Ch. 692. In this last case, however, one of the four original trustees was permitted to withdraw, without the appointment of a new trustee in his place, under another section of such act of 1893.

But when the instrument creating the trust discloses an intention that the number shall remain unchanged it can neither be increased (Ex parte Davis, 2 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 468, 7 Jur. 430) nor diminished (Nicholson v. Smith, 3 Jur. N. S. 313, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 312; Massachusetts General Hospital v. Amory, 12 Pick. 445, and several cases referred to below, where the attempt was made to appoint a single trustee in place of a larger number).

The point on which the courts seem to be most nearly in harmony is that trust property ought, if possible, to be prevented from coming into the hands of a single trustee. A trustee in addition to the sole trustee appointed by the will was, on this theory, appointed on the petition of the beneficiaries, in Re Brackenbury, L. R. 10 Eq. 45, and Grant v. Grant, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 641.

And two trustees of a small property were appointed on the death of a sole trustee in Re Tunstall, 4 De G. & S. 421, and a co-trustee of the survivor was appointed on the death of one of two trustees, under a will 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

devising the trust property to the survivor of them, in Dixon v. Homer, 12 Cush. 41, and Force v. Force (N. J. Eq.) 57 Atl. 973.

The appointment of a single trustee in place of a larger number originally appointed has also, for the same reason, been refused (Re Ellison, 2 Jur. N. S. 62),—especially where the instrument creating the trust discloses an intent that the larger number shall continue to act (Tarrant v. Backus, 63 Conn. 277, 28 Atl. 46; Hulme v. Hulme, 2 Myl. & K. 682; Lonsdale v. Beckett, 4 De G. & S. 73), unless some very special reason to the contrary has been shown (Proudfoot v. Tiffany, 11 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 461; Kingsmill v. Miller, 15 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 171).

But a larger number may be reduced to one with the assent of all the parties (Greene v. Borland, 4 Met. 330), or if it is shown that it will be more beneficial to the parties interested (Sitwell v. Heron, 14 Jur. 848).

Such a reduction, even if improper, is valid (West of England & S. W. Dist. Bank v. Murch, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 138), and vests the property in the sole trustee (Hammond v. Granger, 128 Mass. 272).

A sole trustee has also been appointed where, by the instrument creating the trust, the property was to devolve on the survivor of the trustees originally appointed. Physic's Estate, 2 Phila. 278.

The absence of misconduct does not preclude a removal.

Mr. Elmer J. Smart for Clara B. Berry.

Mr. George E. Cochrane, guardian, in propria persona.

Bingham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have here an estate which the testator understood, when he made his will, was worth $800,000, and which in the early years of the trust produced a net income of $20,000. In a period of eighteen years it has shrunk, from one cause or another, including payments to trustees and appropriations to beneficiaries, to about $200,000, and now yields an income of less than $5,000, after deducting taxes and incidental expenses, but not including trustees' fees, miscellaneous 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

expenses of management, and necessary repairs. The testator provided in his will for a board of six trustees, and that his son Hiram should be added to the number upon his complying with certain standards of sobriety and habits of living for a specified period. For the greater part of ten or eleven years prior to January 20, 1904, the trust was managed by seven trustees, and the sum paid annually for their services was $4,500 and expenses incurred in holding meetings of the board. The resignations of the four trustees who were not of the Barker family, having been previously tendered, were then accepted. Since that time the petitioners and the defendant Charles B. Barker have managed the trust. The petitioners ask for the appointment of four trustees to fill the vacancies. The defendant objects to the granting of the request, and asks that the present trustees be removed, and that a single trustee be appointed to execute the trust. The latter request was granted in the superior court, subject to the petitioners' exception. In addition to the estate having been greatly diminished during the existence of the trust, it is found that the only way to prevent its further dissipation is to provide for its administration by a single trustee; that the petitioners persist in attempting to make appropriations to beneficiaries that will in a comparatively short time exhaust the property; that they are not able to agree with the defendant as to the management of the estate and the sums to be appropriated to beneficiaries; that their further continuance as trustee is opposed to the best interests of the estate and the other beneficiaries; that competent trustees cannot be procured to serve with the Barker trustees for $500 a year, or any reasonable fee; that it is impossible to procure competent trustees to act for a less sum than $500 a year; that if a board of seven is maintained and such payments are made the beneficiaries will be practically deprived of the net income of the property and the principal fund will ultimately be exhausted; and that in order to carry out the principal intention of the testator, namely, to provide for the support and maintenance of Hiram and his wife and Clara Barker Berry and to preserve the bulk of the estate for the grandchildren, it is necessary that the Barker family no longer continue as trustees.

As we understand the case, the order of removal includes a finding that the present trustees are unsuitable to continue in the management of the trust. Such a finding is not inconsistent with the special findings above enumerated. This being so, and it being found that the only way to prevent the further dissipation of the estate is to provide for administering it by a single trustee, the question presented is whether, under these circumstances, the superior court, in the exercise of its equity powers, can legally remove the present trustees and make the order reducing the number from seven to one. The petitioners concede that the superior court has full equity powers in all cases of trusts (Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 205, § 1; Walker v. Cheever, 35 N. H. 339; Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503), but contend that the order of the court in this instance is not within the limits of those powers, and is unauthorized and illegal from the fact that it was the intention of the testator that seven trustees, one of whom was to be his son, should manage the trust, and that to remove the present board, of which the son is a member, and reduce the number to one, is in contravention of this known and expressed intent. The defendant admits that, as a rule, in such matters the wish of the creator of the trust, when ascertained, is to be followed, but contends that the rule is subject to the qualification that when it is shown to be necessary for the effectual performance of the trust that there should be a change in the number, because that fixed by the creator of the trust is excessive or insufficient, a court of equity has power to cause the number to be reduced or increased to meet the necessities of the case, and that, if any or all of the trustees are unsuitable, it can order their removal, always being governed by a sound judicial discretion. The latter view meets our approval. It cannot be doubted but that the superior court, as a court of equity, has the power to remove trustees who become unsuitable for the execution of a trust. Under such circumstances power of removal is also conferred by statute upon the probate court. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 198, § 8. In this particular the jurisdiction of the two courts is concurrent. Bowditch v. Banuelos, 1 Gray, 220, 228, 229. It is the duty of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon the institution of proper proceedings before it and its being made to appear that trustees appointed to execute a trust are unsuitable, to remove them. Adams v. Adams, 64 N. H. 224, 9 Atl. 100. Trustees, whose relations to their cotrustees or the beneficiaries are such as to interfere with the proper management of the estate may be regarded as unsuitable, and removed. Wilson v. Wilson, 145 Mass. 490, 1 Am. St. Rep. 477, 14 N. E. 521; Disbrow v. Disbrow, 46 App. Div. 111, 61 N. Y. Supp. 614; Loring's Trustee's Handbook, 20. An instance of this is when trustees unreasonably disagree with their cotrustees in matters involving their joint discretion. Swale v. Swale, 22 Beav. 584; Stott v. Lord, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 391; Loring's Trustee's Handbook, 47. And, while a court of equity is reluctant to change the number of trustees from that designated by the creator of the trust, yet it seems to be in accordance with reason and authority that it may do so when, by reason of changed conditions in the estate, the number designated by the creator has become excessive or insufficient, and it is necessary to reduce or increase the number in order to effectuate the execution of the trust. Re Anson, 85 Me. 79, 88, 89, 26 Atl. 996; Force v. Force (N. J. Eq.) 57 Atl. 973; Austin v. Austin, 18 Neb. 306, 309, 22 N. W. 116; Birch v. Cropper, 2 De G. & S. 255; Re Dickinson, 1 Jur. N. S. 724; Sitwell v. Heron, 14 Jur. 848; Re Chetwynd [1902] 1 Ch. 692; Lettstedt v. Broers, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 371; Re New [1901] 2 Ch. 534; Lewin, Tr. 11th ed. 803; 2 Beach, Tr. § 387; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1287; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. §§ 1086, 1087; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 970. In Edgerly v. Barker, 66 N. H. 434, 452, 28 L. R. A. 328, 31 Atl. 900, the court, in construing the will, said: "A dominant idea of the residuary clause and of the whole will is that the testator's grandchildren shall have the bulk of his estate. Not less dominant or less manifest is his determination that C. and H. shall not have it. . . . In his mind the main point evidently was the extent to which he disinherited C. and H. and put their children in their places. . . . After years of observation and reflection his unchanged judgment was that the welfare of his issue required an absolute provision for the comfort of C. and H. during their lives, a conditional appropriation of $30,000 for H., other special appropriations (including one for education), and a devise of the remainder to the grandchildren. In this manner, and to this extent, he was convinced it was his duty to modify the operation of the statutory rule of distribution. His exercise of testamentary power to this end was his primary and leading purpose." The order of the superior court does not contravene this primary and leading purpose, for it is not probable the testator intended that, if any or all of the six trustees designated in his will should subsequently become unsuitable, they should be continued in the trust, or that, if Hiram was added to the board and became unsuitable for reasons other than those specified in the will, he should not be subject to removal the same as any other trustee would be for a like cause. And it is equally improbable that he intended the number of trustees should not be reduced if, by reason of changed conditions in the estate, the number became excessive, so that it was impossible to effectuate his primary purpose without a reduction.

Another contention made by the petitioners is that the order of the court deprives Hiram of the opportunity of passing upon the question whether he has complied with the condition imposed as to sobriety and good conduct, upon which the second and third instalments of the gift of $30,000 are predicated, and is in violation of the intention of the testator that he should be permitted to pass upon this question with the other trustees. We do not think that the will provides that he should have the right to pass upon his own qualifications with the other trustees; and, as we understand the law, he would not be entitled to pass upon questions in which he is directly interested as a beneficiary, and involving an exercise of discretion, but that such questions should be passed upon by the other trustees alone. Rogers v. Rogers, 111 N. Y. 228, 234, 237, 18 N. E. 636; Woodward v. James, 115 N. Y. 346, 357, 22 N. E. 150.

All concur.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

JOHN H. ABERCROMBIE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

J. N. SIMMONS et al.

(.... Kan.)

1. Railroad—alienation of right of way.

A railroad company purchased a strip of land for a right of way, the line of which had been surveyed and staked out, but no part of the railroad had been built, and in the deed the land was described as a part of a certain quarter section "lying within 50

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Case Note.—The court, in ABERCROMBIE v. SIMMONS, in holding that a railroad company takes a mere easement, and not a title in fee, under a deed conveying to it land for purposes of a right of way, and that the title reverts to the grantor upon the abandonment of the road, even though the deed contains covenants of warranty, confined its decision to cases where the contract of conveyance shows that it "was sold and received for use as a right of way," and did not pass upon the power generally, of railroads, to purchase land in fee. The decision as thus restricted is supported by the authorities, as will appear from an examination of the following cases in addition to those cited by the court:

The law attaches to a conveyance of a railroad right of way in perpetuity a condition that it shall be kept up and operated feet of the main track of the railroad." Within a few days after the execution of the deed, a map and profile of the railroad was made by the company, and subsequently filed. Held, that the deed was not void because of indefiniteness in the description.

2. Deed—ambiguity—construction.

In construing a doubtful description in a conveyance, the court will keep in mind the position of the contracting parties, the circumstances under which they acted, and interpret the language of the instrument in the light of these circumstances.

3. Deed—right of way—estate conveyed.

An instrument which is in form a general warranty deed, conveying a strip of land to a railroad company for a right of way for a railroad, will not vest an absolute title in the railroad company; but the interest conveyed is limited by the use for which the land is acquired, and, when that use is abandoned, the property will revert to the adjoining owner.

ERROR to the District Court for Mitchell County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an injunction brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

ated; and a conveyance, by the railroad company, of a part of the right of way for a private use, constitutes an abandonment, and the land reverts to the grantor. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Covington, 2 Bush. 526.

A railroad company acquires only an easement in its right of way, and cannot sink and operate oil wells thereon under an instrument granting to the company a full and free right of way for the construction and use of the road, and containing a covenant to execute and acknowledge, when required, a deed in fee simple. Lockwood v. Ohio River R. Co. 43 C. C. A. 202, 103 Fed. 243.

The Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon the question, and held that a railroad company does not have a title in fee in its right of way, so as to subject the same to sale under execution, under a deed purpose of aiding in the construction, maintenance, and accommodation of its railway.

W. 623.

Where a purchase of real estate has been lawfully made by a corporation, it does not cease to be legal, nor does the corporation cease to have a right to hold or convey the property thus acquired, merely because the object which induced the purchase has been conveying the land to it and its successors and assigns, describing the property as a right of way, although the habendum was, to have and to hold the same to the company, its successors and assigns, to its "own proper use, benefit, and behoof forever, in fee simple," as the words "in fee simple" do not enlarge what is otherwise the limited character of the grant. East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. ed. 136, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869.

Under a deed conveying land in consideration of a stipulated sum, and reciting that the grantors do "hereby grant and convey unto . . . its successors and assigns for right of way and for operating its railroad only," the grantee takes an easement only; and a conveyance of a part of the land by the grantee to another railroad company for its right of way constitutes an abandonment of the land so conveyed, and the grantor is entitled to compensation for its use by the other railroad company. Blakely v. Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. 46 Neb. 272, 64 N. W. 972.

But in Ballard v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 523, 5 S. W. 484, the court, in construing a deed as an entirety, held that the grantee took a title in fee, on the ground that the land acquired was for railroad purposes generally, and the consideration paid was a considerable one, although on the face of the deed it was entitled "deed of right of way," and that one call of the description of the premises was for the "east edge of right of way." The grant was to the railroad company of so much of the grantor's lands in the county as is required "for the use of the road of said company," with habendum, "to have and to hold the same to said grantees and their assigns forever," with covenants of warranty. The court placed its decision distinctly upon the ground that, from the terms of the deed, the shape of the land, and the necessities of the railroad, the grant was for purposes other than that of a right of way. From this it will be inferred that the decision would have been different had the grant been for a right of way.

company," with habendum, "to have and to hold the same to said grantees and their assigns forever," with covenants of warranty. The court placed its decision distinctly upon the ground that, from the terms of the deed, the shape of the land, and the necessities of the railroad, the grant was for purposes other than that of a right of way. From this it will be inferred that the decision would have been different had the grant been for a right of way.

Some additional light may be thrown on the question by adverting to the rule that the granting clause of a deed is controlling in case of conflict between it and the habendum. So that a deed granting particular land to a railroad company for a particular purpose is limited to that purpose, even though the habendum uses broader language. In 3 Washburn on Real Property, 6th ed. § 2357, the author, in speaking of the effect of a repugnancy between the granting part of the deed and the habendum, says that the office and purpose of the habendum—that is to say, the part of the deed which begins with the words "to have and to hold"—is to "limit and define the estate which the grantee is to have in the property granted.

. . . It is not an essential part of a deed; and Chancellor Kent declares that it has degenerated into a mere useless form. If the granting part of the deed contain proper words of limitation, the habendum may be dispensed with altogether; and of so little importance is it deemed, compared with the words of the grant, that, if the habendum is clearly repugnant to the grant, it is treated as of no validity or effect."

Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment to recover a strip of land 100 feet wide, running through a quarter section of land, which had been obtained from Joseph Simmons by the Chicago, Kansas, & Western Railroad Company, and was subsequently sold by the railroad company to John H. Abercrombie. In 1887 the railroad company surveyed and staked out a route for a railroad through Mitchell county, and on July 13th of that year, when about to begin construction of the railroad over the land owned by Joseph Simmons, it purchased from him the strip of land, and the conveyance which he made was in form a general warranty, wherein the property was described as "all the lands in the southwest quarter of section 15, township 9 south, of range 7 west, lying within 50 feet of the center line of the main track of said railroad, and containing 6.23 acres, more or less." A week later, and on July 20, 1887, the railroad company made a map and profile of the route intended to be adopted, which was subsequently filed in the office of the county clerk. The railroad was never constructed, nor even graded, over the Simmons land. The entire quarter section was inclosed and cultivated by Joseph Simmons while he lived, and it has remained in the exclusive possession of J. N. Simmons and Laura Simmons, who became the owners of the tract. The railroad company, however, paid taxes on the strip of land until April 28, 1898, when it executed a deed purporting to convey the strip to the plaintiff, describing it as it was described in the deed from Simmons to the railroad company. Later, and in 1903, the plaintiff asserted a claim of ownership to the strip of land through the quarter section, and, as it was denied, he brought this proceeding to recover it. The trial court upon the facts, which were mainly agreed to, found that the strip of land was conveyed by Simmons and received by the railroad company for use as a right of way for a railroad; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and, further, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that the railroad company acquired an absolute title to the strip of land, and that nothing less was conveyed to him. The defendants contend, first, that the deed of Simmons to the railroad company was so indefinite in description of the property conveyed as to be defective; and, second, that, if the description be held to be sufficient, and the instrument valid, it did not convey anything more than a right of way, and hence, when it was not used for that purpose, it reverted to the original owner, or to those holding under him.

First, as to the attack upon the validity of the deed for indefiniteness. It is claimed that it was impossible to locate or identify the land from the description given; that the description of a part of a quarter section "lying within 50 feet of the main track of the railroad" furnished no means of identification where in fact no railroad had been built. The agreed facts, however, show that, prior to the execution of the deed, the company contemplated the construction of a railroad over this land, and had actually surveyed and staked out a route and line. The map and profile of the route was in the course of preparation, and was completed a few days later, and this was the one which was filed with the county clerk. The company was negotiating for land upon which to construct and operate a railroad. It had marked out on the face of the land the line or track which it proposed to build. The owner sold it to the company for that purpose, and obviously both parties contracted with reference to these facts. In construing a doubtful description in a conveyance, the court must keep in mind the position of the contracting parties, the circumstances under which they acted, and interpret the language of the instrument in the light of these circumstances. When so construed, we may fairly say that, as the only way of locating the strip was by a resort to the line which had been surveyed and staked out by the company as the statute authorized, the parties contracted with reference to this survey, and it may be looked to as a part of the description. Under the principle that that will be considered certain which can be made certain, we can look not only to the survey, but also to the map and profile made by the company. In Denver, M. & A. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 54 Kan. 586, 38 Pac. 794, the court considered a description in a deed which was attacked for indefiniteness, which purported to convey 50 feet on each side of a center line of a route which had been surveyed, staked, and located; and it was said that "the law will not declare a deed void for uncertainty when the light which contemporaneous facts and circumstances furnish renders the description definite and certain," and, following this rule, held the deed to be valid. Tucker v. Allen, 16 Kan. 312; Seaton v. Hixon, 35 Kan. 663, 12 Pac. 22; Thompson v. Motor Road Co. 82 Cal. 497, 23 Pac. 130; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Pearsol, 173 Pa. 496, 34 Atl. 226; Crafts v. Hibbard, 4 Met. 438; Oxford v. White, 95 N. C. 525; Horton v. Murden, 117 Ga. 72, 43 S. E. 786; Armstrong v. Mudd, 10 B. Mon. 144, 50 Am. Dec. 545; Lohff v. Germer, 37 Tex. 578; McPike v. Allman, 53 Mo. 551.

Was the interest which the railroad company acquired by the deed one which it could convey to plaintiff? The general rule is that, in the absence of charter or statutory restrictions, corporations may take, hold, and convey land for any purpose not inconsistent with those for which they were created. It is competent for the legislature to prescribe the purpose for which land may be acquired and held by corporations, and in this state the legislature has conferred on such corporations the power "to take and hold such voluntary grants of real estate and other property as shall be made to it to aid in the construction, maintenance, and accommodation of its railway; but the real estate received by voluntary grant shall be held and used for the purpose of such grant only, and to purchase and hold, with power to convey, real estate, for the purpose of aiding in the construction, maintenance, and accommodation of its railway." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1316. Aside from this provision, there is in the same section authority given to enter upon the lands of others for the purpose of selecting and surveying a route for a proposed railway, and in that connection to lay out a road not exceeding 100 feet in width, and a greater width where the proper construction of the road requires it. It is provided, too, that a map and profile of the route intended to be adopted shall be made, and that notice shall be given to all occupants of lands on the designated route which have not been purchased or donated. Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 1318, 1319. There is another provision for obtaining land for a right of way by compulsory process under the power of eminent domain. Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 1359-1365. The statutes recognize that land for a right of way may be acquired by purchase as well as by compulsory proceedings. And, when so acquired for that purpose, does the railroad company hold a higher or better right than where it is acquired by virtue of eminent domain? May a railroad company purchase a strip of land, extending a great distance through the country and over many farms, abandon the enterprise, and then sell the strip to those who will put it to a wholly different use; one which might be both obnoxious and menacing to the adjoining owners? Where an absolute and unqualified fee-simple title is acquired by a railroad company, it may, of course, in the absence of express or implied restrictions, be conveyed to another. After stating this rule, Judge Elliott remarks: "But where there is an implied restriction, as is often the case in regard to the right of way, or the like, of a railroad company, the grant does not ordinarily vest a fee in the company, but vests such an estate—usually an easement—as is requisite to effect the purpose for which the property is required. Where the grant is of 'surplus real estate,' as it is often called,—that is, of real estate not forming part of the railroad or its appendages,—a deed effective to vest a fee in a natural person will vest that estate in a railroad company." 2 Elliott, Railroads, § 400. The fact that the deed contains covenants of warranty, or that the right acquired is designated as a fee, is not necessarily controlling. In Jones v. Van Bochove, 103 Mich. 98, 61 N. W. 342, consideration was given to a conveyance of a strip of land which was described as a right of way for a railroad between certain points, and, although the instrument was in the form of a warranty deed, it was held that an absolute title was not conveyed. In Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Geisel, 119 Ind. 77, 21 N. E. 470, there was a deed releasing and quitclaiming to a railroad company a right of way 80 feet wide through a certain tract of land, and it was held that the company did not acquire the fee of the land. In the opinion it was remarked that "it does not follow that, because a railroad company may take an estate in fee or a right of way of a defined width, it does take such an estate or such a right of way, for parties may by their contract create a less estate than a fee, or a right less in extent than that which the law authorizes the grantee to acquire." In Hill v. Western Vermont R. Co. 32 Vt. 74, it is said that "a contract to convey land for a particular use, or to a party having capacity to acquire a certain estate in land for a particular use, must, of necessity, carry the implication of such limitation upon the estate to be conveyed." In Norton v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 623, the railroad company acquired a fee to a strip of land for a right of way. A question arose as to the right of the railroad company to erect a blind or barrier to obstruct the view from a building of an adjoining owner, and it was held that, although the company held the fee to its right of way, it held it "in that qualified manner in which land taken for particular purposes is taken," and that "they had only a right to the fee simple of the land for the purpose for which they acquired it, namely, the construction and perpetual working of the railway," and for that reason the right to build the barrier and obstruct the plaintiff's view was denied. In the same case it is also held that an abandonment of a portion of the right of way operates to vest that portion in the owner of the adjoining land. In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Aldridge, 135 N. Y. 95, 17 L. R. A. 516, 32 N. E. 50, a dispute arose between a landowner, who had conveyed land along a water front, in fee, to a railroad for a right of way, and the railroad company, whether such owner of the land not conveyed was a riparian owner, or whether the right had passed to the railroad company. The decision was against the railroad company, and the court held that, although the railroad company received title to its right of way "in fee simple by the voluntary grant of the former owners, yet by the provisions of the statute it holds such real estate and can use it only for the purposes expressed in its charter,—that of the maintenance, construction, and accommodation of the railroad. For this purpose only the land can be used; and, although the title granted to the company is a fee, yet, as thus burdened and restricted, we think the grantor in conveying the strip did not thereby cease to be the owner of the upland within the meaning of the statute. The conveyance to the railroad of the strip in question is in its effects entirely unlike the conveyance to a private individual in fee simple. In the latter case it may well be the grantor even of so narrow a strip would lose his character of riparian owner and the grantee would acquire it. But when we consider the purpose of the conveyance to the railroad and the limitations to its use which the statute itself placed upon the company, it becomes entirely plain that the grantor ought not to lose his character of riparian owner where he retains the property immediately adjoining that which he conveys." In Chouteau v. Missouri P. R. Co. 122 Mo. 375, 22 S. W. 458, 30 S. W. 299, land was conveyed to a railroad company by general warranty deed for railroad purposes, and it was held that the company did not acquire a fee in the land; and, further, that the conveyance by the husband extinguished the inchoate right of dower of the wife in the land, although she did not join in the conveyance. In effect, this was a following of the ruling made in Kellogg v. Malin, 50 Mo. 496, 11 Am. Rep. 426. In Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co. 51 W. Va. 106, 41 S. E. 340, there was a contract for the execution of a deed conveying a strip of land for a right of way in fee simple, and it was held 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the words "right of way" in a grant to a railroad company means an easement, and does not pass the absolute title, and that the railroad company did not take oil or other minerals under the land. The supreme court of Iowa in Ottumwa, C. F. & St. P. R. Co. v. McWilliams, 71 Iowa, 164, 32 N. W. 315, held that a contract which recited that certain land was to be conveyed to a railroad company for a right of way, and also that it should be conveyed by deed in fee simple, was a contract for a right of way merely, and not for a fee-simple title to the land. See also People v. White, 11 Barb. 26; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Coburn, 91 Ind. 557; United States Pipe Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 254, 42 L. R. A. 572, 41 Atl. 759.

Now, as we have seen, the deed and those things to which we may look in its interpretation plainly show that the strip was sold on the one part and purchased on the other as and for a right of way for a railroad. This use, being within the contemplation of the parties, is to be considered as an element in the contract, and limits the interest which the railroad acquired. It took the strip for a specific purpose, and could hold it so long as it was devoted to that purpose. Whether the right of way purchased should be designated as an easement or as a qualified or determinable fee, may not be very important. A right of way, although commonly designated as an easement, is an interest in land of a special and exclusive nature, and of a high character. In speaking of its character, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "A railroad right of way is a very substantial thing. It is more than a mere right of passage. It is more than an easement. We discussed its character in New Mexico v. United States Trust Co. 172 U. S. 171, 43 L. ed. 407, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128. We there said (p. 183, 172 U. S., p. 407, 43 L. ed., and p. 133, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep.) that if a railroad's right of way was an easement it was 'one having the attributes of the fee,—perpetuity and exclusive use and possession; also the remedies of the fee, and, like it, corporeal, not incorporeal, property.'" Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 U. S. 540, 570, 49 L. ed. 312, 323, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133, 141. Whatever its name, the interest was taken for use as a right of way, it is limited to that use, and must revert when the use is abandoned.

We are not called upon to decide, nor do we intend to express an opinion, as to the rule applicable where lands are purchased or obtained without regard to the use to be made of them, or where there is nothing in the contract or conveyance indicating that they have been purchased for a right of way. Lands may be acquired by donation or by voluntary grant for aid in the building of railroads, and railroad companies may doubtless acquire lands for various uses in connection with railroad business which could not be taken by virtue of eminent domain, and as to these different rules may apply. It is intended to confine the decision to cases where the contract or conveyance shows that it was sold and received for use as a right of way for a railroad.

The conclusion is that the plaintiff acquired no interest in these lands by the attempted conveyance of the railroad company to him, and, therefore, that the judgment of the District Court must be affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Clark A. Smith, J., who, having been of counsel, did not sit.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM M. MEFFERT, Plff. in Err.,
v.

E. B. PACKER et al., State Board of Medical Registration and Examination.

1. Medicine—license to practice—revocation.

The state, in the exercise of its police power, in the interest of the health, good government, general welfare, and morals of the people, may prescribe the qualifications of persons desiring to practice medicine, and may create a board whose duty it shall be to hear and determine any complaint made

Headnotes by GREENE, J.

Case Note.—The affirmance of this decision without discussion by the Federal Supreme Court (195 U. S. 625, 49 L. ed. 350, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 790) must be taken as sanctioning the application of the same reasoning, as to the existence of due process of law, to the revocation of a license and to the initial granting of the license by an administrative board or committee created by the legislature for these purposes; and also as an assent to the opinion of the Kansas court and to that of the Minnesota supreme court in State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 26 N. W. 123, quoted in the MEFFERT CASE, that there is no possible distinction between refusing to grant a license and revoking one already granted. Both acts are an exercise of the police power. The power exercised and the object of its exercise are in each case identical, viz., to exclude an incompetent or unworthy person from the practice of medicine. Therefore, the same body which may be vested with power to grant, or refuse to grant, a license may also be vested with the power to revoke.

1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against any person holding a physician's license, and revoke such license for any cause provided for in the statute. Such board while so acting is not a judicial tribunal, and is not governed by the technical rules applicable to law courts. In the absence of fraud, corruption, or oppression, the findings of the board are conclusive upon this court.

2. Same—existing licenses—ex post facto law.

Where the statute prescribes the qualifications of a physician, and proscribes the grossly immoral, and authorizes the cancellation of any certificate issued to such persons, the application of this law to one whose habits were grossly immoral before the passage of the law is not in the nature of a punishment, and therefore the statute is not ex post facto, but has in view only the qualifications of the physician and the protection of public morals.

3. Police power—effect of Federal Constitution.

That clause in § 1, art. 14, of the Constitution of the United States, "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," is not a limitation upon the police power of the state to pass and enforce such laws as, in its judgment, will inure to the health, morals, and general welfare of its people.

ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding to enjoin the enforcement of an order made by them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Jay Buck, A. L. Redden, and W. N. Smelser, for plaintiff in error:

The authorities sustaining the validity of such statutes, where the question as to their constitutionality has arisen from the exercise of the power to exclude a physician from practice by the refusal of the board to grant the necessary license, are numerous. Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 47 L. ed. 563, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 42 L. ed. 1002, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; and a collection of authorities in State ex rel. Burroughs v. Webster, 150 Ind. 607, 41 L. R. A. 212, 50 N. E. 750.

It may be remarked that all of these cases are clearly analogous in principle with the MEFFERT CASE, for the refusal of an examining board to grant a license newly made requisite by statute is as much a revocation of a pre-existing right to practise as its direct action in revoking a license granted under some law requiring it. The question as presented by the latter situation, however, has arisen infrequently in the courts.

the question as thus presented is that of State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, already mentioned and sufficiently treated in the opinion.

State ex rel. Feller v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 391, 26 N. W. 125, decided at the same time, assumes the correctness of the Chapman Case.

The constitutionality of a statute intrusting the trial of physicians and the revocation of their licenses for gross ignorance or misconduct in their profession, or for immoral conduct or habits, to county medical societies, was sustained, and the expulsion of a member by the action of one of such societies upheld, in Re Smith, 10 Wend. 449; the court stating that the constitutional provision for due process of law does not prohibit the establishment of various tribunals exercising powers of a judicial nature for purposes other than the administration of civil or criminal justice.

The statute of Rhode Island expressly provides for an appeal from the decision of the state board of health to the appellate division of the state supreme court, upon the revocation of a license. This is held in State Bd. of Health v. Roy, 22 R. I. 538, 48 Atl. 802, to provide due process of law, though no trial by jury could be secured under it.

In England the action of the general council of medical education and registration, taken in good faith after due inquiry, by which a medical practitioner is adjudged to have been guilty of infamous conduct in a 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

professional respect, cannot be reviewed by the courts. Ex parte La Mert, 33 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 69; Allbutt v. Medical Education & Registration, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 400.

However, that due process of law is not accorded where notice is not given to the practitioner of the proceedings to revoke seems to be recognized. Besides the dicta to this effect in State ex rel. Powell v. State Medical Examining Board, 32 Minn. 324, 50 Am. Rep. 575, 20 N. W. 238, and in People use of State Bd. of Health v. McCoy, 125 Ill. 289, 17 N. E. 786, a direct decision on this point is found in State v. Schultz, 11 Mont. 429, 28 Pac. 643, where a revocation by the state board of medical examiners without notice was held void as subverting "the most precious right of the citizen." Reasonable notice of the charge preferred against the defendant, and of the time and place of the trial thereof, is necessary, even where there is no provision therefor, by the statute authorizing the proceeding.

Again, the general terminology of the statutes which generally allow the commission to enforce or revoke a license for "unprofessional or dishonorable conduct" has led some of the courts to remark, in connection with the granting of licenses,—and the remarks are equally applicable to the revoking,—that those words are to be taken to mean such conduct as would, in common judgment, be deemed unprofessional or dishonorable. While there is broad ground for the exercise of discretion under these terms, any arbitrary or unjust interpretation of them by the commission will be redressed at the suit of the injured physician in the courts of law. State ex rel. Hathaway v. State Bd. of Health, 103 Mo. 22, 15 S. W. 322.

While recognizing the validity of a statute so general in terms, the court, in People use of State Bd. of Health v. McCoy, held void a revocation thereunder, which had been made without notice and upon unsustainable charges. The court takes occasion to remark that such a statute does not give the board a right to revoke from mere caprice or without cause. "The right of the citizen to practise his profession, for which he has expended time and money to qualify himself, is too important to be taken away from him without some reasonable cause. It must be for some act or conduct that would, in the common judgment, be deemed 'unprofessional' or 'dishonorable.'"

A direct decision against the validity of so hazy a provision is found, however, in Matthews v. Murphy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 750, 54 L. R. A. 415, 63 S. W. 785, where an injunction was granted against the attempted revocation of a license under a statute authorizing the state board of health to revoke for "unprofessional conduct of a character likely to deceive or defraud the public." Prefacing its decision by the statement of the well-recognized principle that the license to practise is a "right" or "estate" of which the possessor cannot be deprived without due process of law, the court, while admitting the power of the legislature to provide 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) for the revocation of a license where the acts or conduct which shall justify the same are specified in the statute, holds the provision in question simply void for uncertainty. "As the statute does not advise him beforehand as to what is unprofessional conduct, he could not knowingly or intentionally be guilty of it. The legislature, in effect, has attempted to commit to the state board of health the right, after the physician has done some act, to determine what its effect is to be; and if, in its judgment, he should be deprived of the right to practise his profession, it can inflict the punishment upon him by revoking his license."

The court, on the other hand, admits the validity of the statute as to the refusal to grant licenses, though such refusal may be based upon the same grounds. This seems inconsistent with its holding as to revocation, as there is no distinction between the two phases of the question. On the whole, the decision seems to be against the spirit of the decisions above noted, and of the many cases upholding the validity of such a provision in connection with the granting of licenses.

If moral character is a commonly and ordinarily received qualification for the practice of medicine, the board should have the same general right to pass upon it as it has to pass upon other qualifications. Greene, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding in error to reverse the judgment of the district court of Shawnee county, refusing to grant a temporary injunction prohibiting the State Board of Medical Registration and Examination from placing of record and enforcing an order theretofore made, revoking the license of William M. Meffert to practise medicine and surgery in Kansas.

The statute under which the proceedings were had is chapter 254, p. 445, Laws 1901. (Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 6669-6677). and is entitled "An Act to Create a State Board of Medical Registration and Examination, and to Regulate the Practice of Medicine, Surgery, and Osteopathy in the State of Kansas, Prescribing Penalties for the Violation Thereof, and Repealing Chapter 68 of the Session Laws of 1870." The board consists of seven members. The only provision of this law specially involved in this litigation is that part of § 2, p. 446, which reads: "All persons engaged in the practice of medicine on the date of the passage of this act shall, within four months from the date of such passage, apply to the board of registration and examination for a license to practise. . . . The board may refuse to grant a certificate to any person guilty of felony or gross immorality or addicted to the liquor or drug habit to such a degree as to render him unfit to practise medicine or surgery, and may, after notice and hearing, revoke the certificate for like cause."

The petition in this action contains, as exhibits, copies of the accusations made against plaintiff in error to the State Board of Medical Registration and Examination. It appears that at a meeting of the citizens of Emporia a committee of three was appointed to formulate charges against plaintiff in error, and present them to the State Board of Medical Examiners for the purpose of having his license revoked. These charges, while not as formal or specific as would be required in an information or an indictment, were ample to challenge the attention of the board, and to notify the plaintiff in error of the nature of the accusations made against him. Among these exhibits were a resolution passed by the board of education of the city of Emporia, discharging one of its female teachers for associating with the plaintiff in error; a statement "that he was a man notorious in Emporia for his immorality;" a request, signed by eighteen practising physicians and surgeons of Emporia, stating that "we have ground to believe that he is grossly immoral, and we know that he is guilty of other unprofessional conduct of such a degree that we will not meet in consultation or recognize him as a member of the medical profession;" another request signed by the pastors of nine of the churches of Emporia, and another signed by thirty-eight of the business men of Emporia, each stating that Meffert was grossly immoral, and asking that his license to practise medicine be revoked; an affidavit of O. M. Wilhite, charging the plaintiff in error with numerous acts unprofessional, grossly immoral, and criminal. Copies of these charges and complaints were served on plaintiff in error, and a notice informing him when such charges would be heard.

Upon the hearing the plaintiff in error appeared with his counsel. Affidavits and oral testimony were introduced by both parties. The board found that plaintiff in error was grossly immoral, and revoked his license to practice medicine or surgery in Kansas. Proceedings were then instituted in the court below perpetually to enjoin the board from entering such order or otherwise enforcing the same. A demurrer was filed to the petition, which was sustained, from which this proceeding was prosecuted.

It is alleged in the petition that "said board has no power or authority to revoke said license and said certificate, for the reason that this plaintiff has a vested interest in his calling and profession, and the practice thereof, and he cannot be deprived of the same except by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, duly rendered, for offenses and actions committed by himself that pertain and relate to the practice of his said profession, and that have been committed since the 21st day of March, 1901, and are of the nature and character that would warrant, and for which the law authorizes, a revocation of his license and certificate; and said board is not a judicial body, and has no power or right to act in a judicial capacity, and any and all acts and attempts on their part to so act are a nullity and void." There are no allegations of fraud, corruption, or oppression on the part of the board in its proceedings, and we think the questions presented for our determination are involved in the allegations of the petition quoted.

One of the rights reserved to the state is to determine the qualification for office, and the conditions upon which citizens may exercise the various callings and pursuits within its limits. This power was recognized in England more than 300 years ago, and has been the law of that country ever since. Bonham's Case, 8 Coke, 114a. In Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 122, 123, 32 L. ed. 623, 626, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231, 233, the court said: "The power of the state to provide for the general welfare of its people authorizes it to prescribe all such regulations as, in its judgment, will secure, or tend to secure, them against the consequences of ignorance and incapacity as well as of deception and fraud. As one means to this end, it has been the practice of different states, from time immemorial, to exact in many pursuits a certain degree of skill and learning, upon which the community may confidently rely." A surfeit of authority might be cited, holding that the state, in the exercise of its police power, may prescribe the qualifications which a physician must possess before entering upon the practice of medicine or surgery. State ex rel. Powell v. State Medical Examining Board, 32 Minn. 324, 50 Am. Rep. 575, 20 N. W. 238; Thompson v. Hazen, 25 Me. 104; Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 58 Am. Rep. 400, 10 N. E. 97; State v. Call, 121 N. C. 643, 28 S. E. 517; People v. Hasbrouck, 11 Utah, 291, 39 Pac. 918; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 42 L. ed. 1002, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; State v. Wilcox, 64 Kan. 789, 68 Pac. 634.

The State Board of Medical Registration and Examination is not a judicial tribunal. While it may be said to act quasi judicially, it is only a ministerial board, and performs no judicial functions. It is classed with such boards as the county boards of equalization, boards for the examination of applicants for teachers' certificates, city councils in granting and refusing a business or occupation license, and numerous other boards of similar character. Such boards perform no judicial functions, are not judicial tribunals, and have never been classed as such. State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 26 N. W. 123; Wilkins v. State, 113 Ind. 514, 16 N. E. 192; State ex rel. Burroughs v. Webster, 150 Ind. 607, 41 L. R. A. 212, 50 N. E. 750; State v. Hathaway, 115 Mo. 36, 21 S. W. 1081; State Bd. of Health v. Roy, 22 R. I. 538, 48 Atl. 802.

It is contended that the procedure before the board in the admission and rejection of evidence was violative of the rights of Meffert, in that the evidence received and acted upon was made up largely of unsupported accusations, hearsay, and street rumor, and was not sufficient to sustain the findings. The provisions of the act creating the board plainly indicate that such investigation was not intended to be carried on in observance of the technical rules adopted by courts of law. The act provides that the board shall be composed of seven physicians. These men are not learned in the science of law, and to require of a board thus composed that its investigations be conducted in conformity to the technical rules of a common-law court would at once disqualify it from making any investigation. It is subversive of the morals of the people and degrading to the medical profession for the state to clothe a grossly immoral man with authority to enter the homes of her citizens in the capacity of a physician. It was the intention of the legislature to adopt a summary proceeding by which the morals of the people and the dignity of the profession might be protected against such a possibility, without being embarrassed by the technical rules of proceedings at law. In the case of Lynch v. Chase, 55 Kan. 367, 40 Pac. 666, many questions similar to those presented by plaintiff were involved. Chapter 239, p. 361, Laws 1889, provided for the appointment of committees by the governor, lieutenant governor, and speaker of the house, to investigate the affairs of state institutions and conduct of said officers. Under this law a committee was appointed to investigate the affairs of the State Penitentiary, and the conduct of S. W. Chase, the warden of that institution. An investigation was had, and the committee found and reported several acts of official misconduct and insufficiency in office, and recommended his removal. The governor ordered his removal, and immediately appointed Lynch to succeed him. Upon a refusal to surrender the office Lynch prosecuted a proceeding in quo warranto. It was held that "a summary proceeding of this character is not like a common-law trial, nor are the same precision and accuracy required as in a trial before a court;" that "the allegation that the testimony was insufficient to sustain the findings is without force; that the evidence was heard and considered by a tribunal created for that purpose, and the duty of determining its sufficiency belongs to that tribunal, and not to the court." The same question was involved in School Dist. No. 23 v. McCoy, 30 Kan. 268, 46 Am. Rep. 92, 1 Pac. 97, and decided against the contention of plaintiff in error. Meffert was timely notified of the charges preferred against him, the time when a hearing would be had, and was given ample opportunity to refute such charges. The findings by the board are conclusive upon this court.

It is contended that the immoral conduct with which plaintiff in error was charged was not practised by him in the line of his profession, and therefore was not cognizable by the board. The law is not that the board must find that such person has been grossly immoral with his patients, but that he is grossly immoral in his general habits. We only mention this contention to condemn it. The object sought is the protection of the home of the sick and distressed from the intrusion therein, in a professional character, of vicious and unprincipled men—men wholly destitute of all moral sensibilities. It is not the purpose of the lawmakers to clothe a man with a certificate of moral character, and send him out to prey upon the weak and unsuspecting,—upon those who would be entirely at his mercy,—and quietly await the accomplishment of that which observation and experience have taught us is certain to follow, before depriving such person of the indorsement which gave the opportunity to commit such wrong. The law disqualifies one guilty of a felony. It would hardly be contended that the felony for which a license may be revoked must have been committed upon a patient, or against the property of a patient, or while such physician was attending a patient.

It is further contended that the right of a physician to practise his profession is a property right, of which he cannot be deprived without due process of law, which plaintiff in error construes to mean the judgment of a constitutionally created court. We have seen that it is within the police power of a state to prescribe the qualifications of one desiring to practise medicine, and also to provide for the creation of a board or tribunal to make the examination and determine whether the applicant for a license to follow this profession possesses the required qualification, and if so, to issue to him such license. It must follow that the state may confer upon the same board or tribunal the power to revoke such license if it should thereafter be made to appear that the license should not have been issued, or if, for any reason, the holder thereof since its issuance has become disqualified. The argument is that to deprive a physician of his right to practise medicine otherwise than by a judgment of forfeiture by a judicial tribunal is without due process of law, and is in violation of § 1, art. 14, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares: "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." This constitutional provision is not a restriction or limitation on the police power of the state to pass and enforce such laws as, in its judgment, will inure to the health, morals, or general welfare of its people. Such power is reserved to the state, which has been so recognized by all courts since the adoption of this amendment. In People v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 423 1 L. R. A. 293, 294, 6 Am. St. Rep. 389, 392, 18 N. E. 245, 246, it is said: "But, as the language of the constitutional prohibition implies, life, liberty, and property may be justly affected by law, and the statutes abound in examples of legislation limiting or regulating the use of private property, restraining freedom of personal action, or controlling individual conduct, which, by common consent, do not transcend the limitations of the Constitution. This legislation is under what, for lack of a better name, is called the police power of the state—a power incapable of exact definition, but the existence of which is essential to every well-ordered government. By means of this power the legislature exercises a supervision over matters involving the common weal, and enforces the observance by each individual member of society of the duties which he owes to others and to the community at large. It may be exerted whenever necessary to secure the peace, good order, health, morals, and general welfare of the community; and the propriety of its exercise within constitutional limits is purely a matter of legislative discretion, with which the courts cannot interfere." In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31, 28 L. ed. 923, 924, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, 359, the court, in speaking upon this subject, used the following language: "But neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity." In Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 665, 666, 31 L. ed. 205, 211, 212, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, 299, the court said: "The constitutional prohibition upon state laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the state to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contracts. Rights and privileges arising from contracts with a state are subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the public safety in the same sense and to the same extent as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations." The principle that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law was embodied, in substance, in the Constitutions of nearly all, if not all, of the states at the time of the adoption of the 14th Amendment; and it has never been regarded as incompatible with the principle, equally vital, because essential to the peace and safety of society, that all property in this country is held under the implied obligation that the owner's use of it shall not be injurious to the community. . . . 'By the settled doctrines of this court, the police power extends, at least, to the protection of the lives, the health, and the property of the community against the injurious exercise by any citizen of his own rights. State legislation, strictly and legitimately for police purposes, does not, in the sense of the Constitution, necessarily intrench upon any authority which has been confided, expressly or by implication, to the national government.'" To the same effect are Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, and Re Rahrer (Wilkerson v. Rahrer), 140 U. S. 545, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

In Cincinnati v. Steinkamp, 54 Ohio St. 284, 291, 43 N. E. 490, the court, in speaking of the act to regulate the construction of buildings within cities of the first class and first grade, and to provide for the appointment of an inspector of buildings, said: "This section does not abridge the exercise of the police power of the states, nor limit the subjects upon which they may legislate." In Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 127, 34 L. ed. 138, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 690, Mr. Justice Gray, in speaking of the exercise of the police power of the state, said: "Among the powers thus reserved to the several states is what is commonly called the police power,—that inherent . . . power, essential to the very existence of civil society, and the safeguard of the inhabitants of the state against disorder, disease, poverty, and crime." This contention is very aptly and forcibly answered by the supreme court of Minnesota in State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 389, 390, 26 N. W. 123, 124, where it is said: "The radical fallacy in this chain of argument is the assumption that the revocation of such a license is the exercise of judicial power. 'Due process of law,' or 'the law of the land' (which means the same thing), is not necessarily judicial proceedings. Private rights and the enjoyment of property may be interfered with by the legislative or executive, as well as the judicial, department of government. When it is declared that a person shall not be deprived of his property without 'due process of law,' it means such an exercise of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, under such safeguards as these maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs. . . . It has never been held that the granting, or refusing to grant, such a license as this, was the exercise of judicial power; . . . and in fact this is not claimed in this case; and there is no possible distinction in this respect between refusing to grant a license and revoking one already granted. Both acts are an exercise of the police power. The power exercised and the object of its exercise is in each case identical, viz., to exclude an incompetent or unworthy person from this employment. Therefore the same body which may be vested with the power to grant, or refuse to grant, a license may also be vested with the power to revoke. The statutes of all the states are full of enactments giving the power to revoke licenses of dealers, innkeepers, hackmen, draymen, pawnbrokers, auctioneers, pilots, engineers, and the like, to the same bodies, boards, or officers who are authorized to issue them, such as city councils, county commissioners, selectmen, boards of health, boards of excise, etc. The constitutionality of such laws, as a valid exercise of the police power, has often been sustained, and, indeed, rarely questioned."

Another contention is that the state board of medical examiners had no power to revoke the license theretofore issued, because the acts for which the commission was revoked, if committed at all, were committed before the passage of the law creating the board, and therefore as to such acts the law is ex post facto. Conceding that the evidence introduced before the state board of medical examiners related to acts of immorality occurring before the passage of the law creating the board, does it follow that the law is ex post facto, as applied to plaintiff in error? An ex post facto law is one that imposes a punishment for an act that was not punishable at the time it was committed, or imposes an additional punishment to that then prescribed, etc. The revocation of a license to practise medicine for any of the reasons mentioned in the statute was not intended to be, nor does it operate as, a punishment, but as a protection to the citizens of the state. Such requirements go to his qualifications, and, where the qualification imposed is reasonable, one has no right to complain that he is deprived of the right to practise his profession because he has not conformed to such reasonable regulations. The legislature has empowered the different cities of the state to assess a business license tax upon nearly all kinds of trades, professions, business, and occupations, upon the payment of which, and in some instances the conformity to other reasonable regulations, the city issues to such persons a license to carry on such business, occupation, profession, or trade; and for the nonperformance of such condition, or nonpayment of the stipulated license, such permission may be canceled or withheld. It has never been thought that the withholding or revocation of such license was in any sense a punishment. If the revocation were intended as a punishment, there might be force in this argument, but, since the only purpose of the law was to require a certain standard of morals of the physician, the argument is without force.

Our attention has been called to the cases of Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 316-319, 18 L. ed. 356, 360-362, and Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 18 L. ed. 366. The same questions were involved in those two cases, and in rendering the opinion in the latter case the principles announced in the former were generally relied on. Mr. Cummings was a Catholic priest, and was indicted and convicted of teaching and preaching as a minister of that religious denomination without taking what was known as the "test oath." Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The oath prescribed by the Constitution, divided into its separable parts, embraces more than thirty distinct affirmations or tests. Some of the acts against which it is directed constitute offenses of the highest grade; to which, upon conviction, heavy penalties are attached. Some of the acts have never been classed as offenses in the laws of any state, and some of the acts, under many circumstances, would not even be blameworthy. It requires the affiant to deny, not only that he has ever 'been in armed hostility to the United States, or to the lawful authorities thereof,' but, among other things, that he has ever, 'by act or word,' manifested his adherence to the cause of the enemies of the United States, foreign or domestic, or his desire for their triumph over the arms of the United States, or his sympathy with those engaged in rebellion, or has ever harbored or aided any person engaged in guerrilla warfare against the loyal inhabitants of the United States, or has ever entered or left the state for the purpose of avoiding enrolment or draft in the military service of the United States, or, to escape the performance of duty in the militia of the United States, has ever indicated, in any terms, his disaffection to the government of the United States in its contest with the Rebellion. Every person who is unable to take this oath is declared incapable of holding, in the state, 'any office of honor, trust, or profit under its authority, . . . or of acting as a professor or teacher in any educational institution, or in any common or other school, or of holding any real estate or other property in trust for the use of any church, religious society, or congregation,' . . . [or to] 'be competent, as a bishop, priest, deacon, minister, elder, or other clergyman, of any religious persuasion, sect, or denomination, to teach, or preach, or solemnize marriages.' " The severest punishment was prescribed for violation of those provisions of the Constitution. On page 318, 4 Wall. and page 361, 18 L. ed., the court said: "The oath thus required is, for its severity, without any precedent that we can discover." On page 319, 4 Wall., and page 361, 18 L. ed., the court states the fact upon which it held this law unconstitutional and void, as follows: "Qualifications relate to the fitness or capacity of the party for a particular pursuit or profession. Webster defines the term to mean 'any natural endowment or any acquirement which fits a person for a place, office, or employment, or enables him to sustain any character with success.' It is evident from the nature of the pursuits and professions of the parties placed under disabilities by the Constitution of Missouri that many of the acts from the taint of which they must purge themselves have no possible relation to their fitness for those pursuits and professions. . . . The oath could not, therefore, have been required as a means of ascertaining whether parties were qualified, or not, for their respective callings, or the trust with which they were charged. It was required in order to reach the person, not the calling. It was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment, and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment, except by depriving the parties who had committed them of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen." It was held that, as this law was intended as a punishment for past offenses, and not to prescribe a qualification for duties to be performed or callings to be pursued, it was ex post facto, and therefore void. In these particulars it is easily distinguishable from the case under consideration, and is not an authority for the contention of plaintiff in error. We have not overlooked the language used by this court in Re Peyton, 12 Kan. 405, wherein the court, speaking of a disbarment proceeding, said: "The whole thing is in the nature of a criminal forfeiture." Counsel for plaintiff in error seek to apply the principle there announced to the proceeding before the board in this case. We are not prepared to say that the language there used does not express the law as applicable to disbarment proceedings, under § 393, Gen. Stat. 1901, which reads: 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"An attorney or counselor who is guilty of deceit or collusion, or consents thereto, with intent to deceive a court or judge, or a party to an action or proceeding, or brings suit or commences proceedings without authority therefor, is liable to be disbarred, and shall forfeit to the injured party treble damages, to be recovered in a civil action." It appears that disbarment for the reasons mentioned in said section is in the nature of a punishment, which differentiates the law of disbarment from the revocation of a physician's license because disqualified.

We are of the opinion that the petition states no ground for equitable relief, and there was no error committed by the court below in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

B. F. MARK, Admr., etc., of H. R. Mark, Deceased, et al., Appts.,
v.

JOSIE BOARDMAN.

(... Ky.)

Decedent's estate—claim for services.

A woman taking her brother into her

Case Note.—The doctrine established by the authorities is that, when relatives live together as members of one family, or as one household, the right to compensation for board and personal services does not exist in the absence of an express contract; but, when such relation does not exist, an implied contract to pay may arise. Thus, in Disbrow v. Durand, 54 N. J. L. 343, 33 Am. St. Rep. 678, 24 Atl. 545, the facts show that a brother and sister lived together for more than twenty years, until the brother's death. The sister, who was a widow, had no means of subsistence, and refused to live with her son, preferring to live with her brother as his housekeeper. There was no proof that the subject of compensation for her services was ever discussed or contemplated by either of them. In denying the sister's right to recover for her services, the court said: "In order to recover for the services, the plaintiff must affirmatively show, either that an express contract for the remuneration existed, or that the circumstances under which the services were rendered were such as exhibit a reasonable and proper expectation that there would be compensation. The reason of this exception to the ordinary rule is, that the household family relationship is presumed to abound in reciprocal acts of kindness and good will, home, and, without benefit to herself, nursing and performing other menial services for him during his last illness, is entitled to an allowance of their value out of his estate, although there was no express contract that payment should be made.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to settle the estate of H. R. Mark, deceased, and to establish a claim against it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. Apperson, for appellants:

Where the relation of brother and sister exists, the law implies no contract to compensate for services rendered by one per-which tend to the mutual comfort and convenience of the members of the family, and are gratuitously performed; and, where that relationship appears, the ordinary implication of a promise to pay for services does not arise, because the presumption which supports such implication is nullified by the presumption that between members of a household services are gratuitously rendered."

In Keller v. Stuck, 4 Redf. 294, it was held that no implied contract for compensation arises when one sister nurses another when the two are living together.

In Fuller v. Fuller, 21 Ind. App. 42, 51 N. E. 373, it was held that a brother was not entitled to recover from his sister's estate for board and care, where the evidence showed that she lived with him from the time she was a child until her death at the age of twenty-eight, assisting in the household of her brother's family, which was large, and acting and being treated as a member of the family.

In Chapman v. Chapman, 87 Ill. App. 427, the facts show that a merchant received his brother as a visitor, and treated him as a member of the family, and the brother, on his part, performed various kinds of service about the store, such as marking goods, waiting on customers, sweeping out, etc., for ten or eleven months. In an action to recover for such services, the court held that, in the absence of an express agreement, the law would indulge the presumption that what was done for each other by the two brothers was done gratuitously and as the promptings of natural affection.

But in Shubart's Estate, 154 Pa. 230, 26 Atl. 202, a presumption against the existence of a contract was held not to exist. In this case a testator provided a fund to pay for the washing, mending, clothing, and boarding of a daughter, who was an idiot, and who was living in the family of her brother. Three and a half years before her death she became afflicted with paralysis and total blindness, and was entirely helpless. The court held that the compensation for boarding, etc., did not include nursing and personal attendance, and that there was no presumption from the relationship of the parties, that of brother and sister, that the services were voluntary, and not done in expectation of payment. The proof in this case showed that the brother did not receive his sister as a member of his family, but that he expected compensation for his services. The court said that, as between brother and sister, there is no presumption that they live together as members of a family, and that the family relation must be proved by the party asserting it.

The same rule is stated in Curry v. Curry, 114 Pa. 367, 7 Atl. 61, where the court said: "The performance and receipt of services generally raises an implied promise by him who receives to compensate him who performs, but the implication may be rebutted. When the parties are parent and child, or members of the same family, the relationship excludes the implication of a promise. In all cases except that of parent and child there must be evidence beyond the relationship that the creation of no debt was intended. Where the parties are brother and sister, the sister claiming compensation for her services, the burden of showing family relationship, or other cause, to exclude the implication of his promise to pay for the services, is upon the brother." In this case the claim of the sister to compensation was sustained.

But in O'Brien's Estate, 17 Phila. 456, it was held that there is no presumption of an implied contract to pay for board, furnished by a sister to an invalid brother during a visit to her, nor for board furnished at a subsequent time, when he returned, with his nurse, to his sister's home, and remained there until his death, where it appeared that he was neither charged, nor intended to be charged, as a boarder during the first visit, and when he returned in the following year to die there was nothing to apprise him that he was to stand upon a different footing, and it was not contemplated during the brother's lifetime to make any claim for board; the claim apparently originating in a moment of disappointment over the contents of his will. This case is, nevertheless, in harmony with the other Pennsylvania cases holding that there is no presumption, from the relationship between a brother and sister, that services performed by one for the other are voluntary and without expectation of payment. The court expressly says: "His relationship to the claimant did not exempt him from liability. The law, sensitive to the instincts of humanity, will not, it is true, where express proof of a contract is wanting, treat the reciprocal dealings of a child and his parent as the subjects of barter; but in all remoter degrees of kinship it holds to the presumption that a promise to pay accompanies the receipt of a benefit." But the facts of this case were held to take it out of the general rule.

Price v. Price, 101 Ky. 28, 39 S. W. 429; Hartman's Appeal, 3 Grant, Cas. 271; Hall v. Finch, 29 Wis. 278, 9 Am. Rep. 559; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 92 Ky. 556, 18 S. W. 517; Wayman v. Wayman, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 374, 22 S. W. 557.

A brother is entitled to recover for services in nursing, rendered his sister, who came to his house in failing health, not at his invitation, but of her own seeking. The court said that she came to her brother's house as to a hospital, and therefore the claim for services rests upon an implied assumption. Lillich's Estate, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 25.

So, in Silvius's Estate, 3 Lack. Legal News, 84, the court sustained the right of one to receive compensation who left her own family to the care of others, and came, upon request, strictly as a nurse to care for her sister, who had undergone an operation.

In Kentucky a statute requires proof of an express contract before a relative will be allowed to recover for board and lodging furnished a decedent in his lifetime. But this statute does not apply to nursing in old age or in sickness. Thomas v. Arthur, 7 Bush, 245; Schuster v. White, 106 Ky. 319, 50 S. W. 242.

The right to recover for nursing is sustained in Dance v. Magruder, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 220, 80 S. W. 1120. In this case a sister nursed and cared for an aged brother during his last illness, and the court sustained her right to recover, because it appeared that the brother was incapable, on account of the ravages of disease, of making a contract with reference to payment of services received from her.

In O'Connor v. Beckwith, 41 Mich. 657, 3 N. W. 166, the court held that an implied promise to pay for services was created where one lived much of his time with his sister, by whom his washing and ironing were done, and who cared for him when sick. In this case decedent, in his lifetime, repeatedly said that he would pay for all that had been done for him.

In Spencer v. Spencer, 181 Mass. 471, 63 N. E. 947, which was an action for personal services rendered by an unmarried sister to her brother, it appeared that she lived with him as his housekeeper for a while, for pay, but when he became sick she continued to work for him, receiving no compensation, but earning money by working out, which she used in her brother's family. The court held that it did not matter whether the brother expected to pay for services, or not, and that it was not necessary, in order to bind him, that he should have believed that his sister expected pay, if as a reasonable man he should have understood from what he knew that such was the expectation.

In Williams v. Williams, 114 Wis. 79, 89 N. W. 835, it was held that the mere fact that parties are brothers is not sufficient to raise a presumption that valuable services

Mr. Robert H. Winn, for appellee:

Where the decedent recognized his obligation, there need have been no intention to charge him.

Barnett v. Adams, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 622, 82 S. W. 406.

performed by one for the other are gratuitous, where both are grown men, each married and having for years managed his own individual affairs, and there are no facts showing dependence of the one upon the other. In this case a man went without his family to his brother, and was received as a guest, and remained a number of weeks, during which time he commenced superintending the erection of some houses which the brother was building, living part of the time in one of the brother's houses, but taking his meals with his brother until his family came, when he lived entirely at his own home. The services were continued for several months after he ceased to live with his brother as a guest, and he put much labor and time into the enterprise. The court held that, although it might be admitted that while he was stopping at his brother's house and taking his meals there he must be regarded as a guest, and that any incidental services that he might then render to his brother would be regarded simply as offices of kindness, for which no pay was expected, he was entitled to recover for the services performed after he left his brother's family.

The general rule as to the liability of decedents' estates for services rendered by a relative is well stated in vol. 18, Cyclopedia of Law & Procedure, p. 412, as follows: "The courts regard with suspicion and disfavor claims brought against a decedent's estate for personal services rendered by relatives, especially where the latter are members of his immediate family or household, as the presumption is that such services, between persons occupying such relations, are intended to be gratuitous; and hence, claims against the estate of a decedent, made by near relatives for personal services, require stronger proof to establish them than ordinary claims by strangers. The rule does not, however, prevent a recovery by a person standing in such relation to a decedent for services rendered where there was an express contract or promise to pay, or where the circumstances are such as to clearly show a mutual intention that the services should be paid for, and thus raise an implied contract; and where, although the decedent and the claimant were relatives, the relation was not such as imposed any special obligation on the claimant of support of, care for, or tenderness toward, the decedent, a claim for compensation will be more favorably regarded, and in a suitable case upheld,—especially where decedent and claimant did not live together."

Thomas v. Arthur, 7 Bush, 245; Turner v. Moberly, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 623; Frailey v. Thompson, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1179, 49 S. W. 13; Dance v. Magruder, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 220, 80 S. W. 1120; Durr v. Durr, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 855, 82 S. W. 581; Galloway v. Galloway, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 857, 70 S. W. 48.

Implied contracts are such as reason and justice dictate, and which, therefore, the law presumes that every man undertakes to perform.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee and H. R. Mark, deceased, were brother and sister. Appellant B. F. Mark is the administrator, and the other appellants are the decedent's brothers, sisters, nieces, and nephews. H. R. Mark died a bachelor and without a will on August 9, 1901. On October 17, 1900, he left his home, and went to the home of the appellee, and lived with her until his death. During this time he was addicted to the use of both morphine and whisky, and frequently became drunk, and he was in the last stages of consumption. With these three afflictions combined, it made it very unpleasant for those about him, and especially for the appellee, who was compelled to nurse and care for him. He apparently at times had no control over the action of his kidneys and lower bowels, or at least he permitted nature to take its course in his bedroom, and he coughed and expectorated constantly upon the floor and walls of the room. She fed and prepared extra dishes for him, washed his sheets, and changed his linen, and performed other menial labor for him, which consumed a great portion of her time. Appellee was a widow, with five boys of tender years, and the presence of deceased at her home was of no benefit to her, but a positive detriment. Deceased left personalty of the value of about $1,200 and a valuable farm. Appellee instituted this action to settle his estate and presented a claim for $591 for board, nursing, care, and attention furnished and rendered by her to the decedent as stated. Her claim was contested by the administrator and some of the heirs. She did not prove any express contract for the payment to her for these things, and the court upon the trial adjudged that she was not entitled to recover anything on her claim for board by reason of the inhibition of § 2178. Ky. Stat., but allowed her $350 on her claim for nursing and other menial labor performed for him, and credited that sum by $102, the value of some colts and calves given by H. R. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mark to some of the children of appellee. From this judgment appellants have prosecuted this appeal.

They contend that she was not entitled to any part of her claim, and refer to the cases of Reynolds v. Reynolds, 92 Ky. 556, 18 S. W. 517; Wayman v. Wayman, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 374, 22 S. W. 557; Price v. Price, 101 Ky. 28, 39 S. W. 429; Lowe v. Webster, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1208, 43 S. W. 217; and Frailey v. Thompson, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1179, 49 S. W. 13,—in support of their position. It will be observed in all, or nearly all, of these cases that the parties received a direct benefit or advantage in being or residing together, and in most of them the parties making the charge resided in the household of the persons whose estate was sought to be charged. Most all cases denying recompense, under such circumstances, are those where there has been a mutuality of benefit. In the case at bar there was no mutuality of benefit. The benefit was all upon the side of H. R. Mark, the deceased. The allowance by the court of that portion of appellee's claim for nursing, etc., was proper under the circumstances proved in this case. See Thomas v. Arthur, 7 Bush, 245; Turner v. Moberly 14 Ky. L. Rep. 623; Frailey v. Thompson, supra; Dance v. Magruder, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 220, 80 S. W. 1120; Durr v. Durr, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 855, 82 S. W. 581; and Galloway v. Galloway, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 857, 70 S. W. 48.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM STARK, Jr., By Next Friend, Plff. in Err.,
v.

MUSKEGON TRACTION & LIGHTING

(.... Mich.)

Electric wires—injury by—proximate cause.

The act of a boy in seizing a broken telephone wire to receive a shock is the proximate cause of an injury resulting to him therefrom, and not the violation of the Case Note.—Contributory negligence preventing a recovery was held to exist also in Frauenthal v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 67 Mo. App. 1, where a minor, a young man of seventeen, deliberately, after wrapping his hand in a handkerchief, took hold of a live wire in spite of warnings from bystanders, and was instantly killed. Such negligence is deemed not only concurrent, but the sole municipal ordinance as to the manner of stringing the electric light wire which charged the broken one, nor the fact that the wire was imperfectly insulated; and the fact that the boy was not aware of the risk is immaterial.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Muskegon County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Ostrander, J.:

Two errors are assigned upon the record, both of which make the single point that it was error for the court to direct a verdict for defendant. The record contains the substance of all the testimony given upon the trial. The injury complained about was received August 30, 1903. The plaintiff is a lad, ten years old in April, 1903. Defendant is a Michigan corporation, owning a plant for developing electricity for lighting and other purposes, and at the date in question was operating its plant and wires connected therewith, including a system of wires supported by poles on and over Spring immediate cause of the accident. Upon the contention that negligence could not be imputed to an infant, the court states that the question is not one of age, but of intelligence and maturity. "The presumption there is that an infant under the age of fourteen years is prima facie incapable of exercising sufficient judgment so as to be chargeable with contributory negligence; and whether the evidence in a particular case is sufficient to rebut the presumption is always a question of fact, for the jury, and not of law, for the court."

It is upon the same principle, but with a different result, that the court proceeds in Macon v. Paducah Street R. Co. 110 Ky. 680, 62 S. W. 496, where the jury found that a lad of twelve was not guilty of contributory negligence in taking hold of a live wire after warnings of the danger. A street railroad company is there held liable for injuries resulting from contact with a live wire which had been hanging for two weeks or more from the guy wires used by it to sustain its trolley wire in place.

So the court in Texarkana Gas & Electric Light Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215, 43 Am. St. Rep. 30, 27 S. W. 66, refused to disturb the finding of the jury that a boy "not yet arrived at the state of manhood" was not negligent in attempting to remove a live wire from the street, after he had been cautioned against the danger by comrades.

street, in the city of Muskegon. The case made by the declaration is, in substance, that the wires of defendant were, at the place of the accident, carried too near the ground, and were not insulated; that on the same poles, and under the defendant's wires, certain telephone wires were carried; that the condition and position of the wires permitted contact, or that contact occurred between the telephone wires and the other and uninsulated wire; and "that the injuries complained of were caused by the defective and unsafe construction and maintenance of such wires and the defective and unsafe stringing of the wires of the [defendant] at the place aforesaid, and in permitting and maintaining said wire too near the surface of the ground at the place aforesaid, and in allowing the wires herein designated as telephone wires to be and remain on and connected with the poles on which was strung the wires through which the defendant was transmitting a dangerous electrical current." It is alleged that plaintiff, without fault on his part, and without any knowledge of the danger, came in contact with the telephone wire which, owing to carelessness and negligence of defendant, was at the time charged with electricity, and was injured. There is no dispute about the deceased, a ten-year-old newsboy, as he walked home along the street, grasped a wire hanging down from a tree, and within easy reach from the sidewalk, and was killed by the current which it carried by reason of its crossing a trolley wire. "A child," says the court, "is held to such care and prudence as is usual among children of his age and capacity."

The duty of any persons conducting live wires through the streets is not limited to keeping their own wires out of the way of people who may travel thereon, but extends to the prevention of the escape of the electricity through wires brought in contact with their own, and of its transmission thereby to anyone using the streets. In the preceding case the owner of the broken wire was held liable. In City Electric Street R. Co. v. Conery, 61 Ark. 381, 31 L. R. A. 570, 54 Am. St. Rep. 262, 33 S. W. 426, a street railroad was held liable for the injury of a lad who, while at play, happened to step upon a live telephone wire which, after breaking, lay for a couple of days across the trolley wire, and carried its current to the injured boy. There was no claim of contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part.

The same principle is applied in Macon v. Paducah Street R. Co., where the fact that the wire, which had become live by crossing the trolley wire of the defendant, belonged to a telephone company, was deemed immaterial.

Generally on liability for injuries by electric wires in highways, see note in 31 L. R. A. 566.

the facts. No testimony was introduced on the part of defendant. At the pole near which the injury was received, the wires of defendant were supported on arms, two wires each side of the pole and some distance away from the pole. One witness, the father of the plaintiff, testified that they were 19 feet and 8 inches, and another that they were 20 feet and 9 inches, above the ground. Two feet below these wires, supported by single brackets with glass insulators, were two telephone wires, about 3 inches from the pole. They were not directly under the electric light wires, one was above the other, and they were several inches apart. There is no testimony showing or tending to show that the defendant's wires or the telephone wires were not properly and securely placed and supported, or that they were, in position, dangerous or likely to become dangerous. Plaintiff, with other children, was playing on Sunday afternoon in Spring street. One of the boys, playing with a ball and chain, threw it up to the lower telephone wire, to which it became fastened by reason of the chain winding around the wire. A sister of the boy, using a rake, the teeth of which she hooked into the chain, in her effort to get it down broke the telephone wire. A boy took one end of the broken wire, twisted it about a post, and then carried the end to a tree, up which he climbed to put it over a limb of the tree. The other end of the broken wire was made a plaything by the children, who, plaintiff aiding, swung it in the air against the wires of defendant, apparently for the purpose of making and hearing the wires rattle. "They would get hold of the end of it and get it back and form a loop, swing it around in a half-oval shape, and let go of it and strike the electric light wire to hear it rattle." "They would get hold of the end of it and then leave it somewhat slack, and then swing it round and round, and as they let it go it would fly up and hit the other wires and rattle. They were out there engaged in that play probably half an hour." In this way they finally threw the telephone wire over the electric light wires, or one of them. "At the time Willie Stark [the plaintiff] threw the wire up over the electric wire, I had hold of the long piece of wire. When Willie Stark threw the short piece of wire up over the electric light wire, then I got a shock in the long piece of wire that I had hold of." The boy who first felt the current told the others, another boy tried it, and received a shock. The plaintiff, proposing to try the experiment, was asked by his sister and another not to do so. Saying, "Watch me; I am not afraid," he took the wire and received the injuries for causing which he seeks to charge defendant. After 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the injury, on that day and the next day, persons noticed that in spots or small places there was no covering, no insulation on the electric light wire over which the telephone wire had been thrown. It is supposed, by at least one witness, that the telephone wire rested finally upon one of the bare or uncovered spots on the electric light wire, at a point where it was spliced; that the current was carried into the adjoining house from which a telephone had been a short time before removed, leaving the wires supplying the telephone in place with their ends of bare copper twisted together, the current passing out and into the wire described as the long end of the wire which had been carried first to a post and then to a tree, and so, when he seized it, to the person of the plaintiff. Counsel for plaintiff offered in evidence an ordinance of the city of Muskegon, approved December 4, 1889, § 2 of which is: "All such poles and wires shall be put up under the supervision of the chief engineer of the fire department of said city, but no wires shall be put up over the fire alarm telegraph wires, nor shall any wires be put up within 25 feet of the ground in any street, alley, or other public ground of said city." The declaration does not allege disobedience of the ordinance as negligence, but avers the duty to suspend wires at a reasonably safe distance from the ground. It was not more, probably considerably less, than an hour after the time the wire was broken that plaintiff was injured.

Messrs. Turner & Turner and Cross, Lovelace, & Ross, for plaintiff in error:

It was defendant's duty to keep the wires perfectly insulated, and to exercise the utmost care to maintain them in this condition.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not apparent that the requirement, by ordinance, that wires should be supported 25 feet above the ground was based upon any idea of safety of the public. Failure to comply with this provision of the ordinance is not the negligence charged. If it was, it is not to be presumed that it caused or contributed to the injury complained about. See, also, as to the right of this plaintiff to complain of the violation of the ordinance, Flanagan v. Sanders (Mich.) 101 N. W. 581. Whether or not the wires of defendant were exposed before the telephone wire was broken does not appear, nor does it appear whether it is possible, or, observing proper rules, usual, to prevent some exposure of copper wire of the size and kind, in the making of splices. Whether the substance with which the wires were covered could or probably would be removed by being struck by the telephone wire, as it was swung against it, does not appear. It is, however, decisive of the case that plaintiff has conclusively shown a condition and relation of things which, as to himself and the public generally, was safe and harmless if not interfered with, has shown neither invitation nor inducement warranting or excusing interference, and has just as conclusively proved an interference, participated in by himself, the character and the results of which were not to be reasonably apprehended or guarded against. Whether or not, under the circumstances of this case, we apply the term "trespasser" to one of plaintiff's years (Trudell v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 126 Mich. 73, 53 L. R. A. 271, 85 N. W. 250; Henderson v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 116 Mich. 368, 74 N. W. 525), he was certainly a wrongdoer, who, but for his acts of wrongdoing, would not have been injured. Indulging the presumption that plaintiff was not aware of the danger of seizing the telephone wire does not operate, of itself, to charge defendant with responsibility for what occurred. Neither the distance of defendant's wires from the ground, nor the fact, if it is a fact, that one of them was defective as to insulation, can be said to be the proximate cause of the injury.

The judgment is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA ex rel. EDWARD T. YOUNG, Attorney General, Appt.,
v.

VILLAGE OF KENT et al., Respts.

(.... Minn.)

1. Quo warranto—matter of right.

When the attorney general of the state, acting in his official capacity as the chief law officer of the state, exhibits an information in the nature of quo warranto to the district court, and asks that a writ issue, directed to a municipal corporation, requiring it to show cause why its franchise should not be declared null and void, the court has no discretion, but must grant leave to file the information as a matter of course, and direct the writ to issue. Upon the return, it is the duty of the court to try the issues of law and fact presented thereby, and to determine the same upon the merits according to rules of law applicable thereto.

2. Same—application to supreme court.

When an application in a proceeding of this character is made by the attorney general to the supreme court, instead of to the district court, that court will exercise the

Headnotes by ELLIOTT, J.

Case Note.—That the rule authorizing the filing of an information without leave of court in proceedings instituted by the attorney general, ex officio and without any relator, and authorizing the issuance of the writ as a matter of right in such cases, is generally adhered to in the absence of statutes modifying the rule, is shown by an examination of the authorities.

When the commonwealth, through her attorney general, applies for a writ of quo warranto, she is entitled to it without a previous rule to show cause. It is not to be presumed that the law officer of the commonwealth would apply for this high prerogative writ for personal or private ends. He is supposed to be impartial, and to seek only the vindication of the rights of the state. It is not so in the case of a private relator, who is usually put to his rule to show cause. It might not be so where the attorney general merely allows private counsel to use his name, as is sometimes done to procure the writ. But when the attorney general, or his recognized deputy, assumes the responsibility, the writ should issue in the first instance. Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Walter, 83 Pa. 105, 24 Am. Rep. 154.

The writ of information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto is in the nature of a writ of right where the proceedings are instituted by the attorney general by virtue of the inherent authority of his office. State v. Brown, 5 R. I. 1.

The attorney general may, without leave of court, file an information in quo warranto praying that a building and loan association be ousted of its franchises and discretion given it by statute, and determine whether it is a case in which the writ should issue out of that court. If, in its judgment, the application should have been made to the district court, leave to file the information will be denied.

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the District Court for Wilkin County dismissing a petition for a writ of quo warranto to determine the validity of the organization of the defendant village. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward T. Young, Attorney General, Edward Valentine, and Jones & King, for appellant:

Where a court, having full and complete jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this proceeding, exercises its discretion, and, by a formal order, directs the issuance of a writ of quo warranto, it exhausts its discretion, and nothing remains possible for it to do in the premises except to try and determine the issues of fact and of law.

corporate privileges. State ex rel. Walker v. Equitable Loan & Invest. Asso. 142 Mo. 325, 41 S. W. 916. The court here states that this rule is the settled law of Missouri, and cites a long list of Missouri cases in support of its decision.

At common law the attorney general, ex officio, has the right either to sue out a writ of quo warranto or to bring an information in the nature of a quo warranto, without leave of court. *Atty. Leave of court is not necessary to enable a district attorney to institute proceedings in the nature of quo warranto to prevent the unlawful exercise of a corporate franchise. People ex rel. Jerome v. State University, 24 Colo. 175, 49 Pac. 286.

On the filing of an information, the writ issues upon the demand of the attorney general, against a person holding a public office, to inquire into his title thereto; and the court cannot inquire into his motives in instituting such proceedings. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Gleason, 12 Fla. 190.

Douglas v. School Dist. No. 108, 85 Minn. 230, 88 N. W. 751.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

sota from an order of the district court vacating and setting aside an order permitting the institution of proceedings in quo warranto against the village of Kent and its officers and trustees. The writ was issued upon an information exhibited by the attorney general of the state, acting ex officio on behalf of the public, and not upon the relation of a private relator. It recited that because of certain irregularities, therein fully set forth, the village had never been legally incorporated, and that the pretended incorporation had no force or effect. The writ was duly issued on May 17, 1905. On June 5th the respondent moved to dismiss the information and writ on the grounds (1) that the court had no jurisdiction in the premises, and (2) that the cause of action was not a proper case for quo warranto in the district court, and that, by reason of special and exceptional circumstances involving the corporate existence of a municipal corporation and the interest and convenience of the public, application for said writ should have been made to the supreme court of the state. The writ had been made returnable on that date, and a motion seems then to have been made to dismiss the information on the grounds (1) that it was not a proper case for quo warranto in the district court, and (2) that the order permitting the issue of the writ had been "inadvertently made without consideration and without the court having exercised any discretion therein." The motion was granted on both grounds. The state contends that the trial court erred in granting this motion, because (1) it had full and complete jurisdiction, and (2) the attorney general had the right to institute the proceedings without the consent of the court, and (3) even if the court had any discretion in the matter, having once issued the writ, its discretion was exhausted, and it was then its duty to hear and determine the cause upon the merits.

1. We do not understand counsel for the respondent to seriously contend that the district court was without jurisdiction to entertain and determine this proceeding. Rev. Stat. 1851, chap. 80, § 1, abolished the writ of quo warranto and proceeding upon information in the nature of quo warranto; but that statute was repealed by chapter 122, Gen. Stat. 1866, which revived the writ as a common-law writ to be issued in a proper case by the district court, as the court of general original jurisdiction, the historical successor of the court of King's bench. State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Otis, 58 Minn. 275, 59 N. W. 1015; State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Lockerby, 57 Minn. 411, 59 N. W. 495. This court also has original jurisdiction in quo warranto, but the Constitution and statutes recognize the desirability that such proceedings should ordinarily be instituted in the lower courts. Under Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4823, the supreme court will not order the writ to issue when "there is a remedy in some other court which is at all adequate." Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4823 (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 63, § 1), which provides for the exercise of the jurisdiction authorized by article 3, § 1, of the Constitution, empowers the supreme court to issue quo warranto writs, "subject to such regulations and conditions as the court may prescribe." These conditions are prescribed in State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Otis, supra, where it was said: "This court will not grant such an application if there is a remedy in some other court which is at all adequate, unless under special and exceptional circumstances, as for instance, that there will be great injury or inconvenience to the public by reason of the delay and uncertainty caused by commencing in the lower court and awaiting a final determination on appeal to this court." State ex rel. Simpson v. Dowlan, 33 Minn. 536, 24 N. W. 188; State ex rel. Diepenbrock v. Gates, 35 Minn. 385, 28 N. W. 927; State ex rel. Bell v. Moriarty, 82 Minn. 68, 84 N. W. 495. But it will be noted that it is the discretion of this court, and not that of the district courts, which is referred to in the statute. The jurisdiction of the supreme court being to a certain extent voluntary, it may decline to order the writ to issue in a case which comes within the conditions, even though the district court, under the same circumstances, would have no right to refuse it. The law which confers original jurisdiction upon this court expressly authorizes it to define the conditions under which it will be exercised; but the jurisdiction is conferred on the district courts without any such limitations. Their jurisdiction is complete, and in the exercise thereof they have a judicial discretionary power to grant or refuse leave to file information in the nature of quo warranto when applied for by individuals.

2. It is further contended that, even if the court had any discretion in the matter of allowing the information to be filed and the writ of issue, it was exhausted when the court once exercised its discretion and allowed the information to be filed and the writ to issue, and nothing thereafter remained for it to do but try and determine the issues of law and fact in accordance with the rules of law as in ordinary cases. In People ex rel. Jerome v. State University, 24 Colo. 175, 49 Pac. 286, Mr. Justice Campbell said: "The authorities seem to be unanimous that, when once the discretion of the court in which the proceeding is brought has been exercised and permission 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

given to relator to file an information, such discretion is exhausted, and may not be recalled; but, on the contrary, the court must then proceed to determine the controversy the same as any other upon the law and the facts."

In Spelling, Inj. & Extr. Rem. vol. 2, § 1777, it is said: "Where, however, the court has, in the exercise of its discretion, permitted the information to be filed, its discretionary power is thereby exhausted, and the issues of fact and law as presented must, at the trial, be determined according to the strict rules of law as in ordinary cases." In State v. Brown, 5 R. I. 1, the court said: "The discretion to allow in such a case the filing of an information of this character is, as we apprehend, all the discretion which courts of . . . authority justify. When the information is filed, all the discretionary power of the court is expended." To the same effect are High. Extr. Legal Rem. § 606; People ex rel. Swigert v. Golden Rule, 114 Ill. 34, 28 N. E. 383; People ex rel. Woodward v. Paisley, 81 Ill. App. 52; Place v. People, 83 Ill. App. 84; State ex rel. Lloyd v. Elliott, 13 Utah, 200, 44 Pac. 248; State ex rel. Heatherly v. Shank, 36 W. Va. 230, 14 S. E. 1001. And see King v. Brown, 4 T. R. 276. Mr. Justice Campbell's statement that the authorities seem to be unanimous is hardly correct, as there are cases which hold that this discretionary control remains with the court until the case is finally determined and that, where leave is improvidently given, the court may, upon the hearing, refuse relief upon the same grounds upon which it might originally have refused leave to file the information. People v. Wild Cat Special Drainage District, 31 Ill. App. 223; People v. Hamilton, 24 Ill. App. 609; State ex rel. Eckhart v. Hoff, 88 Tex. 297, 31 S. W. 290; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Claggett, 73 Mo. 388. We are of the opinion that the court exhausts its discretion when it exercises it upon the preliminary application for leave to file the information. This presumes, however, that the court actually exercises its discretion, and does not deprive it of the right to dismiss the proceedings if it subsequently appears that it acted improvidently or through inadvertence and under a misapprehension of facts. Gilroy v. Com. 105 Pa. 484; Com. ex rel. Fisher v. Kistler, 149 Pa. 356, 24 Atl. 216. Under such circumstances, no judicial discretion is exercised.

3. But has the court any power to refuse to allow the information to be filed in a case such as the record here discloses? This question cannot be answered intelligently without some consideration of the origin and development of the writ of quo warranto and the information in the nature of the writ of quo warranto, and also of the practice and procedure at common law and under the early English statutes, which were a part of the common law as it was adopted in this country. The historical phase of the subject will be found somewhat extensively presented in State ex rel. Lloyd v. Elliott, 13 Utah, 200, 44 Pac. 248; State v. Ashley, 1 Ark. 304; High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 605; and in Blackstone's Commentaries, bk. 3.

A very brief résumé only is sufficient to show beyond the possibility of doubt or cavil that the ancient writ of quo warranto and the information in the nature of quo warranto at common law is and always was a writ of right at the instance of the attorney general ex officio, as the representative of the Crown, commonwealth, or state. As said by Chief Justice Comegys, the writ of quo warranto had its existence in the womb of the common law before the time of the Crusades, although never appearing upon the statute books as aided by parliamentary provision for its exercise until the time of the first Richard." State ex rel. Dunlap v. Stewart, 6 Houst. (Del.) 359. It issued out of chancery, and was returnable at first before the King's bench at Westminster, and at a later period before the justices in eyre. When these justices were displaced by the judges on the various circuits, the writ became again returnable before the justices at Westminster. In the unusually felicitous words of Coke, "with justices in eyre this branch lived, and with them it died." This was the ancient writ, a writ of right for the King, against him "who claims or usurps any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supports his claim, in order to determine the right." Bl. Com. bk. 3, chap. 12, p. 5. The procedure upon this writ was complicated and cumbersome, and this, in connection with the fact that the judgment was conclusive, even against the Crown, led to its abandonment and the introduction of the information in the nature of quo warranto. The ancient writ was a purely civil proceeding, and the judgment never involved more than seizure of the franchise by the Crown. The information which took its place was a criminal proceeding, and involved fine and imprisonment, as well as the ouster of the defendant from the usurped franchise. It lost this character, however, long before the American Revolution, although the form of a criminal proceeding was retained in England until Stat. 47 & 48 Vict. chap. 61, p. 15, which provided that "proceedings in quo warranto shall be deemed to be civil proceedings whether for the purpose of appeal or otherwise." In some of the states the old form is still retained, and informations of this character are in form criminal, although in substance purely civil.

The ancient writ thus became obsolete in England, and the proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto came into use. Informations in the nature of quo warranto were either (1) such as were filed by the attorney general ex officio on behalf of the Crown, or (2) those exhibited by the master of the Crown office on the relation of some private individual. The abuse of the right which the master of the Crown office exercised, of filing such informations on his own discretion at the instance of private persons who were not named as relators, led to the enactment of Stat. 4 & 5 Wm. & Mary, chap. 18, which made it necessary for a person who desired to file such an information to obtain permission to do so from the court and enter into a recognizance for the sum of £20. Rex v. Hertford, 1 Salk. 376. This statute was restrictive in its operation, and the purpose was to restrict the powers of the master of the Crown office to vex and oppress the King's subjects. It will be noted that the act in no way restrained or restricted the power of the attorney general when acting ex officio on behalf of the general public. It related solely to proceedings sought to be instituted by the master of the Crown office at the instigation of private individuals. This is also true of the famous Stat. 9 Anne, chap. 20, the substance of which has been embodied in so many American statutes relating to the subject of quo warranto. As we have seen, the former act was restrictive, but the statute of Anne was enacted for "rendering the proceedings upon writs of mandamus and informations in the nature of a quo warranto more speedy and effectual; and for the more easy trying and determining the rights of offices in franchises . . . and boroughs." In contrasting these two statutes, Mr. Justice Wilmot, in Rex v. Trelawney, 3 Burr. 1616, said that "the two acts of Parliament (Stat. 4 & 5 Wm. & Mary, chap. 18, and Stat. 9 Anne, chap. 20) relate to quite different objects, and are the reverse of each other. The former restrains the clerk of the Crown in this court [of King's bench] from exhibiting or filing informations without leave of the court in cases where all . . . subjects might, before the making of that act, have made use of his [the King's] name without such leave. The latter lets in everybody who desires it to make use of his name in prosecuting usurpers of franchises; whereas before no subject could have done so; but it provides that these informations (as well as those for misdemeanors) must be under the leave and discretion of the court. Therefore the court ought not to give such leave without sufficient reason."

We thus find that the common law as we received it provided for the information in the nature of quo warranto in two classes of cases, and that these two classes included (1) those filed by the attorney general ex officio on behalf of the Crown, and (2) those allowed by the court to be exhibited by the master of the Crown office at the instance of a private individual. The second class includes (a) those relating to corporate franchises, which were the most numerous, and to which alone Stat. 9 Anne, chap. 20, applied, and (b) all others exhibited at the instance of private relators.

The ancient common-law writ of quo warranto was a writ of right for the King, and issued as of course at the instance of the attorney general. 4 Bl. Com. p. 309; case of Abbot of Strata Mercella, 5 Coke, 40; Rex v. Phillips, 4 Burr. 2090; Rex v. Staverton, Yelv. 190, Bulstr. 54; Whelchel v. State, 76 Ga. 647. After the ancient writ was displaced by the information in the nature of quo warranto, no one, so far as we have been able to discover, ever questioned the right of the attorney general to appear ex officio as the representative of the Crown, institute the proceedings without leave of court, and have the questions raised determined on their merits according to the laws applicable thereto. Rex v. Phillips, 3 Burr. 1565, per Lord Mansfield. The early authorities are uniformly to this effect. Thus: "Quo warranto is in the nature of a writ of right for the King, against him who usurps or claims any franchise or liberties to say by what authority he claims them." 7 Comyn's Digest, 190. "It seems to be the established practice at this day not to admit of the filing of any information (except those exhibited in the name of His Majesty's attorney general) without first making a rule on the persons complained of to show cause to the contrary." Bacon's Abr. title "Information" (d). "Informations in the nature of quo warranto," says Cole, "may be divided into two classes: (1) Information exhibited by and in the name of the attorney general ex officio, without any relator, and which are filed without leave of the court, or any recognizance being entered into; (2) informations exhibited to and in the name of the Queen's coroner and attorney . . . at the instance of a relator, or relators, which cannot in any case be filed without previous leave of the court." Cole on Information (Law Lib. vol. 46) 91, 113. "Ex officio informations are filed by the attorney general in his own name, without any relator, without leave of the court, and without any recognizance." Heard's Short, Extr. Rem. 112. "As regards the necessity of applying for leave of court before filing the information, a distinction is taken between cases where the proceedings are instituted by the attorney general, ex officio and without any relator, and cases where they are brought upon the relation of a private citizen. In the former class of cases the information is filed as of course, without leave of court; but in the latter class the information may be filed only by leave of court first had and obtained for that purpose, and the application is not granted as of course, but rests in the sound discretion of the court." High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 707.

It may be noted in passing that at common law, when the information is filed by the attorney general, no relator need be named (2 Selwyn, N. P. 9th ed. 1165, Buller, N. P. 207; Territory ex rel. Parker v. Smith, 3 Minn. 240, 74 Am. Dec. 749, Gil. 164; Bartlett v. State, 13 Kan. 99; State ex rel. Probstfield v. Sharp, 27 Minn. 38, 6 N. W. 408), and that the mention of a relator under such circumstances is merely surplusage, which will be rejected (Denison, J., in Rex v. William, 1 Burr. 408; People ex rel. Warfield v. Sutter Street R. Co. 117 Cal. 604, 49 Pac. 736). In King v. Trevenen, 2 Barn. & Ald. 479, Chief Justice Abbott said: "Where a corporation acts contrary to the franchises which have been granted to it, and invades the rights of the Crown, the attorney general of his own authority, and without any application to this court for leave, may exhibit an information against them."

Where the common-law procedure prevails either by statutory enactment or adoption by the courts, the authorities in this country uniformly sustain the right of the attorney general to the writ, when the information is filed by him in his official character as the representative of the state. In the recent case of Meehan v. Bachelder, 73 N. H. 113, 59 Atl. 620, Bingham, J., said: "The attorney general ex officio has the right to bring an information in the nature of a quo warranto to try the title to a public office, and is not compelled to ask leave of the court." In Vanatta v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 38 N. J. L. 282, Mr. Justice Dixon said: "When facts exist which, in the opinion of the attorney general, call for a quo warranto information, he has the right to present it, without leave asked of anyone. In that respect he represents the sovereignty, whose attorney he is. Such a power existed unquestionably at common law, and neither the statute of 9 Anne nor our own statute in any way abridged it. Before 9 Anne quo warranto informations were filed either by the attorney or solicitor general ex officio, or by an officer of the court under the direction of the court, at the instance of parties concerned. Such officer, in the King's bench, was the master of the Crown office. The statute of 9 Anne merely regulated the practice in some cases of this latter class, requiring the parties concerned to be named as relators and to become responsible for costs, etc. Our statute substitutes the attorney general for this master of the Crown office, and extends the range of the act; but in such case the attorney general is only nominally a party, a mere officer of the court, subject to its control. He is not there as attorney general, exercising in the cause that power which such officer had at common law, and which he still wields when he appears ex officio." In State ex rel. Miller v. Seymour, 67 N. J. L. 482, 51 Atl. 719, it was held that when the attorney general ex officio files an information in the nature of a quo warranto, the leave of court to file is not necessary. The court said: "This proceeding must be regarded as under our statute of 1795 (Gen. Stat. p. 2632), which is copied substantially from the statute of 9 Anne, chap. 20." State v. Paterson & H. Turnp. Co. 21 N. J. L. 9. And see State ex rel. Gibbs v. Somers Point, 40 N. J. L. 517, 10 Atl. 377. In State ex rel. Lloyd v. Elliott, 13 Utah, 204, 47 Pac. 248, it was said that an officer representing the state has the right to file an information as of course, without leave of court. In Com. v. Allen, 128 Mass. 308, Chief Justice Gray said: "This is an information at common law . . . for the usurpation of an office, which the attorney general has the right to file ex officio, in the name and behalf of the commonwealth, at his own discretion, and leave to file which the court has no authority to grant or withhold; and the mention of relators is mere surplussage, and does not affect the validity of the information or the form of the judgment to be rendered thereon." Atty. Gen. v. Sullivan, 163 Mass. 446, 28 L. R. A. 455, 40 N. E. 843. In Haupt v. Rogers, 170 Mass. 71, 48 N. E. 1080, the court said: "This court has no authority to direct the attorney general to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto. He is not an officer of the court, but an officer of the commonwealth, and in the performance of his official duties he is not subject to the direction of the court. In Goddard v. Smithett, 3 Gray, 116, the court explain the practice of the court of King's or Queen's bench in England in directing the master of the Crown office to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto on application of a private person. The court there says: 'But there being no corresponding office or officer in this commonwealth having authority at common law to prosecute in the name and behalf of the public, and at the same time an officer of this court and subject to its orders and directions, no corresponding practice could prevail here.' The court also says of such an information that, 'when filed by the attorney general, it is done at his own discretion, according to his own view of the rights of the government, without leave of court; nor will the court direct or advise him on the subject.'"

Quo warranto is a writ of right for the commonwealth against one who usurps or claims franchises or liberties. Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Dillon, 81 *Pa. 41; Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Walter, 83 Pa. 105, 24 Am. Rep. 154. In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Gleason, 12 Fla. 190, where the history and use of the writ of quo warranto received elaborate consideration, Mr. Justice Westcott said: "The office of attorney general is, in many respects, judicial in its character, and he is clothed with a considerable discretion. The appropriate and proper function of courts is to hear causes that the citizen of the state may see proper to institute; and there are but few cases in which they can exercise a discretion to refuse to hear them. The attorney general being intimately associated with the other departments of the government, being as well the proper legal adviser of the executive as the legislative department of the government, it is highly proper, whenever the right to a public office is to be tried, that he should be clothed with a discretion in the premises which should be exercised . . . independently of the courts in actions of this character. . . . This discretion is vested in the attorney general. If he exercises it improperly, there is another tribunal, the people, or their grand inquest, the assembly, to punish him." In Missouri it has long been the established rule that the attorney general may, ex officio, file an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto without leave of court as a matter of course. "It is the settled law of this state," said Mr. Justice Sherwood, in State ex rel. Walker v. Equitable Loan & Invest. Assn. 142 Mo. 325, 41 S. W. 916, "that such officer can, of his own motion and without leave of this court, file an information in quo warranto, and take all other subsequent and necessary steps to have such cause thus instituted passed upon and determined. State ex rel. Circuit Atty. v. Bernoudy, 36 Mo. 279; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. McAdoo, 36 Mo. 452; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Steers, 44 Mo. 223; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Rose, 84 Mo. 198; State ex rel. Brown v. Westport, 116 Mo. 605, 22 S. W. 888; State ex rel. Brown v.

Merry*, 3 Mo. 278." See also State ex rel. Crow v. Lindell R. Co. 151 Mo. 162, 52 S. W. 248; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Balcom, 71 Mo. App. 27; State ex rel. Crow v. Bland, 144 Mo. 534, 41 L. App. 146, 72 S. W. 471.

The control of the attorney general over such proceedings is recognized in State ex rel. Warner v. Agee, 105 Tenn. 588, 59 S. W. 340. See also People ex rel. Jerome v. State University, 24 Colo. 175, 49 Pac. 286, and State v. Delieseline, 1 M'Cord, L. 52. In State v. Brown, 5 R. I. 1, Chief Justice Ames said: "The information in this case was filed by the attorney general by virtue of the inherent authority of his office. . . . It is very true that in cases in which a private relator moves, as he may, to be permitted to use the name of the state for the purpose of inquiring by what warrant an individual holds and exercises a public office, the motion is subject to the regulated discretion of the court. The necessity, the policy of making the inquiry, and even the position and motives of the relator in proposing it, are all matters considered by the court, in the exercise of their discretion in granting such a motion, since a court of justice will not allow the name of the state to be used and its own time to be occupied, improperly or unnecessarily, or merely to feed the grudge of a relator who has no interest in the matter of inquiry, to the disturbance of the public peace." See Atty. Gen. ex rel. Miner v. Lorman, 59 Mich. 157, 60 Am. Rep. 287, 26 N. W. 311; Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Walter, 83 Pa. 107, 24 Am. Dec. 154 (leave necessary when the attorney general merely allows private counsel to use his name); McDonald v. Alcona County, 91 Mich. 459, 51 N. W. 1114; People ex rel. Speed v. Hartwell, 12 Mich. 522, 86 Am. Dec. 70; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Seattle Gas & Electric Co. 28 Wash. 488, 68 Pac. 946, 70 Pac. 114.

It is thus apparent that, subject to the requirements of particular statutes regulating the procedure in quo warranto, the general rule in this country is substantially that of the common law after Stat. of Anne, chap. 20. The only case to which our attention has been called which directly sustains the contention of respondent is State v. Leatherman, 38 Ark. 81, in which the court sustained a demurrer to an information exhibited by the attorney general on the ground that the state had by acquiescence lost the right to question the legal existence of the respondent corporation. It was admitted that to "apply this discretion to proceedings on the part of the state herself, without any private relator," was a departure from the general rule. Other cases cited by the respondent are not in conflict with the rule as we have stated it. Atty. Gen. v. Erie & K. R. Co. 55 Mich. 15, 20 N. W. 696, was a proceeding to forfeit the charter of a private corporation and was plainly controlled by the terms of the statute. Mr. Justice Campbell said: "The statute now in force on the subject of quo warranto requires leave before such an information is filed, and makes the granting here, as in England, discretionary." This is also true of Capital City Water Co. v. State, 105 Ala. 406, 29 L. R. A. 743, 18 So. 62. In Lamoreaux v. Ellis, 89 Mich. 146, 50 N. W. 812, the court exercised the power to require the attorney general to set the machinery of the law in motion, and upon a proper and prima facie showing to file an information in the nature of quo warranto to test the right of an incumbent to the office of sheriff. A similar control over the attorney general's discretion in permitting such proceeding to be instituted was exercised by the court in State ex rel. Dowdall v. Dahl, 69 Minn. 108, 71 N. W. 910. But these cases both arose on the attempt of a private citizen to induce the attorney general to act. They were instances of the class over which the courts have exercised discretionary control ever since the statute of Anne was enacted. That the Lamoreaux Case falls within this class clearly appears from the quotation there made from Vrooman v. Michie, 69 Mich. 42, 36 N. W. 749, where the court said: "Courts can never act, unless upon some reasonable showing; and, as it is contrary to public policy to allow persons to be needlessly annoyed by vexatious claims, the statute which has long existed in England, while it allows the public representative, who is the attorney general or some other high official, to proceed ex officio, does not, as construed, permit a relator to proceed without exacting a very precise and positive showing." State ex rel. Walker v. McLean County, 11 N. D. 356, 92 N. W. 385, also grew out of a contest between the attorney general and a private relator. State ex rel. West v. Des Moines, 96 Iowa, 521, 31 L. R. A. 186, 59 Am. St. Rep. 381, 65 N. W. 818, was brought upon the relation of an individual. People ex rel. Warfield v. Sutter Street R. Co. 117 Cal. 604, 49 Pac. 736, arose upon an information filed by the attorney general upon the relation of a private person, and it was held that the attorney general could not thereafter himself dismiss the proceedings without an order of court.

The distinction between proceedings by the attorney general and those sought to be commenced by private relators being thus clearly defined at common law, both before and after the statute of Anne, it remains to be seen whether the common-law practice has been changed by the statutes and decisions of this state. A careful examination leads us to the conclusion that the common-law procedure, but slightly modified, prevails in this jurisdiction. Article 6, § 2, of the state Constitution confers original jurisdiction upon the supreme court "in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law." For the purpose of giving effect to this provision, the legislature enacted a statute (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 63, § 1; Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4823) which recites that "the supreme court has power to issue writs of error, certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, . . . subject to such regulations and conditions as the court may prescribe." In State ex rel. Probstfeld v. Sharp, 27 Minn. 39, 6 N. W. 408, it was held that proceedings under this statute are governed by the rules of the common law. "This," said Mr. Justice Berry, "is a proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto under Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 63, § 1. It is not the action provided for in chapter 79 of said statutes, and the provisions of that chapter are not per se applicable to it. In the absence of any legislation or controlling considerations to the contrary, it follows that, as respects procedure, it is governed by common-law rules. . . . High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 629, 712, and cases cited: 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 717, 722; 5 Wait. Pr. 615; People ex rel. Moses v. Pease, 30 Barb. 588-591." See also Territory ex rel. Wade v. Ashenfelter, 4 N. M. 93, 12 Pac. 879; State ex rel. Dunlap v. Stewart, 6 Houst. (Del.) 372. In State ex rel. Wetzel v. Tracy, 48 Minn. 497, 51 N. W. 613, Mr. Justice Vanderburgh says: "The term 'quo warranto,' used in that section [referring to the statute], must be deemed to refer to 'an information in the nature of quo warranto' as existing at the common law;" citing State v. West Wisconsin R. Co. 34 Wis. 197, 208, 213.

Chapter 79, Gen. Stat. 1878 (§§ 5961-5973, Gen. Stat. 1894), provides for another remedy, which somewhat enlarges the functions of the common-law action and embodies some of the features of quo warranto informations. It is a civil action, and not a special proceeding. It provides that the attorney general may, in the name of the state, bring an action (1) for vacating the charter or annulling the existence of a corporation, other than municipal, whenever such corporation offends in certain ways, and (2) for the purpose of annulling and vacating certain letters patent granted by the state under certain conditions. It also provides for the bringing of an action in the name of the state by the attorney general, on his own information or on the complaint of a private party, against the party offending in the following cases: (1) When any person usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises any public office or franchise within this state, or (2) any office in the corporation created by the authority of this state, or (3) when any public officer has done or suffered any act which by the provisions of law cause a forfeiture of his office, or (4) when any association or number of persons act within this state as a corporation without being duly incorporated; and the attorney general may bring the action whenever he has reason to believe that any of these acts can be proved. It is further provided that, when an action is brought by the attorney general, by virtue of this chapter, on the complaint or information of any person having an interest in the question, the name of such person shall be joined with the state as plaintiff. This statute does not expressly provide that the attorney general shall obtain leave of court to bring the action; but it is apparent that the statute embodies some of the provisions of the statute of Anne, and the court has adopted a practice very similar to that in force in the English courts and in various states of the Union under that act.

A proceeding under chapter 63, § 1, Gen. Stat. 1878 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4823), is the common-law information in the nature of quo warranto, as it was known and used in England after the enactment of Stat. 9 Anne, chap. 20, and long before the date when English statutes were embodied in the common law which became a part of the law of this country in 1776. This common law clearly distinguished between proceedings by the attorney general ex officio and proceedings on the relation of a private person with the consent of the attorney general.

Turning, now, to the decisions of this court, we find the same distinction clearly recognized in all the cases. Territory ex rel. Parker v. Smith, 3 Minn. 140, 74 Am. Dec. 749, Gil. 164, was a proceeding under Rev. Stat. 1851, at a time when the writ of quo warranto and information in the nature of quo warranto did not exist in this jurisdiction. State ex rel. Lindholm v. Parker, 25 Minn. 215, was an action under chapter 79, instituted by the attorney general, on behalf of the state, on the relation of a private citizen, to oust the respondent from an office. State ex rel. Probstfeld v. Sharp, 27 Minn. 38, 6 N. W. 408, was instituted under chapter 63, on the relation of a private individual, with the approval of the attorney general. It was not instituted by the attorney general ex officio; but the court recognized his general control over the proceedings. In reference to the suggestion that the relator had acquiesced in the proceedings, and was therefore estopped to proceed, Mr. Justice Berry said: "The answer to this is that it is the attorney general who has instituted and who is conducting the proceeding as the law officer of the state,—the representative, not of the relator, but of the government. It is for him to determine whether the public good requires him to proceed. . . . Notwithstanding any conduct of the party at whose instance he moves, if there is any case in which his determination would be overruled, it must certainly be a very extraordinary one, and not such a case as this." The case belongs to the class, well known at common law and provided for by the statute of Anne, in which the control of the proceedings is intrusted very largely to the court. In State ex rel. Hahn v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 35 Minn. 222, 28 N. W. 245, the question of the original jurisdiction of the supreme court in quo warranto proceedings was raised and determined. The court said: "As between the remedy in this court by quo warranto and that by action in the district court, it is for the attorney general, to whom the interests of the state in such cases are intrusted, to determine which he will pursue." State ex rel. Clapp v. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. 40 Minn. 213, 3 L. R. A. 510, 41 N. W. 1020, was upon an information in the nature of quo warranto filed by the attorney general ex officio. It was contended by the respondent that the attorney general had filed a disclaimer of any interest in the proceedings. Mr. Justice Mitchell said: "An inspection of the statement filed by him will show that it will bear no such construction. As such proceedings are in the nature of a public prosecution, having for their object the recovery to the state of a usurped or fortified franchise, and not to redress private grievances, no one but the attorney general has authority to institute or prosecute them; it being exclusively for him to determine when public interests require them to be instituted. Therefore, had he moved to dismiss, as he had the undoubted right to do, or had he stated that this was not a case which public interests required to be prosecuted, we would undoubtedly have dismissed, notwithstanding objections by private parties. But the attorney general having done neither, and the information being filed by him in his official capacity, this court did the only thing it could do under the circumstances, viz., to entertain the proceedings 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and determine them according to law." State ex rel. Simpson v. Dowlan, 33 Minn. 530, 24 N. W. 188, was an application by a private relator for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto. The application was denied. "We are also agreed," said Chief Justice Gilfillan, "that the granting of leave to file an information (especially upon the application of a private person) is within the discretion of the court, and that leave ought not to be granted where the law furnishes another remedy, unless under special and exceptional circumstances." This general statement must, of course, be read in the light of the facts of the case there under consideration. In State ex rel. Wetzel v. Tracy, 48 Minn. 497, 51 N. W. 613, the proceedings were instituted by a private relator in the name of the state with the consent of the attorney general. The object was to test the right of the respondent corporation to exercise the corporate franchise. It was held that the writ would not lie for such a purpose at the instance of a private party, that it must be presented and subscribed by the attorney general on behalf of the state, and that it was not enough that it was prosecuted with his formal approval. State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Lockerby, 57 Minn. 411, 59 N. W. 495, and State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Otis, 58 Minn. 275, 59 N. W. 1015, were both cases in which private relators sought to use the name of the state to have determined private rights, in which the state was but remotely concerned. In State ex rel. Dowdall v. Dahl, 69 Minn. 108, 71 N. W. 910, an appeal by a private person, with no special interest, for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto, was denied because the attorney general had refused to give his consent. See Pound v. Atty. Gen. 119 Mich. 528, 78 N. W. 541, for a similar proceeding. State ex rel. Dowdall v. Dahl, supra, State ex rel. Probstfield v. Sharp, supra, and other such cases, show that, while the court always gives great consideration to the views of the attorney general, it exercises discretionary power over the matter of allowing the information to be filed and the writ to issue when the right to be determined affects individuals only and the attorney general does not appear ex officio. In State ex rel. Bell v. Moriarty, 82 Minn. 68, 84 N. W. 495, the petition was signed by the attorney general, but was presented to the court by the attorney for the private relator. The court said: "Ordinarily, when the attorney general asks that the writ issue, we assume, unless the contrary appears from an inspection of the information, that public interests require that the writ issue. This is due to him as the head of the legal department of the state, charged with the duty of representing the interests of the state before this court. But where, as in this case, the application for the writ is made by the attorney of the relator, the attorney general consenting, but not participating, it is our duty upon our own motion to scrutinize the petition and deny the writ, unless it affirmatively appears from allegations of the petition that public interests require that it be issued."

The principle is thus firmly established in this state that the granting or withholding of leave to file an information at the instance of a private relator, or of a private relator with the consent of the attorney general, to test the right to an office or franchise, rests in the sound discretion of the court to which the application is made, even though there is a substantial defect in the title by which the office or franchise is held. High, Extr. Harrison v. Mineral Marsh Drainage District*, 193 Ill. 428, 62 N. E. 225. The information in the nature of quo warranto, as it exists in Minnesota, is thus substantially that known in England after the enactment of Stat. 9 Anne, chap. 20. State ex rel. Clapp v. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. 40 Minn. 213, 225, 3 L. R. A. 510, 41 N. W. 1020. Atty. Gen. v. Gleason*, 12 Fla. 217.

It follows that the trial court erroneously dismissed these proceedings. The information was exhibited by the attorney general in his official capacity as the principal law officer of the state in a proceeding brought by the state to require a municipal corporation to show cause why its pretended incorporation should not be declared illegal and void. Upon the presentation of the information containing allegations sufficient to make a prima facie case, the court should have ordered the writ to issue as of course, and thereafter determined the issues of law and fact upon the merits as in ordinary proceedings.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

MICHAEL C. BRADY, Appt.,

v.

ADAM GILMAN, Respt.

(.... Minn.)

1. Redemption from foreclosure—creditor—notice.

The plaintiff filed a notice of his intention to redeem from a mortgage foreclosure sale as a judgment creditor, but his judgment was not docketed until four hours after his notice was filed. He attempted to redeem by virtue of such notice. Held, that he was not entitled to redeem, and his attempt to do so was void.

2. Notice—fractions of day.

The legal fiction that there are no fractions of a day has no application to cases where the statute expressly requires that notice shall be taken of the precise time an official act is done, and that a record thereof be made.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County in favor of defendant in an action brought Headnotes by START, Ch. J.

Case Note.—As is said in Maine v. Gilman, 11 Fed. 214, the ancient maxim that the law knows no fractions of a day is now chiefly known by its exceptions. Although the decisions are not uniform as to the extent to which such exceptions are admitted, the courts are in agreement as to the doctrine on which they are based.

In Combe v. Pitt, 3 Burr. 1434, Lord Mansfield observed: "But, though the law does not in general allow of the fraction of a day, yet it admits it in cases where it is necessary to distinguish. And I do not see why the very hour may not be so too, where it is necessary and can be done; for it is not like a mathematical point, which cannot be divided."

And it was said by Justice Story in Re Richardson, 2 Story, 577, that the rule that in law there is no fraction of a day is a mere legal fiction, and is never allowed to operate against the right and justice of a case.

When necessary to determine conflicting rights, courts of justice will take cognizance of the fractions of a day. Louisville v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 104 U. S. 469, 26 L. ed. 775.

Fractions of a day in statutes, or legal proceedings, or in contracts, are not generally considered; but, when the rights of parties depend upon the precedence of time in the same day, or upon a given hour or fraction of a day, it may be alleged or proved, as any other fact. Benson v. Adams, 69 Ind. 353, 35 Am. Rep. 220.

In computing time, fractions of a day are to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles E. Bond and M. C. Brady, for appellant:

All that the defendant is in a position to exact from a subsequent redeeming party is a repayment of the money due to him.

not as a rule considered, unless made material by the statute controlling the rights in litigation.

In Seaman v. Eager, 16 Ohio St. 209, it was held that where, by the terms of the statute, the time of receiving a chattel mortgage for record must be indorsed by the clerk, the time for refileing is to be computed from the hour at which the original filing was done.

The hour when an attachment was made, and the hour when bankruptcy proceedings were instituted, are to be taken into account in determining whether or not the attachment was made within four months of the commencement of proceedings. Westbrook Mfg. Co. v. Grant, 60 Me. 88, 11 Am. Rep. 181.

Where a statute provides that "every Saturday after 12 o'clock, noon," shall be a holiday, such half days are to be excluded in computing time for taking an appeal under a statute excluding holidays from the number of days specified. Ocuppaugh v. Norton, 24 App. D. C. 296, 68 L. R. A. 272.

In Lewis's Sutherland on Statutory Construction, 2d ed. § 179, it is said, in reference to the rule that, where it is necessary to justice, the law takes notice of the parts of the day: "This necessity exists when an act is done on the same day that a legislative act is passed, if that statute, being passed afterwards, should not affect such act, or, being passed before, should do so."

The hour at which an act repealing a bankruptcy law was approved, is to be considered in determining whether a petition in bankruptcy, filed on the same day, is within the saving clause of such repealing act. Re Richardson, 2 Story, 571; Re Ankrim, 3 McLean, 285, Fed. Cas. No. 395; Contra, Re Welman, 20 Vt. 655.

Where an election was held on the same day that the law under which it was held was repealed, the court will determine whether the repealing act became effective, by approval, before or after such election. People ex rel. Campbell v. Clark, 1 Cal. 406.

The courts will determine whether a vote to issue railroad-aid bonds was taken before the closing of the polls of an election, held on the same day, at which a Constitution was adopted prohibiting such ac-

Where a statute governing the right of appeal goes into effect upon its publication, the court will determine the hour of such publication in passing upon an appeal taken that day. Leavenworth Coal Co. v. Barber, 47 Kan. 29, 27 Pac. 114.

It is said in First Nat. Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 686, 25 L. ed. 766: "For most purposes, the law regards the entire day as an indivisible unit. But when the priority of one legal right over another, depending upon the order of events occurring on the same day, is involved, this rule is necessarily departed from."

Prima facie, the presumption of law is that the several acts or steps in the course of a legal proceeding take place in the order necessary to give them legal effect. But, whenever an inquiry into the priority of acts, on the same day, becomes necessary in order to protect the rights of parties, the ordinary presumption must give way to the facts of the case. Knowlton v. Culver, 2 Pinney (Wis.) 243, 52 Am. Dec. 156.

It was held in Wallace v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 27 App. Div. 457, 50 N. Y. Supp. 329, that a notice of trial, which may be served after the joinder of issue, is premature when served on the same day, but some hours before the answer is served.

Cognizance will be taken of the hour of each act in determining whether a motion to reduce the ad damnum of a writ to an amount which would preclude removal of a suit was granted before the filing on the same day of a bond for removal. Maine v. Gilman, supra.

So, also, the court will determine which of two suits based on one cause of action was first brought, where both were instituted on the same day (Johnson v. Pennington, 15 N. J. L. 188. Contra, Middlebrook v. Travis, 68 Hun. 155, 22 N. Y. Supp. 672): whether a suit in replevin, brought on the same day, was commenced before the cause of action arose (Knowlton v. Culver, 2 Pinney [Wis.] 243, 1 Chand. [Wis.] 214, 52 Am. Dec. 156); whether civil process was served upon the defendant before his conviction for felony, which took place on the same day, whereby he became, during the without a jury. The district court of the county of Hennepin, in which the action was pending, as a conclusion of law based upon its findings of fact, directed judgment on the merits for the defendant. It was so entered, and the plaintiff appealed from the judgment.

The question for our decision is whether the conclusion of law and judgment are supported by the findings of fact. The short facts found by the court are these: On October 7, 1903, the premises in question were duly sold on the foreclosure by advertisement of a mortgage, which was the first lien thereon, to Nathan M. Barnes, mortgagee. On October 1, 1904, another mortgage on the premises, which was the second lien thereon, was duly made to the defendant herein, and duly recorded on October 5, 1904. On the next day the defendant filed a notice in due form and substance of his intention to redeem as such mortgagee the premises from the sale on the foreclosure of the first mortgage. No redemption was made by the mortgagors, and on October 12, 1904, the defendant, as such junior mortgagee, redeemed the premises from the foreclosure sale. The usual certificate of redemption was issued to him and duly recorded on the same day. On October 6, 1904, the plaintiff secured from one of the mortgagors in the first mortgage a con-term of his imprisonment, civilly dead (Neale v. Utz, 75 Va. 480).

In apparent conflict with the last-cited case, but in harmony with the rule that fractions of a day will be considered where justice demands it, is the decision in Mitchell v. Schoonover, 16 Or. 211, 8 Am. St. Rep. 282, 17 Pac. 867, where it was held that the death of the defendant at a previous hour cannot be shown to defeat a judgment rendered on the same day.

The courts will take notice of fractions of a day, for the purpose of determining priority of appointment, as between receivers. Worth v. Piedmont Bank, 121 N. C. 343, 28 S. E. 488; People v. Central City Bank, 53 Barb. 412.

In Lang v. Phillips, 27 Ala. 311, it was said that the doctrine that the law does not take account of the fractions of a day "does not apply to statutes which, as between different acts, give a preference or priority to the one which is first done."

In discussing the question whether the courts will regard fractions of days in determining the precedence of judgment liens between one another, it is said in Freeman on Judgments, 4th ed. § 370: "It seems to be well settled . . . that, unless the law provides for fractions of days, all judgments entered on the same day will be regarded as if entered at the same time, and as creating liens equal in point of priority, and entitled to be paid pro rata out of the debtor's real estate. Still, this rule does not prevail universally. In many instances courts have inquired, even as between different judgments, the precise time when they were rendered or docketed, and decided that the law will take notice of fractions of days in the contests between creditors seeking to have funds realized from the sale of lands applied in satisfaction of their judgment liens."

The hour will be regarded, in determining the precedence of judgments entered on the same day (Biggam v. Merritt, Walk. [Miss.] 430, 12 Am. Dec. 576); where priority is given by statute to the one first registered (German Security Bank v. Campbell, 99 Ala. 249, 42 Am. St. Rep. 55, 12 So. 436), or where the statute requires the notation of the time of receipt by the clerk (Bates v. Hinsdale, 65 N. C. 423).

In Clute v. Clute, 4 Denio, 241, it was said, obiter, that the court would determine the priority of executions placed in the hands of the sheriff on the same day.

As to whether, between mortgages and judgments entered on the same day, a fraction of a day will be considered, the decisions are in conflict. That it will be considered, has been held in, inter alia, Goetzinger v. Rosenfeld, 16 Wash. 392, 38 L. R. A. 257, 47 Pac. 882. Contra, Claason's Appeal, 22 Pa. 359.

As between a deed recorded and a lien acquired by rendition of judgment or issuance of execution, the courts will consider fractions of a day. Murfree v. Carmack, 4 Yerg. 270, 26 Am. Dec. 232; Clark v. Duke, 59 Miss. 575; Metts v. Bright, 20 N. C. 311 (4 Dev. & B. L. 173) 32 Am. Dec. 683.

The courts will also determine the precedence of attachments levied, or lodged in the sheriff's office, on the same day. Tufts v. Carradine, 3 La. Ann. 430; Brainard v. Bushnell, 11 Conn. 16; Callahan v. Hallowell, 2 Bay, 8.

Fractions of a day have been considered in determining whether an offer to deliver was seasonably made, where, by the terms of the contract, the offer was to be made "by the first half of August" (Grosvenor v. Magill, 37 Ill. 239); whether an auctioneer made the memorandum required by the statute of frauds "at the time of the sale" (Graig v. Godfroy, 1 Cal. 415, 54 Am. Dec. 299); whether a garnishment was made before or after an assignment of his contract by the garnishee (Malvin v. Sweitzer, 1 Kulp, 5); whether a set-off was acquired before the execution of an assignment for creditors (Collins v. McKee, 44 Phila. Leg. Int. 167); whether a lease was executed previously to a mortgage (Lockett v. Hill, 1 Woods, 552, Fed. Cas. No. 8,443); whether a check deposited was covered by a guaranty of sums thereafter to be held against the depositor, made the same day (First Nat. Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 686, 25 L. ed. 766); or which of two sales made the same day was first, where the right to an easement depended upon it (Maynard v. Esher, 17 Pa. 222).

fession of judgment in his favor in the sum of $25, and in the afternoon of that day and before 12:20 o'clock delivered it to the clerk of the district court and requested him to enter and docket it forthwith, which the clerk promised to do. There is no showing at what hour of the day last named the judgment was entered in the judgment book in the clerk's office; but the judgment docket does show that the plaintiff's judgment was not docketed until the hour of 5 o'clock of that day. On the same day, and at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., the plaintiff filed in the office of the register of deeds a notice in proper form stating his intention as a judgment creditor to redeem the premises from the foreclosure sale. On the following October 17th the plaintiff attempted to redeem the premises as such judgment creditor, and did all things necessary to make a valid redemption, save and except that the only notice of his intention to redeem was one filed four hours before his judgment was docketed. Thereupon the usual certificate of redemption was made and delivered to the plaintiff, which was recorded the next day. On March 15th following, on application of the plaintiff and consent of the judgment debtor, the district court of the county of Hennepin ordered the clerk to amend the docket entry so as to show that plaintiff's judgment was docketed at 12:30 o'clock p. m., October 6, 1904, and, further, that the judgment, after such change is made in the record, shall have the same force and effect as if it had been docketed at 12:30 o'clock p. m., provided that the rights of third persons shall not be affected by the order.

Was the plaintiff's attempted redemption of the premises valid? This is the sole question presented by the record, and we answer it in the negative. The attempted amendment of the docketing of the plaintiff's judgment is not relevant here, for the rights of the defendant were not affected by the action of the court to which he was not a party. Every clerk of the district court is required to keep a docket, in which he shall enter alphabetically the name of each judgment debtor, the amount of the judgment, and the precise time of his entry. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 861. The judgment becomes a lien on the unexempted land of the judgment debtor only from the time of so docketing it. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5425. A creditor having a junior lien, legal or equitable, on mortgaged premises may redeem from a foreclosure sale thereof, provided he files notice of his intention to do so within the year allowed for redemption. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Gen. Stat. 1894, § 6044. It is a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of such creditor to redeem that he file a notice of his intention to do so, and to entitle him to give the notice he must have a lien on the premises at the time he files his notice. Therefore a notice of an intention so to redeem, filed by an intended redemptioner before he is in fact a lien creditor, is void, even though by the docketing of his judgment he afterwards becomes such creditor before the year to redeem expires. Maurin v. Carnes, 71 Minn. 308, 74 N. W. 139.

The plaintiff contends that the trial court found that there was no evidence showing at what hour the judgment was docketed, and does not find that it was not docketed until the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. What the court did find was that there was no evidence showing at what time the judgment was entered in the judgment book, but that the docket book did show that the judgment was not docketed until 5 o'clock p. m. The clerk was required by law to enter the precise time of the docketing, and he is presumed to have done his duty. The necessary inference from the finding is the ultimate fact that the judgment was not docketed until the hour named.

It is also urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant cannot question the validity of the redemption, for the reason that all he was entitled to was the amount paid by him to redeem from the mortgage foreclosure sale and the amount of his own lien, with interest; all of which was paid by the plaintiff to the sheriff when he attempted to redeem. Such is not the law, for the defendant, by his redemption, was subrogated to the rights of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, and thereby obtained the right to acquire the absolute title to the premises, unless redeemed within the time allowed by law, by one having the legal right so to do. Hughes v. Olson, 74 Minn. 237, 73 Am. St. Rep. 343, 77 N. W. 42.

The last contention of the plaintiff to be considered is that the law does not take notice of fractions or parts of a day; hence the judgment must be deemed to have been docketed at the time the notice of intention to redeem was filed, both acts having been done on the same day. The legal fiction that there are no fractions of a day has no application to cases like this one, where the statute, to avoid confusion, expressly requires that notice shall be taken of the precise time an official act is done and that a record thereof be made.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Resp't.,
v.

C. D. CRAWFORD, Appt.

(.... Minn.)

1. Appeal—review—evidence elicited by juror.

Where questions improper in form are asked of and answered by a witness in a criminal case, and no objection is made nor exception taken, no error is saved which is subject to review by an appellate court as a matter of right; and if such inquiries are made by a jurymen with the court's permission, failure of the court to interpose objections is not necessarily reversible error.

2. New trial—errors of law.

In criminal cases, the granting or refusing of a new trial for errors of law should not be determined by mere technical conformity with, or infringement of, rules of practice and evidence.

3. Same—when granted.

New trials should be granted only when the substantial rights of the accused have been so violated as to make it reasonably clear that a fair trial was not had.

4. Homicide—crime established—new trial refused.

The defendant in this case was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and was sentenced to be hanged for the murder of a fellow traveler in a box car, while the accused and another were engaged in holding up the murdered man and other inmates of that car. The principal assignment of error was based upon questions asked by a juror of a witness, with the court's permission, involving a conclusion or opinion as to whether the accused stepped aside to take aim at his victim, to which no objection was made and no exception was taken. Four eyewitnesses to the shooting testified, without attack, impeachment, or inconsistency, to every detail of the homicide. The revolver which fired the bullet and the bullet which was taken from the brain of the dead man were produced, identified, and connected with the accused. He himself took the stand in his own defense and admitted the robbery and shooting, but denied intent to kill. Under such circumstances, a new trial is refused and the judgment affirmed.

Case Note.—Very little is to be found in the decisions or law books of any kind with respect to the right or propriety of inquiries by jurymen of witnesses. While the court in the above case takes a strong position against reversing convictions in criminal cases for technical errors of no vital consequence, it distinctly holds that there was in this case no error, technical or otherwise, in permitting a juror to ask a question of a witness to which no objection was made in the trial court, though it admits that there might be cases in which it would be an abuse of discretion in the court to permit questions by jurors, and in which it would be the more orderly practice for the court to ascertain the point of the juror's inquiry, and then see that it is properly formulated and asked by counsel.

In the few cases in which such questions of witnesses by jurors have been discussed and passed upon they have generally been held proper, or, at least, free from prejudice. Thus, in North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Burgess, 94 Ill. App. 337, where misconduct of one of the jurors was alleged in entering into a colloquy with counsel and asking questions of witnesses, the court said: "While the juror assumed a duty which did not belong to him, still there is nothing which shows that he had become incompetent to discharge his duty as juror, though he does appear to have been over-officious and inclined to be disputatious. But we find no objection made by counsel for appellant at the time to the juror's interference. It is too late to raise the objection for the first time on motion for a new trial, having taken, without objection, the chances of a favorable verdict."

Similar language was used in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Harper, 128 Ill. 384, 21 N. E. 561, where the court said: "While the juror, in his attempt to examine a witness, assumed a duty which did not belong to him, and which perhaps ought to have been checked by the court at the outset, still there is nothing in the nature of the questions which disclosed the fact that the juror had become incompetent to discharge his duty as a juror." It was therefore held that there was no error in denying a motion to exclude him from the panel.

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Krueger, 124 Ill. 457, 17 N. E. 52, complaint was made of prejudice on the part of the juror, to which the court said: "This complaint is founded entirely upon manifestations of alleged prejudice exhibited by the juror during the progress of the trial, in his cross-examination of witnesses. However this may be, we do not find therein ground for reversing the judgment."

More unqualified approval of such inquiries by jurors was expressed in Schaefer v. St. Louis & Suburban R. Co. 128 Mo. 64, 30 S. W. 331, where questions were asked of witnesses by jurors, as well as by the court, in their endeavor to properly understand the facts in evidence. The court said: "We do not see how this could have possibly been prejudicial to the plaintiff, and do not see why it was not a commendable thing in both the court and the jury endeavoring to ascertain just exactly the situation at the time of the injury, so that they could properly determine the case before them. In fact, the objection is rather a novel one, coming from the plaintiff."

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ernest S. Cary and Charles S. Wheaton, for appellant:

It was the duty of the court, in its sound discretion, with regard to the rights of the defendant, to determine whether or not the questions were proper and competent questions, before allowing the same to be submitted to the witness, and not allow incompetent questions to be asked witness.

The accused, C. D. Crawford, jointly indicted with one George R. Palmer for murder in the first degree, was convicted on separate trial, and was sentenced to be hanged. On application of his counsel, a stay of execution was granted. The case comes before this court upon an appeal from the judgment of the trial court. The assignments of error are twenty-three in number. Upon argument in this court, counsel for the accused expressly waived all except the one to which reference will especially be made hereafter. A brief statement of the facts in this case is essential to the proper understanding of the questions thus raised. Crawford and his codefendant, Palmer, knew each other before the night of the murder. Crawford had been in the Army and was familiar with the handling of firearms. He and Palmer, together with five other young men,—Lundin, Freeman, Bjorquist, Conradson, and Kenner,—were riding together on a freight train, in a combination mail and baggage car, with the consent of a brakeman. Crawford, testifying on his own behalf, confirms the narrative of the other eyewitnesses in almost all essential particulars. In substantially his own language, the tragedy occurred as follows: He had said to Palmer, while they were on the car: "Let's hold them up." Palmer replied: "All right; I've a flash light." He passed the light over to Crawford, who then had both the light and a revolver. Palmer found a club in the car. "They each knew what each of them had to do, and what he had to do in order to make this hold-up effective." Crawford held the flash light in his left hand on the heads and faces of the men, "on one and then the other," and followed the light with his revolver in his right hand. Palmer flourished his club. Both Crawford and Palmer cried out: "Throw up your hands!" Although no one offered any resistance, Crawford fired one shot in the air just to "scare" the prospective victims. At the rear end of the car was a sorting table, about 5 feet long and 4 feet wide. Lundin and Bjorquist had lain down on it and had gone to sleep, each lying on his right side, each with his face to the front end of the car. Bjorquist awoke, got off the table, and held up his hands. Lundin remained on the table. After the first shot was fired, Lundin, lying with one hand in his overcoat pocket, did not get up; but, when Palmer tried to waken him, it seemed to Crawford "as if he kind of raised up a little." Palmer then stepped away and, according to Crawford, said to Crawford, "Wake him up;" according to all other eyewitnesses, "Shoot the sun of a bitch." Crawford, then only a few feet away from Lundin, passed the light backward and forward and followed the light with the revolver. He "shot the revolver immediately after Palmer said 'Wake him up.'" He said: "I was standing, more or less standing still at that time, but just then the cars—just as he said 'Wake him up,'—the cars jerked. I had the revolver like this [illustrating], and just as he said 'Wake him up' the train jerked, and I stepped forward. It threw me forward and brought the revolver down like that [illustrating] just as the cars jerked, and just as I went forward the gun went off, and I noticed that the man on the table kind of quivered. I noticed that he did not get up."

The witnesses indicated the way in which Crawford held the flash light in his left hand, so that the light fell on Lundin's face, and the gun in his right hand. He raised or moved up his arm when he was getting ready to shoot Lundin. Conradson testified, without objection, that Crawford "moved it [the flash light] up like this and took aim. He did not take a very long aim, but he brought it up to his eye." Without objection, Kenner testified at one place "that Crawford just took deliberate aim and fired." At another place, in answer to the question, "Did you mark that as the place where he was standing at the time the first shot was fired?" he said, "No, sir; I don't think so, and, if I did, I was mistaken, because he stepped over there at the time he fired the second shot, so that he would have a chance to get a line on his [Lundin's] face." The two defendants then proceeded to rob their four living companions. When they came to the dead man, Palmer seems to have hesitated; but Crawford said: "You need not be afraid of him. He is dead. Dead men tell no tales." Thereupon Palmer robbed the body, taking from it, among other things, a watch. Having taken everything they could find, Palmer said: "We are having damned poor luck this fall," or "damned poor picking this fall." Crawford thereafter ordered Conradson to open the car door, and Palmer said: "We are through with you fellows. Climb out of there." The men in the car proceeded to obey. One of them got out of the car just as the rapidly moving train was about to go over a bridge. He waited until the bridge was passed and then jumped. The others followed. None were seriously hurt. The two defendants stayed on the train some time longer, then left it and went to the shores of a river where they divided the "swag" or "junk" as Crawford describes it. This included the watch which was taken from the body of the dead man and identified by his father, the jeweler who sold it, and otherwise, and which was found in Crawford's possession when he was arrested.

Toward the close of the case of the state there occurred the only matter which is now properly before us upon assignment of error.

The record reads: By one of the jurors:

Q. I would like the witness a question to ask.

The court: You may ask it.

Q. Mr. Conradson, you say that after he the first shot did fire, and before he did the second shot fire, he did to one side step?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, I would like to ask you if your best judgment is if he, after he the first shot did fire, and before he did the second shot fire, he did to one side step that he might the better aim take?

A. Yes, sir; so that he could see Lundin's face better and get out of our line and get a better view of Lundin.

Q. And you say that he careful aim did take?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then did you hear the report?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, then, after you the report did hear, did you right away know that Lundin was hit?

A. No, sir.

Q. How long after you the report did hear before you knew that the man on the table sleeping was hit?

A. I didn't know that he was hit. I knew that he didn't get up, and I thought he must be shot. That is all I knew about it.

Counsel for the accused insists that it is the duty of the court, in its sound discretion, to allow the juror to ask any proper and competent question, but it was likewise the duty of the court, in its sound discretion, with regard to the rights of the defendant, to determine whether or not the questions were proper and competent questions before allowing the same to be submitted to the witness, and not to allow incompetent questions to be asked, and that failure to object to this question involving the opinion of this witness was error. In support of this he cites typical authorities to the effect that it is a well-established principle that the rejection of competent and material evidence, or the reception of incompetent and improper evidence, which is harmful to the defendant and excepted to, present an error requiring reversal. Such a ruling affects the substantial rights of the defendant, even though the appellate court would, with the rejected evidence before it, or with the improper evidence excluded, still come to the same conclusion reached by the jury. The defendant has the right to insist that material and legal evidence offered by him shall be received and submitted to the jury, and to have illegal and improper evidence, which may be harmful, excluded, and have the opinion of the jury upon proper evidence admitted in the case, and upon such evidence only. People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 249, 27 N. E. 362; People v. Greenwall, 108 N. Y. 296, 2 Am. St. Rep. 415, 15 N. E. 404. As was said by Earl, J., in the latter case: "A person on trial for his life is entitled to all the advantages which the laws give him, and among them is the right to have his case submitted to an impartial jury upon competent evidence." Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 164, 13 Am. Rep. 492; People v. Corey, 148 N. Y. 476, 42 N. E. 1066.

We are satisfied that, as a matter of strict technical construction, there is no error in this record entitling the accused to a new trial as a matter of right. Essentially the same matters as those here objected to had been previously testified to without objection or exception, as appears from the statement of testimony previously made, and were not assigned as error here. No objection was made to the question asked by the jurymen, nor to the admission of the testimony in answer, nor was any motion made to strike it out, nor was any exception taken in any way thereto. Accordingly, assuming that the questions and testimony have all the legal faults counsel for the accused contends for, and that the decision of this case is to be rested upon technical rules, the appeal must fail. Saving Questions for Review, 2 Current Law, 1590. And see Id. 1594, et seq. That the inquiries were made by a jurymen with the court's permission did not necessarily impose upon the trial judge the duty of conducting the defense by interposing objections based upon their not very improper form, because objections by his counsel might prejudice the defendant. We do not hold that the court's discretion in this regard might not be abused upon a different state of facts. There are cases in which it would be the more orderly practice for the trial court, in its discretion, to ask the jurymen to indicate the point of his inquiry, and then to see that the question is properly formulated, as by directing counsel to put it, so as to afford the usual opportunity for objection and exception. Indeed, there is ordinarily no occasion for a jurymen to interrogate a witness. In the instant case, however, no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court and no reversible error appears in this matter.

The decision in this case, however, is not based upon compliance or noncompliance with technical rules of practice or evidence. Such rules are primarily different from the constitutional guaranties, without the strict observance of which punishment, even by a properly constituted court, is little better than the punishment by a mob. Matters of mere procedure, however, have no such sanctity. When a court exercises its traditional power to regulate a trial, to pass on the competency, materiality, or sufficiency of evidence, or the propriety of the form of a question, and to revise the action of a jury, it violates no constitutional right; nor does it when it confirms the verdict of a jury. Rules of practice and evidence are primarily designed to secure the orderly administration of the laws of the land. They serve their purpose so far as, and only so far as, they conduce to a fair trial. But, instead of serving as a means of securing justice, they have been made to usurp dominion, as if their observance were the end to be attained. Decisions of many courts have determined controversies concerning them as if they were the constitutional requirements,—as if the object of the law was their evolution into a perfect system,—and as if the function of even the highest judicial tribunals was to secure their consistent enforcement. Under the guise of protecting the “rights of the accused,” this perversion in the use of these rules has been and must be the source of wrong, alike to the accused and to the public. For, on the one hand, cases involving human lives may arise in which an appellate court would properly feel that there was imposed on it the duty of setting aside a verdict of conviction and of granting a new trial for errors committed by the trial court resulting in an unfair trial of the defendant, although no objection or exception was made or taken to the improper admission or exclusion of evidence, or to the improper conduct or ruling of a trial court, because of the mistake or misconduct, neglect, or incompetency of his counsel. The strict application of practice rules would then make a new and fair trial impossible. On the other hand, the exaggeration of the value of such technicalities has opened the doors for the escape of unnumbered and undoubted criminals. “Some of the instances of its enforcement would seem incredible, even in the justice of a tribe of African fetish-worshippers.” 1 Wigmore, Ev. p. 73, § 21.

There is a current impression on the part of the profession of law, and of the community in general, that all courts are hopelessly committed to this apotheosis of an artificial system, as repugnant to common sense as it is subversive of common justice. In point of fact, this is far from being true. The original English rule was that erroneous admission or exclusion of evidence, duly objected to, would not be a basis for a new trial if the rest of the testimony be sufficient to warrant the conclusion to which the jury have come. Later, and about 1835, a different rule came to be generally accepted; viz., “that an error or ruling created per se for the defeated party a right to a new trial. It remained the law of England until it was reformed away for civil cases in 1875.” In the United States this rule is the law in the majority of jurisdictions, but it is not sustained by the better opinion or reason (1 Wigmore, Ev. p. 71, § 21), and is distinctly not the law in this state. In State v. Nelson, 91 Minn. 143, 144, 145, 97 N. W. 652, Brown, J., says: “New trials in criminal prosecutions have for many years been granted by the courts with too much liberality (3 Columbia Law Rev. 433), and to such an extent have the technical rights of accused persons been magnified and upheld, and that, too, in cases where guilt has been overwhelmingly shown, as to result in much public discontent, and to bring the administration of the criminal laws into disrespect. Errors of no vital consequence, at least not affecting materially the substantial rights of the accused, either in the admission or exclusion of evidence, in the instructions of the trial court to the jury, or alleged misconduct of the prosecuting attorney, have opened prison doors and liberated many criminals. This condition has caused peaceful and law-abiding citizens to become lawless, and to join in the barbarous method of punishing crime by a resort to the court of Judge Lynch. All such outrages of the law have been attributed in the main to the lax administration of the laws in the criminal courts, the gravity and tenacity with which they respect the alleged legal rights of the criminal, and the unnecessarily strict adherence to ancient forms and procedure. Remedies have been suggested, among others, that the right of appeal be taken away in such cases; but it is believed that the only appropriate way to quiet the public mind in this respect and restore confidence in the ability of the courts to administer justice, not only to the criminal, but to society and the state as well, and to overcome the tendency to resort to lynch law, is a prompt and speedy trial, conviction, and certain and unrelenting punishment of the guilty, unaccompanied by the long delays usually incident to the administration of criminal laws, and unaccompanied, too, by too much respect for refined and subtle technicalities. New trials should be granted only where the substantial rights of the accused have been so violated as to make it reasonably clear that a fair trial was not had."

The present case, however, presents neither error nor unfair trial. The substantial rights of the accused have not been violated. We have examined with care, notwithstanding the waiver of counsel for the accused, all his assignments of error, and find all without merit. Throughout the entire case, the record shows, the trial court carefully followed each successive development of testimony, correctly ruled on every question raised by counsel, and so ordered that the result was an eminently just and impartial trial. The counsel of the accused who tried the case before the jury, but who did not appear for him upon this appeal, was appointed by the court. He performed his difficult and painful duties with fidelity and ingenuity. So far as the testimony is concerned, the language of Porter, J., in a 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) similar case (People v. Gonzalez, 35 N. Y. 49, 59) is apt: "The circumstances which were established by evidence confessedly competent were so conclusive as to the guilt of the prisoner that no honest jury could refuse to convict him of the crime. . . . We are under no legal or moral obligation to assume that the jury might have rendered a false verdict . . . but for the erroneous admission of . . . evidence." The prosecuting attorney without error proved every step in the perpetration of the double felony, from its beginning to its end, by testimony the most direct, complete, and conclusive, amounting to a substantial demonstration of the guilt, and of the degree of guilt, of the accused. Not only did four full-grown men, who, in the possession of all their faculties, had seen, in the light held by the prisoner himself, in his presence and in the presence of each other, every act of the tragedy, testify without attack, impeachment, or inconsistency, to every brutal detail,—not only were the revolver which shot the bullet and the bullet which was taken from the brain of the dead man produced, identified, and connected with the deceased,—but he himself voluntarily took the stand and admitted the robbery and the shooting. There is accordingly no doubt that the judgment of the trial court should be, and it is hereby, affirmed; and it is hereby directed, in accordance with the statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 7391), that the sentence pronounced by the trial court be executed.

Judgment affirmed.

NEVADA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM BELL et al., Petitioners,
v.

FIRST JUDICIAL DISTRICT COURT FOR ESMERALDA COUNTY et al.

(.... Nev.)

1. Officer—removal—unconstitutional statute—injunction.

The fact that a statute providing for the removal of an incumbent from a public office is unconstitutional will not prevent the Case Note.—In determining whether or not a writ of prohibition will lie in a particular case, it must be borne in mind that it is an extraordinary writ, and lies only when an inferior court proposes to exceed its lawful jurisdiction, and the party seeking it is without other adequate means of redress for the wrong about to be inflicted by the act of the inferior tribunal. Spelling, Injunctions & Extraordinary Remedies, 2d ed. pp. 1472, 1486. From this it is obvious that, in order to entitle a party to a issuance of a writ of prohibition to prevent proceedings under it, if relief has been denied petitioner in the lower court, and there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

2. Statute—title—elections.

The trial of an officer, after his election, for malfeasance in office, his removal, and the appointment of his successor, are not properly covered by a statutory title "Elections."

3. Conflicting constitutional provisions.

A constitutional provision as to the entitling of statutes is not superseded by a provision that "provision may be made by law for the removal from office of any civil officer for malfeasance or misfeasance in the performance of his duties."

APPPLICATION for writ of prohibition to restrain proceedings for the removal of petitioners from office. Allowed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. P. M. Bowler, Jr., for petitioners.
Mr. George S. Green for respondents.

Norcross, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding to obtain a writ of prohibition restraining and prohibiting respondent, the district court above named, and the Hon. M. A. Murphy, writ for the purpose of preventing proceedings under an unconstitutional statute, it must appear either that the court acquires its jurisdiction from the statute which is attacked, so that the defect is jurisdictional, or else that the complainant has no other adequate remedy for preventing the enforcement of the statute.

In BELL V. FIRST JUDICIAL DIST. COURT the decision sustaining the right to a writ of prohibition was placed upon the ground that, by reason of the summary nature of the proceedings against the complainant, the fact that they might be based upon the accusation of "any complainant," and that, in case of the officer's removal, he was deprived of the office and emoluments pending an appeal, such remedy by appeal was not adequate in case the statute under which the proceedings were had was unconstitutional.

From an examination of the following cases in addition to those cited by the court, it is apparent that, while prohibition will lie to prevent the court from acting where its jurisdiction is derived from an unconstitutional statute, it is not generally allowed although there is a conflict in the cases, where the inferior court has jurisdiction independent of the statute in question; as in such cases the inferior court, having jurisdiction, may itself determine the constitutionality of the statute, and its decision may be subject to review, and consequently 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

judge thereof, from further proceeding, other than to make an order of dismissal, in a certain action in said court pending, entitled "A. Summerfield, Complainant, v. William Bell, J. E. Davidson, and James Russell, Defendants. Accusation." The issuance of the writ is demanded upon the grounds, first, "that said court has no jurisdiction of the parties, or the subject of said action;" second, "that said court has no jurisdiction of the parties, or of the subject of said action in the manner and form therein assumed to be exercised by said court."

The defendants in said action, petitioners herein, are regularly elected, qualified, and acting officers of the said county of Esmeralda as follows: The said William Bell and James Russell are the justice of the peace, and constable, respectively, of Goldfield township, and the said J. E. Davidson is the district attorney of the county. The action sought to be prohibited by this proceeding was instituted by the complainant, A. Summerfield, a citizen and taxpayer of said county, for the purpose of removing said petitioners from office for alleged malfeasance. The proceeding was brought under the provisions of §§ 59 to 62 of an act entitled "An Act Relating to Elections," approved March 12, 1873 (Laws 1873; chap. 121, p. 209, Comp. Laws, §§ the complainant in such cases ordinarily has an adequate remedy without resort to the writ of prohibition.

In Pennington v. Woolfolk, 79 Ky. 21, it was held that prohibition would lie to restrain an inferior court from acting under an unconstitutional statute where its jurisdiction depended upon such statute.

And in State ex rel. Morley v. Godfrey, 54 W. Va. 54, 46 S. E. 185, it was held that prohibition will lie to prevent proceedings under a warrant issued for violating a municipal ordinance which the municipality was without power or authority to pass. In this case Poffenbarger, J., discussed at length, in a concurring opinion, the question as to whether prohibition will lie to prevent proceedings under a void ordinance, instead of permitting the inferior court to pass upon the question itself, while Brannon, J., dissented upon the ground that the inferior court, having jurisdiction to hear and determine prosecutions for violation of ordinances, could itself determine the question of the validity of the ordinance, from which judgment an appeal could be taken.

In Louisiana it is held that prohibition will not lie to determine the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance for the violation of which a prosecution is pending in a recorder's court, as the jurisdiction of such court to hear and determine such question is not involved. State ex rel. Morere v.

"Sec. 59. If any person now holding or who shall hereafter hold, any office in this state, who shall refuse or neglect to perform any official act in the manner and form as now prescribed by law, or who shall be guilty of any malpractice or malfeasance in office, shall be removed therefrom as herein prescribed.

"Sec. 60. Whenever any complaint in writing, duly verified by the oath of any complainant, shall be presented to the district court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of said court has been guilty of charging and collecting any illegal fees for services rendered, or to be rendered, in his office, or has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as prescribed by law, or has been guilty of any malpractice or malfeasance in office, it shall be the duty of the court to cite the party charged to appear before him on a certain day, not more than ten nor less than five days from the time when said complaint shall be presented, and on that day, or some subsequent day not more than twenty days from that on which said complaint is presented, shall proceed to hear in a summary manner the complaint and evidence offered by the party complained of, and if, on such hearing, it shall appear that the charge or charges of said complaint are sustained,—the court shall enter a decree that said party complained of shall be deprived of his office, and shall enter a judgment for $500 in favor of the complainant, and such costs as are allowed in civil cases.

"Sec. 61. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which such proceedings are had to transmit, within three days thereafter, to the governor of the state, or board of county commissioners (as the case may be) of the proper county, a copy of any decree or judgment declaring any officer deprived of any office under this act; and it shall be the duty of the governor or such board of county commissioners (as the case may be) to appoint some person to fill said office until a successor shall be selected or appointed and qualified; and it shall be the duty of the person so appointed to give such bond and security as are prescribed by law and pertaining to such office.

"Sec. 62. In case judgment of the district court, as herein provided, shall be against the officer complained of, and an appeal taken from the judgment so rendered, the officer so appealing shall not hold the office during the pending of such appeal; but such office shall be filled as in case of a vacancy."

It is contended by petitioners that the foregoing sections of the act, under which

Second Recorder's Court Judge, 44 La. Ann. 1100, 11 So. 683. In this case the court said that to authorize such relief would be practically to supplant the remedy by appeal in every case in which the defendant chose to plead the unconstitutionality of the law on which the plaintiff's claim was based. The case was cited with approval in State ex rel. Crozier v. Rost, 49 La. Ann. 1451, 22 So. 421, where the court refused to issue a writ to prevent criminal prosecutions based upon an unconstitutional statute.

In People ex rel. Burbank v. Wood, 21 App. Div. 245, 47 N. Y. Supp. 676, a New York case later than Sweet v. Hulbert, 51 Barb. 312, cited by the court in BELL v. FIRST JUDICIAL DIST. COURT, it was held that a writ of prohibition, being an extraordinary remedy, and not issuable when there are other perfectly adequate remedies, will not issue to prevent an examination before a justice of the peace of a party arrested under a warrant pursuant to a statute claimed to be unconstitutional. In so holding the court stated that the justice of the peace had jurisdiction to examine persons arrested on a warrant.

A writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a justice of the peace from passing upon a statute alleged to be unconstitutional, where he has jurisdiction independent of the statute. Scott v. Tully, 106 Ky. 69, 49 S. W. 1063. A similar decision was rendered in Arnold v. Shields, 5 Dana, 19, 30 Am. Dec. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

669, where the court added that the justice could not take cognizance of the action if his right to do so depended exclusively upon the statute.

That the courts differ as to whether other remedies are adequate is illustrated by the following cases:

In Re Schumaker, 90 Wis. 488, 63 N. W. 1050, the court refused to grant a writ of prohibition prohibiting the circuit judge from taking further proceedings in the matter of the application to incorporate a village, based on the ground that the statute authorizing the incorporation was unconstitutional as conferring legislative powers on the court. The application was denied upon the ground that no extreme necessity existed for the issuance of the writ; and there was no reason why the remedies at law were not ample in case an order of incorporation was made by the circuit court.

But in State ex rel. Luley v. Simons, 32 Minn. 540, 21 N. W. 750, it was held that prohibition will lie to prevent a judge of the district court from exercising power under an unconstitutional statute authorizing such court to incorporate villages. In discussing the right to a writ, the court said that the exercise of these unlawful powers would result in injury, for which there seems to be no other adequate remedy than that of prohibition.

the said proceedings were instituted, are violative of the state Constitution, and hence void, and that, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction in the premises. Upon the other hand, counsel for respondent takes the position that prohibition is not an appropriate remedy to determine the constitutionality of an act or provisions thereof, and that, therefore this proceeding should be dismissed, without passing upon the merits of the legal questions presented. Unquestionably this proceeding would be improper, if petitioners have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law; but no authorities are cited by counsel that go so far as to hold that an appellate court will refuse to grant relief by prohibition simply because to do so would necessitate the passing upon a constitutional question. In the case of Walcott v. Wells, 21 Nev. 51, 9 L. R. A. 59, 37 Am. St. Rep. 478, 24 Pac. 367, which was a proceeding in prohibition, it is manifest from the majority opinion of the court that a constitutional question would have been passed upon if necessary to a determination of the case, while the dissenting opinion of Belknap, J., was predicated upon his view of the unconstitutionality of the act therein brought in question. The case of Ex parte Roundtree, 51 Ala. 42, referred to in the Walcott v. Wells Case, 21 Nev. 51, 9 L. R. A. 59, 37 Am. St. Rep. 478, 24 Pac. 367, was a proceeding wherein a writ of prohibition was issued to the judge of the fourth judicial circuit of Alabama to prohibit him from proceeding in a case in the law and equity court of Morgan county; the issuance of the writ being based upon the unconstitutionality of the act creating the court. Among other cases in which the constitutionality of statutes have been passed upon in proceedings in prohibition may be cited the following: Levy v. Superior Court, 105 Cal. 600, 29 L. R. A. 811, 38 Pac. 965; Connecticut River R. Co. v. Franklin County, 127 Mass. 50, 34 Am. Rep. 338; McInerney v. Denver, 17 Colo. 302, 29 Pac. 516; Sweet v. Hulbert, 51 Barb. 312. In the case of Walcott v. Wells, 21 Nev. 50, 9 L. R. A. 61, 37 Am. St. Rep. 478, 24 Pac. 367, this court said: "The writ of prohibition is an extraordinary remedy, and should be issued only in cases of extreme necessity. Before it should issue, it must appear that the petitioner has applied to the inferior tribunal for relief. The object of the writ is to restrain inferior courts from acting without authority of law in cases where wrong, damage, and injustice are likely to follow from such action. It does not lie for grievances which may be redressed, in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, by appeal. It is not a writ of right, but one of sound judicial discretion, to be issued or refused according to the facts and circumstances of each particular case. Like all other prerogative writs, it is to be used with caution and forbearance, for the furtherance of justice, and securing order and regularity in judicial proceedings in cases where none of the ordinary remedies provided by law are applicable. The writ should not be granted, except in cases of usurpation or abuse of power, and not then, unless the other remedies provided by law are inadequate to afford full relief. If the inferior court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the controversy, and only errs in the exercise of its jurisdiction, this will not justify a resort to the extraordinary remedy by prohibition."

It appears from the petition herein that petitioners applied to the lower court for relief, and that the questions herein presented were urged upon that court upon motions to quash and to dismiss the proceedings. If the proceedings in the lower court would be void because of the unconstitutionality of the sections of the act under which it is instituted, I think it is a case for the proper interference of this court by prohibition, unless it appear that there is another plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. If decision is rendered against petitioners in the proceeding in the lower court, a decree is entered removing them from office, and judgment for $500 in favor of the complainant may be imposed, as well as costs, as in civil cases. If appeal is taken from such judgment, no matter how meritorious the appeal may be, there is no way by which the judgment, at least so far as the decree of removal is concerned, may be stayed pending the appeal; for the statute particularly provides that an appellant "shall not hold the office during the pending of such appeal." Petitioners are charged with gross misconduct,—acts which are cognizable as crimes and punishable as such; in fact, malfeasance in office itself has all the attributes of crime. These accusations, grave as they are, are not, under the sections quoted, required to be made under the solemnity of an investigation of a grand jury and presented by a body of that character, but may rest upon the accusation of "any complainant." After summary hearing and a judgment and decree which may impose a great financial hardship, the accused is deprived of holding office and of receiving its emoluments pending the appeal, and the duties of the office are performed and the salary enjoyed by another person appointed as in the act provided. Not only this, but in a case like that of the district attorney, his appointed successor may become his legal prosecutor. If the entire proceedings are without authority in law, and void because of the unconstitutionality of the sections of the act providing for this mode of procedure, certainly the remedy to be obtained by the slow process of appeal, which could only follow a vain, fruitless, and perhaps expensive, trial, could not be considered an adequate remedy. But more injurious to the defendant than loss of office and money would be the obloquy fastened upon him by such a decree, which an appeal in such a case could not remedy. It is hard to conceive of a greater legal wrong which might be imposed upon a person charged with a grave and serious offense than to compel him to undergo trial by a court or under a procedure wholly void in law. Even if guilty, his conviction would not be a bar to further trial before a competent court and under a lawful proceeding. If innocent, he would be subject to possible conviction, against which he never could obtain adequate relief; for, if the lower court had no jurisdiction to consider the merits of the case, the appellate court would not, and all that could properly be accomplished by an appeal in such a case would be a dismissal of the cause, with no opportunity for a new trial, or a further chance to overcome the effect of the wrongful conviction. For cases of this character, no other remedy could be adequate, and reason and justice dictate the restraining of such a trial by writ of prohibition. Brunner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 267, 28 Pac. 341; People ex rel. Yearian v. Spiers, 4 Utah, 395, 10 Pac. 609, 11 Pac. 509.

Are the sections of the "Act Relating to Elections" under which the proceeding was instituted unconstitutional? It is urged by counsel for petitioners that they are in several particulars, and the following specifications are made wherein the organic act of the state is declared to be violated: The subject of the sections in question is not mentioned in the title of the act, and has no proper connection with the subject that is mentioned, "elections," but, upon the contrary, is foreign thereto, in violation of article 4, § 17; that the proceeding, in reality being a prosecution criminal in its nature, can only be prosecuted in the name of and by the authority of the state, and the authorization of a prosecution in the name of an individual is violative of article 6, § 13; that the authorizing of such a proceeding otherwise than upon presentment or indictment of a grand jury is violative of article 1, § 8; that the provision requiring a summary proceeding deprives the accused of the right

All of the constitutional questions specified have been very ably presented by counsel, but I shall only discuss the first mentioned, for I deem it clearly decisive of the case, making it unnecessary to pass upon the other interesting questions submitted. The purpose of § 17 of article 4 of the state Constitution, which provides that "each law enacted by the legislature shall embrace but one subject, and matter properly connected therewith, which subject shall be briefly expressed in the title," etc., has been so frequently considered by this court, and so well settled, that it would accomplish no useful purpose to enter upon a further discussion of a matter so thoroughly covered by former opinions. As was said in the case of State ex rel. Wilson v. Stone, 24 Nev. 310, 53 Pac. 497, "that a compliance with this provision of the Constitution is essential to the validity of every law enacted by the legislature, has been so often decided by this court that it is not worth while to cite the cases." The subject of the act in question is Elections. Its purpose and object is the orderly electing of public officials by the qualified voters of the state. The trial of an officer, after he has been so elected, for malfeasance in office, his removal, and the appointment of his successor because of such removal, has no proper connection whatever with the subject of elections. But counsel for respondent says: "Sections 50 and 60 are no more 'incongruous' to the title of the act than §§ 52 to 57, inclusive, and they have been the settled law of this state for many years." Sections 52 to 57, inclusive, relate to contests for members of the legislature. A comparison of §§ 50 to 62, inclusive, with sections 52 to 57, inclusive, of the act in question, only serves to show more clearly the distinction between what matters have a proper connection with the general subject of the act, and what have not. It is manifest that the purpose of an election contest is to determine who has been legally elected in case of controversy. Such contest necessarily relates to the election. Its ultimate object is to determine which of the contesting parties has been duly elected. While it may result in determining that the person holding the office has not been elected thereto and should be ousted therefrom, and that the contestant, or person for whom the contest is instituted, should be invested with the office, such ouster, upon the one hand, and investiture, upon the other, is based primarily upon the true result of the election. The removal of an officer for malfeasance in office has no necessary relationship to the question of his election.

Probably in the great majority of cases the malfeasance in office, like the malfeasance charged against petitioners, has not even the remotest relationship to the election of the officer. If the office is an elective one, the election at which the officer became entitled to hold the office is a thing of the past before the malfeasance is committed. An officer appointed to fill a vacancy existing in an elective office may as readily commit a malfeasance in office as he could had he been elected to the office; and so an officer holding an office that is only appointive may be just as liable to commit such an offense. The object of legislation like that attempted to be accomplished by the sections of the "Act Relating to Elections," herein in question, is to protect the public from corrupt and neglected officials by removing them from office. Thurston v. Clark, 107 Cal. 288, 40 Pac. 435; Ponting v. Isaman, 7 Idaho, 283, 62 Pac. 680. That this purpose has no proper relationship to that of elections, is too clearly manifest to require any extended discussion.

Counsel for respondent argues, however, that by reason of the provisions of § 4 of article 7 of the state Constitution, the legislature has power to enact legislation for removal of officers guilty of malfeasance or nonfeasance in office in whatever manner it sees fit, and that therefore the sections of the "Act Relating to Elections," herein in question, having been enacted in pursuance of this provision of the Constitution, are valid. The constitutional provision referred to is as follows: "Provision shall be made by law for the removal from office of any civil officer, other than those in this article previously specified, for malfeasance or nonfeasance in the performance of his duties." While the framers of the Constitution recognized the importance of specifying in the organic law of the state a provision requiring the legislature to enact laws for the removal of all officers guilty of malfeasance or nonfeasance in office, other than those whose removal was specified in the Constitution to be accomplished by impeachment, it was never intended that such law or laws could be enacted differently from the method prescribed for the enactment of laws generally. Under the constitutional provision mentioned, the legislature is free to provide whatever proceedings for the removal of guilty public officers it deems most advantageous for the public good, so long as it does not in such enactment violate other constitutional provisions. There is nothing in the Constitution itself indicating any other purpose, and reason does not dictate 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

why there should be any exception in the case of this character of a law.

While the conclusion reached is that the sections of the act under which the proceedings sought to be prohibited were instituted relate to a subject foreign to that expressed in the title of the act in which they are found, and that, hence, they are void, it is proper to note that the effect of this decision is not to hold invalid all provisions of law enacted for the trial of those charged with, and the punishment of those found guilty of, malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. Some of the acts relating to particular county officers contain provisions for the indictment and removal from office of the official who may be found guilty of a misdemeanor in office. State v. Borowsky, 11 Nev. 119. The act relating to officers generally contains many provisions definitive of offenses thereunder and providing punishments therefor. The general criminal practice act of this state provides, in its 1st section, that "a crime or public offense is an act or omission forbidden by law, and to which is annexed on conviction: . . . Fourth. Removal from office." Comp. Laws, § 3986. Section 63 of the act last mentioned provides that "an accusation in writing against any district, county, or township officer, for wilful or corrupt misconduct in office, may be presented by the grand jury of the county for which the officer accused is elected or appointed." The sections immediately following (Comp. Laws, §§ 4038-4051, inclusive) provide for the hearing of objections to the sufficiency of the indictment, for a trial by jury, for judgment upon conviction of removal from office, and the right of appeal to the supreme court. Should these various provisions of law to which attention has been directed be deemed inadequate by the legislature to provide a sufficient remedy for the public against unworthy or corrupt officials, additional legislation upon the subject will doubtless be enacted.

The writ will issue as prayed for.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA ex rel.
CHARLES M. THACKER, County Attorney, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FRANK WOODRING et al.

(.... Okla.)

1. Bail bond—authority to take.

Under a statute vesting the power to take bail solely in persons or courts authorized by law to arrest and imprison persons charged with the commission of criminal offenses, a bail bond taken by the clerk of a district court, or his deputy, is void.

2. Same—enforcement of.

A statutory bail bond which is void for want of authority to exact it cannot be enforced as a common-law obligation.

(September 5, 1905.)

ERROR to the Probate Court for Greer County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce a bail bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles M. Thacker, in propria persona:

If not good as a statutory bond, it is good as a common-law obligation, upon the broad principle that, having received the benefits of the bond as if taken by proper authority, bail cannot change position with change of interest, and deny the authority of the taker.

Lowe v. Guthrie, 4 Okla. 287, 44 Pac. 198; Territory v. Cooper, 11 Okla. 699, 69 Pac.

Case Note.—The authorities lay down the general rule that the clerk of a court has no inherent power to admit to bail, such an act being a judicial function which a ministerial officer such as the clerk cannot perform. 2 Brandt. Suretyship & Guaranty, 3d ed. § 582; 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 85.

Some cases not cited by the court in TERRITORY EX REL. THACKER v. WOODRING also passed on the power of the clerk of the court to take a bail bond and fix the amount of bail. Thus, in Dugan v. Com. 6 Bush, 305, it was held that a bail bond taken by the clerk of the city court of Lexington is void for lack of authority to take bail.

Fixing the amount of bail is a judicial function which a ministerial officer such as the clerk of the circuit court cannot perform; and a bond taken by him is void. Gregory v. State, 94 Ind. 384, 48 Am. Rep. 162; State v. Mills, 13 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 555.

A bail bond which is taken and acknowledged before the clerk of the district court is not invalid, when this is done pursuant to the direction of the district judge, and at the request of the accused. Hunt v. United States, 11 C. C. A. 340, 27 U. S. App. 287, 63 Fed. 568.

In Louisiana it has been held that, after the district judge has admitted to bail, he may, independent of statute, legally delegate to his clerk authority to accept the bond. State v. Sewall, 3 La. Ann. 575.

A recognizance taken in term before the clerk of the court, for the appearance of one charged with passing counterfeit money, is valid, as it is presumed that the bond is taken under the direction of the court. Bodine v. Com. 24 Pa. 69; United States v. Evans, 2 Fed. 147.

Hainer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action commenced in the probate court of Greer county, by the county attorney, in the name of the territory, and against the defendants in error, on a written instrument purporting to be an appearance or bail bond in a criminal action. This instrument reads as follows:

Appearance Bond, District Court.

Territory of Oklahoma, } County of Greer. } ss:

Be it remembered, that on the 10th day of January, 1902, Frank Woodring, as principal, of Greer county and territory of Oklahoma, and A. S. Woodring and J. B. Woodring, as sureties, residents of Greer county, territory aforesaid, appeared personally before the undersigned, district clerk in and

But in Lock v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 399, it was held that the mayor of Newport had power, under statute, to take bail, but he had no authority to delegate such power to the clerk of the mayor's court; and a bail bond taken by such clerk is void, although the mayor indicated before the execution of the bond that the proposed surety would be acceptable.

As the clerk of the court in which an indictment is found has the power, under statute, to accept a recognizance for the appearance of the prisoner, the clerk of the court to which the change of venue is taken has the same power. State v. Merrihew, 47 Iowa, 112, 29 Am. Rep. 464; State v. Wells, 36 Iowa, 238.

In Gregory v. State, 94 Ind. 384, 48 Am. Rep. 162, it was held that a statute giving the clerk of the circuit court authority to fix the amount of bail in case of persons accused of crime is unconstitutional. The court based its decision on the ground that such a statute delegated judicial power to a ministerial officer.

But in State v. Krohne, 4 Wyo. 347, 34 Pac. 3, a statute giving the clerk of the court power to admit to bail one charged with a crime was held to be valid. The court said: "That the clerk of a district court may perform, under the statutes of Wyoming, quasi judicial functions, has never been doubted."

And in State v. Schweiter, 27 Kan. 499, a statute gave the clerk of the district court power to issue a warrant and fix the amount of bail when the court failed to do so, and when there was no district judge in the county.

for Greer county, and jointly and severally acknowledged themselves to be indebted to the territory of Oklahoma in the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00), to be made and levied on their respective goods, chattels, lands, and tenements, to be void, however, if the said Frank Woodring, defendant, who has been committed to the common jail of Greer county, territory of Oklahoma, shall personally be and appear before the district court of said county on the first day of next term, at 9 o'clock A. M., of said day, and from term to term and from day to day of each term, to answer a charge preferred against him for the offense of grand larceny, and to do and receive what shall be enjoined by said court upon him, and shall not depart the said court without leave.

Taken, subscribed, and acknowledged this 10th day of January, 1902.

B. D. Shear, Clerk,

[Seal.] by O. P. Elliott, Deputy.

The sole question presented here is whether an appearance or bail bond in a criminal action, taken by the clerk or his deputy, is a valid and binding obligation on the principal and his sureties, or either of them. Section 633, of our Code of Criminal Procedure (Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, § 5769) provides as follows: "Bail, by sufficient sureties, shall be admitted upon all arrests in criminal cases where the offense is not punishable by death; and in such cases it may be taken by any of the persons or courts authorized by law to arrest and imprison offenders." It will thus be seen that our statute does not, expressly or by implication, authorize the clerk of the district court or his deputy to take bail in criminal cases. Our statute vests this power solely in the persons or courts authorized by law to arrest and imprison persons charged with the commission of criminal offenses. Before the clerk or his deputy would be authorized to take bail in a criminal case, such power must have been expressly conferred by statute. This has been the uniform holding of the courts that have passed upon this subject. In United States v. Hudson, 65 Fed. 68, it was held that, to make a bail bond valid, it must have been taken by competent legal authority, and that an invalid bail bond is not binding on either the principal or his sureties. To the same effect are United States v. Goldstein, 1 Dill. 413, Fed. Cas. No. 15,226. In United States v. Horton, 2 Dill. 94, Fed. Cas. No. 15,393, Judge 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Dillon says: "It is settled that bonds of this character are valid only when taken in pursuance of law and the order of a competent court." It is said by the court in the case of State v. Buffum, 22 N. H. 267, when speaking of the liability of sureties on bail bonds: "They are liable in any case only upon the ground that they have entered into a recognizance ordered by a tribunal having authority to act in the premises." It is the essence of authority, understood by the bail or surety of another, that there should have been a valid obligation comprehended. United States v. Hand, 6 McLean, 274, Fed. Cas. No. 15,296. "Bail taken by a court without jurisdiction, or by an officer without authority, is void." State v. Winniger, 81 Ind. 51; Dickenson v. State, 20 Neb. 72, 29 N. W. 184; State v. Jones, 3 La. Ann. 10; Gray v. State, 43 Ala. 41; Jacquemine v. State, 48 Miss. 280; Branham v. Com. 2 Bush, 3; Com. v. Roberts, 1 Duv. 199; Com. v. Fisher, 2 Duv. 376; Dugan v. Com. 6 Bush, 305; Harris v. Simpson, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 165, 14 Am. Dec. 101; State v. McCoy, 1 Baxt. 111; Wallenweber v. Com. 3 Bush, 68; Williams v. Shelby, 2 Or. 144; Schneider v. Com. 3 Met. (Ky.) 409; Blevins v. State, 31 Ark. 53; Cooper v. State, 23 Ark. 278; State v. Nelson, 28 Mo. 13; State v. Hays, 4 La. Ann. 59; State v. Vion, 12 La. Ann. 688; Holmes v. State, 44 Tex. 631; State v. Berry, 8 Me. 179; State v. Russell, 24 Tex. 505; Com. v. Loveridge, 11 Mass. 337; Com. v. Otis, 16 Mass. 198; Com. v. Canada, 13 Pick. 86; Powell v. State, 15 Ohio, 579; State v. Clark, 15 Ohio, 595; People v. McKinney, 9 Mich. 444.

The same rule has been announced in Morrow v. State, 5 Kan. 563. Mr. Justice Valentine, in this case, uses the following language: "It may be urged that there was evidence showing that the court deputized the clerk to take these recognizances, but this the court could not do. It may also be urged that they were taken in open court, but that would not make them any better, as they were not taken by the court. It is true that the clerk may do all the work in taking a recognizance, but it must be done in open court, under the court, by order of the court, and in the name of the court; and, when the instrument itself shows that it was not so taken, it is void." In State v. Caldwell, 124 Mo. 509, 28 S. W. 4, it was held that a clerk of a court has no authority to take a bail bond, and a bond taken by him is not binding, though the court enter a nunc pro tunc order approving the same after the discharge of the prisoner. Mr. Justice Sherwood, speaking for the court in this case, uses the following language: "Now, it is abundantly settled that a bond or recognizance taken in a criminal cause before an unauthorized person has no savor of validity about it. State v. Randolph, 26 Mo. 213; State v. Nelson, supra; State v. Ferguson, 50 Mo. 409; State v. Watson, 54 Mo. App. 416. Nor, where the bond or recognizance is taken before the clerk of a court, can it be afterwards validated by the entry by the court of a nunc pro tunc order approving the bond. Morrow v. State, 5 Kan. 563." In 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed., p. 659, the rule is thus stated: "There is no inherent power in the clerk of a court to take bail, and he cannot, in the absence of statute, be delegated so to do by the court."

But it is contended that, if the bond is invalid as a statutory bond, it is good as a common-law bond. This contention is clearly untenable. A statutory bond, which is void for want of authority to execute it, cannot be enforced as a common-law obligation. Dickenson v. State, supra; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 688. It follows that the bond taken in this case by the deputy clerk of the district court is void, and therefore the court properly sustained the demurrer to the petition, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, at the cost of plaintiff in error.

All the Justices concur.

GEORGE ABBOT, Resp't.,
v.

OREGON RAILROAD & NAVIGATION COMPANY et al., Appts.

(.... Or.)

1. Carrier—lighting stations.

What period of time will be reasonable for a railroad company which has agreed to stop a night train at a station where night trains are not scheduled to stop, to keep its Case Note.—As to what constitutes a reasonable time prior to the arrival or departure of trains for keeping a railroad station open and lighted and heated, and as to whether the question should be left to the jury, different courts have taken quite different views.

In Grimes v. Pennsylvania Co. 36 Fed. 72, the court left the jury to determine the reasonableness of the time in the case of plaintiff, who reached the depot at 9 o'clock in the evening, about five and a half hours before the train which he was intending to take was due, and who was injured by stepping off the platform, which was un-station platform lighted for the accommodation of intending passengers prior to the arrival of the train, is for the jury to decide.

2. Same—platform—negligence of passenger.

A passenger is guilty of contributory negligence which will bar his recovery for injuries received by a fall from a station platform, where, having been provided by the carrier with a well-lighted car in which to await the arrival of his train, he leaves it on a very dark night to walk, merely for exercise, on an unlighted platform, knowing that the slope of the land is such that some portions of the platform must be some distance above the ground.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sherman County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is an action by George Abbot against the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company and the Columbia Southern Railway Company, to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff while a passenger of the defendant companies, and caused by their negligence in failing to maintain a railing at, and in omitting to keep a lamp burning on, a depot platform jointly used by them. The defendants, separately answering, denied the material allegations of the complaint, and for further defenses averred that plaintiff, at the time he was injured, was not a passenger of either company, and that his hurt was caused by his own want of care. The allegations of new matter in the answer having been denied in the replies, the cause was tried, and judgment rendered against the defendants, or either of them, for the sum of $20,000, and they severally appeal.

Messrs. Snow & McCamant, for appellant Columbia Southern Railway Company:

lighted; saying to them that it was the duty of defendant, within a reasonable time before the arrival and departure of trains, properly to light its waiting room and platform so as to make them comfortable and safe for the use of passengers desiring to take such trains; but that it was not its duty to keep them lighted at unreasonable hours.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 84 Ala. 159, 5 Am. St. Rep. 354, 4 So. 359, which is cited in ABBOT v. OREGON R. & NAV. CO., states that the duty to furnish a light in the nighttime at a station is limited to the time of departure and arrival of trains, and ceases when the passenger has been carried to his destination, and been given a sufficient time to leave the carrier's premises.

One who comes to a railway station as a sufficient time before departure to enable persons desiring to take passage to be in readiness to enter the cars without undue haste, and, after their arrival, to enable those leaving the train to do so in safety; and that the length of time for keeping such light depends on the circumstances in each case.

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cornelius, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 125, 30 S. W. 720, held that the provision of the Texas act March 6, 1891, imposing a penalty on railroad companies for failure to keep their depots lighted and warmed for not less than one hour before the arrival and after the departure of passenger trains, does not relieve them from liability for failure to keep them warmed for such further reasonable time as they are occupied by passengers waiting for delayed trains; and held defendant railroad company liable for injuries due to waiting in an unwarmed depot for several hours for the arrival of such a train.

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mayes (Tex. App.) 15 S. W. 43, also holds that it is the duty of a railroad company towards the purchaser of a ticket to keep the station warm for several hours during which the train is delayed.

But Brown v. Georgia, C. & N. R. Co. 119 Ga. 88, 46 S. E. 71, holds that a railroad company is required to keep waiting rooms open only for a reasonable time before and after the departure of trains, and is not liable for failure to keep the waiting room heated for one waiting there over night for the arrival of the next train, after the train which his ticket called for had passed without stopping; although there was no other place for him to go, and although he might be entitled to recover in such case for the injury received because of the failure to transport him on the train agreed.

Hodges v. New Hanover Transit Co. 107 N. C. 576, 12 S. E. 597, denies the liability of a railroad company for injury to a member of an excursion party while attempting to get on board the train which was standing at the depot from half to three quarters of an hour before the time for starting, caused by the failure to light the platform; holding that fifteen minutes before the time of starting, at which time the first signal was to be given, was a sufficient time for lighting such platform.

Phillips v. Southern R. Co. 124 N. C. 123, 45 L. R. A. 163, 32 S. E. 388, holds that a rule for closing a railroad waiting room after a train leaves, until thirty minutes before the departure of the next train, is a reasonable one as applied to one who came to the station at 8 o'clock in the evening with the intention of waiting for a train which left at 1:30 A. M., and who was driven out in the cold; although it would probably be unreasonable as applied to through passengers and delayed trains.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 102 Ky. 300, 53 L. R. A. 149, 43 S. W. 458, holds that the duty to keep ticket offices and waiting rooms open for at least thirty minutes before the departure of a passenger train from a regular passenger depot at which it regularly stops, imposed by Ky. Stat. § 84, does not extend to the opening of such rooms for night trains, for which they have never been kept open for the sale of tickets, where no extra charge is made on such trains to passengers without tickets.

passenger, and remains there longer than is reasonably necessary, or wanders about the platform for a purpose not related to his journey, thereupon becomes a mere licensee, in like manner as if his original entry had been unconnected with any business with the carrier.

Mr. A. S. Bennett for respondent.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by defendants' counsel that the testimony introduced by plaintiff conclusively shows that the injury of which he complains was caused by his contributory negligence, and hence the court erred in overruling their motions for judgments of nonsuit, based on that ground. The legal principle insisted upon necessitates an examination of the bill of exceptions, which shows that the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company is a corporation owning and operating a railroad from Portland east to Huntington, passing through the station of Biggs, situated on the south bank of the Columbia river. The Columbia Southern Railway Company is also a corporation owning and operating a railroad from Biggs south to Shaniko. The depot and tracks at Biggs are owned by the former company, but the cost of maintaining the station is borne, and the tracks and premises connected therewith are jointly used by both, in receiving and discharging passengers. The station building is placed east and west between parallel tracks, the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company using the lines of rails on the north side of the depot, and the other company those on the south. This building is surrounded by a plank platform 16 feet wide on the north, 12 on the south, and 14 on the east and west. The land on which the depot stands slopes to the south, so that the north edge of the platform is level with the tracks of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, while the south edge is about 5 feet above the rails on that side, and the center of the west edge about 6 feet above the surface of the ground, which at that point is somewhat depressed. The Columbia Southern Railway Company, at the time of plaintiff's injury, was operating daily trains only, but the other company was running night passenger trains,—No. 6, going east, passing through Biggs at 12:22 midnight, and No. 3, going west, at 3:30 A. M. These trains were not scheduled to stop at that station, which was closed at night, and no light maintained at the depot, the passengers being accommodated by the day trains of both companies which stopped at that junction.

The plaintiff is fifty-nine years old, has traveled extensively by rail, is engaged in buying wool on commission, and had been at Biggs eleven times prior to his injury, passing in the daylight over a gang plank extending from the depot platform to the cars of the Columbia Southern Railway Company. With other buyers, he was at Shaniko June 27, 1903, attending a sale of wool, which was not concluded until evening. As these dealers could save a day's time if they could reach Biggs and take the night passenger trains of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, they employed the other company to carry them by special train to that junction, the train despatcher of the former company having telegraphed that its night passenger trains would stop at Biggs if the special train reached there in time. The train so chartered left Shaniko at 8:40 P. M., and reached the junction at 12:15 that night, the car in which the wool dealers rode being left on the south side of the depot, and near the west end thereof. A few minutes thereafter train No. 6 stopped at the north side of the depot, and the passengers from Shaniko, who were going east, were escorted by a trainman of the Columbia Southern Railway Company, having a lantern, from its car, over the gang plank and across the west end of the depot platform to the train of the other company. The plaintiff accompanied the departing passengers to their train, and immediately returned with the trainman to the car which he had left, intending to take passage for Portland when train No. 3 arrived. The car in which plaintiff was to wait was well lighted, and provided with a suitable toilet room. He sat down, and tried to slumber, but on the way from Shaniko the passengers had freely indulged in smoking, and he was unable to sleep. Being weary from the effects of his ride and fatigued from the strained position occasioned by sitting for several hours in an ordinary passenger car, he rose, left the coach, and again passed over the gang plank, intending to cross the tracks of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company to seek refreshment in a cool breeze from the Columbia river, and also to urinate. Instead of going directly north, he turned to the west, and slowly walked in the darkness to the edge of the depot platform, which was not protected by a railing, and fell to the ground, sustaining such an injury that one of his legs had to be amputated below the knee. As a witness in his own behalf he testified, on cross-examination, that he had been at Biggs several times prior to June 28, 1903; that he knew the station platform was level with the car tracks on the north, but elevated on the south, requiring a gang plank, over which he had always passed in entering or leaving the coaches of the Columbia Southern Railway Company, but he had never particularly noticed the ground around the station; that he knew the platform did not extend indefinitely to the west; and, referring to the time when he was injured, he said, "It was the darkest night I ever saw."

In support of the judgment rendered, it is asserted by his counsel that, as the defendants jointly maintain the depot at Biggs, each owes a duty to persons arriving on the cars of one company to take passage on those of the other to provide a reasonably safe platform, and to see that it is suitably lighted at night for a reasonable time before the arrival and after the departure of their trains, and for any neglect in these particulars they are jointly and severally liable for any damage resulting therefrom; that the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, having agreed to stop its train No. 3 at Biggs, on the night in question, for the accommodation of persons coming on the special train from Shaniko and intending to go west over its line, thereby established the relation of carrier and passenger with such persons from the time of their arrival at the junction, and, neither company having lighted the depot or platform, plaintiff, who then was a passenger of both companies, and entitled to go on the platform for exercise and to secure pure air, had the right to assume from its dark condition that it was reasonably safe for his accommodation, but, having been dangerous by reason of the defendants' failure to maintain a railing or a light, he is entitled to recover from them the damages awarded by the jury, and hence no error was committed as alleged.

It will be remembered that the night passenger trains of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company were not scheduled to stop at Biggs, and for that reason no light was maintained there. The plaintiff's right to recover compensation for the injury sustained depends upon the existence of some duty owed him by the defendants, or either of them, the breach of which was the proximate cause of his hurt. Emry v. Roanoke Nav. & Water Power Co. 111 N. C. 94, 17 L. R. A. 699, 16 S. E. 18. The law imposes on a railway company engaged in carrying persons for hire the duty of exercising reasonable care in keeping its platforms, approaches thereto, and station grounds, so far as passengers would naturally resort to them, properly lighted at night for a reasonable time next prior to the arrival or immediately following the departure of a train which its time cards specify will stop at night to take on or put off passengers. 3 Thomp. Neg. § 2691; 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1641; Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. § 516; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas, 119 Ind. 583, 6 L. R. A. 193, 21 N. E. 968; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stansberry, 132 Ind. 533, 32 N. E. 218. What constitutes a reasonable time during which such premises must be kept lighted is determined by the circumstances of each particular case, and depends upon the size and importance of the station and the number of persons who lawfully visit it at night for the purpose of transacting business with the railroad company. 3 Thomp. Neg. § 2686; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 84 Ala. 159, 5 Am. St. Rep. 354, 4 So. 359; Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Treadway, 142 Ind. 475, 143 Ind. 689, 40 N. E. 807, 41 N. E. 794. A person who has completed his journey on a railroad train, and alighted therefrom at a station provided for the accommodation of the general public, is allowed a reasonable time to leave the premises; and one who lawfully intends to secure passage on the cars is permitted to occupy the waiting room of a depot a reasonable time immediately preceding the arrival of a train which he expects to take, during which such person sustains towards the carrier a relation analogous to that of a passenger, to whom the railway company owes a duty commensurate with the degree of danger to which such person may be exposed. 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1592; 2 Wood, Railroads, Minor's ed. § 310. In Heinlein v. Boston & P. R. Co. 147 Mass. 136, 9 Am. St. Rep. 676, 16 N. E. 698, it was held that a person remaining at a station three or four minutes after he knew that the train which he desired to take had already gone, when there was nothing to detain him except his wish to take a street car which would soon arrive at such station, ceases to have the rights of an intending passenger, and cannot recover for injuries sustained by him in attempting to leave the station by reason of the station door being closed, the station lights extinguished, and the passage by which he endeavored to depart insufficiently illuminated. In Quantz v. Southern R. Co. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

137 N. C. 136, 49 S. E. 79, a person having arrived at night on a train at his destination left the station grounds, but, returning in a few minutes to the depot on business of his own, walking into an open doorway, and, falling, was injured, and it was ruled that he had ceased to be a passenger, and was only a licensee, to whom the railroad company did not owe the duty of keeping the door closed, but only of maintaining a way that was free from danger. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Neiswanger, 41 Kan. 621, 13 Am. St. Rep. 304, 21 Pac. 582, the appellee, a stranger, arrived by rail at Beloit, Kan., about 5 o'clock P. M., and went immediately into the depot, intending to go to Osburn, in that state, by the next train, which she was informed by the agents of the company would leave at 9:20 that night. Having secured a ticket entitling her to be carried on the appellant's cars to her destination, she left the depot, but returned "about dusk" on May 6th, and waited to resume her journey. Her train not having arrived at 11 o'clock P. M., she had occasion to go to the toilet, but, there being none in the building, she went upon the depot platform, which was not lighted, and walking off, sustained an injury, and it was held that the railroad company was liable therefor. In St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Griffith, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 631, 35 S. W. 741, the appellee, having secured a coupon ticket for the entire distance, left Gainesville, Texas, with her babe, for Mt. Vernon, in that state, going via Greenville, where she was to change cars. At the latter city she was transferred to the appellant's depot, which she reached at 2 o'clock P. M., and, being a stranger without money, and informed that no hotel or boarding house was within a mile of the station, she concluded to remain in the waiting room until 12 o'clock that night, when the next passenger train for Mt. Vernon would arrive. The station agent, knowing her intention, either consented, or at least made no objection, to her occupying the room until she could resume her journey. About 9:30 o'clock P. M. the appellant's night agent in charge of the depot entered the waiting room, turned down the light, placed his arm around the appellee, and, over her protest, tried to kiss her, and also made improper proposals to her. She pleaded with him to desist, and not molest her, whereupon he returned to his office, and she quietly left the depot with her babe, and went to a private residence, and notified the occupant of the attempted outrage. Mrs. Griffith commenced an action against the railroad company to recover damages for the assault, and, having secured a judgment, it was affirmed on appeal; the court holding that as she possessed a ticket, and had gone to the depot for the purpose of taking passage on the first train that arrived, and, by the assent of the station agent, was permitted to occupy the waiting room, she sustained the relation of a passenger whom the company owed a duty to protect, and it was therefore liable in damages for the assault of its agent. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Neiswanger, 41 Kan. 621, 13 Am. St. Rep. 304, 21 Pac. 582, the question of reasonable time before the arrival of a train when a person at a depot intending to take a train may be regarded in the nature of a passenger was not involved, for, the train having been scheduled to reach the station at 9:30 P. M., and thereafter momentarily expected to arrive, when Mrs. Neiswanger was injured, shows that she was certainly entitled to protection. So, too, in St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Griffith, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 631, 35 S. W. 741, the question of reasonable time was not in issue, for Mrs. Griffith's occupancy of the waiting room at the depot was not in pursuance of an absolute right, but resulted from the station agent's knowledge that she intended to remain at the depot ten hours, waiting the arrival of her train, and his assent thereto.

In the case at bar the testimony shows that the agents of the Columbia Southern Railway Company who operated the special train were informed that plaintiff intended to take passage for Portland on train No. 3 of the other company when it reached Biggs, and, knowing this, they assented to his occupying the car in which he had made the journey from Shaniko until the arrival of the other train. The Columbia Southern Railway Company, by reason of this assent of its agents, thereby treated plaintiff in the nature of a passenger, notwithstanding it had safely carried him the entire distance agreed upon. The train dispatcher of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company had agreed to stop train No. 3 at Biggs if the special train reached that station in time, and he must have known that some passenger would be at the depot intending to go west. This knowledge, however, in the absence of any stipulation to that effect, did not bind the last-named company to light its depot platform until a reasonable time next prior to the arrival of its west-bound passenger train. The plaintiff, having accompanied the wool buyers going east to their train, returned to the car provided for his accommodation about three hours before train No. 3 was expected to arrive. Whether or not such period of time next prior to the arrival of a train is reasonable during which the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company should have kept its depot platform lighted at a station where its night passenger trains were not scheduled to stop, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) is not now necessary to inquire, for that was a question exclusively for the jury to determine.

In considering the action of the trial court in overruling the motions for judgments of nonsuit interposed on the ground of plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence, we shall for the present treat the question as it relates to the duty of the Columbia Southern Railway Company only, basing our conclusion on its assent to plaintiff's occupying its car until the arrival of the west-bound passenger train on the road of the other company. This car was pro hac vice a depot to all intents and purposes, well lighted, and provided with a suitable toilet room, so that it was unnecessary for plaintiff to leave it, as in the cases of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Neiswanger, 41 Kan. 621, 13 Am. St. Rep. 304, 21 Pac. 582, and Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Treadway, 142 Ind. 475, 143 Ind. 689, 40 N. E. 807, 41 N. E. 794, to obey an urgent call of nature. The testimony shows that the coach provided for plaintiff's accommodation was scented with tobacco smoke, but it nowhere appears in the bill of exceptions that the fumes of that weed were offensive to him, as in the case of McDonald v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 124, 96 Am. Dec. 114, in which Mr. Chief Justice Dillon said: "If the station room is full, or if it is intolerably offensive by reason of tobacco smoke, so that a passenger has good reason for not remaining there, while this will not justify him in violating reasonable rules and regulations of the company, which are known to him, respecting the place, mode, and time of entering the cars, it will justify his endeavor to enter the cars at as early a period as possible, especially if it is dark and cold without, if in so doing he uses proper care, and violates no rule or regulation of the company of which he has actual knowledge, or which, as a reasonable man, he would be bound to presume existed." At the time plaintiff sustained the injury he did not go upon the station platform for the purpose of entering a car in which he expected to take passage, or to transact any business with either railroad company, nor was he for any reason necessarily compelled to leave the coach which he occupied. His act in leaving the car at the time and under the circumstance indicated, and going to the platform, which he knew was not lighted, is sought to be justified on the ground that he was entitled to walk for exercise, and to secure fresh air, and that he had a right to assume, from the extreme darkness, and his knowledge that the defendant companies were aware that he was waiting the arrival of a train at a depot jointly used by them, that they had discharged the obligation devolving upon them of making the station platform reasonably safe, and that, relying thereon, he was injured in consequence of their breach of duty, thereby rendering them liable for the damages resulting from the injury which he sustained. He could undoubtedly have secured an abundant supply of fresh air by raising a window of the coach, thereby ventilating it, and hence he was not obliged to leave the car for that purpose.

This brings us to a consideration of the remaining question,—whether or not a person sustaining the quasi relation of a passenger can, for the mere purpose of exercise, leave a well-lighted depot, provided with necessary accommodations, and go in the darkness upon a walk surrounding the station, and recover damages for an injury sustained in consequence of the carrier's failure to maintain a railing on or its omission to light the platform. A passenger, before reaching his destination, may leave a car or a boat to transact his own private business at any intermediate station or landing where a stop is made for any reasonable time to receive or discharge passengers; and if, without his fault, he is injured in consequence of the carrier's negligence on any part of the premises set apart by it for the use of the public, or used with its consent, he may recover the damages sustained. 1 Fetter, Carr. Pass. § 234. Thus, in Dice v. Willamette Transp. & Locks Co. 8 Or. 60, 34 Am. Rep. 576, the plaintiff, a passenger, before reaching his destination, attempted to leave the defendant's steamboat to transact his own business at a landing where passengers and freight were being discharged, and, the night being dark and rainy, and the lights on the boat and on the wharf insufficient to enable him plainly to see his way, he fell, sustaining an injury, and it was held that he had a right of action against the carrier for its negligence in not providing a safe means of egress from the boat to the wharf.

In Hrebrik v. Carr, 29 Fed. 298, notice having been given that a steamer would sail early on a certain morning, the plaintiff and her husband went on board the boat the evening before her departure, and soon thereafter he, in attempting to cross to the wharf to secure some tobacco, fell from the gang plank, and was drowned. In an action to recover for the death it was held that a passenger on board a vessel before she left port had the right to go ashore for the purpose stated, and that it was the duty of the carrier to provide a safe means of passage from the steamer to the pier. In that case it does not appear that the night had set in, or, is so, that the passageway was not lighted. In deciding the case Benedict, J., says: "The necessity on the part of a passenger, who has taken his position as a passenger, to return to the pier, is a common incident of travel. It is constantly done, to find lost baggage, to speak to a friend, and may be done to purchase tobacco by anyone addicted to the use of that weed. From this necessity arises the obligation on the part of the ship to keep and maintain for the passenger's use, at all proper times, a safe passageway from the steamer to the pier."

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Coggins, 32 C. C. A. 1, 60 U. S. App. 140, 88 Fed. 455; the appellee, a lineman in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company, was traveling in the caboose of a freight train to a point where repairs were to be made. The train on which he was riding stopped at Rising Fawn, Georgia, an intermediate station, at the usual place for the alighting of passengers from freight trains, which was about 1,500 feet from the station proper. The appellee got off the car and started to walk to the station by the only practicable way, which was between the main track and the house track, to see if there was any telegram for him from his employer. As he was going to the station he saw a part of the train on which he came backing towards him on the main line, and as it approached he concluded it would be safer to cross over near the house track, and in doing so he was struck and injured by a switching car on a cut-off. In an action to recover damages for the hurt inflicted, the railroad company introduced testimony tending to show that the appellee was loitering along between the tracks, talking with acquaintances whom he met; that he had no reason to anticipate the receipt of a telegraphic order at that point, and that he was standing on or near the track, looking up at the telegraph wires, when struck. The trial court, having instructed the jury in relation to the degree of care due from a railroad company to a passenger on a freight train, said: "Now, when they reached Rising Fawn, that not being the plaintiff's place of destination, if he alighted from the car intending to go direct to the depot for a particular business purpose, and with the intention of returning when that purpose was accomplished, he would, while going to and from the depot, exercising the proper diligence due from a passenger, remain a passenger, and would be entitled to the degree of care belonging to a passenger. Now, that rule applies until he had time to get off the car, going along exercising reasonable prudence to do so, attend to his business (if he had any), and return, and no longer. The liability of the company to him as a passenger lasted only so long as to give him a reasonable time in which to get to the depot and return after transacting his business, and did not extend to him after the lapse of that time. After that they owed him no duty, except that which they owed to any stranger,—not to wantonly or unnecessarily injure him. . . . Now, on the contrary, if, after they had got in the yard, he got out of the train, without having any business that required him to go to the depot, that not being his point of destination, or without having any particular business to go to the depot, and instead of going by the direct and usual route and within a reasonable time, such as any other man (a prudent man) would have required to go to the depot, and if, instead of that, he, out of mere curiosity, got out to look through the yard and talk with the employees in the yard,—if he stopped in the yard, and began to talk and loiter about the yards there in conversation, or if he began to look at the overhead wires, as one of the witnesses indicates probably he did (at least, there is a silent proof that tends to show that),—why, then in each of these contingencies, he would cease to be a passenger, but would be there on the switch yard at his peril; and the only duty the defendant company would owe to him in such a situation as that would be the duty not to wantonly or unnecessarily injure him, and they would owe him no greater duty than they would owe to a stranger in the yard without any business." A judgment, having been rendered against the railroad company, was affirmed on appeal; Taft, J., in referring to the instructions, saying: "The foregoing states the law correctly, and leaves to the jury the issue in such a way as to enable them, without difficulty, justly to determine whether Coggins was entitled to the high degree of care from the railroad company due a passenger when he was struck." Further in the opinion it is said: "The authorities are not quite so uniform upon the question whether the obligation of the carrier extends to the same degree of care over the safety of its passengers when they alight at intermediate stations and go to the station house while the train is waiting. But we think the weight of authority, reason, and custom all require us to hold that where a passenger, without objection by the company or its agents, alights at an intermediate station, which is a station for the discharge and reception of passengers, for any reasonable and usual purpose, like that of refreshment, of the sending or receipt of telegrams, or of exercise by walking up and down the platform, or the like, he does not cease to be a passenger, and is justified in the belief that the company is exercising due care for his safety." In that case nothing is said as to what time the appellee was injured but, as it is intimated that he was looking up at the telegraph wires when he was struck, it is to be inferred that it was daylight. This being so, what is said in the opinion about the right of a passenger to walk up and down the depot platform for exercise can have no application to explorations made at such a place in utter darkness.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Coulson, 8 Kan. App. 4, 54 Pac. 2, W. F. Coulson was a passenger on appellant's train, which stopped at an intermediate station for dinner. He left the car in which he was riding, and went to an eating house, where he secured his lunch, and, having returned he passed through a car to the depot platform where, having been informed by the conductor that the train would start in three or four minutes, he walked to the platform on the opposite side, and stood 5 or 6 feet from the end of a coach. He then started towards the car, whereupon he caught his foot in a warped plank, and, falling, put out his hand for protection, and as he did so the train simultaneously started, whereby he was injured. A judgment having been rendered against the railroad company for the damages sustained, it was contended by the appellant that its obligation under the contract ceased when Coulson got his lunch and returned to the car. The court, discussing this question, says: "We cannot consent to this doctrine. The train had stopped for dinner. The passengers were invited to this platform. It was maintained for their safety and convenience, and they were expected to get on and off. This was involved in and connected with the regular passenger service of the road. The act of Coulson in leaving the train at this particular point, after he had returned from his luncheon, is not sufficient to justify this court in declaring, as a matter of law, that he was negligent, or that the obligation of the company to provide safe passage for him had been fulfilled, or that the relationship as a passenger to the company had for the time ceased." In that case the injury occurred at the noon hour, when the passenger was undoubtedly afforded sufficient natural light plainly to see the passageway that had been provided by the railway company for the accommodation of the traveling public.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Woolridge, 32 Ill. App. 237, the appellee, having a railroad ticket, was walking on a depot platform about 9 o'clock P. M. waiting the departure of his train, which stood on a side track, and was expected to pull out after a "rally" meeting adjourned. Another train coming in rapidly hit a baggage truck which was being pulled on the platform, causing it to strike and injure him. In an action to recover the damages resulting from the hurt the court refused to instruct the jury that unless the appellee was at the place where he was injured on business with the railroad company, or was there to take a train about to depart from the station, or to meet someone expected to arrive on the train which struck the baggage truck, or to see someone about to leave, then, if there was a suitable waiting room, though he was expecting to depart on some other train for which he might have been waiting, he had no right to be on the depot platform at the time he was injured. A judgment having been rendered against the company, was affirmed on appeal; the court, in referring to the charge requested, saying: "We do not think this states the law correctly. To hold that a passenger waiting at a railroad depot for his train to arrive must remain in the waiting room, and that if he goes out upon the platform at any time before it becomes necessary to board his train he is guilty of such negligence as to prevent his recovery for an injury like the one in question, is not consistent with reason or common sense." In that case the baggage master testified that he lighted the gas at the baggage room door before the arrival of the train causing the injury. The depot platform must also have been lighted, for Woolridge testified that he saw the baggage truck when it was struck by the incoming train.

In Lemery v. Great Northern R. Co. 83 Minn. 47, 85 N. W. 908, the plaintiff, having purchased a railroad ticket, entered a day coach at Duluth, Minnesota, for a continuous passage to Park River, North Dakota, on defendant's through train that did not stop at intermediate stations to receive or discharge passengers. After the train started, plaintiff left the car originally taken, passed to the rear into a sleeping car, going through a coach occupied by a military company that maintained guards at each entrance of the car, but passengers were not prevented from passing through it when necessary. As the conductor entered the sleeper, plaintiff discovered that he had lost his ticket, and, being compelled to pay his fare, he demanded a receipt therefor, but none was given him, the conductor claiming that his blank acknowledgments of payment were at the other end of the train. The plaintiff remained in the sleeper until the train arrived at Grand Rapids, Minnesota, where it was stopped at night, when it was very dark, for the purpose, only, of taking water. When the train came to a halt, plaintiff left the sleeper, as he insisted, to find the conductor and again to demand a receipt, and also to pass around the car occupied by the militia and enter the day coach, claiming that he was not permitted longer to remain in the sleeper, and that the military guards would not allow him to pass through the car which was under their care and protection. In alighting at the station plaintiff fell between the steps of the sleeper and the depot platform, which was not lighted, sustaining an injury. An action having been begun to recover the damages resulting from the hurt sustained, a judgment of nonsuit was rendered, which was affirmed on appeal, the court finding that the reasons assigned by plaintiff for going to the station platform were subterfuges, and holding that a through passenger on a train which did not stop at intermediate stations, who leaves such train without the knowledge, consent, or invitation of the company, at any intermediate station at which the train may stop for some purpose necessary to its operation and management only, abandons for the time being his relation as a passenger, and assumes all the risks incident to his movements. In rendering that decision, Mr. Justice Brown, speaking for the court, says: "In the case of a local train the company is bound to know that passengers may be received and discharged at all stations at which a train may stop for that purpose, and is required by the rule to keep the approaches to the train in a safe condition for their egress and ingress." Further in the opinion it is said: "This was not a local train, but a through train, and the plaintiff was a through passenger. The train did not stop at Grand Rapids to receive or discharge passengers. There was no invitation held out to plaintiff to leave the train at that station. There was no occasion for him to do so, and he must be taken to have assumed all risks incident thereto. There was not only no invitation, express or implied, to passengers to leave the train at this station, but the fact that the station platform was unlighted was in the nature of a warning to them to remain on board."

The cases to which attention has been called, illustrating the right of a passenger, without forfeiting his relation as such, to leave a car or a boat at an intermediate station or landing to transact business of his own, or for his own pleasure, where a stop is made to receive or discharge passengers, are relied upon by plaintiff's counsel to justify their client in assuming, from the unlighted platform, that it was safe for him to walk thereon.

An examination of these cases will show that Dice v. Willamette Transp. & Locks Co. 8 Or. 60, 34 Am. Rep. 575 is the only one cited in which judgment is given for injuries received in the darkness by a passenger at an intermediate station or landing by leaving a car or a boat to transact business not connected with the carrier; and in that case it will be remembered that the steamboat and the wharf were lighted, but not sufficiently to enable the plaintiff to discover and avoid the danger to which he was exposed. In that case, the boat having made a landing at night where passengers and freight were being discharged, Dice might reasonably have inferred from the light on the wharf and on the steamer, which he must have seen, that the passage-way was sufficiently illuminated to enable him safely to go ashore. In the case at bar, if the plaintiff had necessarily been compelled to leave the car because the Columbia Southern Railway Company neglected to furnish suitable accommodations, or if the train of the other company, upon which he expected to take passage, was approaching Biggs Station, so that to board it he was obliged to cross the depot platform in the darkness, a very different rule of law would be applicable. The right of a passenger, before reaching his destination, to leave a car and to walk on a depot platform for exercise, when the train is stopped in daylight, to receive or discharge passengers, or at night, even, when the walk is sufficiently illuminated, is admitted. The vibration of a car in rapid motion prevents a passenger from materially changing his position in a seat, the occupation of which for several hours necessarily produces extreme tension of the muscles of the lower limbs, to relax which relief is found in walking, and, as this cannot readily be secured in a car, it must be obtained, if at all, outside the coach and when it is at rest. When a train is stopped in daylight for any reasonable length of time to receive or discharge passengers, an invitation is thereby tacitly extended by the railroad company to the passengers in the coaches to alight for a few minutes' rest and invigoration by a change of position and a respiration of pure air. This same invitation, it would seem, must also be offered at night where a train is stopped for a reasonable time to receive or discharge passengers at a station, the platform of which is well lighted. A passenger on a train, before reaching his destination, cannot, in reason, be invited to leave the car every time a stop is made at night to receive or discharge passengers. If a contrary rule were to obtain, it would necessarily follow that a railroad company would not venture to stop a train when flagged at night at an insignificant station, the platform of which was not illuminated, however urgent might be the call to board the train. When the platform of a depot at which a train stops at night is not illuminated, the darkness is a notice to passengers in the cars who are not obliged to depart at that station to remain in the coaches. Lemery v. Great Northern R. Co. 83 Minn. 47, 85 N. W. 908. So, too, where a person, intending to take a train, goes at night to a well-lighted waiting room of a depot and, leaving it, walks to an unlighted freight platform and there sustains an injury, his contributory negligence precludes a recovery. Gunderman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 58 Mo. App. 370. In that case the plaintiff, knowing the construction of the depot, went to a platform not intended to be used by passengers. It is cited, however, to show that an unlighted way imparts notice to all persons except such as are necessarily compelled to pass over it. In deciding that case the court, referring to the plaintiff, says: "He wantonly left the comfortable waiting rooms and well-lighted passenger platform of defendant, and sauntered forth into the darkness, and upon the defendant's freight platform, and, without there giving heed to the existing conditions, patent to his senses, and which were sufficient to have warned an ordinarily prudent man of the probable danger of proceeding further, he persisted in going forward until he fell into the pit. He was guilty of such contributory negligence as must preclude his recovery." To the same effect, see Grimes v. Pennsylvania Co. 36 Fed. 72.

In the case at bar plaintiff had crossed the depot platform several times in daylight before he was injured, and, though he testified that his attention was never called to the condition of the ground at the west end of the platform, he knew the south side of the walk surrounding the building was elevated while the north side was level with the track of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. Knowing these facts, reason must have taught him that the surface of the ground at the west end of the platform descended to the south, unless it had been graded up to that line.

If it was incumbent upon either of the defendants to light the depot platform three hours before a train was expected to arrive, the failure in this respect was known to the plaintiff, who, when he was injured, was not necessarily compelled to leave the well-lighted car that had been provided for his accommodation; but, having done so, on one of the darkest nights he ever saw, his injury results from his own contributory negligence, thereby precluding a recovery of damages for the hurt sustained. Massey v. Seller, 45 Or. 267, 77 Pac. 397; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Turley, 29 C. C. A. 196, 56 U. S. App. 1, 85 Fed. 369; Emery v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Minn. 465, 80 N. W. 627.

There being no conflict in the testimony, an error was committed in refusing to give a judgment of nonsuit in favor of each defendant. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the motions interposed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

STATE OF OREGON, Resp.,
v.

J. C. RYAN, Appt.

(.... Or.)

1. Conspiracy—proof of.

A conspiracy may be proved by showing the declarations, acts, and conduct of the conspirators.

2. Same—admission of evidence.

Upon trial of one accused of getting money from another by means of a conspiracy to steal, evidence is admissible of declarations by one of the conspirators which induced the victim to go to the desired spot, where the others carried out the scheme, although no conspiracy was shown to have existed at the time they were made.

3. Larceny—securing money by trick.

One who induces another to part with money as a wager on a pretended event which is not to take place, with the intention of appropriating it to his own use, is guilty of larceny in making such appropriation, notwithstanding the owner consents to part with the possession.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County convicting him of larceny. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James McCain, W. H. Holmes, and Webster Holmes, for appellant:

Evidence of Huston's sayings in Portland was inadmissible.

Underhill, Crim. Ev. §§ 492, 493; Cox v. State, 8 Tex. App. 258, 34 Am. Rep. 746; State v. McGee, 81 Iowa, 17, 46 N. W. 764; Wiborg v. United States, 163 U. S. 632, 41 L. ed. 289, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1127, 1197; Brown v. United States, 150 U. S. 97, 37 L. ed. 1012, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37.

Larceny is not necessarily committed wherever property is feloniously obtained from the owner by means of schemes or fraudulent acts.

Eichel-*

Case Note.—In STATE v. RYAN the prosecutor did not become a party to the wager. The race and pretended bet between the confederates were merely a trick by which possession of the money produced by him as security for his position as stakeholder was obtained, and the case falls within the general principle of larceny by trick, so well stated in State v. Edwards, 51 W. Va. 220, 59 L. R. A. 465, 41 S. E. 429: "Where a person, by means of some fraud or trick, and with intent to steal, procures the delivery of money or goods to him by the owner, it amounts to a taking, within the definition of larceny, unless the delivery of the possession is made for the purpose of passing the property or title in the goods as well as the possession. And, if possession be acquired by such means, and with such intent, and the goods or money are afterwards converted by the taker to his own use, the offense is larceny; and whether such intent existed at the time of the taking and practice of the fraud is a question for the jury. But this distinction must be borne in mind: If the property is delivered with the intention on the part of its owner of parting with it altogether, passing both title and possession, the offense is not larceny, but obtaining property by false L.R.A. (N.S.) pretenses; but, if the owner is induced to deliver the possession only, the taker having a preconceived design to convert it to his own use when obtained, it is implied that the taking is against the will of the owner, and the offense is larceny. While the act of taking, in order to constitute larceny, must be a trespass against the owner's possession, actual violence is not necessary, for in these cases the fraud by which possession is acquired takes the place of force."

The case is nevertheless closely related to that of a wager to which the prosecutor becomes a party, staking his money upon a pretended chance at cards, dice, or other game, upon the outcome of which, however, there is, through prearranged design of the other parties thereto, no intention or possibility of his winning. That the confederates in such a game are guilty of larceny is generally recognized. "It is larceny where the defendants so fraudulently conduct a gambling game or lottery as to give the prosecutor no chance of winning, and he parts with his money through fraud or fear." Rapalje, Larceny, § 14.

Larceny by trick is well illustrated by State v. Edwards, above quoted from. The prosecutor was induced by a friend to enter a three-card-monte game with a stranger.

204, 40 N. W. 107; Com. v. Eichelberger, 119 Pa. 254, 4 Am. St. Rep. 642, 13 Atl. 422.

Wolverton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of the crime of larceny, and appeals from the judgment rendered in pursuance thereof.

The subject of the larceny was $2,000, consisting of 100 gold $20 pieces, current money of the United States, alleged to have been the property of one John F. Roth, the prosecuting witness. Roth testified, in substance, that he was acquainted with the defendant; that he met him in Salem, Oregon, at the Willamette hotel on the 23d day of September, 1904; that defendant came to a room in the hotel occupied by witness and a party by the name of Huston, and was introduced to him by Huston; that witness met Huston in Portland, about two days prior to this date, in Doctor Pohl's office, and had a conversation with him therein; and that he explained what he was up for. Witness continues (quoting from the bill of exceptions): "Huston told me that two men here at Salem were trying to get up a foot race, and he said that they wanted some bona fide business man to come up here and hold the money for them; and he says, if he could get me to come up here, he would assure me that he would pay me well for my trouble. He said I did not need to bet anything. He said them two fellows had lots of money. All they wanted was for me to come up here and hold the money, and divide it fairly after the race

After winning a small amount, larger stakes were put up, and he and his "friend" won heavily. He was prevailed upon to return a little to the stranger, who had been fleeced, and the prosecutor's money, a pile of $300, was given over, leaving him with a tin box full of bogus paper. The "friend" was held guilty of larceny.

Loomis v. People, 67 N. Y. 322, 23 Am. Rep. 123, which is there cited, is of a similar nature. The prosecutor, having been decoyed into a saloon by one of two confederates, was induced by one to loan him a sum to stake upon the throw of dice. It was lost to the other confederate pursuant to the scheme of the two. It was held to be larceny.

That cannot be called a game of chance, says the court in United States v. Murphy, MacArth. & M. 375, 48 Am. Rep. 754, where the result is certain, and by no possibility could the victim have won. A conviction for larceny was sustained, the game of faro, in which the prosecutor's money was lost, being proved to be a mere farce, in which the sharpers were sure of winning.

Similarly, in Miller v. Com. 78 Ky. 15, 39 Am. Rep. 194, the prosecutor was taken in by conspirators in a faro game so operated that only they could win. Money was obtained from him by his "friend" to stake on the game, and was lost to the second of the two confederates. The latter are said by the court to be in the same position as if, instead of going through the form of the game, they had, immediately upon obtaining possession of the money, divided it between them.

Exactly this state of affairs appears in Queen v. Buckmaster, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 182, where the prisoner, having obtained the prosecutor's money at the race track under pretense of making a bet upon a forthcoming race, made off with the same, and, after the race, denied the existence of the bet or having received any money from the prosecutor.

Similar cases in which a conviction for larceny is sustained are found in Hall v. State, 6 Baxt. 522; State v. Skilbrick, 25 Wash. 558, 87 Am. St. Rep. 784, 66 Pac. 53; People v. Dean, 35 N. Y. S. R. 931, 12 N. Y. Supp. 749; Rex v. Robson, Russ. & R. C. C. 413. See, however, Hindman v. State, 72 Ark. 516, 81 S. W. 836.

was over, and I agreed to come up on those conditions; and I came up here, and on Friday evening we went to the hotel, and Ryan came up to our room, and Huston introduced me to him, and he [Ryan] explained the thing differently. He said he wanted to bet some money on a foot race against Raymond. He said Raymond was a friend of his, and he wanted me to bet against Raymond for him, and he said he would pay me for my trouble. Next day he met us again and wanted to know if I had any money in the bank to show I was a business man in Portland. The next day Ryan came to the hotel again, and wanted to know if I had any money to show, in case of an argument, that everything was all right, that I was responsible, and I told him that I had a bank book, the money that was put in the bank from our business, and a small check, and he said in case of an argument he wanted to show about $2,000 in the bank; that that would be enough to satisfy Raymond probably, if he lost that much money and wanted to protest the race. He wanted me to go back and make arrangements so I could get $2,000, and I went back and explained the case to my brother-in-law, and he let me have that amount of money. Ryan said we might not have to draw it and I agreed to it, and we came back here Tuesday, Huston and I, and Ryan met us and went to the hotel with us, and we had dinner, and after dinner he [Ryan] went out. About 1 o'clock Ryan met us again, and he took us down to his room,—it was over a saloon on the corner,—and he introduced me to this man Raymond, and Raymond said that he wanted to bet some money on a foot race. Ryan gave me a bunch of greenbacks marked $2,500, and he said, when Raymond came, 'You bet this money with him,' so Raymond said he wanted to bet, and he put down $2,500 in greenbacks. Raymond said he would go back to the bank, and Ryan gave me a bunch, $3,000, all in greenbacks, and I bet Raymond all this other bunch. It was put in a little grip, and Raymond went downstairs with this man, Morris. While he was down there, Ryan gave me another bunch of $5,000 in greenbacks, but he says, 'Go down and draw your money,' and he said, 'I want the money.' I did not think anything about it being a scheme, and I went down to draw my money. It was $2,000. I got it all in 20-dollar gold pieces. When I got back, Raymond says, 'I have got $5,000 more,' and I bet him the $5,000 which Ryan gave me. Ryan says, 'Did you draw your money from the bank?—and I had it in a little bag, and Ryan took it and he put it in a grip and he says, 'We will run the race,' and he says, 'Leave the money in the bank,' and he stepped out about five or ten minutes and came back and showed me a little receipt, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which read: 'One grip and contents deposited here.' He folded it up and put it in his pocket, and said, 'After the foot race we will get it,' and we went out to the ball ground, and, when we got there, there were a few boys in there, about sixteen or eighteen years old, playing ball. Then it was decided to go back of the ball ground, and they went back there, and Ryan stepped off 60 feet and told me to go to one end while he measured off 60 feet, and I stayed up there, and the men started to run and one fell down, and Ryan said to Raymond: 'We will run this thing over inside of ten days,' and he said: 'All right. We will go to the race track or some other place,' and we agreed all around that we would run it off in ten days, and Ryan said: 'We will leave the money in the bank until after the race comes off,' and I went back to Portland that same night, and Huston went along." The witness further testified, in substance, that he came to Salem on the 23d of September in company with Huston; that Ryan, Raymond, Morris, Huston, and another man accompanied him to the race; that Morris was one of the runners and Huston the other; that Ryan was supposed to be betting on Huston, and Raymond on Morris. The defendant offered evidence tending to show that he met Roth, the prosecuting witness, for the first time on the 23d of September, 1904; that he was not introduced to him, but that Roth came to him on the street and said to him, in substance: "We understand that you know something about athletics, and [referring to the foot race in question] we would like for you to be stakeholder," which the defendant consented to do. He said, amongst other things, to the defendant, that he wanted it understood that this race was to be run as private as possible, and, as his partner was interested with him, he did not want him to know this race was coming off; and, further, the defendant testified and offered evidence tending to show that, after the race was run and was unsatisfactory to Roth, it was agreed between Roth and Raymond, who was backing the other runner, Morris, that the race should be again run on the following Saturday. That the defendant retained the money until late in the evening Saturday, and after the time had expired within which the race was to be rerun, Raymond and Morris, his runner, were present, ready to rerun the race, but that Roth did not come with his runner to contest. That after his time had expired [the defendant] as stakeholder turned the money in his hands over to Raymond." The foregoing testimony illustrates fairly the respective positions of the parties litigant. There was an objection interposed to the prosecuting witness detailing what was said and done by Huston in Portland, that being two days prior to the time they met the defendant in Salem, on the ground that such evidence was incompetent by which to establish the defendant's guilt. The court, however, permitted it to go to the jury upon the assurance on the part of the state's attorney that he would connect up Huston with the defendant in the transaction later on in the trial. Error is now predicated upon the admission of such testimony, not because of the order in which it was allowed to go to the jury, but solely upon its incompetency.

The theory of the state is that both Huston and the defendant were, with others, engaged in a conspiracy to wrongfully obtain the money in question from Roth, and that what was said and done by Huston in Portland was in furtherance of such conspiracy, and therefore tantamount to the utterances and acts of the defendant himself. It is a matter, perhaps, of substantive law, rather than a rule of evidence, that what one conspirator says and does during the existence and in furtherance of the conspiracy are the utterances and doings of all, on like principle that the acts of an agent within the legitimate scope of his employment bind his principal as if done by the latter. The conspirators are all principals, and the acts of each are the acts of his fellow conspirators, and are binding upon that basis. Unless, therefore, the relationship is such as to make them all principals, none are affected, except the party whose acts or admissions are in question. When the appropriate relationship is shown, then may the acts and utterances of each be shown as the acts and utterances of all. 3 Wigmore, Ev. § 1797; 15 Am. Law Rev. 80. The common expression of the books seems to be that "those declarations only are admissible which are made by a conspirator during the existence of the conspiracy, and in furtherance of it." Underhill, Crim. Ev. § 493. Greenleaf says that the acts and declarations must "be those only which were made and done during the pendency of the criminal enterprise, and in furtherance of its objects." 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 184a.

Now, it is argued that what Huston said and did in Portland was prior to the formation of any conspiracy between the parties concerned in the theft. But is the premise well founded? It is not material at what particular time anyone entered into the conspiracy. It is enough to know that he was a common conspirator. The acts or declarations of one or more of the conspirators are sometimes admitted before sufficient proof is given of the conspiracy. This rests, however, largely within the discretion of the trial court, but the proper connection must be subsequently made, so as to show prima facie a conspiracy between all, before such acts or declarations will ultimately be permitted to go to the jury. Such is the course pursued in the present case. A conspiracy may be proved by showing the declarations, acts, and conduct of the conspirators. It is seldom possible to establish a specific understanding by direct agreement between the parties to effect or accomplish an unlawful purpose. Usually, therefore, the evidence must be necessarily circumstantial in character, and will be sufficient, if it leads to the conviction that such a combination in fact existed. Thus, if it be shown that the conspirators were apparently working to the same purpose,—that is, one performing one part and another another,—each tending to the attainment of the same object, so that in the end there was apparent concert of action, whether they were acting in the immediate presence of each other or not, it would afford proof of a conspiracy to effectuate that object. Mussel Slough Case, 6 Sawy. 612, 5 Fed. 680; United States v. Sacia, 2 Fed. 754. Such proofs would evidence prima facie a conspiracy. So it is, as was pertinently said by Pennefather, Ch. J., in R. v. O'Connell, cited and quoted in 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1079: "If the conspiracy be proved to have existed, or rather, if evidence be given to the jury of its existence, the acts of one in furtherance of the common design are the acts of all; and, whatever one does in furtherance of the common design, he does as the agent of the co-conspirators." Now, a conspiracy between Huston and the defendant was not shown prima facie sufficient to carry the case to the jury, until their acts and conduct two days later in Salem were detailed by the witness. But Huston's declarations and representations to Roth in Portland, and the fact that the former accompanied the latter to Salem, leading to a meeting with the defendant and the other parties concerned in the scheme, coupled with the further fact that the scheme was then carried to a successful issue, all participating, show a common design of all. That design could not have been successful without Roth's presence in Salem, and Huston played the part of bringing him here. This affords evidence in itself of a conspiracy existing prior to the time that Huston talked with Roth in Portland; and, further, that the acts and declarations of Huston in the presence of Roth were but a part of the common design to effectuate the purpose of the conspiracy. What Huston did, therefore, in Portland was in furtherance of the common design and prima facie, at least, during the existence of the conspiracy. The scheme included a foot race and a betting thereon, or a simulation to that effect. Huston talked about such a scheme in Portland, and, when he induced Roth to come to Salem, the defendant took the matter up where Huston had left it, and Huston subsequently participated in the race. Could there be any more pertinent evidence of a conspiracy between Huston and the defendant to accomplish an unlawful purpose, and that it had its origin prior to Huston's meeting Roth in Portland? Clearly not. The ruling of the trial court in admitting the evidence was therefore unexceptional. State v. Moore, 32 Or. 65, 48 Pac. 468, is by analogy authority for this view, and State v. McGee, 81 Iowa, 17, 46 N. W. 764, so much relied on by appellant, is not adverse.

The next assignment of error relates to the following instructions of the court, to wit: "If, however, the property was received or taken by the defendant with a felonious intent at the time, he is guilty of larceny, even though it were by the owner's consent. Any preconcerted plan to obtain money, and an intent to steal coupled with that plan, is felonious. If money is obtained by trick, artifice, or device, as fraudulently obtaining it under color of a bet, inducing a person to bet merely for the purpose of getting possession of the stakes deposited, and with the intent to appropriate them, regardless of the event on which the bet was made, is larceny. So you are to consider whether or not this whole transaction was a mere scheme or device to steal Roth's money. If it appears to you beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant entered into such scheme, either by himself or with others, intending all the time to steal this money from Roth, and you should believe that beyond a reasonable doubt, and further find that he did get the money by such scheme, you should find him guilty as charged in the indictment." The meaning intended to be conveyed by the language quoted is elucidated by a preceding clause and others that followed, whereby it was explained that, if the property was received in good faith, a subsequent wrongful conversion would not support an allegation of larceny in the original taking; and, further, that if the bet was made, and Ryan was a stakeholder in good faith, he could pay the money over to the winner at any time after the race, and before a return was demanded by Roth, and the transaction would not constitute larceny. The legal significance of the term "bet" or "wager" is well understood. The contention of appellant is that, if Roth bet his money on the foot race in question, it is not of the slightest legal consequence how he came to do so, whether he was so induced by fraud or not, or whether the foot race was fair or not; that in either or any event he parted with his money voluntarily, and, there not being present the element of trespass, there could be no larceny. The 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

proposition goes beyond the authorities. It is not larceny, say the learned authors of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 18, 2d ed. p. 482), to obtain money "by inducing a person to bet on some game or trick, and then, by fraudulently making it appear that the party betting has lost, taking the stakes deposited by him." The text seems to be based upon an old English case, where the party parted with his property on a wagering trick, supposing that he had lost fairly. King v. Nicholson, 2 Leach, C. L. 610. By a footnote the authors further say: "A distinction is to be noted between apparently winning a bet by fraudulent means and inducing a party to deposit money or goods on a bet merely as a means of getting possession of them." The principle applicable for determining whether money obtained fraudulently amounts to larceny or not is well illustrated in People v. Tomlinson, 102 Cal. 19, 23, 36 Pac. 506, 507. The court says: "Where one honestly receives the possession of goods upon a trust, and, after receiving them, fraudulently converts them to his own use, it is a case of embezzlement. If the possession has been obtained by fraud, trick, or device, and the owner of it intends to part with his title when he gives up possession, the offense, if any, is obtaining money by false pretenses. But, where the possession has been obtained through a trick or device, with the intent, at the time the party receives it, to convert the same to his own use, and the owner of the property parts merely with the possession, and not with the title, the offense is larceny." The distinction was applied in a later case. People v. Shaughnessy, 110 Cal. 598, 43 Pac. 2. Mr. Justice Caton states the principle a little more comprehensively in Welsh v. People, 17 Ill. 339. He says: "The rule is plainly this: If the owner of goods alleged to have been stolen parts with both the possession and the title to the goods to the alleged thief, then neither the taking nor the conversion is felonious. It can but amount to fraud. It is obtaining goods under false pretenses. If, however, the owner parts with the possession voluntarily, but does not part with the title, expecting and intending that the same thing shall be returned to him, or that it shall be disposed of on his account, or in a particular way, as directed or agreed upon, for his benefit, then the goods may be feloniously converted by the bailee, so as to relate back and make the taking and conversion a larceny." This doctrine is expressly reaffirmed by two later cases from the same state. Stinson v. People, 43 Ill. 397; Doss v. People, 158 Ill. 660, 49 Am. St. Rep. 180, 41 N. E. 1093. The latter comes very near on the facts to the case at bar.

tors made use of the bet as a scheme or device to secure possession of Roth's money, and at the same time the bet was merely simulated, it not being intended that there should be a bona fide foot race between the supposed contestants, and the money was received to be disposed of on the result of such race, and the race was not run bona fide, and was not so intended from the beginning, then it was larceny in the defendant to appropriate it. The money was received by the defendant to be disposed of in a particular way; that is, to be held as stakes to abide the event of a bona fide foot race. If Roth won, the money was to be returned to him with his winning, but, if he lost, then to be turned over to Raymond. Such was the effect of the wager, if real. If, however, there was not to be a bona fide race, and the defendant intended to retain the money to his own use, and not to dispose of it on account of Roth, or in a particular way, to which Roth had assented, then there was a larcenous taking, for Roth would never have assented to staking his money if he had known that it was to be retained in any event. Though he may have voluntarily given the money into the hands of the defendant, he did not part with the title, because he was tricked to believe there was to be a fair and bona fide foot race; and, while he might have intended to bet, the defendant did not intend that he should have any chance of winning, and therefore did not intend to account for the money or dispose of it in the particular way agreed upon. Thus he obtained Roth's money feloniously, and was guilty of larceny from the inception. If this is not larceny, then the distinction is too refined for practical and safe application. As was said by Mr. Justice Campbell, in People v. Shaw, 57 Mich. 403, 406, 58 Am. Rep. 372, 24 N. W. 121, 122, whose language is peculiarly apt in the present exigency: "We do not think it profitable to draw overnice metaphysical distinctions to save thieves from punishment. If rogues conspire to get away a man's money by such tricks as those which were played here, it is not going beyond the settled rules of law to hold that the fraud will supply the place of trespass in the taking, and so make the conversion felonious."

The circuit court properly distinguished between a real bet and one that was merely colorable or simulated for the purpose of getting wrongful possession of Roth's money, and the instructions are not vulnerable to the objections interposed.

The court further instructed that evidence of an escape is always admissible as against the defendant, but at the same time left it to the judgment of the jury whether or not the real purpose of the defendant was to escape justice or to go about his affairs innocently. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This is assigned as error. The matter is disposed of, however, favorable to the instruction in State v. Lee, 17 Or. 488, 21 Pac. 455. No further comment is necessary.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Petition for rehearing denied.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

SUSAN F. EARLE

v.

RUDOLPH BERRY.

(.... R. I.)

1. New trial—finding on evidence.

A new trial will not be granted because the appellate court believes that the jury erroneously decided a question of fact on conflicting evidence.

2. Duress—refusal to pay money as.

Refusal to pay money admitted to be due, except upon receiving a certain kind of receipt, does not constitute such duress as to render the receipt void.

3. Compromise—receipt of less than is claimed.

An acknowledgment in writing that an amount received is all that is due, after a dispute as to what is due, is binding as a compromise.

(May 29, 1905.)

PETITION by defendant for new trial after verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover money alleged to be due and unpaid. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—The holding of EARLE v. BERRY, that the refusal to pay money admitted to be due, unless a receipt demanded is given, does not constitute duress, is in accord with other authorities, where the parties stand on equal terms, except for the fact that the person giving the receipt needs the money.

Thus, the giving of a full release of equities claimed in certain property with the full knowledge of all the facts, to one who had distinctly refused to recognize them, in order to induce the latter to surrender property which he had detained under a claim of ownership and in denial of the former's right, does not constitute duress. S. C. Hall Lumber Co. v. Gustin, 54 Mich. 624, 20 N. W. 616.

Nor does the fact that the one giving a receipt in full is an employee, and is told, on the determination of his employment, that he will get nothing unless he signs such receipt, change the rule. Golden v. Bartlett Illuminating Co. 114 Mich. 625, 72 N. W. 622.

Nor that the government was the debtor,

The exactment of the money in dispute was compulsory and against the will of the plaintiff.

The right to recover money paid under duress of property is very broad.

Mr. Earle's statement at the time of the signing of the receipt, that the defendant would hear further from this matter, prevents the receipt from being conclusive.

and that the claim was a very large one. United States v. Child, 12 Wall. 232, 20 L. ed. 360.

But stopping the payment of money due from third persons, with the knowledge that the creditor is in such circumstances that the failure to obtain the money will result in his financial ruin, will constitute duress avoiding a receipt in full, given on payment of part of the money claimed to be due. Vyne v. Glenn, 41 Mich. 112, 1 N. W. 997.

And the withholding of a seaman's wages unless he will sign a receipt in full, including claims for assaults and batteries and imprisonment as well as for wages, is held to constitute duress because of the peculiarly helpless and dependent position of seamen. Thomas v. M'Daniel, 14 Johns. 185; The David Pratt, 1 Ware, 495, Fed. Cas. No. 3,597.

Such a receipt has also been held void 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Douglas, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time to which this action relates—about September 2, 1902—the plaintiff and her family were the owners of 90 shares of the capital stock of the Phoenix Iron Foundry, a corporation doing business in the city of Providence, but all but 5 of these shares were hypothecated for debts,—63 shares to the Mechanics' Savings Bank to secure a loan of $12,600, and 22 shares to Alfred Metcalf to secure a debt of $8,000. The plaintiff's husband was a salaried officer of the company, and her two sons were employed there. One hundred and seventeen shares of the stock were owned by Edwin A. Smith, who was treasurer of the Mechanics' Savings Bank. The balance of the stock—30 shares—was in the treasury of the company. On September 2d, as he testifies, but probably a day later, the complainant's husband, who represented her in these transactions, received the following letter:

Providence, R. I., September 3, 1902.

Mr. Charles R. Earle, Treasurer.

Dear Sir:—

I have to inform you that I have disposed of my holdings in the Phoenix Iron Foundry, having sold all my stock to Mr. Perry H. Brundage, of 49 Wall Street, New York, for $300 per share, the same to be paid for at the Rhode Island Hospital Trust Company on October 1st, 1902, and he will take all the other stock at the same price provided he is notified of the same on or before September 15th. Yours truly, Edwin A. Smith.

The purchaser referred to in the letter was acting in the interest of the Textile Finishing Machinery Company, which had acquired a controlling interest in several other manufacturing corporations, and Mr.

for duress where it was executed after the seaman had applied for a discharge from service, and before the request had been granted. Mitchell v. Pratt, Taney, 448, Fed. Cas. No. 9,668.

And the refusal to pay a discharged employee in a foreign land any part of the amount due, or to bring him home in the vessel of the employer, as required by the contract of employment, unless a receipt in full is given, has also been held to amount to duress by imprisonment. Rourke v. Story, 4 E. D. Smith, 54.

So, also, the refusal, by a military commission, to return unquestioned vouchers to claimants unless they would sign receipts in full for an amount allowed after making an arbitrary deduction from another voucher has been held to constitute duress avoiding the receipt. Livingston v. United States, 3 Ct. Cl. 131.

Earle, on receipt of this letter, was alarmed lest this new controlling power should wind up the business of the Phoenix Iron Foundry, terminate his employment, and force the plaintiff to sell her stock at the price offered. He consulted counsel, who advised him that the treasury stock could lawfully be sold by the directors, and thereupon he conceived the plan of purchasing it for his wife, and thus giving her the control and thereby enabling her to continue the business, or to demand a larger price for her original shares. At first he endeavored to persuade Messrs. Berry & Boyden, a firm of which the defendant was a partner, to advance the money needed to pay for the treasury stock and to redeem the stock which had been pledged. He also approached other capitalists with similar propositions. Finally, he procured $9,000 from Alfred Metcalf, and placed it in the hands of the defendant, who paid it into the treasury of the company, and received therefor a certificate in his own name of the 30 shares of treasury stock. At the same time Mr. Metcalf intrusted the plaintiff's husband with the stock which he had held as security, and certificates for this stock were also placed in the defendant's hands. Mr. Earle continued negotiations with the agent of the textile company, and finally received and accepted on behalf of his wife an offer of $500 per share for the 90 shares originally controlled by her and $300 per share for the 30 shares purchased of the corporation. The defendant, on September 30th, with his own money, paid the note at the savings bank, with interest from July 1st to October 1st, amounting to $12,757.50 and obtained possession of the certificate which the bank had held. On October 1, 1902, the plaintiff's stock having been sold and the defendant having received $54,000 therefor, the parties met for a settlement. The defendant retained $2,500 for his own services, paid the counsel who had been employed $1,200, and, deducting the amount he had advanced to the Mechanics' Savings Bank, paid the plaintiff the balance, $20,542.50, and the amount due Mr. Metcalf, $17,000 (who had given an order to pay this sum to Mrs. Earle), and took the following receipt:

Providence, R. I., Oct. 1, 1902.

Received from Rudolph Berry $37,542.50, of which $17,000 is [to be] paid in cash to Alfred Metcalf, and the whole is the entire amount due from him on account of $54,000, collected by him on sale of stock in the Phoenix Iron Foundry by myself and others to Courtland C. Earle, as well as ourselves.

Susan F. Earle,
Charles R. Earle, and Courtland C. Earle,
by Charles R. Earle.

This suit was brought March 19, 1903, to recover the sum of $3,850, which it was alleged the defendant had wrongfully retained out of the sum of $54,000 collected on her account. The defendant pleaded the general issue and a plea in set-off, claiming that the plaintiff owed him $5,000 for services in advancing $12,757.50 to the Mechanics' Savings Bank, and for consultations in regard to the disposal of the stock, and for payments to the attorneys, and for his services in the premises. November 14, 1904, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,667.50, being $2,425 damages, and interest to the date of the trial, $242.50, thus allowing the defendant the amount he had paid the attorneys and $75 for his own services, and the defendant now brings his petition for a new trial on the grounds that the verdict is against the law and evidence, that there had been an accord and satisfaction of the claim in suit before the suit was commenced, that the court erred in charging the jury as requested by the plaintiff's counsel's requests 3 and 4, and that the amount of the verdict is excessive.

The plaintiff's case rested on the establishment of two propositions of fact: (1) That the defendant retained more money for his services than he was legally entitled to. (2) That the plaintiff's signature to the acknowledgment of full payment, which she signed, was procured by duress. We think she fails to sustain either proposition by satisfactory evidence. Mr. Earle's statement of Mr. Berry's relation to the transactions between them makes him only a voluntary lender of $12,757.50 for one day, upon ample and undoubted security. If this were his only service, a commission of from $50 to $100, as estimated by the stockbrokers who were called as witnesses, would seem to be sufficient compensation. Mr. Berry says that his agreement with Mr. Earle was to assist him with advances necessary to obtain control of the 120 shares, and, if the Textile Finishing Machinery Company should buy them, he should have $5,000 of the profits. If, on the contrary, the Textile Finishing Machinery Company should not purchase the stock, then he should furnish sufficient money to acquire all the stock and to carry on the business, and in the latter case should retain a controlling interest in the business. If this was the agreement, the amount of $2,500 was not excessive compensation for the risk he assumed. We think Mr. Berry's story accords better than Mr. Earle's with the undisputed circumstances in which the parties were placed. The Textile Finishing Machinery Company, in purchasing Mr. Smith's stock, supposed they were securing control of the corporation. Mr. Smith had stipulated for the plaintiff that she should receive the same price that he had obtained for himself. He had acted in good faith towards the Earles. But he was also the treasurer of the bank, and when he found that, by the device of using the treasury stock, the Earles had outwitted him and his customer, it was to be feared that he might retaliate by causing the bank to sell the pledged stock. Mr. Earle told Mr. Berry that the note was not due for six months; but the note itself, which is in evidence, shows that it was a demand note, and that the last interest had been paid only to July 1, 1902. Mr. Earle attempts to explain his statement to Mr. Berry by saying that he had a verbal agreement with Mr. Smith not to enforce payment of the note for six months; but such an agreement would have no binding force. Mr. Smith then had it in his power to make good to the Textile Finishing Machinery Company his agreement to deliver a majority of the stock, or, if they declined to go farther with the bargain, to demand from the Earles that they should redeem their pledged stock and purchase his holdings. The requirement in the charter that the stock should first be offered to the corporation could not have hindered such a sale, for the foundry had just emerged from the hands of a receiver, and had no money to pay out in acceptance of such a proposition. Something more was needed than a mere honest custodian of the stock and proceeds, to wit, a capitalist, able and willing, in case of necessity, to provide funds to satisfy present creditors and to continue the business; and this is the position which Mr. Berry says he agreed to fill. This question, however, of the value of the defendant's services depends upon conflicting evidence; and, though we believe the jury erred in their decision of it, we should not feel warranted, for this reason alone, in granting a new trial.

Upon the next question of fact there is nothing in the plaintiff's favor worthy of the name of evidence. The claim of duress rests upon the testimony of Mr. Earle alone, and he had been discredited by his statements to Mr. Berry, repeated at the trial, that the savings bank note could not be enforced until December, which a production of the note itself conclusively contradicts. Mr. Earle's testimony does not show any act of coercion on the part of the defendant. It is, in substance, that he presented an order from Mr. Metcalf directing the payment of his $17,000 to Mrs. Earle, and Mr. Berry refused to pay that until a receipt was prepared for Mrs. Earle to sign, showing the disposition of the whole of the money; and that, after the paper was prepared, Mr. Berry still refusing to pay what he admitted to be due unless she would sign the paper, he and the plaintiff concluded to sign it in order to get what Mr. Berry admitted to be due.

His testimony is reported as follows:

Q. What took place in regard to the settlement?

A. Then I asked him to give the money to Mrs. Earle.

Q. Did you state what money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What money did you state?

A. All of it.

Q. How much was it?

A. $54,000.

Q. What reply did Mr. Berry make to that?

A. He said he was not going to give it all to her.

Q. What did you then ask him?

A. I said—then—I took the order from Mr. Metcalf and presented the order, and I said, "Give me that."

Q. How much did that order call for?

A. I think that order called for $9,000. There were 22 shares that he bought of me. It was not necessary, but I handed it to him.

Q. Now, what reply did Mr. Berry make to your demand for the $17,000, called for by the order of Alfred Metcalf?

A. Well, now, Mr. Angell was very busy getting out some writing or paper, and he brought it in—when he finished it he brought it in—to Mrs. Earle, and I read it. It was a receipt for so much money, what she received,—some $35,000 that he wanted to pay her,—but she did not want to take it. I said, "Now, I will ask him for the $17,000." I took that paper in there and demanded that.

Q. Of whom?

A. Of Mr. Berry.

Q. What reply did he make to you?

A. He said he would not pay one without the whole of it.

Q. Did you make any demand for any portion of this sum?

A. I made a demand for that.

Q. Did you make any further demand upon him for the $9,000?

A. No, I made demand for that.

Q. Did you make any further demand besides the whole of the money and this part here?

A. Why, yes, sir; I did say—I think I told him that after he declined to give me that, I said, "Give me the $9,000."

Q. What reply did he make to that?

A. He said he would not give me any until Mrs. Earle signed that paper.

Q. And then what was done?

A. Well, after some little time, and waiting and thinking it over, I says, "All there is about it, I will sign that paper, and see him afterwards."

Q. Did you tell him so?

A. I said it so he could hear it, in his presence.

Q. Did Mrs. Earle have any talk with him or his attorney in regard to signing that paper?

A. She asked Mr. Parkhurst, I think, what she should do about it.

Q. Did she speak to Mr. Berry about it, whether or not she would sign the paper—did she speak to him about it?

A. She said she did not want to sign that paper; yes, sir.

Q. And the result was, as you said, that the paper was finally signed?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who signed it?

A. Mrs. Earle signed it and I did. It was a receipt; that is all it was; simply a receipt.

Mrs. Earle says she had no conversation with Mr. Berry at all. She only knows what her husband told her of the discussion between him and Mr. Berry. She signed the paper reluctantly, after her counsel had advised her to do so. Mr. Earle is contradicted by Mr. Parkhurst, Mr. Berry, and Mr. Angell as to any refusal by Mr. Berry to pay over the amount he admitted to be due unless the plaintiff would agree that it was the whole sum due. After the money had been drawn, Mrs. Earle acknowledged her obligation to Mr. Berry, and thanked him for what he had done. And no demand for any further sum was made upon Mr. Berry until the following March. As a matter of fact, the controversy between Mr. Earle and Mr. Berry seems to have been in respect to the attorney's bills, not in regard to Mr. Berry's compensation. Mr. Earle, all through the interview, denied his obligation to the attorneys, and persisted at the trial that they were not employed by him; but the evidence that their services were engaged and employed for the plaintiff's benefit is most convincing. The jury did not sustain Mr. Earle in this assertion, for the verdict allows the defendant the sums he paid the attorneys. The evidence so strongly preponderates against the claim of duress or coercion that we feel certain the jury did not rightly appreciate the question before them, and we are confirmed in this view by an examination of the exceptions taken by the defendant to the charge of the court.

Plaintiff's counsel requested the court to charge: "(3) That, if the jury find that the plaintiff signed the receipt offered in evidence in order that she might obtain the amount which it was undisputed belonged to her, after refusal on the part of the defendant to give it to her unless she did so, then the receipt is not binding upon the plaintiff, and she may recover, notwithstanding the statements contained in it." And: "(4) That the receipt signed by the plaintiff is not conclusive, but is, only evidence of a settlement; and the whole transaction and circumstances under which it was given may be gone into to explain it or avoid it." These requests were granted, and the defendant duly excepted. To the last statement the presiding justice added the following observations: "That is true. It would be a different thing if it was under seal. It is not. It was simply a receipt made and signed," etc. The first instruction goes farther than any reported case. It would have been correct if the defendant had been in possession of the plaintiff's goods, and had refused, without right, to deliver them unless upon payment of money not due. Duress of goods is recognized by the law as a cause for setting aside a contract or for allowing recovery of money paid. But a threat to withhold payment of a debt or to refuse performance of a contract is not duress. 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 448 d. The discrimination between duress and such inequitable conduct as is charged by the plaintiff in this case is clearly made by Cooley, J., in Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569, 8 N. W. 511, where it is held that "refusal, on demand, to pay a debt that is due, thereby forcing the creditor to receipt in full for only a partial payment, does not constitute duress if the debtor has done nothing unlawful to cause the financial embarrassment which compelled him to submit to the extortion." The opinion cites and analyzes the following cases: Astley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 915; Smith v. Bromley, 2 Dougl. K. B. 696; Ashmole v. Wainwright, L. R. 2 Q. B. 837; Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99, 62 Am. Dec. 142; Scholey v. Mumford, 60 N. Y. 498; Chase v. Dwinal, 7 Me. 134, 20 Am. Dec. 352; Shaw v. Woodcock, 7 Barn. & C. 73; Nelson v. Suddarth, 1 Hen. & M. 350; White v. Heylman, 34 Pa. 142; Sasportas v. Jennings, 1 Bay, 470; Collins v. Westbury, 2 Bay, 211, 1 Am. Dec. 643; Crawford v. Cato, 22 Ga. 594; Chandler v. Sanger, 114 Mass. 364, 19 Am. Rep. 367; Spaids v. Barrett, 57 Ill. 289, 11 Am. Rep. 10; Bates v. New York Ins. Co. 3 Johns. Cas. 238; Beckwith v. Frisbie, 32 Vt. 559; Adams v. Reeves, 68 N. C. 134, 12 Am. Rep. 627; Briggs v. Lewiston, 29 Me. 472; Grim v. Weissenberg School District, 57 Pa. 433, 98 Am. Dec. 237; First Nat. Bank v. Watkins, 21 Mich. 483; Skeate v. Beale, 11 Ad. & El. 983; Preston v. Boston, 12 Pick. 14; Wilcox v. Howland, 23 Pick. 167; and continues: "Many other cases might be cited, but it is wholly unnecessary. We have examined all to which our attention has been directed, and none are more favorable to the plaintiff's case than those above referred to. Some of them are much less so,"—citing Atlee v. Backhouse, 3 Mees. & W. 633; Hall v. Shultz, 4 Johns. 240, 4 Am. Dec. 270; Silliman v. United States, 101 U. S. 465, 25 L. ed. 987,—and sums up the case as follows: "In what did the alleged duress consist in the present case? Merely in this: That the debtors refused to pay on demand a debt already due, though the plaintiff was in great need of the money, and might be financially ruined in case he failed to obtain it. It is not pretended that Hackley and McGordon had done anything to bring Headley to the condition which made this money so important to him at this very time, or that they were in any manner responsible for his pecuniary embarrassment, except as they failed to pay this demand. The duress, then, is to be found exclusively in their failure to meet promptly their pecuniary obligation. But this, according to the plaintiff's claim, would have constituted no duress whatever if he had not happened to be in pecuniary straits; and the validity of negotiations, according to this claim, must be determined, not by the defendants' conduct, but by the plaintiff's necessities. The same contract which would be valid if made with a man easy in his circumstances becomes invalid when the contracting party is pressed with the necessity of immediately meeting his bank paper. But this would be a most dangerous, as well as a most unequal, doctrine; and, if accepted, no one could well know when he would be safe in dealing on the ordinary terms of negotiation with a party who professed to be in great need." In Silliman v. United States, supra, the owners of certain barges which were employed by the quartermaster's department claimed that they were forced by duress of their property to sign new charter parties at a reduced rate; but the court held that neither the forcible retention of the barges nor the refusal to pay the compensation agreed upon constituted duress. Harlan, J., says: "They yielded to the threat or demand of the department solely because they required, or supposed they required, money for the conduct of their business, or to meet their pecuniary obligations to others. . . . We are aware of no authority in the text-books or in the adjudged cases to justify us in holding that the last charter parties were executed under duress. There is present no element of duress in the legal acceptance of that word. The hardships of particular cases should not induce the courts to disregard the long-settled rules of law." Adams v. Schiffer, 11 Colo. 15, 7 Am. St. Rep. 202, 17 Pac. 21, was a bill in equity to set aside settlements and conveyances alleged to have been induced by fraud and oppression. The court found that the defendant's conduct amounted to duress of goods, but they say (p. 40 of 11 Colo., p. 216 of 7 Am. St. Rep., and p. 34 of 17 Pac.): "It was therefore not a mere withholding of a debt due from himself, but an unlawful interference between the plaintiff and other debtors, by means of which he stopped the payment to plaintiff of sums due him, and presents a case analogous to that of Vyne v. Glenn, 41 Mich. 112, 1 N. W. 997; reviewed by Mr. Justice Cooley in the case of Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 577, 8 N. W. 511. We are of the opinion that the settlement of the 1st of August was clearly made under duress of property, and must be held null and void." In the light of these cases, which are the only ones brought to our attention where the retention of money has been claimed to constitute duress, it is clear that the charge given was erroneous.

The second instruction gave the jury to understand that the paper which was signed by the plaintiff was a mere receipt, and was of inferior force to a release under seal. The statute (Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 202, § 12) has done away with the necessity of affixing a seal to a general or special release, and this reference to the law which had been abrogated was calculated to mislead the jury into giving the document less weight than it was entitled to. While not in form a release, it was more than a mere receipt. It was, in addition, an acknowledgment that the sum received was all that was due. The amount due having been in dispute, as all parties agree that it was, the offer and acceptance of the amount specified was binding upon both parties as a compromise. Hull v. Johnson, 22 R. I. 66, 46 Atl. 182. The receipt says, in effect, that it was so agreed upon, and cannot be contradicted except on a proof of mistake, fraud, duress, or undue influence. Small v. Sumner, 6 Gray, 239; Tanner v. Merrill, 108 Mich. 58, 31 L. R. A. 171, 62 Am. St. Rep. 687, 65 N. W. 664; Rosenmueller v. Lampe, 89 Ill. 212, 31 Am. Rep. 74; Ennis v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 165 Ill. 161, 46 N. E. 439; Lawrence v. Schuylkill Nav. Co. 4 Wash. C. C. 562, Fed. Cas. No. 8,143; Truax v. Miller, 48 Minn. 62, 50 N. W. 935. In United States v. Child, 12 Wall. 232, 20 L. ed. 360, Mr. Justice Miller makes this comprehensive statement, which is conclusive of the question before us. He says: "We can hardly conceive of a definition of duress that would bring this case within its terms. Authorities are cited to show that where, under peculiar circumstances, property is withheld from the owner, and he is forced to pay some unjust demand to obtain possession of it, he can afterwards maintain a suit for the money so paid. But no case can be found, we apprehend, where a party who, without force or intimidation, and with a full knowledge of all the facts of the case, accepts on account of an unliquidated and controverted demand a sum less than what he claims and believes to be due him, and agrees to accept that sum in full satisfaction, has been permitted to avoid his act on the ground that this is duress. If the principle contended for here be sound, no party can safely pay by way of compromise any sum less than what is claimed of him, for the compromise will be void, as obtained by duress. The common and generally praiseworthy procedure by which business men every day sacrifice part of claims which they believe to be just to secure payment of the remainder would always be duress, and the compromise void."

The defendant's exceptions to these instructions of the court are sustained, and the petition for a new trial is granted, and the case will be remitted to the Common Pleas Division for further proceedings.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIRST CIRCUIT.

THE PINE FOREST.

CHARLES W. MORSE et al., Appts.,
v.
READING COMPANY.

(64 C. C. A. 228, 129 Fed. 700.)

1. Salvage—by owners of vessel in fault.

The owners of a tug whose fault causes the wreck of its tow are not entitled to salvage for services rendered in raising and bringing the wreck into a port of refuge, although such services are rendered by another vessel belonging to them.

2. Same—effect of statute limiting liability.

The owners of a vessel whose fault causes a wreck cannot, by taking advantage of the statute for the limitation of liability after they have rendered services in raising and taking the sunken vessel into a port of refuge, entitle themselves to salvage, although the entire value of the ship in fault is consumed in satisfaction of the claim of the injured vessel, and the denial of the salvage claim will in effect give the injured party the value of the salvage services in addition to the amount allowed by the statute.

3. Same—agreement for compensation.

A formal agreement will not entitle a vessel in fault to salvage for services rendered to one injured.

4. Towage contract—salvage.

A towage contract cannot be converted, under the admiralty law, into a salvage service under conditions brought about by the fault of the tug.

(March 29, 1904.)

A PPEAL by libellants from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island dismissing a libel filed to compel payment of salvage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Colt and Putnam, Circuit Judges, and Aldrich, District Judge.

Mr. Edward E. Blodgett, with Mr. Eugene P. Carver, for appellants:

The right of limitation existed at the time of the accident, and the proceedings that are incident to making the limitation refer back to that time.

The City of Norwich, 118 U. S. 468, 30 L. ed. 134, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1150.

Messrs. Robert M. Morse and W. M. Richardson, for appellee:

Voluntary services of restitution give no claim to pecuniary compensation.

The Clarita and The Clara (The Clara Clarita v. Cox) 23 Wall. 1, 23 L. ed. 146; The Capella, L. R. 1 Adm. & Eccl. 356.

The duty or obligation of the tug to make restitution or to pay damages extends to her owners.

Fleming v. Lay, 48 C. C. A. 748, 109 Fed. 952.

Libellants should not be permitted to credit on their limited liability the cost to them of the services of restitution incurred prior to the stipulation; that is, to credit on their limited liability that which was not at the time a liability.

The Benefactor (New York & W. S. S. Co. v. Mount) 103 U. S. 239, 26 L. ed. 351.

Case Note.—The general doctrine that a vessel which has caused the wreck of another, or put the other in peril, cannot claim any salvage for rescuing the other vessel from its peril, has been applied in a good number of cases. The Sampson, 4 Blatchf. 28, Fed. Cas. No. 12,279; The Mary Patten, 2 Low. Dec. 196, Fed. Cas. No. 9,223; The Samuel H. Crawford, 6 Fed. 906; The Chas. E. Soper, 19 Fed. 844; The Minnie C. Taylor, 52 Fed. 323; The Washington v. The Saluda, Fed. Cas. No. 17,232; The Clarita and The Clara (The Clara Clarita v. Cox), 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

23 Wall. 1, 19, 23 L. ed. 146, 152. This rule is also cited in The Relief, 51 Fed. 255, and applied to a case somewhat analogous, holding that, if a pilot, through his unskillfulness, puts a vessel in distress, it would be grossly inequitable that the attending pilot boat of the association of which he is a member, and through which he gets his license, should profit by his want of skill.

In the case of THE PINE FOREST the only distinction from these cases was that the vessel claiming the salvage was not the one that caused the wreck, though they both

Putnam, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal relates to a libel for salvage, following a wreck which occurred under circumstances shown in the record in The Triton, in which case we passed down an opinion and entered judgment on February 4, 1904. 64 C. C. A. 226, 129 Fed. 698. The libel in this case was dismissed by the district court, and the libellants appealed to us. The Triton was a steam tug which had the barge Pine Forest in tow. The record stipulates into this case the proofs and proceedings in The Triton, where we found that The Pine Forest was wrecked, and that the tug, under her contract of towage, was liable for the damage arising therefrom. The amount now claimed is for raising The Pine Forest and bringing her into a port of refuge. It is agreed that we are to accept $8,750 as a fair value of the services, if they are to be recovered for in this proceeding. It was stipulated in The Triton that, aside from the $8,750 now in controversy, the damage to The Pine Forest and her cargo, for which The Triton was primarily responsible, amounted to $24,784.91. The items making up this total were stated in detail, and included repairs and refurnishings at the port of refuge, damage to the cargo, loss of freight, demurrage, loss of personal effects of the crew of the barge, and small incidental items. Therefore, if the amount now claimed is included with the stipulated damage to the barge and cargo, the total would be $33,534.91. It also appears in The Triton that her owners availed themselves of the provisions for limited liability contained in § 4283 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2943), and sequence; and, for that purpose, the value of their interest in accordance therewith was stipulated at $20,000. Consequently, damages were awarded at that amount, interest, and costs.

The barge was raised and brought into port, not by The Triton, but by the libellants, now the appellants, who were the owners of The Triton, or the representatives of those owners, and also the owners, or representatives of the owners, of the tugs and barges employed in the salving enterprise. Indeed, it is agreed that the libellant in The Triton is to be taken as the claimant in the case now before us, and that the libellants in the case now before us are to be taken as the claimants in the other suit and owners of the tug. The present libellants, however, undertake to make a distinction based on a claim that the employment of The Triton in the towage service for which she was held responsible was under a charter; but this is dismissed from our consideration by the fact that it appears, on cross-examination of the witness who testified that she was under charter, that it was not of the hull of the tug, and that during the towage service she remained under control of her owners. It cannot be claimed on the proofs before us that her owners pro hac vice were other than the registered owners. Thus, the legal identity of the parties in interest in the two litigations is established.

In The Glengaber, L. R. 3 Adm. & Eccl. 534, 535, decided by Sir Robert Phillimore in June, 1872, a vessel was brought into a position of jeopardy by a steam tug, as in the case at bar. Another steam tug, The Warrior, of which only a part of the owners were owners of the tug at fault, rescued the tow. It was held that the case was one of salvage. Sir Robert Phillimore concluded as follows: "I know of no authority for the proposition that a vessel wholly unconnected with the act of mischief is disentitled to salvage reward simply because she belongs to the same owners as the vessel that has done the mischief."

It will be noticed that this expression ignored the fact, which was carefully stated in the report of the case, that only some of the owners of The Warrior were owners of the other tug; and the decision has been cited with apparent approval, either without reference to this distinction, or without following it out, by text writers usually authoritative. Kennedy, Civil Salvage, 74, 75; Carver, Carriage by Sea, 3d ed. 1900, 386, note e. This makes, apparently, a weighty body of authority, all resting on the proposition that we are to look at the conduct of the salving ship only, and that this identifies with her all who are con-belonged to the same owners. But in The Washington v. The Saluda, supra, the situation was similar. The salvage was claimed by a pilot boat, and was denied because the pilot whose fault had caused the danger of the vessel in distress was a part owner of the pilot boat that claimed the salvage.

The principle of this decision is, in the language of Mr. Justice Clifford in The Clarita and The Clara, supra: "Whenever, therefore, a fault is committed whereby a collision ensues, that fault is imputed to the owners." This language was used in respect 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to liability for collision. But, if the fault is imputable to the owners, to allow them to recover salvage for rescuing a vessel from a danger which they had themselves caused would be to violate the maxim against allowing one to profit by his own fault. In the case of THE PINE FOREST there seems to have been an identity of ownership in respect to the vessel causing the damage and the one that claimed the salvage. Whether the doctrine of the case should apply where the ownership was the same only in part is another question.

nected with her, whether as officers, seamen, or owners. Nevertheless, this is certainly not now the law in England when the ownership is identical, as in the case at bar.

Authoritative English decisions later than The Glengaber, and also authoritative English text writers, hold the rule which defeats salvage in the case before us. In The Glenfruin, L. R. 10 Prob. Div. 103, decided in 1885, the salving vessel was expressly excluded on the ground of identical ownership with the vessel in fault; and The Laertes, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 187, 190, decided in 1887, laid down the same rule in positive terms. So in Carver, Carriage by Sea, 3d ed. 386, at the same page where the note refers to The Glengaber, the learned author, who is accepted as high authority, adopts the rule of The Glenfruin; and the work entitled Abbott's Merchants' Shipping and Seamen, 14th ed. 1901, at page 975, says: "The owners of a salving ship who are also the owners of the salvaged ship may obtain salvage remuneration from the owners of the salvaged cargo, provided the circumstances which caused the necessity for the salvage services do not amount to a breach of the contract of carriage between the ship's owners and the owners of the cargo which is on board the salvaged ship."

This is also accepted as the law in so accurate a work as Williams & Bruce, Admiralty, Jurisdiction & Practice, 3d ed. 1902, 141. The Glenfruin has never been questioned in England by any text writer, or, so far as the official reports disclose, by the supreme court of judicature in any of its departments, by the privy council, or by the House of Lords. These authorities declare the right of the crew of the salving ship to salvage; but this, of course, avoids the difficulties of the case before us. To the same effect, The Clarita and The Clara (The Clara Clarita v. Cox) 23 Wall. 1, 19, 23 L. ed. 146, 152, referring to circumstances under which the peril to which a vessel may be exposed is caused by libellants who claim salvage reward, says that "to the rule that such libellants are not entitled to recover there are no exceptions." Therefore, in view of the fact that the parties are identical, as we have explained, the present libellants are positively barred by the authorities everywhere, unless relieved by the statutes of limited liability.

As already stated, the owners of The Triton availed themselves of those statutes, and damages were assessed against her to the full amount at which her liability was limited. Therefore her entire value was exhausted in the proceeding against her. In this connection dates become important, and they are as follows: The wreck occurred January 16th; the work of raising The Pine Forest commenced on January 18th, and was completed on February 27th; on March 5th. The Triton was libeled; and on March 10th, the application was made for a limitation of liability. In the succeeding April the present libel was filed. So it appears that all the services for which compensation is now claimed were performed prior to the application for limitation of liability. Thus the present condition is a complication of artificial results arising from a mere incidental order of succession of dates. If the owners of The Triton had appreciated that she would ultimately be found at fault by the court, they might have surrendered her before commencing the services for which compensation is now claimed, and thus, perhaps, they could have purged themselves, and entitled themselves to a salvage reward. Also, if the services now claimed for had been rendered by someone else than the owners of The Triton, the burden of them would have rested on the claimant of The Pine Forest, without any right of recoupment from the owners of the tug. As it stands, the owner of the barge is receiving $20,000, in addition to services of the value of $8,750, a total of $28,750, thus in excess of the amount at which The Triton was appraised. This is contrary to the underlying purpose of the statute of limited liability. Nevertheless, by force of the rules and authorities to which we will refer, this anomalous result cannot be avoided.

It is to be borne in mind that the claim asserted in this libel is for salvage. But according to the underlying rules of the admiralty law, and aside from the statutes of limited liability, it is clear that the services rendered by the libellants, inasmuch as they were the owners of The Triton, were not salvage services. The authorities are overwhelming that under those rules there can be no salvage reward to a vessel or individual with reference to a condition arising from the fault of that vessel or individual. This is not merely technical, but it is recognized everywhere as fundamental.

In stating this proposition, we must regard as ineffectual the suggestions on the one side and the other with reference to the nature of the alleged stipulations between the owner of the barge and the owners of The Triton, and of the conferences which occurred between them, as to the services which were rendered by the present libellants. Salvage does not ordinarily arise out of a contract, and the most formal agreements for salvage or rescue services do not bar the admiralty from reaching the merits, or from applying its fundamental rules when circumstances justify it. Presumably, at the time of these conferences, the libellants had no belief that The Triton was in fault, or that there was anything in the way of their recovering for the services which the conversations concerned, and to which the present litigation relates. Very likely, also, the owner of The Pine Forest had at that time no decided understanding otherwise. Nevertheless, as well observed by the learned judge of the district court, this suit "must be determined from the proof as to the things which were done;" that is, from the event. What we intend by this, a hypothetical illustration from a class of cases which are common will make clear. Two vessels are in collision; No. 1 is seriously damaged and No. 2 only slightly injured, or not injured at all. No. 1 appeals to No. 2 for assistance; and immediately from the decks of the two vessels, the masters agree as to a round sum to be paid for the assistance, if successful. All this is effectual if it is afterwards determined that No. 2 is not in fault, but it goes for nothing if it is finally settled that she was the guilty vessel. Therefore, as we have said, the conferences referred to are not of importance on the appeal before us.

We come to the precise proposition that, at the critical time, the relations of The Triton and The Pine Forest were such that, under the maritime law, no claim could arise on which the libel now before us, which asks salvage, can be based. The Triton was under a contract of towage. She was not released from that contract by the mere fact that the barge required assistance which, under ordinary circumstances, would entitle those rendering it to salvage compensation. The Carbonero, 45 C. C. A. 314, 106 Fed. 329, 333. Also, under all the authorities and on principle, a towage contract cannot be converted under the admiralty law into a salvage service under conditions brought about by the fault of the tug, as in the case before us. This is declared in nearly all the authorities we have cited, and emphatically in The Clarita and The Clara (The Clara Clarita v. Cox) 23 Wall. 1, 18, 19, 23 L. ed. 146, 152. A very late reaffirmance of the rule is found in The Duc D'Aumale [1904] p. 60.

These propositions are not dicta, nor limited to special circumstances. They are the logical results of proportions of maritime law, so plain that they need not be detailed, and all the text writers of authority agree to them. We have no occasion now to discuss the conditions under which officers and crews can become salvors, because there are here no such conditions. The officers and crews of the rescuing tugs and barges were paid their ordinary wages, included in the $8,750. These rules of maritime law would so plainly bar the libellants from maintaining a libel for salvage as salvage 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) that we would not have deemed it necessary to elaborate them, or cite authorities in reference thereto, except that they do not appear to have received special attention in their particular application to the case at bar. They dispose of this case, because, as we have said, it is strictly a libel for salvage.

Nevertheless, it is interesting and worth our while, in order to avoid any impression that we are disposing of this appeal on merely technical grounds, to pursue the relations of the parties to the controversy somewhat further. Section 4283 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2943) provides that the "liability of the owner" "shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending." If we had only that general declaration of the fundamental rule of adjustment, and the case was not merely a libel for salvage, but one which would enable us to make a complete disposition of all counterclaims and all equities pro and con, we might, perhaps, in the absence of authorities otherwise, administer the statute by holding that the owners of The Triton, in rendering services, in raising The Pine Forest, to the value of $8,750, should be equitably discharged from liability to that extent, and that, in determining all the sums to be awarded against her and her owners, this $8,750 should be deducted; so that ultimately the statutory provision that the liability of owners should in no case exceed the amount or value of their interest could be literally, and also substantially, complied with. But, aside from the fact that the form of proceedings now before us could not, for the reasons we have stated, permit so broad an adjustment, the various statutes of limited liability have not been administered practically in that enlarged manner, and do not contain machinery adjusted thereto.

As sustaining this proposition, the claimant relies on The Benefactor (New York & W. S. S. Co. v. Mount), 103 U. S. 239, 245, 26 L. ed. 351, 354, where it is said that, in case of payment of a demand against a vessel before proceedings for limited liability are commenced, the court will refuse its aid in compelling return of the money received. This, however, is to be considered in connection with the later case of The City of Norwich, 118 U. S. 468, 30 L. ed. 134, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1150. What is to be met in the case at bar is not a simple proposition like that in The Benefactor, but the possibly logical result of the application of the statutes of limited liability in harmony with The City of Norwich, at page 493, 118 U. S., at page 143, 30 L. ed., and at page 1156, 6

Sup. Ct. Rep. Speaking of the options given the vessel owner, namely, one of surrendering the vessel and the other of an appraisal, this opinion says that the measure of liability is the same whichever course is adopted. It adds that this "enables the owner to lay out money in recovering and repairing the ship, without increasing the burden to which he is subjected." This has reference to repairs which might be made on the ship in fault before proceedings for limited liability are commenced; and, on broad principles, the owner of the offending vessel ought to be allowed, in the same way, to recover and repair the injured ship without increasing his burden. In other words, in order that the liability of the owner of an offending vessel may not exceed his interest, the rule has been settled by the Supreme Court that the value thereof shall be taken as of immediately after the damage was done; and the point is to meet the proposition that, to give full effect to the logical sequence of that rule, everything else should have relation to that point of time. In other words, the proposition to be met is that, when the application for a limitation of liability had been made by the owners of The Triton, she and they were purged as of the time immediately after The Pine Forest was wrecked.

There is another difficulty which meets the claimant in this case. Under all circumstances, according to the rules of maritime law, no one should be discouraged from rendering assistance to a vessel in distress. Sometimes, as we may well presume to have been the fact in the case at bar, the owners of the offending vessel, by their equipment and adjacency to the place of wreck, are the most competent of all to effect a prompt rescue; but, on the rule asserted by the claimant, and which, by the force of authority, we are compelled to accept, such persons, when situated like the libellants, may well say: "We refuse to expend our moneys in behalf of your property until we have applied for the benefit of the statutes of limited liability, so as to enable us to recover what we may disburse." Such a proposition would not be admissible where life was involved; but, when it is a mere question of property, there is no unreasonableness in the interests of one party being balanced against those of another.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, we seem, as we have said, to be bound by authority to affirm the decision of the district court dismissing the libel. Under the English statutes, the point seems to have been directly determined against the owners of The Triton. The Ettrick, L. R. 6 Prob. Div. 127, was first decided by Sir Robert Phillimore, and he was affirmed on appeal, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) at page 132, all in 1881. The case is accepted by so careful an authority as Mr. Marsden in his Collisions at Sea, 4th ed. 193, which gives the pith of this decision. That under the English statutes, the liability extends to £8 per ton of the offending vessel is not essential, as is plain of itself, and as is also emphasized by the fact of the citation of The Ettrick by the Supreme Court, to which we will hereafter refer. The substance of this decision is stated by Marsden as follows: "The owner of a ship sunk by collision, who, admitting that the collision was caused by the fault of his own ship, obtains judgment for limitation of his liability, and pays into court the statutory amount of his liability, does not thereby escape from the legal consequences of his wrongful act in causing the collision, except so far as the act expressly relieves him. The owner of a ship sunk in the Thames paid into court the statutory amount of his liability. His ship was raised by the Thames conservators (who have statutory powers to raise wrecks and reimburse themselves for the expense of raising them by sale of ship and cargo), he undertaking to pay the cost of raising. It was held that the shipowner was bound to hand over cargo on board to its owner, and that the cargo owner was not liable to pay him anything by way of salvage or general average contribution."

In the case as reported, Jessel, the Master of the Rolls, at page 132, states the position of the owner of the offending vessel in such a way as to present the precise difficulty we have suggested. He observes: "He [that is, the shipowner] says that the payment of £8 per ton not only prevents his being answerable in damages for any more, but is equivalent to saying that he shall be in exactly the same position as if no negligence had been committed."

That is to say, the master of the rolls puts the position of the shipowner as though he had claimed that a compliance with the statutes of limited liability purged his vessel and himself as of the time when the damage was done. Of course, The Ettrick necessarily overrules this proposition, and thus meets all suggestions in the way of the owner of The Pine Forest. There were other propositions considered in the various opinions delivered in the case, but none of them contravene the use we make of the decision. The Ettrick has never been questioned by any judicial tribunal in England. It is accepted by Mr. Justice Kennedy in his work on Civil Salvage, to which we have already referred, at page 183. It is also accepted by the Supreme Court in The Irrawaddy (Flint v. Christall) 171 U. S. 187, 195, 43 L. ed. 130, 133, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831.

The Irrawaddy supports the conclusion we are compelled to announce. That case arose under the "Harter act," so called; but that, for all the purposes to which we apply The Irrawaddy, there is no distinction between that statute and the statutes on which The Triton relies, is true, and is emphasized by the fact that the Supreme Court used The Ettrick as we have already said. It is true that the issue in The Irrawaddy was not one of salvage, but of general average, the shipowner claiming to share therein, although the sacrifice which underlay it was made in order to relieve against the fault of his own vessel. General average and salvage, for all the purposes we are considering, are to be spoken of in the same breath; and, indeed, they run together in a great many respects. The pith of what applies to this case is stated at pages 193, 194, 171 U. S., at page 132, 43 L. ed., and at page 833, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep., as follows: "The act in question [meaning the Harter act] does undoubtedly modify the public policy as previously declared by the courts; but if Congress had intended to grant the further privilege now contended for, it would have expressed such an intention in unmistakable terms. It is one thing to exonerate the ship and its owner from liability for the negligence of those who manage the vessel; it is another thing to authorize the shipowner to do what he could not do before, namely, share in the general average occasioned by the mismanagement of the master and crew."

This, in connection with the citation of The Ettrick, is a declaration that the rules of interpretation as applied in The Ettrick and The Irrawaddy run on parallel lines, and reach in the same way the statutes of limited liability on which The Triton relies as they do the Harter act. The result is that, on the fundamental principles of the maritime law, neither The Triton nor her owners can recover for salvage services to The Pine Forest, and, on the authorities, there is nothing in the statutes which gives them relief in this respect beyond what otherwise existed.

There is much force in the proposition that the statutes of limited liability on which The Triton relies effectuate a privilege, so that, if availed of by a vessel owner, it must be taken with all the burdens of the condition as it exists at the time to which the acceptance has been delayed; in other words, that, unless the shipowner acts at once and promptly, he must stand the consequences thereof. Under some circumstances it would be impossible to escape this proposition in some respects. The opinions of the master of the rolls and the lords justices in The Ettrick contain several expressions in that direction; especially the former at the foot of page 132, and Lord Justice Brett at page 134, where he speaks of "a new series of events," meaning the raising of The Ettrick and her cargo, "with which, to my mind, the act of Parliament," meaning the statute limiting liability, "has nothing whatever to do." Nevertheless, in view of the various considerations which we have stated, it is not safe to apply this proposition too rigidly or universally. Possibly the circumstances would admit of its application here; but we deem it safer to dispose of this appeal in view of the authorities which we have cited, and which, taken together, result in the proposition that, whatever may be the theory of the statutes, they contain no suitable provision or machinery for working out any salvage compensation for the libellants, now the appellants.

With reference to any services which might be rendered after an application for limited liability has been made by the owners of an offending vessel, the position would probably be different; but, as this case stands, we are led to the conclusion that the libellants can obtain no relief.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed, and the appellee recovers its costs of appeal.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

FRANK W. PALMER, Public Printer, Appt.,
v.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

(.... App. D. C.)

1. Smoke law—obedience by public official.

A public official intrusted with the custody of a government building must obey the provisions of a statute forbidding

Case Note.—There is little authority very closely in point on the question as to the construction of the general terms of an act in the exercise of police power, so as to make them apply to a public official. Cases as to the exemption of Federal officials from the operation of state laws of this character involve the power of the state, rather than the intention of the legislature. In PALMER v. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA there can be no question of legislative power to reach the defendant, but only a question of the intent to include him in the general language. The power of Congress to compel the public printer to avoid making a smoke nuisance the emission of dense smoke from chimneys into the atmosphere.

2. Same—purchase of soft coal—effect of approval.

That Congress has approved the estimate of a custodian of a public building for a supply of soft coal for a season does not absolve him from liability for violation of an act of Congress forbidding the emission of dense smoke from chimneys into the atmosphere.

3. Same—no provision of apparatus.

A public official charged with a violation of an act of Congress forbidding the emission of dense smoke from chimneys into the atmosphere cannot escape liability on the ground that Congress has not supplied him with the necessary apparatus to prevent such emission, if he has made no effort to procure it.

ERROR to the Police Court of the District of Columbia to review a judgment convicting defendant of violation of the smoke law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Morgan H. Beach and A. R. Mul-lowney for appellant.

Messrs. A. B. Duvall and E. H. Thomas, for appellee:

The use of soft or bituminous coal is not allowable under the statute if thereby the prohibited smoke is emitted.

Moses v. United States, 16 App. D. C. 438, 50 L. R. A. 532; Bradley v. District of Columbia, 20 App. D. C. 172.

The statute applies to the defendant, who is required by law, as alleged in the information, "to take charge of and manage the government printing office."

Sinclair v. District of Columbia, 20 App. D. C. 336.

The defendant, even though he is a public officer, is liable for violation of the smoke law.

S. 52, 29 L. ed. 805, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 29 L. ed. 185, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 903, 962; Tweed's Case (Flanders v. Tweed) 16 Wall. 504, 21 L. ed. 389; The Monte Allegre, 9 Wheat. 616, 6 L. ed. 174.

The government does not guarantee the integrity of its officers, but leaves to all who are wronged by such officers their rights of action against them.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was arraigned in the police court of the District, and there was judgment rendered against him there for the violation of what is known as the "smoke law" of the District, that is, the act of is, of course, not open to question. But the dissenting chief justice strongly argues that the act cannot be reasonably construed to indicate an intent to make it apply to his case. It is obvious that the same or similar language in different statutes may be differently construed with respect to different subjects and conditions. For instance, it is not necessarily inconsistent to hold that by a general prohibition of the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia without a license by any person, as held in Page v. District of Columbia, 20 App. D. C. 469, Congress did not intend to prohibit the continuance of such sales in the Capitol restaurants under arrangements made with its own committees, and at the same time to hold, as in the present case of the smoke nuisance, that similar general language prohibiting the emission of dense, black, or gray smoke from any smokestack other than the chimneys of private residences was intended to apply to buildings used for public purposes as much as those used for private house buildings, hotels, etc.

so as to make them applicable to public officials, reference may be made to Laurens v. Crawford, 55 S. C. 594, 33 S. E. 728, where it is held that constables and other peace officers are within the general terms of a statute against carrying concealed weapons; but it should be said that the decision was based principally on the fact that an exemption of such officers, contained in a prior statute on the subject, was omitted from the latest revision of the law.

In Neall v. United States, 56 C. C. A. 31, 118 Fed. 699, the general terms of the Federal statutes against forgery, referring to "every person who, with intent to defraud, falsely makes, forges," etc., are held to apply to and include an officer of the Army of the United States so as to subject him to prosecution in the district court of the United States,—at least, where the prosecution is begun after his discharge from the Army, without any action having been taken against him by the military authorities. But in this case the question turned on the relation of the civil to the military jurisdiction over crimes by persons in the Army, and not on the sufficiency of general terms to include the public official.

Congress of February 2, 1899 (30 Stat. at L. 812, chap. 79), entitled "An Act for the Prevention of Smoke in the District of Columbia and for Other Purposes." The act has been repeatedly before this court for construction, and its validity has been uniformly upheld. This, however, is the first occasion in which a public official, charged with the custody and control of one of the great public buildings of the city, has been held for a violation of the act. The appellant is the public printer, and the question now to be determined is whether, as the custodian for the time being of the government printing office, he is amenable to the courts for a violation of the law in permitting the issue of dense black or gray smoke from the chimneys of that office. Under the numerous adjudications cited on his behalf, there is undoubtedly great plausibility in the appellant's contention that the executive offices of the government in this city are not subject to the municipal regulations which all other citizens are required to obey. But we cannot give our assent to the proposition that there is any class of officials above the law, or that there is one law for the official and another for the private citizen with reference to the same duty equally incumbent upon all, and which requires the equal obedience of all, if the statute which commands it is to be at all effectual for the purpose for which it was enacted. We cannot think that it was the intention of Congress to suppress the nuisance of smoke emanating from a private hotel, and at the same time to authorize it tenfold, perhaps a hundredfold, greater in volume in the great public building across the street. Such discrimination, if it be assumed to exist, would be manifestly unjust, and by its palpable injustice would tend to bring the statute into odium and contempt, and would contribute more than aught else to prevent its effective observance.

If there is any one principle of our American institutions which is dear above all others to the hearts of our people, and of which the disregard is above all other things repugnant to our sense of justice, it is that of equality before the law. And this principle of equality is more applicable than anywhere else to the matter of municipal regulations. Municipal regulations intended for the safety of life and limb, and for insuring the public health, if they would be effectual, cannot be permitted to be violated with impunity by anyone, no matter what may be his station or his official position, and even though the offender should seek to shield himself behind the protection of international privilege. The individual citizen, desirous to obey the law and to conform to all its reasonable requirements, will feel himself sorely tempted in a contrary direction, and will not be solicitous to suppress the nuisance of smoke on his own premises or to remove the dangerous accumulation of snow and ice from the sidewalks in front of his residence if on the opposite side of the street from him the agents of the municipality, or the agents of government, are under no obligation on their part to contribute anything to the public safety in that regard.

The act of Congress, for the violation of which the appellant has been charged, is an exercise of the police power of the state, and is intended to suppress a public nuisance injurious to human comfort and human life. The nuisance is equally deleterious and equally a nuisance whether committed by a private person in the management of a factory, store, hotel, or apartment house, or by an officer of the government in the management of a large building, such as the government printing office, temporarily intrusted to his care; and neither in the letter nor in the spirit of the law is there any apparent purpose to be found to discriminate against the private citizen and in favor of the public official. The terms of the statute are general and comprehensive. In the broadest and most emphatic language it declares the emission of dense black or gray smoke from any smokestack or chimney in the District, other than the chimneys of exclusively private residences, to be a public nuisance, and punishable as such. It did not content itself with forbidding and punishing the act, but it characterized the act as a public nuisance, in order that there should be no doubt about the scope and purpose of the enactment, and in order to eliminate the nuisance of smoke from the District of Columbia. For apparently good reasons, which are obvious to everyone, the movable engines used for the propulsion of railroad trains and steamboats were excluded from the operation of the act. And for still more obvious reasons, of which this court may take judicial cognizance, namely, because in them hard or anthracite coal was almost universally used, which emits little or no smoke, the chimneys of private residences were specially excepted. But, with these exceptions, the prohibition is general, and the buildings used for the business of the government are as much within the spirit and the letter and the purpose of the enactment as are department stores, office buildings, and hotels. Indeed, were there discrimination in this regard, a grave question of constitutional right might arise, based upon the ground of palpable inequality, which such legislation would then suggest.

the sweeping enumeration of the persons liable to the penalty of the act, which comprise "the owner, agent, lessee, or occupant of any building of any description." Here, of course, if the scope and purpose of the enactment were such as to exclude the agents of the government from its operation, we would not hesitate to hold, in accordance with the adjudications and with well-established principles of law, that these were not intended to be embraced within the statute, notwithstanding its very general and comprehensive language. But when we find the purpose to be general, and to be best subserved by the inclusion of the agents of the government, and when the language of the statute is amply sufficient in its generality to include such agents, we fail to see why they should not be regarded as embraced within its terms.

This conclusion is further strengthened by the 5th section of the act, which prescribes "that no discrimination shall be made against any method or device which may be used for the prevention of smoke, and which accomplishes the purpose of this act." This would seem to be rather a direction by Congress to the agents of government than an intimation to private citizens that they are entitled to use any proper device for the prevention of smoke. As an acknowledgment of private right in individual citizens, it would be meaningless; as a direction to officers of government, it was eminently right and proper to insert it in the act; and the fact of the insertion of such a provision tends to show that the Congress intended that the officers of the government in charge of public buildings should be included within the purview of the act.

On behalf of the appellant, reliance is placed upon the well-established rule of law that, where the state is not named in an enactment, it is not bound by its provisions. Thus, the state ordinarily is not bound by the statute of limitations to which individual citizens are held, and there are numerous other illustrations to be found in the books; but this rule, it seems to us, is not here applicable. The appellant is not the state, nor does he represent the state, in this case. On the contrary, the state, or its representative, the municipality, is the party in interest against him. The state is interested, even as against its own officials, in having its laws enforced, especially those laws which are made for the preservation of the public health. It is not left to the public officials to determine for themselves whether they will obey the laws or not. It is not left to them to create a public nuisance at their pleasure and then shield themselves behind the pretense that they are the state and cannot be held for that which the legislature expressly prohibited from being done. In France, in the days of Louis XIV., when he said that he was the state, this plea might hold. It might have availed a defendant even in the days of personal government in England, when the infamous maxim was in force that the King could do no wrong and his officers were shielded by his privilege. But we cannot see how, in our country, and in this age and generation, a public official, charged with the commission of a public nuisance, which the legislative power of the state has endeavored most rigidly to prohibit, can protect himself by the claim that in the performance of the act he represents the state.

We have held in the case of Roth v. District of Columbia, 16 App. D. C. 323, that the municipality, even in the course of its performance of its governmental functions, is not entitled to perpetrate a nuisance. And the same rule will apply still more strongly to the executive officers of the government, whose duty it is to execute and obey the laws, not to violate them. All laws are presumed to be consistent with each other until the contrary is shown; and, therefore, it is no excuse to a public official to secure him immunity for the violation of one law that he is obeying another. He must obey both. He must take all laws as qualifying each other, and, if he is the public printer, he must do the public printing under such rules and regulations as Congress has prescribed; and especially he must not do it under such conditions as Congress has prohibited.

Apart from the general principles which we have considered, and which we hold do not excuse him, the plea of the appellant is that he made estimates for the use of soft coal in the building under his charge; that he submitted those estimates to the proper committees of Congress, and that Congress approved them, and made its appropriation of money for the conduct of his office in accordance with them. But we fail to see how, in law or in reason, this affords any justification for a violation of the law against public nuisances. If this were the case of an agent for a private building, submitting to an absent or intangible owner, an estimate for the soft coal to be used in such building, and having the approval of such owner for his estimate, could it reasonably be contended for one moment that such estimate and approval would relieve the agent from liability for the creation of a public nuisance? Repeatedly in this court have we heard in this connection the pleas of parties that they have taken all the precautions in their power, and yet have been unable to prevent the prohibited emission of smoke from their chimneys; but, in the face of the express prohibitions of the act, and in the face of the fact taught by practical science that the nuisance is preventable, even with the use of soft coal, by the use of proper appliances and proper management, we have never held such pleas to be valid.

Congress has never prohibited the use of soft coal in this District. Such prohibition may be the inevitable result, if obedience is not otherwise rendered to the statute. But thus far it has evidently been the view of Congress that the use of soft coal is not inconsistent with the prevention of the public nuisance created by the emission of dense smoke from chimneys. This being the case, it is not apparent why the appellant should regard his use of soft coal under the authority of Congress as a justification of a public nuisance, which Congress has been careful to prohibit. In other words, it is not the use of soft coal that causes the public nuisance, but the use of it in an improper way or without the proper appliances; and the appellant has not said that he has used this coal in the proper way, or that he is without the proper appliances for the prevention of smoke from it. His true defense is, not that he has used soft coal under the authority of Congress, but that Congress has not furnished to him the proper appliances wherewith to devert such use of its resultant nuisance of smoke. And this defense he has not made. But let us assume that he has made it, and that this is what he means. Is it a good defense? We think not.

The smoke law has now been in force for upwards of six years. So far as the record before us discloses, it does not appear that during that whole period the appellant has at any time made any effort to conform to the requirements of the statute. It will not do for him to say that Congress has not provided him with the proper appliances when he has made no effort to procure such appliances. It cannot be assumed that, in the multitude and magnitude of its public duties, Congress can take the initiative in the determination of the details needed for the conduct of any public office or department of government.

The appellant was appointed to his office with the duty imposed upon him to conduct that office according to law,—according to all the laws affecting it,—the smoke law, as well as others; and he is not at liberty to conduct the business of that office in violation of law. The duty was incumbent upon him, as upon all executive officers, to report to Congress the requirements necessary for its management in accordance with the law. It does not appear that he has done so. If it appeared that he had made application for the proper appliances, and that the application had been refused or ignored, perhaps a different question might be presented here. But that question is not presented now, and we cannot assume that Congress will deliberately refuse to executive officers of the government the necessary appliances for giving effect to its own act and its own specific and reiterated requirement.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the police court in this matter was right and just, and that it should be affirmed.

But, inasmuch as the operations of the government printing office might be seriously interfered with by rigid enforcement of the act at the present time when Congress is not in session and application cannot immediately be made to it by the appellant to remedy the result of past negligence, the municipal authorities, we think, would do well to exercise discretion in the matter of further prosecution at this time.

Affirmed.

Shepard, J., dissenting:

Regretting that I cannot concur in the judgment of my brethren, I think it proper to state the reasons for my dissent.

To the information presented against him the defendant entered a special plea alleging, in substance, that the said building was solely owned, used, and occupied by the United States; that in the discharge of his duties as public printer in the execution of the work carried on in said building, it was his duty to report, annually, to the "Joint Committee on Printing" of the two Houses of Congress, submitting estimates of the materials and so forth, including fuel, for the use and consumption of said printing office, together with all contracts and payments therefor; that Congress has regularly appropriated the money for the purchase of bituminous coal to be used as fuel in the furnaces of said building, all of which purchases have been duly reported as aforesaid; that in the discharge of his duties he has used due care and prudence in the use of said bituminous coal in carrying on the work required by the United States in said building; and that the emission of smoke was occasioned by the use of said fuel notwithstanding his exercise of due care and prudence in the performance of his said duties.

The Attorney General filed a motion on behalf of the United States to set aside and dismiss the information for want of jurisdiction of the court, on the ground, as he informed the court, that the building is the property of the United States, possessed, held, and occupied by them for public purposes, and that the defendant is a public officer of the United States and not the owner, agent, lessee, or occupant of the same.

The court denied this motion, and sustained a demurrer to the said plea. The defendant electing to stand upon his plea, the court adjudged him guilty, and sentenced him to pay a fine of $50, and in case of default in payment thereof to be imprisoned for sixty days.

There is no occasion to consider whether the public printer would be liable for the commission of a nuisance through his own wrongful act or neglect of duty, because the allegation of the exercise of due care and prudence in the use of the appliances furnished by the United States has been admitted by the demurrer to the plea. Nor is the effect of this allegation avoided by the further allegation that it was the duty of the public printer, among others devolved upon him by Congress, to make estimates of the supplies and fuel needed in the operation of the printing office, for the consideration of the "Joint Committee on Public Printing." For neglect of duty or misconduct, if any, in that respect he can be held responsible by the United States, but not by the District of Columbia in this proceeding.

Whatever effect his recommendations or want of recommendation may have had upon said committee, the fact remains that Congress provided by law for the operation of the engines of the government printing office through the use of bituminous coal, without providing, at the same time, for the necessary appliances to consume the smoke therefrom.

The single question for determination, then, is, whether the act of Congress approved February 2, 1899, applies to the buildings in the District of Columbia belonging to and operated by the United States?

The act reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. That on and after six months from the passage of this act the emission of dense or thick black or gray smoke or cinders from any smokestack or chimney used in connection with any stationary engine, steam boiler, or furnace of any description within the District of Columbia shall be deemed, and is hereby declared to be, a public nuisance: Provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed as applied to chimneys of buildings used exclusively for private residences.

"Sec. 2. That the owner, agent, lessee, or occupant of any building of any description from the smokestack or chimney of which there shall issue or be emitted thick or dense black or gray smoke or cinders within the District of Columbia on or after the day above named shall be deemed and held guilty of creating a public nuisance, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and of violating the provisions of this act.

"Sec. 3. That any person or persons violating the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof before the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100 for each and every offense; and each and every day wherein the provisions of this act shall be violated shall constitute a separate offense." [30 Stat. at L. 812, chap. 79.]

The general object of the exercise of legislative power is the enactment of laws for the regulation of the acts and rights of citizens, and not of the sovereign. And the universal rule of construction is that the sovereign state is not bound or its rights affected by a statute of apparent general application unless expressly named therein, or unless the words used are so clear and unmistakable as to leave no doubt that such was the legislative intention. This rule has been uniformly applied in the construction of general statutes of limitations and bankruptcy, and others relating to revenue licenses and impositions, to interest upon debts and demands, to judgment and mechanics' liens, to practice and the like. United States v. Knight, 14 Pet. 301, 315, 10 L. ed. 465, 472; United States v. Insley, 130 U. S. 263, 266, 32 L. ed. 968, 969, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485; United States v. Merritt, 113 Ga. 238, 38 S. E. 751; Brunswick v. King, 91 Ga. 522, 524, 17 S. E. 940; People v. Gilbert, 18 Johns. 227.

Authorities need not be multiplied in support of a general principle that has met with no judicial denial so far as my research has extended. In the main those have been selected which would seem to bear most directly upon the application of the general principle to the conditions presented by the case at bar; and some of these will be briefly reviewed.

In Page v. District of Columbia, supra, it was held that an act providing in broad terms that no person shall sell liquor in the District of Columbia without a license, etc., did not apply to persons conducting restaurants in the Capitol under arrangements made with committees of the House and Senate respectively.

In State v. Milburn, supra, it was held that a general statute declaring that no bond shall be received in evidence that had not been stamped, as provided by a revenue law relating to bonds of every nature whatsoever, did not apply to an unstamped bond sued on by the state of Maryland.

In Josselyn v. Stone, supra, a general statute required the registration of all judgments in order to give liens, and another was subsequently passed providing that all such liens shall be enforced within a certain period or else lost. Held, that the latter statute, which did not name the state, though sweeping in its terms, did not apply to the lien of a judgment in favor of the state.

In Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, supra, it was held that a general statute providing for a mechanic's lien upon "any property," and "any building," did not extend to a school building in a district acting by authority of the state.

In Fuller v. Roosevelt, supra, it was held that a general statute abolishing imprisonment for debt did not bind the state because it was not named.

In Seton v. Hoyt, supra, a general statute providing for the running of interest on all debts and demands was held not to apply to the debt of a county, because it was a subdivision of the state; and the latter was not named in the act.

In Cole v. White County, supra, a general fee bill authorizing certain costs for the service of all writs by officers was held inapplicable to writs served in proceedings on behalf of the state. To the same effect, People v. Gilbert, supra.

In State v. Garland, supra, it was declared that the state was not bound by a general statute regulating jurisdiction in cases of appeal.

In Butler v. Merritt, supra, the following facts appear: The state, by authority of law, maintained a dispensary in a town for the sale of liquor. Subsequently, the town, by a popular vote taken in accordance with the provisions of a general local-option law, put the latter in force. This was a sweeping act prohibiting the sale of liquor by all persons. The court held that sales by the state were not within the prohibition, and that the word "persons" did not include the agents of the state. In Stoughton v. State, supra, the defendant was indicted for a nuisance directly resulting from a dam maintained under grant of power by the state. The conviction was reversed on the ground that the state could not punish as a crime an act which it had expressly authorized. No question of injury done to private individuals by reason of the nuisance was involved. To the same effect, People v. New York Gaslight Co. 64 Barb. 69.

Tested by the principle stated, in the light of its application in the analogous cases before cited, I am of the opinion that the act of Congress does not apply to the public buildings of the United States in the District of Columbia. Had the regulation been enacted by the municipal authorities under broad general police powers conferred upon them by Congress from time to time, it would not be contended that they, without express authorization, could bring the buildings of the United States under their jurisdiction. From the beginning, a distinction has been carefully made, in respect of management, control, and police, between the public property occupied and used by the United States for governmental purposes, as well as much that is not so used; and that of ordinary public use which falls naturally within the scope of municipal control and supervision.

As regards the regulation of the uses of public property of the latter kind, as well as that of private owners, Congress, which is invested with plenary powers of legislation within the limits of the District of Columbia, has rarely, if ever, conferred upon the municipal authorities other than the minor powers of regulation that are common to municipal corporations in this country generally. Congress reserves to itself the granting of franchises in the public streets, their extension and improvement, as well as the regulation of some of their ordinary uses by the public. By direct legislation it has established some market places and provided for their general regulation; created hack and cab stands in certain public places, and has undertaken to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks. See Coughlin v. District of Columbia, 33 Wash. L. Rep. 376. Other instances might be cited. The act under consideration is a municipal regulation of the same nature. Clearly its primary object was to direct the uses of property ordinarily subject to municipal police regulation. The United States are not named in the act, and I do not find in the use of general words, common in all such local legislation, an unmistakable or certain intent to include their public buildings within its operation. The words "agent" and "occupant" in addition to "owner" and "lessee" are aptly used to meet the case of corporate ownership, and of private ownership where the owner retains no constant personal direction and management. The word "persons" used in the 3d section necessarily refers, and is limited in its meaning, to the "owner, agent, lessee, or occupant" named in the 2d section.

Neither "agent" nor "occupant" aptly describes the relation of the public printer to the owners of the building in this case. The occupation as well as the ownership of the building is unquestionably that of the United States; and the public printer, who superintends the business which they carry on, with the means and appliances furnished by the legislative department, is not their agent within the ordinary meaning of that word. He holds a public office created for the purposes of the government, and to that end certain powers have been delegated to him. And a public officer is quite different from an ordinary agent. United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 96, 102, Fed. Cas. No. 15,747; Atty. Gen. v. Drohan, 169 Mass. 534, 535, 81 Am. St. Rep. 301, 48 N. E. 279; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Rich v. Jochim, 99 Mich. 358, 367, 23 L. R. A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606, 58 N. W. 611.

In the absence of some express declaration to the contrary. I regard it as most unreasonable to presume that Congress contemplated his prosecution and punishment, equally with the agents of private owners, when, in the exercise of ordinary care, he was engaged in the performance of public duties imposed upon him by law with the only means and appliances provided for the purpose. It requires more than inference to convict the Congress of the gross injustice and oppression of enacting a law embracing in its term the administration of a department of the government, and then subjecting the officer charged with that administration to punishment for the careful discharge of duties imposed upon him by express provisions of the law.

The apparent injustice of making a distinction between public and private ownership of buildings in respect of the emission of noisome smoke and cinders is a matter with which the courts have nothing to do. This injustice, however, consists not so much in the exemption of the buildings of the United States from the operation of a municipal regulation, as in the failure to provide the necessary fuel or appliances through which the emission of objectionable smoke might reasonably be prevented. In my opinion the judgment of the police court ought to be reversed with direction to sustain the plea and motion.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

HENRY F. JORDAN, Admr. of Joseph De-Ange, Deceased, Resp't.,
v.

CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAIL-ROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(.... Wis.)

1. Appointment of administrator—collateral attack.

The appointment, by a court of competent jurisdiction, of an administrator, is not open to collateral attack in a suit by the administrator to collect assets, on the ground that it was void because of lack of assets in the state.

2. Same—action for killing as asset.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenosha County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

Statement by Cassoday, Ch. J.:

It is conceded that the plaintiff's intestate was killed in the county of Kenosha, January 23, 1904, while in the employ of the de-

Case Note.—The decision in the above case, that a right of action for the negligent killing of a person is an asset of his estate, sufficient to warrant the appointment of an administrator, is sustained by the clear preponderance of the authorities.

In Re Mayo, 60 S. C. 401, 54 L. R. A. 660, 38 S. E. 634, it was held, on a review of the authorities from different states, that, where a statute creates a right of action which cannot be enforced except by an administrator, and provides for a special distribution by him of the proceeds, the probate court, where an intestate was killed, can grant administration to enforce such right of action. This was the case of a nonresident intestate. Other cases in which administration has been granted to enforce the right of action for the killing of a nonresident are Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Andrews, 36 Conn. 213 (where the administration granted was ancillary); Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 97 Ky. 228, 30 S. W. 639 (where there was also an administrator in another state); Findlay v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 106 Mich. 700, 64 N. W. 733; Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 44 Minn. 5, 46 N. W. 79; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bradley, 51 Neb. 596, 71 N. W. 283.

In some cases where the deceased was a resident of the state it has also been held that the right of action for wrongful death is an asset sufficient to sustain adminisdefendant as a section laborer. January 26, 1904, the plaintiff filed his verified petition in the county court of that county, wherein he represented, in effect, that he was the public administrator of that county; that the deceased died in the town of Pleasant Prairie, in that county, January 23, 1904, intestate; that he died possessed of certain personal property not exceeding $5,000, consisting of a claim for damages against the defendant for negligently causing his death and for wages due him from the defendant for work and labor performed by him for the defendant, and debts due and unpaid to an amount unknown to the petitioner; that the deceased had left him surviving a widow and three children, whose Christian names and ages were unknown to the petitioner, and who were then in Italy or on their way to the United States; that, except as above stated, no person under twenty-one years of age, or otherwise incapable of prosecuting or defending such action, had any interest in the subject-matter therein, or any rights in respect thereto which might be affected by the order entered thereon; that at the time of his death the deceased was an inhabitant of Kenosha county; and the petition prayed that letters of administration be issued to the plaintiff or some other suitable person. Upon such petition, the Kenosha county court, on February 2, 1904, issued letters of administration to the plaintiff, reciting therein, in effect, that the deceased, late of Lake county, Illinois, died intestate while living in Kenosha county, and having at the time of his death goods, chattels, credits, and estate in Kenosha county, by means whereof such letters were granted of all and singular the goods, chattels, credits, and estate, and also the auditing, allowing, and final discharging of the account of the deceased, and therefore the county court granted to the plaintiff, in ef-tration. This was declared in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 24 Neb. 848, 2 L. R. A. 67, 40 N. W. 401, and Morris v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 727, 54 Am. Rep. 39, 23 N. W. 143, in both of which cases the death took place in another state.

On the other hand, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cragin, 71 Ill. 177, administration granted in Iowa, on a cause of action for death in Illinois, was held invalid; and, upon the ground that there had been no real adjudication in Iowa, it was held that the administration could not be granted.

In Indiana the court held, in Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Swayne, 26 Ind. 477, that a right of action for causing the death of a non-resident was not assets which would sustain administration. Likewise, in Perry v. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. 29 Kan. 420, the same decision was rendered.

In Marvin v. Maysville Street R. & Transfer Co. 49 Fed. 436, the United States circuit court in Kentucky said that the right to recover for the death of the decedent under the Kentucky statutes was not assets upon which an administration of a nonresident decedent could be obtained in that state; but this is not only in conflict with the later decision of the Kentucky supreme court in Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra, but was not strictly a part of the decision, as the action was brought by a foreign administrator, and it was on this ground that the case was disposed of by the circuit court of appeals. 8 C. C. A. 21, 16 U. S. App. 236, 59 Fed. 91.

A distinction between the statute passed on in the Kansas and Indiana cases and that of Michigan is made in Findlay v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. supra, because the Michigan statute provides for distribution of the recovery as intestate property generally, while in Indiana and Kansas it goes exclusively, in the first instance, to the widow and children, or next of kin. But, in Nebraska, which upholds the administration based on such right of action, the recovery is, by the statute referred to in the Bradley Case, supra, "for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin." The same is true of the Iowa statute passed upon in the Morris Case, supra; and, under the Minnesota statute referred to in the Hutchins Case, supra, it is said that the proceeds of the action for death of an intestate "formed no part of his general estate, but belonged to his next of kin." And the South Carolina statute set out in the Mayo Case, supra, makes the recovery "for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and children," if there are any. Therefore, it must be conceded that the Indiana and Kansas cases referred to are not to be reconciled with those of the other states.

The reasoning in the majority of the courts seems to be convincing in favor of the right of administration; as, in the Hutchins Case, supra, the court says: "The fact that the statute gives such a right of action to the personal representative, and to him alone, implies the right to appoint, if necessary, an administrator to enforce it." In the Findlay Case, supra, the Michigan court says: "It could not have been contemplated by the legislature that the right to bring this action could be made to depend upon the question of whether the deceased left other property." In the Brown Case, supra, the Kentucky court said that the statute giving such right of action to an administrator "necessarily implies the right to have an administrator appointed by the local courts for this purpose alone, if there be no other necessity or right or authority for such appointment."

The right to make a collateral attack on the appointment of an administrator on the ground that there were no assets to sustain the action is denied in most of the decisions, as shown by the note in 18 L. R. A. 243, which fully agrees with the conclusions of the court in the above case.

fect, full power to administer and faithfully dispose of all and singular the goods, chattels, and estate of the deceased; to ask, demand, recover, and receive the debts which were due unto the deceased while living and at the time of his death properly belonging to him; to pay the debts of the deceased so far as there was property to do so; to make, or cause to be made, a full, true, and perfect inventory of all and singular the goods, chattels, credits, and estate of the deceased which had or should come to his possession or knowledge on or before May 2, 1904; and also to render a just and true account of such administration at or before the expiration of one year from February 2, 1904, and to obey all orders and decrees of the court, and also render a just and true account of such administration when thereunto lawfully required. February 20, 1904, the plaintiff, as such administrator, commenced this action and alleged in the complaint, in effect, that such killing was solely by reason of the wrongful act, default, negligence, and carelessness of the defendant; that the defendant was liable in damages therefor to the plaintiff as such representative; that the amount recovered be paid over to the widow and children of the deceased; that the deceased was a resident of Lake county, Illinois, but was injured and died in Kenosha county, leaving a widow and three infant children and property and an estate to be administered therein, but leaving no widow or next of kin residing therein; that immediately upon such death the plaintiff, as such public administrator, became the only personal representative of the deceased; that January 26, 1904, he filed his petition for his appointment as such administrator and was appointed as stated; that, soon after, the defendant's claim agent offered the plaintiff $3,000 in compromise and settlement of said claim and cause of action, and the plaintiff accepted the same and thereby the cause of action was settled and compromised; that the plaintiff then presented to the defendant proper releases and discharge of the defendant from all further liability, but that the defendant did not pay the same, as its attorney expressed doubt of his authority to make such settlement,—and prayed judgment for $3,000 and interest from February 2, 1904. March 2, 1904, the defendant answered in abatement of the action, by way of admissions, denials, and counter allegations to the effect that the deceased at the time of his death was a nonresident of Wisconsin, and not a citizen of the United States; that the widow and children were residents and citizens of Italy and nonresident aliens; that the deceased left no estate to be administered in Wisconsin, and no property or estate in Kenosha county; that no sufficient petition or application for administration had been made to the Kenosha county court; that no notice of the time or place of hearing, as required by § 3808 of the Revised Statutes of 1898, had been given; that the Kenosha county court had no jurisdiction to make such appointment, or any appointment, over the estate of the deceased, or to grant such letters of administration; and that all the proceedings of that court were null and void. The defendant further answered in bar of the action, by way of admissions, denials, and counter allegations to the effect that the deceased was instantly killed while in the employ of the defendant as a section laborer; that he left him surviving his widow and children, who were residents and citizens of Italy and nonresident aliens.

The cause having come on for trial May 2, 1904, it was stipulated by and between the parties in open court, in effect, that a trial by jury be waived, and the cause heard by the court; that, if the court should adjudge that the plaintiff was lawfully appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased and had the legal right to bring the action, judgment might thereupon be entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $3,000, the defendant reserving the right to appeal from the judgment of the court, so far as the same related to the legality of the appointment of the plaintiff as such administrator; that the record of such appointment might be considered in evidence; and that the deceased was killed in Kenosha county, January 23, 1904, while in the defendant's employ as a section laborer, by being struck by a locomotive operated by the defendant. At the close of the trial the court made findings of fact to the effect that all the material allegations of the complaint were true; that the plaintiff was and is the administrator of the estate of the deceased and the personal representative thereof, and as such had the legal capacity to commence this action; that the appointment of the plaintiff as such administrator and the granting to him of letters of administration were and are valid, regular, and proper; that, the court having so found and decided, judgment should, pursuant to the stipulation, be given and entered in favor of the plaintiff for $3,000, together with costs of the action; that the deceased left property and an estate within Kenosha county to be administered therein; that the allegation of the answer that the deceased died instantly was not proved, and, as conclusions of law, the court found, in effect, that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment against the defendant for $3,000, together with the costs of the action, and ordered judgment to be entered accordingly. From the judgment so entered the defendant brings this appeal.

Mr. Edward M. Hyzer, for appellant:

Defendant had a right to inquire into the validity of the appointment of a plaintiff administrator.

Hubbard v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Wis. 746; 76 Am. St. Rep. 855, 80 N. W. 454. The appointment was void.

Odell v. Rogers, 44 Wis. 136.

The existence of conditions which authorize the interference of a county court with property by way of administration is open to collateral inquiry.

Melia v. Simmons, 45 Wis. 334, 30 Am. Rep. 746; Wisconsin Trust Co. v. Wisconsin Marine & F. Ins. Co. Bank, 105 Wis. 464, 81 N. W. 642.

Mr. Norman L. Baker, with Messrs. B. J. Wellman and R. V. Baker, for respondent:

A special administrator may be appointed for the sole purpose of bringing such an action where there is no other property.

Grece v. Helm, 91 Mich. 450, 51 N. W. 1106; Swan v. Norvell, 107 Wis. 625, 83 N. W. 934.

The appointment of the administrator is in every way regular.

Welsh v. Manwaring, 120 Wis. 377, 98 N. W. 214.

The granting of administration to the public administrator cannot be attacked collaterally.

Andrews, 36 Conn. 213.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the stipulation entered into on the trial, the only question here for consideration is whether the plaintiff was lawfully appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased and had the legal right to bring this action. There is no claim that the plaintiff should have been appointed such administrator by reason of being one of the persons referred to in § 3807 of the Revised Statutes of 1898, or that the notice prescribed in § 3808 of the Revised Statutes of 1898 was ever given. The plaintiff claims, and the trial court in effect found, that the appointment was properly and regularly made by the county court upon a sufficient petition under § 3819 of the Revised Statutes of 1898. Omitting words not applicable here, that section declares that, "when any person shall die intestate, leaving property in this state, but leaving no widow, surviving husband, or next of kin, known to the county court, living therein, . . . the county court having jurisdiction of such estate . . . shall, upon its own motion, or upon the application of the public administrator, if such court shall deem necessary, grant administration of such estate . . . to the public administrator, and it shall thereupon be lawful for the public administrator to take possession of the property and effects of the intestate. . . . and protect and preserve the same and to proceed with the administration of such estates and with the care and management of the estate, . . . until administration . . . thereon shall, upon proper application of some person entitled to apply therefor, be granted to some other person. If such intestate . . . be a nonresident, administration . . . of his estate shall be granted to the public administrator of the county where the property may be found." And then, after providing for the revocation of the appointment of such public administrator, the section provides that "such estates shall be administered by the public administrator in the same manner as other estates, except as otherwise provided herein." Rev. Stat. 1898, § 3819. As held by this court, this section "obviously provides merely for a temporary situation, and authorizes appointment of the public administrator only until those having lawful right under § 3807 shall make proper application." Welsh v. Manwaring, 120 Wis. 377, 379, 380, 98 N. W. 214. As indicated, "the county court, having jurisdiction of such estate," may, "upon its own motion, or upon the application of the public administrator, . . . grant administration of such estate . . . to the public administrator." Of course, such appointment may properly be made without notice.

The contention is that the county court had no jurisdiction to make such appointment, because the intestate did not die "leaving property in this state." In other words, it is claimed that it appears from the evidence taken that the intestate left no estate in Wisconsin, and that, in the absence of an estate therein, the county court had no jurisdiction to make the appointment. The records of such appointment by the county court are in evidence; but there is no indication that such appointment was ever set aside by the county court, or any appeal taken therefrom to the circuit court. But counsel for the defendant contends that the authority of the county court to make such appointment is open to collateral attack for want of jurisdiction, by reason of the absence of any estate in Wisconsin left by the intestate. In support of such contention counsel cite the decisions of this court holding that "the only jurisdiction the county court has in respect to the administration of estates is over the estates of dead persons." Melia v. Simmons, 45 Wis. 334, 30 Am. Rep. 746; Wisconsin Trust Co. v. Wisconsin Marine & F. Ins. Co. Bank, 105 Wis. 464, 81 N. W. 642. See also D'Arumant v. Jones, 4 Lea, 251, 40 Am. Rep. 12; Thomas v. People, 107 Ill. 517, 47 Am. Rep. 458; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 38 L. ed. 896, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1108; Cunnius v. Reading School District, 198 U. S. 458, 49 L. ed. 1125, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 721. The distinction between such a case and the one at bar is pointed out by Marshall, Ch. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

J., in an early case, and expressly sanctioned by some of the cases above cited. Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch, 9, 23, 3 L. ed. 471, 475. It is there said that "in the common case of intestacy it is clear that letters of administration must be granted to some person by the ordinary [having the power of our county court], and, though they should be granted to one not entitled by law, still the act is binding until annulled by the competent authority, because he had power to grant letters of administration in the case. But, suppose administration to be granted on the estate of a person not really dead. The act, all will admit, is totally void. . . . The case, in truth, was not one within his jurisdiction. It was not one in which he had a right to deliberate. It was not committed to him by the law. And, although one of the points occurs in all cases proper for his tribunal, yet that point cannot bring the subject within his jurisdiction." This court, following the highest courts of England, has held, on direct appeal from the county court, that an order or judgment of a Louisiana court appointing an administrator of the estate of a deceased person, though based on a petition alleging that the deceased died while a resident of that state leaving property therein, was not conclusive as to the domicile of the deceased, and did not preclude a court of this state from taking jurisdiction of proceedings to probate the will of the deceased and administer so much of his estate as was actually located in Wisconsin. Frame v. Thormann, 102 Wis. 653, 667-671, 79 N. W. 39, Affirmed in 176 U. S. 350, 356, 44 L. ed. 500, 503, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 446; De Mora v. Concha, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 268, Affirmed in L. R. 11 App. Cas. 541. See also Overby v. Gordon, 177 U. S. 214, 223, 224, 44 L. ed. 741, 745, 746, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603. Of course, it frequently occurs that an intestate person leaves property located in different states. Where that is the case, there can be no doubt that the appropriate court of each state where such property is located may, upon proper proceeding being had, grant letters of administration of so much of the estate as is therein located.

The question here presented is whether the appointment of the plaintiff as administrator by the county court is open to collateral attack. The county court, upon petition filed, certainly had jurisdiction to determine whether the deceased left any property in the state of Wisconsin. Having such jurisdiction of the subject-matter in such proceeding in rem, its determination could not properly be treated as a nullity, nor be open to collateral attack. Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, §§ 527, 573, and cases there cited. In the last of these sections, it is said that "the statutes concerning the appointment of administrators authorize it to be made in certain cases in any county where the decedent left assets. On the presentation of a petition asking for an appointment in such a case, it becomes a question of fact, to be determined from the evidence, whether or not the decedent did leave assets in that county, and an erroneous decision is conclusive in a collateral proceeding." See 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 785; Pick v. Strong, 26 Minn. 303, 3 N. W. 697; McCooley v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 182 Mass. 205, 65 N. E. 62; O'Connor v. Huggins, 113 N. Y. 511, 21 N. E. 184; Johnson v. Johnson, 66 Mich. 525, 33 N. W. 413; Brawford v. Wolfe, 103 Mo. 391, 15 S. W. 426; Dunn v. German-American Bank, 109 Mo. 90, 18 S. W. 1139. In this last case it was expressly held that "the right of a public administrator to take charge of an estate cannot be collaterally questioned." To the same effect: Hoes v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 73 App. Div. 363, 77 N. Y. Supp. 117. In so far as this court has spoken on similar subjects of jurisdiction, the same is in harmony with the authorities cited. Tallman v. McCarty, 11 Wis. 401; Portz v. Schantz, 70 Wis. 497, 36 N. W. 249; Swan v. Norvell, 107 Wis. 625, 83 N. W. 934. We must hold that the appointment of the plaintiff as such administrator was conclusive on the defendant in this action. Besides, the evidence is sufficient to support the finding that the deceased left property and an estate within Kenosha county to be administered therein.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Dodge, J., concurring:

Upon the ground that the evidence shows that decedent had property in Kenosha county I concur in the affirmance of the judgment, but I cannot yield assent to the doctrine that the exercise of jurisdiction to appoint an administrator by the county court concludes all collateral inquiry as to whether it had jurisdiction to do so. To so hold is to adopt the sophistry which was exploded by Paine, J., with such dignity of ridicule in Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 328, 76 Am. Dec. 269, adopting the views expressed in Starbuck v. Murray, 5 Wend. 148, 21 Am. Dec. 172. Where the very existence of a fact is essential to the power of a court to consider a matter, that it cannot have such power to consider when the fact does not exist seems an axiom. To concede the necessity of existence of the fact as a condition to the court's deciding at all, and then to hold that, though it does not exist, yet the court's decision that it does in effect creates the fact, is magic. It endows courts with omnipotence. It creates something out of nothing. It sanctions the logic of the man who would lift himself by pulling on his own boot straps. The power of the state of Wisconsin to exercise any control, either by its courts or other branches of government, over the property left by a decedent, must depend on either the fact of his residence here or the presence of effects within the state. Moyer v. Koontz, 103 Wis. 22, 74 Am. St. Rep. 837, 79 N. W. 50; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Cunnius v. Reading School District, 198 U. S. 458, 49 L. ed. 1125, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 721. In absence of those facts, it cannot confer on anyone authority to meddle with such decedent's property, to take it into possession, sell it, or give it away. The acts of one so attempted to be authorized must be entirely futile and ineffective whenever questioned by the government having lawful jurisdiction over such property, or by its administrative agents. Hence the payment of money to one appointed administrator without jurisdiction will not protect appellant against an administrator duly appointed. So I cannot doubt that appellant had right to question whether plaintiff was administrator at all.

That a jurisdictional fact must actually exist before any decision of a court can be conclusive has been declared repeatedly by this court; and the illogic of those courts, some of which are cited in the majority opinion, which hold that a finding that such fact exists suffices, has been reviewed and repudiated. Rape v. Heaton, supra; Pollard v. Wegener, 13 Wis. 569; Carr v. Commercial Bank, 16 Wis. 52; St. Sure v. Lindsfelt, 82 Wis. 346, 19 L. R. A. 515, 33 Am. St. Rep. 50, 52 N. W. 308; Toepfer v. Lampert, 102 Wis. 465, 469, 78 N. W. 779; Johnson v. Turnell, 113 Wis. 468, 472, 80 N. W. 515. The same principle has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, which in this field is our superior, for the enforcement of a judgment rendered without jurisdiction is a taking of property without due process of law. Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch, 241, 269, 2 L. ed. 608, 617; Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch, 9, 3 L. ed. 471; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 45, 38 L. ed. 896, 901, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1108; Bell v. Bell, 181 U. S. 175, 178, 45 L. ed. 804, 807, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 551; Cooper v. Newell, 173 U. S. 555, 43 L. ed. 808, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506; Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 47 L. ed. 366, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237. New York has repeatedly applied the same doctrine, following Starbuck v. Murray, supra, the reasoning of which this court deemed unanswerable. Ferguson v. Crawford, 70 N. Y. 253, 26 Am. Rep. 589; O'Donoghue v. Boies, 159 N. Y. 87, 98, 53 N. E. 537, and cases cited; Hoes v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 173 N. Y. 435, 66 N. E. 119. The following are some of the jurisdictional facts, absence of which has been held to preclude jurisdiction and render judicial action void, even collaterally considered, although in such original proceedings the fact had been found and recited, viz.: The fact of service of process (Rape v. Heaton, Pollard v. Wegener, and Carr v. Commercial Bank, supra); the fact of actual appearance to the action and of authority of attorney (Christ v. Davidson, 116 Wis. 621, 93 N. W. 532; Cooper v. Newell, 173 U. S. 555, 43 L. ed. 808, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506); the fact of death before administration (Melia v. Simmons, 45 Wis. 334, 30 Am. Rep. 746; Wisconsin Trust Co. v. Wisconsin Marine & F. Ins. Co. Bank, 105 Wis. 464, 81 N. W. 642; Griffith v. Frazier, and Scott v. McNeal, supra); the fact of domicile in divorce (St. Sure v. Lindsfelt, 82 Wis. 346, 19 L. R. A. 515, 33 Am. St. Rep. 50, 52 N. W. 308; Andrews v. Andrews, and Bell v. Bell, supra); the legal sufficiency of publication proceedings (Beaupre v. Brigham, 79 Wis. 436, 48 N. W. 596); existence of property in state of the judgment (Renier v. Hurlbut, 81 Wis. 24, 14 L. R. A. 562, 29 Am. St. Rep. 850, 50 N. W. 783); seizure of property by sheriff (Toepfer v. Lampert, supra); fact of capture and location of property in prize condemnation (Rose v. Himely, supra); location of a trespass (Thompson v. Whitman, supra); domicile of a decedent (Frame v. Thormann, 102 Wis. 653, 79 N. W. 39; Id. 176 U. S. 356, 44 L. ed. 503, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 446; Overby v. Gordon, 177 U. S. 214, 44 L. ed. 741, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603); location of property in administration proceeding (Overby v. Gordon, and Hoes v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra).

There certainly is no distinction between such facts and that of the existence of property within a state, and none is suggested either by counsel or by the opinion filed on behalf of the court in this case. I do not find that the citations in that opinion, with one exception, at all support the holding that a jurisdictional fact cannot be denied and examined in collateral proceedings. Some are to the effect either that, if the court has jurisdiction, the judgment cannot be attacked collaterally, which is, of course, begging the present question. Others declare that the recitation of the jurisdictional fact in the record establishes it prima facie,—a rule with which I not only agree, but would enlarge to the extent that the mere judgment of a superior court of general jurisdiction prima facie establishes every jurisdictional fact not expressly contradicted by the record. The exceptional 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case is O'Connor v. Huggins, 113 N. Y. 511, 21 N. E. 184, wherein it is said that all jurisdictional facts are concluded against collateral attack by a recitation of them in the record; but it supports this dictum by citation and quotation of argument from Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst. 63 N. Y. 460, 20 Am. Rep. 555, holding that the fact of death is so concluded and cannot be contradicted. Obviously the O'Connor Case is the logical deduction from the Roderigas holding, and vice versa. If the record can conclude one jurisdictional fact, it can another. No more omnipotence is necessary to kill a live man than to create property where there is none. However, the former has been held impossible in Wisconsin, and neither the Roderigas Case nor the logical deduction from it in O'Connor v. Huggins is very cogent authority here. I do not understand that either is authority in New York, for I find that Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst. supra, is spoken of as that "much cited and overruled case" in Re Killan, 172 N. Y. 557, 63 L. R. A. 95, 65 N. E. 561. In my opinion, the question whether there existed in Wisconsin any property of decedent was open to denial by defendant and to trial in the present action.

(... Wis.)

1. Authority to fill blanks.

A person having executed an instrument, leaving blank spaces therein to be filled, and

Headnotes by MARSHALL, J.

Case Note.—That an agency to collect will be presumed to continue until collection is made, although no express authority upon the point is found, clearly comes within the general rule that, where a general authority is once shown to have existed, it may be presumed to continue until it is shown to have been revoked, and notice of the revocation communicated to the party acting upon its supposed existence. Mechem, Agency, § 224, citing many cases; Wigmore, Ev. § 2430.

The rule finds illustration in Hall v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 23 Wash. 610, 51 L. R. A. 288, 83 Am. St. Rep. 844, 63 Pac. 505, where it is held that payment of premiums on a life insurance policy to a party, where delivered the same in such imperfect condition to another for use, the presumption is, nothing appearing to the contrary, that such person intended to confer upon such other authority to complete the instrument.

2. Same—instruments under seal.

The rule above stated applies to instruments required by law to be executed under seal, and to be witnessed and acknowledged in order to entitle the same to be recorded, as well as to simple contracts.

3. Same—re-execution.

In case of implied authority, in the circumstances stated in the foregoing propositions, being performed, the instrument does not require re-execution or acknowledgment to give it full validity.

4. Mortgage—extinguishment.

Payment of an indebtedness on a note secured by a mortgage on real estate extinguishes the mortgage lien without any satisfaction thereof of record or in writing.

5. Same—satisfaction piece.

A mortgage having been extinguished by payment of the indebtedness, it is not necessary to valid record evidence thereof that a satisfaction piece shall be executed by the actual or apparent owner of such indebtedness for delivery to the mortgagor, or that there should be such delivery.

6. Assignment of security—power of attorney.

If a person, acting for himself or another, for value acquires a promissory note before maturity, secured by a mortgage upon real estate, taking the title to such mortgage in the name of another by his consent, evinced by a general power of attorney, but without his knowledge as to the particular transaction; and thereafter such other, by consent of such third person, evinced by such power of attorney, but without his knowledge as to the particular transaction, assigns his security in writing to a fourth person, the agency for the defendant company was not shown by the evidence to have been revoked, was sufficient, the agency being presumed to continue.

The delivery of proofs of loss to one who appeared by an indorsement upon the back of a fire policy to be the agent of the insurance company is held, in McCullough v. Phenix Ins. Co. 113 Mo. 606, 21 S. W. 207, to be a sufficient delivery to the company, since the continuance of the relationship, and its existence at the time of delivery, are presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

The continued existence of an agent's authority to permit the removal of goods covered by a fire policy from one location to another is presumed in Burlington Ins. Co. v. Threlkeld, 60 Ark. 539, 31 S. W. 265, in favor of an insured who received no notice of a revocation of such authority before giving the customary notice to the agent and removing his goods.

assignment being neither witnessed nor acknowledged, the bona fides of the transaction as to the latter, or as to such first person, is not affected by the mere use of the third person's name as assignee and subsequently as assignor, nor by the fact that he was not pecuniarily interested in the transaction, nor by the circumstance that the second instrument of assignment was not so executed as to be entitled to record.

7. Same—rights of assignee.

In the circumstances above stated, the final holder of the legal title to the security can rely on the bona fides of the transaction between the vendor and the person dealing with him in the first transaction.

8. Reliance on record title.

A person, in dealing with another in respect to real estate, may rely upon the record title to the property, in the absence of actual knowledge of the title in fact, or of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry in respect thereto.

9. Same—right of mortgagee.

A person, in taking a mortgage on real estate, may rely on the record of a satisfaction by the record owner of a prior mortgage on the same property, in the absence of knowledge, actual or constructive, of the ownership of such prior mortgage by some other person than such owner.

10. Record of mortgage—what notice of.

The record of a mortgage affords constructive notice only of its existence and ownership thereof by the mortgagee named therein, not of the assignment of such mortgage to another.

11. Attorney to collect note—authority of.

A person in possession of a note belonging to another, secured by a mortgage upon real estate, with authority to collect the same, cannot rightfully accept in payment anything but money; nevertheless, if such person takes from the mortgagor a new mort-

563, 54 N. W. 381, to continue in force six months, where no revocation of the authority is made meanwhile, and consequently entitles the agent to commissions on a sale effected for, but not ratified by, his principal.

Payment by a father of a prior account contracted by his son is held in McKenzie v. Stevens, 19 Ala. 691, to be a recognition of the latter's authority to bind his parent, and to justify the plaintiff in advancing goods to the son on the father's credit, on the assumption that such authority continues. The lapse of fifteen months since the first account is held not to be evidence that the former authority had come to an end. A similar case is found in Bryan v. Jackson, 4 Conn. 288.

The mutual agency created by the partnership relation continues, presumptively, until notice of dissolution. Butler v. Henry, 48 Ark. 551, 3 S. W. 878; Inby v. Brigham, 9 Humph. 750; Cooper v. Dedrick, 22 Barb. 516.

gage on the real estate covered by the first mortgage, for the purpose of providing means with which to pay off the latter, and thereafter, by the use of such second mortgage, he acquires such means before his agency to collect is terminated, such authority is thereby executed, and the first mortgage indebtedness and lien extinguished.

12. Same—continuance of agency.

If a person intrusted with authority to collect a mortgage indebtedness enters upon the execution of such authority, and continues efforts in that regard until he obtains the necessary money therefor, nothing appearing to the contrary, the agency to collect and possession of the securities by the agent is to be presumed to continue correspondingly; and the legal effect of obtaining the money is the extinguishment of the note and mortgage, regardless of whether such money in due course, or otherwise, reaches the rightful owner.

APPPEAL by plaintiff and the defendant Yahr from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County determining the priority of certain mortgages against the estate of the defendants Ward. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to foreclose a mortgage. The complaint was in the usual form. Defendants Thomas H. Bowes and Mary Kurtz, as executors of the last will of James Lawrie, deceased, pleaded ownership of a note for $1,600, secured by a mortgage on the premises described in the complaint, given to their testator in his lifetime by defendants Francis Ward and Alice Ward, the makers of plaintiff's mortgage, and that the said mortgage was paramount to that of the plaintiff. They ask for appropriate relief. Defendants Francis Ward and his wife, Alice Ward, pleaded extinguishment of the Lawrie mortgage by payment of the indebtedness secured thereby to Henry Herman, as agent for Lawrie in his lifetime. Defendant Yahr pleaded ownership of a $600 note made by said Francis Ward, secured by a mortgage on the premises described in the complaint, executed by said Francis Ward and his wife, and that the same was paramount to the Lawrie mortgage. The facts established by the evidence as found by the trial court, so far as necessary to be stated, are these: December 12th, 1893, defendants Francis Ward and Alice Ward mortgaged the real estate described in the complaint to Henry Herman to secure payment in five years of Francis Ward's note for $1,600, and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually. The mortgage was duly recorded December 16th, 1893.

January 10th, 1894, Herman, for value, in writing assigned the mortgage and indebtedness secured thereby to James Lawrie. The assignment was not recorded till April 23d, 1903. The failure in that regard was in accordance with a then existing custom. Interest on said note was duly paid to Lawrie or his agent until 1898. In October, 1902, Lawrie delivered the mortgage, note and assignment to Henry Herman with instructions to collect. Herman delivered the same to an attorney with instructions to commence foreclosure proceedings, but not to file any papers. The attorney did as directed, Lawrie verifying the complaint, and service thereof being duly made in the action. No papers in such action were filed. No bill for legal services was rendered to Lawrie, nor was the latter notified of the termination of the action, which thereafter occurred. November 14th, 1902, by previous arrangement, Alice Ward, Ferdinand T. Yahr, and Henry Herman met at the latter's office. Neither Lawrie nor his attorney knew of such meeting. The amount due on the mortgage indebtedness for interest and unpaid taxes was then determined. An outstanding mortgage for $300, on the premises in question to a corporation represented by Yahr, was satisfied, a new note for $1,600, payable in five years with interest at 5 per cent per annum, and a mortgage on such premises to secure the same was signed by Alice Ward. Later in the day the mortgage and note were signed by Francis Ward, and the mortgage was duly witnessed and acknowledged so as to be entitled to record. At this time the Wards were assured that a release of the Lawrie mortgage was ready for delivery and would be recorded with the new mortgage. No release was in fact ready for delivery. The mortgage was duly recorded the next day after its execution. At the time of making the second $1,600 mortgage the Wards gave a note for $600, due in five years thereafter with 5 per cent interest per annum, to defendant Yahr, and mortgaged the premises in question to secure payment thereof, the same to be subject to the $1,600 mortgage. The consideration for the Yahr mortgage was the satisfaction of the $300 mortgage and a loan of $300. At the same time the Wards further mortgaged the premises to Herman to secure payment of Francis Ward's note for $600, given to Herman, which by its terms drew interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum and was payable in five years. Thereafter such note and mortgage were duly assigned to defendant Vedder, who is now the owner thereof. That note was due at the time of the commencement of this action. By agreement with defendant Yahr his mortgage was made subject to the Vedder mortgage. At the time of the transactions of November 14th, 1902, Yahr had actual notice that Lawrie was the assignee of Herman of the first $1,600 mortgage, and Vedder had constructive notice of such fact. Herman from the time he transferred the mortgage to Lawrie till he left the country in 1903, knew that the mortgage indebtedness had not been paid and that Lawrie had never released his mortgage. As a result of negotiations between Herman and Charles Friend, plaintiff's son and attorney, between the date of the second $1,600 mortgage and the 24th day of November thereafter, the former transferred such mortgage and the indebtedness secured thereby, delivering the papers to said Friend. In consummating the deal, Herman delivered with the note and mortgage an assignment executed so as to entitle the same to be recorded, except the name of the assignee was left blank, a satisfaction, in form, of the Lawrie mortgage executed by Herman without the knowledge of or consent of Lawrie, and an abstract of title showing the first $1,600 mortgage to be unsatisfied of record. In January, 1903, Friend completed the assignment by writing in the name of A. G. Stein, of New York, as assignee. Neither Stein, Herman nor Lawrie knew of this. Friend acted for Stein under a duly recorded power of attorney authorizing him to do such business. Before the commencement of this action Friend, under such power, assigned the securities acquired by him as aforesaid to the plaintiff, though the assignment was not executed so as to be entitled to record, and the same has never been recorded. Stein did not furnish any money to carry out the transaction aforesaid, or know of the same. When Friend acquired the mortgage from Herman he had notice of the state of the record as to the Lawrie mortgage. He made no inquiry therefor, nor was the mortgage or the note secured thereby produced at the time of the transaction, nor was there any evidence produced on the trial that such securities were then in Herman's possession. Herman did not execute said satisfaction with the intention of delivering the same to the mortgagors. It was not received by Friend with the understanding that it was to be so delivered. He retained the same until April 10th, 1903, when he caused it, together with the assignment, to be duly recorded. Shortly thereafter Herman absconded. Friend knew, prior to such departure, of Herman's intentions in the matter. At the time of the transaction between Friend and Herman in respect to the mortgage, the latter delivered to the former $3,000, face value of corporate stock to secure payment of $1,800, he at the same time giving Herman his check for that amount, which was subsequently paid. The stock was later returned to Herman. Plaintiff knew nothing of this transaction. For some fifteen years prior to Herman's departure he was an active business man in Milwaukee, where all the transactions referred to occurred. During such period he was engaged in many business matters and enterprises, in some of which Friend was associated with him, and their relations were very close and friendly. On the eve of Herman's departure he transferred to Friend some property in settlement of various claims the latter had against him. The Lawrie note and mortgage were returned to Lawrie some time after the execution of the second $1,600 mortgage. Other facts were found sufficient to support the judgment, if correct conclusions of law were drawn by the trial court.

The court held thus: The Lawrie mortgage is in full force and the first lien upon the premises described in the complaint. The second $1,600 mortgage and note were taken by Herman, and the money obtained therefrom from Friend, with the intention on the former's part of converting the same to his own use. The assignment of such mortgage was too incomplete when delivered to be effective for any purpose, and it was not made effective thereafter, in that it was not reworded and acknowledged after its completion by filling in the name of an assignee. Friend took the mortgage with constructive notice of Lawrie's rights under the first mortgage, and not as a bona fide holder. The satisfaction, in form, of Lawrie's mortgage was ineffective for want of delivery thereof to the mortgagors. Herman was not the agent for Lawrie in taking and disposing of the second $1,600 mortgage. The several mortgages mentioned, as regards priorities, rank as follows: The Lawrie mortgage first, the Vedder mortgage second, the Yahr mortgage third, and the plaintiff's mortgage fourth.

Judgment was entered accordingly, from which plaintiff and Yahr separately appealed.

Messrs. Turner, Hunter, Pease, & Turner, for appellant Yahr:

The Lawrie mortgage was paid.

The Lawrie note and mortgage in Herman's hands for collection on November 14th, 1902, must be presumed to have remained there until the contrary is shown.

Brinkman v. Jones, 44 Wis. 526.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The finding that appellant is not the bona fide holder of the $1,600 mortgage of November 14th, 1902, is grounded, in the main, on the following supposed infirmities in her position: (1) The transfer of the mortgage was ineffective because the assignment was incomplete when delivered, in that the space for the name of the assignee was blank, and it was not reacknowledged after being completed. (2) Charles Friend had constructive notice of the first $1,600 mortgage, referred to as the Lawrie mortgage, when he took and paid for the one in question, and did not make any inquiry as regards whether Herman, the owner of record, had parted therewith, or require production of papers showing that he was such owner in fact, or indicating that he had authority to make the satisfaction thereof. (3) The satisfaction, in form, of such first mortgage delivered to Friend by Herman, was invalid because the latter neither had authority to make it, nor was it made to be delivered by him to the mortgagors, nor given to Charles Friend to be so delivered. (4) The assignment was completed, in form, by writing in the name of Stein without his knowledge or his having furnished any funds with which to purchase the securities. (5) The note and mortgage were by Charles Friend, acting under a power of attorney from Stein, but, without the latter's knowledge, assigned in writing to the plaintiff, the writing not being witnessed or acknowledged. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We will consider such supposed infirmities in their order.

1. This court has repeatedly held that one who holds a paper executed by another, as in this case, with express or implied authority to fill up the blanks therein, may do so, and then record the instrument if that is necessary, with the same effect as though the paper had been fully made before delivery; that we hardly need do more than refer to a few of the instances. Vliet v. Camp, 13 Wis. 198; Van Etta v. Evenson, 28 Wis. 33, 9 Am. Rep. 486; Schintz v. McManamy, 33 Wis. 299; Johnston Harvester Co. v. McLean, 57 Wis. 258, 46 Am. Rep. 39, 15 N. W. 177; Nelson v. McDonald, 80 Wis. 605, 27 Am. St. Rep. 71, 50 N. W. 893.

Numerous decisions, most of them being quite ancient, may be found holding to the contrary of the foregoing. Those, however, of this court in respect to the matter are in harmony with the now prevailing rule. Dixon, Ch. J., in Van Etta v. Evenson, supra, said, as to the supports of conflicting decisions: "They are grounds of the purest and most unalloyed technicality, originating in a state of things and condition of the law which have long since passed away." The rule deducible from that decision is clearly indicated in the syllabus in these words: "Where a note and mortgage otherwise fully executed, but with a blank in each for the name of the payee and mortgagee, were delivered to an agent who was to procure (from whomsoever he could) a loan of money thereon for the maker, this shows an intention that the agent should fill the blanks, and when so filled the instruments were valid without a new execution and delivery."

It will be found decided in some cases holding that blank spaces, such as the one in question, may be filled up after delivery of the paper by authority in writing, that parol authority is insufficient, and that if it were otherwise authority could not be implied from the mere delivery of the paper in its incomplete condition; but the general rule is that when one delivers an instrument, whether the same be required to be under seal or not, so executed as to, in form, give it full validity upon the filling up of blanks, authority for the holder thereof to do that is implied.

2. True, Friend had constructive notice of the first mortgage, but he had no notice, constructive or otherwise, of its assignment to Lawrie. The idea that one is not protected in dealing with the record owner of a mortgage, as regards a satisfaction thereof, unless the latter produces the securities, showing affirmatively that he is the right one to enter such satisfaction of record, is not in harmony with the recording act nor with the adjudications on the subject. There is nothing which we can discover charging Friend with knowledge of a state of things sufficient to put him on inquiry as to whether Herman was in fact the owner of the first mortgage. He had a right to assume that, if Herman had assigned the mortgage, that fact would appear of record. No such fact so appearing, and no circumstance coming to his knowledge indicating the true state of things, or suggesting the probability of such state being inconsistent with the record, when Herman delivered the satisfaction to him he was warranted in supposing, as he did, that the note had been paid and with the mortgage delivered to the mortgagor.

The law as above indicated is supported by the following authorities: Girardin v. Lampe, 58 Wis. 267, 16 N. W. 614; Bank of Indiana v. Anderson, 14 Iowa, 544, 83 Am. Dec. 390; Vannice v. Bergen, 16 Iowa, 555, 85 Am. Dec. 531; Livermore v. Maxwell, 87 Iowa, 705, 55 N. W. 37; Ahern v. Freeman, 46 Minn. 156, 24 Am. St. Rep. 206, 48 N. W. 677; Ogle v. Turpin, 102 Ill. 148. In Girardin v. Lampe, supra, the facts were these: The assignee of the mortgage took a defectively written transfer thereof and recorded it. Subsequently the assignor discharged the mortgage. Later a third person for value acquired an interest in the mortgaged property without notice of the assignment, other than such as was afforded by the defective record. That was not effective because the instrument of assignment was not so executed as to entitle it to be recorded. It was held that the third person's interest in the property was paramount to the mortgage. The gist of the decision in Ogle v. Turpin, supra, and the facts involved are stated concisely in the syllabus in these words: "An assignee of notes secured by mortgage may protect his equitable lien on the mortgaged premises, by taking and putting upon record an assignment of the mortgage, so as to give notice of his interest, and thereby prevent others from being deceived by any subsequent satisfaction entered of record by the mortgagee." "A person taking a mortgage from the payee will not be held chargeable with notice that the notes secured in the first mortgage have been assigned, but he may rely upon the record, as showing title in his mortgagor."

The other cases cited are quite as decisive on the point under discussion. The purpose of the record is too obvious, and the law in respect to the matter, as indicated, too plain, to require any very extended discussion of the matter. When one deals with another respecting real estate, in the absence of actual notice of the true state of the title or of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry in respect thereto, he may safely rely on the record. If that works hardship to a third person, as in a case like this, it is chargeable to the latter's negligence in not exercising ordinary care to guard his own interest by causing the record to show the actual state of the case. The rule applies that, as between two innocent persons, one of which must suffer pecuniary loss, the one is to be preferred who is without fault.

3. The point that Herman did not have authority to make the satisfaction has been sufficiently answered. He had apparent authority and that was sufficient. The record, which persons circumstanced as Friend was had a legal right to rely upon, indicated the existence of such authority. Delivery of the satisfaction piece to the mortgagor, or preparation of it for that purpose, was not essential to its validity. The only purpose of such an instrument is to create record evidence of that which is accomplished by mere payment of the indebtedness. Since Ward and Lawrie were responsible for the state of the record, indicating that Herman was the proper person to make the instrument of satisfaction, as to innocent third persons, it was competent for him to do so. This is unlike a case where the person appearing of record to be authorized to satisfy a mortgage deposits a satisfaction piece with a third person for delivery to the mortgagor upon condition, and he makes delivery regardless thereof. In such circumstances the instrument is held to be void, because the person purporting to be bound never in fact acted in the matter. Franklin v. Killilea (Wis.) 104 N. W. 993.

4. The fact that Stein's name was added to the satisfaction piece as that of the assignor without his knowledge, and that he did not furnish the funds given in exchange for the securities, has no significance in view of the power of attorney. It is undisputed that the title to the property was placed in Stein's name for convenience, and by his permission.

5. The circumstance that Stein did not know of the assignment of the securities, in form, to Mrs. Friend, is of no significance in view of the power of attorney. The circumstance that Mrs. Friend did not know of the acquirement of the securities when it occurred is not important, since the evidence shows that her son Charles had ample authority to act for her in such matters, and parted with full value in her money, or his own, in exchange for the property. Whether in the transaction the money was regarded by the parties as a loan, as the court in effect found, is immaterial since the evidence is undisputed that the same was not repaid, and was finally treated as purchase money. Whether it was the one or the other does not affect the bona fides of the transaction. The circumstance that the assignment to Mrs. Friend was not witnessed or acknowledged is likewise of no significance. Neither was essential to transfer title. The bona fides of her ownership rests on the transaction between Charles Friend and Herman.

The findings to the effect that Herman absconded soon after the transaction with Charles Friend; that the latter knew of the former's secret intentions in that regard; that the relations between the two for years prior had been very close and friendly,—do not seem to require any extended notice. Counsel laid considerable stress on these circumstances upon the oral argument, as if they should be regarded as of some weight as to whether Friend knew, or ought to have known, when he obtained the mortgage that Herman had no right to satisfy the Lawrie mortgage. However, it does not seem that the conclusions of law were grounded on such circumstances. At best they are sufficient to create mere suspicion. They do not warrant the belief that Friend colluded with Herman in the fraudulent transaction as to the Wards and Lawrie, or that he had knowledge, or ought to have had, at the time he acquired the note and mortgage, that Herman was acting corruptly in the matter. Knowledge only came to him, as appears, of Herman's secret intentions to leave the country months after he obtained the securities. He certainly had a right to suppose, as the fact was, that the second $1,600 mortgage was given to provide means to take up the first one. He testified that he so understood the matter when he took the mortgage, and that he then had no knowledge of Herman's being financially embarrassed. There is no satisfactory evidence to impeach that.

It is contended on behalf of both appellants that the evidence clearly shows that the Lawrie mortgage was discharged in fact by the indebtedness to which it was incident being collected by Herman as Lawrie's agent, and that the findings in respect to that branch of the case are clearly wrong.

It must be conceded that if, while the securities were in Herman's possession for the purpose of collecting the indebtedness, he executed such purpose, the money obtained belonged to Lawrie, and the mortgage lien was extinguished regardless of any formal entry to that effect upon the record. The trial court found that there was no claim on the trial that the Lawrie papers were in Herman's hands November 24th, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1902, when the transaction with Friend occurred, and no evidence that he then had such possession. That was excepted to, as were other findings touching the question of payment. It seems that the attitude of counsel for appellants on this branch of the case and the effect of the evidence must have been misunderstood. Counsel must have claimed from the first to last that Herman was the agent of Lawrie to collect the latter's claim, during all the transactions in relation thereto. It was important to show that he was armed with the proper evidence of such authority, not only when the mortgages were made November 14th, 1902, but when the transaction occurred with Friend. No one claimed at the trial, we assume, certainly no one does upon appeal, that authority to collect of Ward authorized acceptance in payment of anything but money. It was obviously and properly claimed that if he trusted Herman to provide means out of the new mortgages made November 14th, 1902, to pay Lawrie, and the latter did so before his authority was terminated, extinguishment of the Lawrie mortgage was the legal effect thereof.

Now the court found that Herman had the Lawrie papers a short time prior to November 14th, 1902, with authority to collect of Ward. While such authority did not by implication include authority to accept in payment anything but money, it included authority to exercise reasonable discretion as to the means to be used to accomplish the purpose of the agency, such as the employment of an attorney to foreclose the mortgage. When did the agency terminate? The findings do not cover that directly. They, in effect, hold that it ended when the papers were placed in Comstock's hand. We infer that because of silence as to whether Comstock returned the papers to Herman prior to the occurrences of November 14th, 1902, leaving it to be assumed that he did not, and because of the finding that he did not participate in such occurrences. The views thus taken of the evidence by the trial court, which seem to be clearly unwarranted, resulted in the making of the finding as to there being no evidence that Herman had the Lawrie papers at the time of the transaction with Friend November 24th, 1902. It appears to be clearly established by the proofs, that Comstock returned the papers to Herman on or prior to November 14th, 1902; that he had them at that time; that Comstock had notice of the meeting on that date at Herman's office and participated therein; and that such papers did not leave Herman's possession till after November 24th thereafter.

The evidence, as we read it, is to the effect that the amount necessary to discharge the indebtedness to Lawrie and other claims upon Ward's property existing November 14th, 1902, and the costs of the foreclosure were determined by Comstock and a statement thereof made by him in writing at the request of Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr, and that the three then went to Herman's office to settle the matter. This is Yahr's testimony on the subject: "We met up in Comstock's office, and he then had the final figures showing how much money it would take to settle these whole amounts; that is, the amount due on the Lawrie mortgage, and on my mortgage, and on the unpaid taxes and interest. By my mortgage I mean the $300 mortgage held by the Baumback Company. Then we all went down to Mr. Herman's office, Mr. Comstock, Mrs. Ward, and I. Mr. Herman was waiting there for us. The Lawrie note and mortgage were in his office at that time. That was on the 14th day of November, 1902, the day the papers were executed. Mr. Herman had the note and mortgage there." The witness testified further, in effect, that at such meeting he discharged his mortgage, and advanced $300 in money, taking a new mortgage for $600; that he insisted upon seeing the satisfaction of the Lawrie mortgage before doing so; that Herman exhibited the same to him, and that Comstock remained with Herman and Mrs. Ward till after he concluded his part of the business and went away. Mrs. Ward testified to the same effect. Comstock testified that nothing positively was concluded as to the settlement of the Lawrie indebtedness in his office, or at any office when he was present. He did not testify that he had no notice of the meeting at Herman's office on November 14th, 1902. The trial court seems to have accepted the witness's general conclusion as to warranting the finding that he had no such notice, though Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr testified to the contrary, and his evidence is contradictory and very unsatisfactory. He testified that Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr called on him at his office in relation to the settlement of the Lawrie indebtedness, and that a conversation was then had resulting in an agreement in respect to the matter. He said nothing at first as to Herman being present, or in respect to the Lawrie papers. Later he said: "Mr. Herman had possession of the Lawrie note and mortgage at that time." (Referring to the time of the conversation in his office.) "I had two interviews. The conversation I am speaking of was in my office, and I had also previous to that time met with them in Mr. Herman's office. After this conversation I had nothing more to do with the matter one way or the other. At the time of the last interview Mrs. Ward, Mr. Herman, and Mr. Yahr were present. That was previous to the interview to which I testified." (Again referring to the conversation in his office.) "At that time Mr. Herman had the mortgage and note there." Thus it will be seen the witness said that Herman was present at the time of the conversation in the former's office when the agreement was made (obviously the same agreement testified to by Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr, which was concluded in Mr. Herman's office), and that Herman then had possession of the Lawrie papers. He spoke of that as the last he had to do with the matter, and of the last interview (the one when Mrs. Ward, Mr. Yahr and Mr. Herman were present), as having occurred previous to the interview in his office, which he declared was the last interview. How one of two interviews could be the last, and yet have occurred previous to the other, would be difficult to explain. The witness was evidently confused in respect to the matter. Probably there were two interviews. Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr testified that there were; that one occurred in Comstock's office some days prior to November 14th, 1902; and that the other occurred on such date partly in Comstock's office and partly in Herman's office. Comstock could not reasonably be expected to remember the transaction as clearly as Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr. His office was but a few steps from Herman's, both being in the same building. A circumstance of going from one to the other was probably not of much significance to him. The transaction involved was an ordinary one in a lawyer's professional career, while to Mrs. Ward and Mr. Yahr, particularly the former, it was an unusual matter. On the main point all the witnesses agree, in this, when the negotiations took place for a settlement of the Lawrie indebtedness and the giving of a new mortgage to accomplish it, Herman was in possession of the Lawrie papers.

So the true state of the case appears to be this: On the 14th day of November, 1902, Herman then having the Lawrie papers and authority to accept payment of the indebtedness, Ward intrusted him with three mortgages on his property for the purpose, in the main, of raising the necessary money to make such payment. Three hundred dollars was at that time obtained from Yahr. Subsequently by the transaction with Charles Friend the balance of the money for such payment was obtained. Yahr and Ward acted in the matter on the faith of Herman's having possession of the Lawrie papers and authority, as record owner of the mortgage, to discharge it. There is no evidence that Herman parted with the Lawrie papers after November 14th, 1902, and before the occurrence of November 24th, thereafter, or as to when Lawrie regained such possession. The reasonable inferences all indicate that Herman had them till some time subsequent to the transaction with Friend. Such is the legal inference. One of the most familiar rules of evidence is that "when . . . the existence of a . . . personal relation . . . is once established by proof, the law presumes . . . that the . . . relation . . . continues to exist as before, until the contrary is shown, or until a different presumption is raised, from the nature of the subject in question." 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 41; Body v. Jewsen, 33 Wis. 402; Eames v. Eames, 41 N. H. 177.

We cannot escape the conclusion that the finding of the trial court that there is no proof that Herman was in possession of the Lawrie note and mortgage November 24th, 1902, and the finding, in effect, that he was not then the agent of Lawrie to collect of Ward, is contrary to the clear import of the evidence. During the continuance of Herman's agency for Lawrie to collect of Ward, and his agency for the latter to use the mortgages executed November 14th, 1902, for the purpose of securing money to pay such indebtedness, he performed in both those respects. Thereby the Lawrie mortgage was extinguished leaving its equivalent in Herman's hands for Lawrie. Herman's failure to pay the money to his principal is a misfortune which the latter's representatives cannot rightfully shift to the holders of the other mortgages. Herman embezzled Lawrie's money, not Ward's.

The judgment is reversed on both appeals, and the cause remanded with directions to render judgment in accordance with this opinion.

And
M. W. LIPPER, Appt.

(212 Pa. 165.)

1. Suit on stock subscription—equity jurisdiction.

The right to maintain suits against the individual stockholders of an insolvent corporation to enforce their liability on unpaid 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stock subscriptions does not constitute such a plain, full, and adequate remedy at law as to defeat a suit in equity against all the stockholders for the collection and administration of the corporate assets as a trust fund for the benefit of creditors.

2. Same—necessity of accounting.

The necessity of an accounting does not determine equitable jurisdiction of a suit against the stockholders of an insolvent corporation to enforce payment of unpaid stock subscriptions as an asset for the benefit of creditors.

3. Same—limitation of action.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run upon an unpaid stock subscription until demand is made for payment, where, by the terms of the contract, it is not payable until called for.

4. Same—demand.

Demand for unpaid stock subscriptions need not be made within six years to prevent the right to make the demand from being barred by the statute of limitations, under a contract of subscription to the stock of a corporation which is payable from time to time, as called for.

I. Introduction.

It will be assumed, for the purposes of this note, that the subscription is a valid one, and the corporation duly organized. Only such cases will be considered as have arisen in an attempt to enforce an unpaid stock subscription. Suits arising upon the statutory liability of stockholders for debts of the company are foreign to the scope of this note, except in so far as they are intended to reach only unpaid balances of subscriptions.

A stock subscription is a contract, oral or 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in writing, between the subscriber and a corporation, whereby the subscriber agrees to take a certain number of shares of the capital and pay for the same. Upon the acceptance of the subscription by the corporation, a contractual relation arises, to be governed by the terms of the agreement. Upon those terms are founded the rights and remedies of the contracting parties. When a suit is brought by the company against a defaulting stockholder, the rules applicable are rather simple; but when a company has ceased to be a going concern, and the rights of creditors of the corporation must be considered, difficulties have arisen in determining when the cause of action has accrued; and it is in this class of cases that there is much less uniformity than in the other.

II. Actions by solvent corporations.

a. From a fixed period.

The relation between the corporation and a subscriber to its stock is that of debtor and creditor. The terms of the contract govern the relation, and the general rule may be said to be that no cause of action accrues in favor of the company against the subscriber until a demand has been made in the usual form by a call upon the subscriber. It must be remembered that the statute of limitations is a statute affecting the remedy, and not the right, and though in some of the earlier cases there seems to be a stronger leaning against the stockholder, nevertheless it has been held to be a statute of repose, and to be received with no less favor than other defenses. These rules must be kept in mind in considering all cases: First, there must be in existence a party to sue; second, a party to be sued; and third, that the debt sued upon must have become due. These must be applied in order to determine when the cause of action has accrued; for when the cause of action accrues, then the statute of limitations begins to run.

There is a class of cases which have held that the cause of action accrues as soon as the subscription has been made, and that, unless the demand is made within a period of their unpaid subscriptions within six years of every assessment, with notice.

Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 36 Pa. 77; Allibone v. Hager, 46 Pa. 54.

Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The preliminary question is the jurisdiction in equity. Appellants insist that there is a plain, full, and adequate remedy at law, by suits against the several stockholders defendant, where each can defend upon his own case, untrammelled by differences of fact in the others. That there is a remedy at law by separate actions against the respondents is undeniable, but is it a full and adequate remedy in the sense that it bars the jurisdiction of equity? The subject of similar to that of the statutory period of limitations, the suit is barred by analogy to that statute. These cases will be considered at the end of the note, under subdivision VI.

In Baltimore & H. de G. Turnp. Co. v. Barnes, 6 Harr. & J. 57, a subscription to be paid for in certain instalments according to the terms of the statute incorporating the turnpike company was held to have been barred because the limitation attached at the time that the instalments respectively fell due.

Also in Western R. Co. v. Avery, 64 N. C. 491, it was held that the statute of limitations began to run on each instalment on the day upon which it became due by the call for its payment.

b. From demand.

The general rule is that the statute does not begin to run on a cause of action, where a demand is to be made, until the demand has actually been made. One of the earlier cases is Sinkler v. Indiana & E. Turnp. Road Co. 3 Penr. & W. 149, where it was decided that the statute was no bar to an action brought within the statutory period after the time fixed by the managers of the corporation by a resolution on its books, followed by notices which constituted a demand for the payment of the subscription, under a charter authorizing the managers to ascertain the time in which it should be made, and to give notice thereof. The subscription referred to such authorization. This case was distinguished in Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, 32 Pa. 22, 72 Am. Dec. 770, noted under subdivision VI.

In many cases the subscription is made subject to calls by the managers or directors of the corporation. And in such cases it has been almost universally held that the statute does not begin to run until the call has been made and notice given. Taggart v. Western Maryland R. Co. 24 Md. 563; Lexow v. Pennsylvania Diamond Drill Co. 5 Pa. Dist. R. 499; Macon & A. R. Co. v. Vason, 52 Ga. 326; Laughlin v. Orangeville & Mt. S. l L.R.A. (N.S.)

the controversy is the collection and administration of corporate assets as a trust fund for the benefit of corporate creditors. Both the control of corporate matters and trust funds are in general the subject of equitable jurisdiction. As was said in Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, 65, 51 Am. Rep. 166: "When insolvency and exhaustion of assets [of corporations] exist, the unpaid capital is not available to any one creditor in satisfaction of his debt, because then the whole amount of the unpaid capital is a trust fund, which does not belong to the corporation, but to the whole body of its creditors. Hence, whether the proceeding originates in the name of one, or of several, or of all the creditors, the result is the same in each. The capital, when recovered, inures

Turnp. Co. 1 Ky. L. Rep. 348; Lindsay's Estate, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 3, 27 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 235; Citizens Bank v. Hyams, 42 La. Ann. 729, 7 So. 700; Garner v. Hall, 114 Ala. 166, 21 So. 835.

Even in some cases where nothing is shown in the report to indicate what the terms of the subscription were, it has been held that the statute did not begin to run until a call by the company. Gibson v. Columbia & N. R. Turnp. & Bridge Co. 18 Ohio St. 396.

And in Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Lea, 578, it was held to run from a call, although, by the terms of the subscription, 5 per cent was to be paid at the time of the subscription and 10 per cent on the 1st of October, 1860, nothing further appearing in the report as to the conditions.

Where several assessments are made, the statute begins to run from the time that each assessment becomes due, according to the terms of the call. Union Sav. Bank v. Leiter, 145 Cal. 696, 79 Pac. 441.

And in the same case it was also held that the running of the statute as to one assessment did not affect a subsequent assessment by liquidators.

In Kent County R. Co. v. Wilson, 5 Houst. (Del.) 49, a written contract of subscription in the hand of the subscriber was declared not barred until the expiration of six years from the accrual of the cause of action. It was stated that the contract was not like a promissory note, payable on demand, "for, when it was entered into, the company was not yet organized, and there was no person legally authorized to receive the money. Moreover, by the terms of the charter, the company had no power or authority, when organized, to require immediate payment of the subscription." But it should be observed that in this case the charter of the company required the subscription to be paid at such times as should be determined by the president and directors.

c. After sale of forfeited stock.

The charter of a navigation company provided that stock might be sold for failure to to the benefit of all, and must be distributed among all ratably." This result as to collection, and still more forcibly as to distribution, is not reasonably practicable, except in equity. A bill may be filed, as in this case, by assignees representing the corporation for the benefit of creditors, or, as in Lane's Appeal, supra, by creditors in their own names in behalf of themselves and others. In the latter case an action at law would present insuperable difficulties, and yet the substantial controversy is the same, and the mere difference in the nominal complainant should not oust in one case the jurisdiction that must be sustained in the other.

It is earnestly argued by appellants that in all the cases where a bill has been sustained an accounting was part of the relief sought, and that equitable jurisdiction attached on this ground alone, while in the present case no accounting is asked, as the bill avers that the whole unpaid subscription will be insufficient to pay the debts. It is true that the necessity for an account is a large and influential element in equitable relief; but we do not find it said in any of the cases that its presence or absence is the conclusive jurisdictional fact. In the present case the bill sets up facts that avoid the necessity for an accounting and an assessment. But suppose the answer had denied the averments and thus made the necessity of an accounting and assessment an issue; that would at once have made the case one cognizable in equity. Citizens & pay subscriptions. After the sale of forfeited stock, following assessment, an action was brought against the defaulting subscriber for the balance due. The court declared the action not barred, for it was commenced within the statutory period, after the balance was ascertained by the sale. Cape Fear & D. River Nav. Co. v. Wilcox, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 481, 78 Am. Dec. 260.

To the same effect is Cape Fear & D. River Nav. Co. v. Costen, 63 N. C. 264.

d. When statute not applicable.

The prescription of the Louisiana statutes of three years upon "all other open accounts" is not applicable to an action to recover a stock subscription. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Estlin, 12 La. Ann. 184; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Lea, 12 La. Ann. 388.

In Otter View Land Co. v. Bolling, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1157, 70 S. W. 834, the decree of a sister state adjudging the statute of limitations a bar against suits on stock subscriptions is not sufficient, if the statute of that state is not pleaded, and there is no plea of the lapse of time under that statute as a bar.

In Falmouth & L. Turnp. Co. v. Shawhan, 107 Ind. 47, 5 N. E. 408, it was determined that a written contract to take stock payable at such times as the director may require is not, for that reason, a contract partially in writing and partially oral, so as to make applicable a six years' limitation of action.

In Great Western Teleg. Co. v. Stubbs, 55 Ill. App. 210, a cause of action to recover the balance of a subscription was determined to be barred because it arose outside of the state and was barred by the laws of that state. The Illinois statute provides that "when a cause of action has arisen in a state or territory out of this state, or in a foreign country, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot be maintained by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained in this state." 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

III. Actions after insolvency of the corporation.

a. By assignee or trustee for the benefit of creditors, or by receiver.

1. After demand.

When a company becomes insolvent and its assets are vested in an assignee or trustee for the benefit of creditors, or an assignee or trustee in bankruptcy, then first arises the right of the creditors to be paid out of its assets. Included among such assets are unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock.

Difficulties have arisen when applying the statute of limitations, in determining when the cause of action has accrued; and the cases do not agree. Probably most of them could be reconciled by observing whether, by the terms of the subscription, it was intended that payment should be made at once, or should be left to the determination of the company's directors.

When a corporation has made an assignment or has gone into bankruptcy, the assignee or trustee represents the company for the purpose of collecting its assets and paying its creditors. He has control over the assets, but the right or franchise to make a call or assessment upon the stockholder for his balance of subscription has not passed to him by the assignment, and when demand is required the directors are the proper persons to make it.

The rule as laid down by the Federal courts grew out of what may be termed the "Glenn" cases. A history of the facts underlying them all is interesting and instructive, as disclosing the length to which the courts have gone in holding that the statute of limitations begins to run only after a demand has been made.

The National Express Company was chartered in Virginia. December 12, 1865, became insolvent the following year, and, in obedience to a resolution of its directors, the president executed a deed of trust to three trustees for the benefit of its creditors. This deed was soon after ratified by the stockholders present at a meeting of the stock-

M. Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Gillespie, 115 Pa. 564, 9 Atl. 73, was an action at law in which such necessity was part of the issue, and the case had to be sent to a new trial for the reception of incompetent evidence on that point. Whether all the unpaid capital is required for payment of debts, or only part, and, if so, how much, are matters of judgment on the evidence, and different juries are likely to differ in their conclusions. The result would be that in numerous suits by the assignees some stockholders defendant might have to pay their subscriptions in full while some paid only part, and others perhaps nothing at all. This would be incurring certain inconvenience and quite probable injustice, where the relief should not only be certain, but uniform. As was well said by the learned judge below: "There are more than forty defendants. Most of them live within the jurisdiction: some do not: and it is quite conceivable that there might be hundreds living without the jurisdiction, not reachable by our process at law. The question involved in all the cases is substantially the same, namely, Ought the corporation to collect in its unpaid capital? It is a pure question of law, and may be decided once for all in one suit as well as in a thousand. If the balance should not be collected from all, then it ought not to be collected from any. If, on the other hand, it should be collected, then none should escape."

holders, and at that meeting the president and directors were instructed to make a call for the payment of its debts. But no call was ever made and the corporate affairs were absolutely abandoned. No further meeting of the stockholders was held. Glenn, a creditor, obtained judgment against the company in Maryland, and filed a creditor's bill in the chancery court of Richmond against the company, the president and directors, and the trustees, December 4, 1871. But no process was actually issued against the company itself, and nothing further was done in the suit until August 4, 1879, when an amended and supplemental bill was allowed to be filed and was finally heard on the merits. A decree was entered Dec. 4, 1880,—fourteen years after the notorious insolvency of the company. By that decree the deed of trust was declared valid, the trustees removed, and another trustee, Glenn, appointed in their place. The only assets were unpaid subscriptions. It was decreed that an assessment of 30 per cent should be made upon the stock unpaid, and that "the stockholders of said company . . . be and they are hereby severally required to pay the several amounts hereby called for and assessed, to the said John Glenn . . . and the said trustee is hereby authorized and directed to collect and receive the said call and assessment . . . by suit or otherwise." Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 957, 6 S. E. 866.

Many suits were brought by Glenn in the Federal and state courts. In the Federal courts there was a difference of opinion, some holding that a lapse of nearly eighteen years before bringing suit was a bar, because the liability of the stockholder was fixed by the assignment to trustees in 1866. Glenn v. Dorsheimer, 23 Fed. 695.

And in another case, 24 Fed. 536, it was said: "If it be that no cause of action accrued, technically, until a formal call was made, it is equally true that the assignees should have made the call in a reasonable time after the assignment, or caused the same to be made."

while confessing to be somewhat shaken in its opinion in former cases, still insisted "that the statute of limitations does stand as a bar to a claim which could have been enforced by proceedings eighteen years ago."

But in Glenn v. Soule, 22 Fed. 417, the doctrine that was finally laid down by the United States Supreme Court was enunciated that the statute did not begin to run until a call was made by the trustees appointed by the chancery court of Richmond, because a call was made necessary by the terms of the subscription.

The disagreement in the Federal courts was set at rest by the case of Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U. S. 319, 33 L. ed. 184, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739, in which it was stated that "the decree of the Richmond chancery court determined the validity of the assessment, and that the lapse of time between the failure of the company and the date of the decree did not preclude relief, by creating a bar through statutes of limitation or the application of the doctrine of laches. . . .

The court may have erred in its conclusions, but its decree cannot be attacked collaterally, and, indeed, upon a direct attack it has already been sustained by the Virginia court of appeals. Hamilton v. Glenn, 85 Va. 901, 9 S. E. 129." The Supreme Court also declared that "by the deed the subscriptions, so far as uncalled for, passed to the trustees, and the creditors were limited to the relief which could be afforded under it, while the stockholders could be subjected only to equality of assessment; and as the trustees could not collect except upon call, and had themselves no power to make one, rendering resort to the president and directors necessary, or, failing their action, then to the courts, it is very clear that the statute of limitations could not commence to run until after the call was made." The court further held that as, by its charter, a call could only be made by the president and directors, that, as they had failed to do their duty, the court could order the assessment. "Constituting, as unpaid subscriptions do, a fund for the payment of corporate debts," it was stated that, after a creditor had exhausted his ever practicable in common-law forms. When later the legislature granted equitable powers, it was held that, if the subject of a bill was one within the proper and established jurisdiction of chancery, the invention of a new remedy in common-law form, or the extension of an old one, would not necessarily oust the equitable jurisdiction. Wesley Church v. Moore, 10 Pa. 273. The question in such cases turns on the completeness, adequacy, and convenience of the remedy at law, and our decisions have been liberal in the consideration of all these elements. Kirkpatrick v. M'Donald, 11 Pa. 387; Bierbower's Appeal, 107 Pa. 14; Brush Electric Co.'s Appeal, 114 Pa. 574, 7 Atl. 794; Johnston v. Price, 172 Pa. 427, 33 Atl. 688; Gray v. Citizens' Gas Co. 206

Pa. 303, 55 Atl. 988. In the last case it was said by our Brother Dean: "The question raised in this case is not alone whether plaintiff has a remedy at law, for that remedy it clearly has; but whether, in view of the facts, it is an adequate one. It may be conceded that the time is not very remote in our judicial history, when a wronged party sought the intervention of equity, and he could be truthfully met by the reply, 'You have a remedy at law in an action for damages;' such reply would have been the end of his bill; he would have been turned out of court for want of jurisdiction. But this answer is no longer conclusive as to the jurisdiction; courts now go further, and inquire whether, under the facts, the remedy at law is not vexatiously legal remedies against the corporation, "he could subject such subscriptions to the satisfaction of his judgment, and the stockholder cannot then object that no call has been made."

This case was deemed conclusive in Glenn v. Liggett, 135 U. S. 533, 34 L. ed. 262, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867, in which it was further held that the Missouri legislation, by which the liability of the stockholder was fixed through the insolvency of the corporation and the running of the statute from that event, had no application, because the case was to be adjudicated according to the Virginia laws. These cases were followed in Glenn v. Marbury, 145 U. S. 499, 36 L. ed. 790, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914.

After the decision in Hawkins v. Glenn, the Federal courts, of course, followed that case in holding that the statute began to run only from a call by the trustee appointed by the court in 1880. Glenn v. Foote, 36 Fed. 824; Glenn v. McAllister, 46 Fed. 883; Priest v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 305, 4 U. S. App. 478, 51 Fed. 400.

In Glenn v. Macon, 32 Fed. 7, the court declared that in a suit which formerly was pending in the circuit court in 1867, a decree directing the receiver therein to collect any sums due upon the shares of the stock "and for that purpose may prosecute actions," did not amount to a call or assessment, and the plea of prescription under the Louisiana statute could not apply. A similar ruling was made in Liggett v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 286, 4 U. S. App. 438, 51 Fed. 381, and in Glenn v. Marbury, supra.

The refusal of a stockholder to pay a draft drawn on him by the company for an assessment did not set the statute running as to subsequent calls, but only as to the first call. Dorsheimer v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 309, 4 U. S. App. 500, 51 Fed. 404.

Nor will an adjudication that a call is also barred. Priest v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 311, 4 U. S. App. 509, 51 Fed. 405. And both the assignor and assignee of stock not fully paid are liable until the par value of the stock is called in. 48 Fed. 19. The state courts in which Glenn brought actions laid down 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the same principle, that a call was necessary to set the statute running, some of them being decided before the case of Hawkins v. Glenn. Glenn v. Semple, 80 Ala. 159, 60 Am. Rep. 92, 91 Ala. 245, 24 Am. St. Rep. 894, 6 So. 46, 9 So. 265; Lehman v. Glenn, 87 Ala. 618, 6 So. 44; Calloway v. Glenn, 105 Ky. 648, 49 S. W. 440; Glenn v. Williams, 60 Md. 93; Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 6 S. E. 866; Hamilton v. Glenn, supra; Vanderwerken v. Glenn, 85 Va. 9, 6 S. E. 806; Glenn v. Sothoron, 4 App. D. C. 125.

But some of them, while adhering to the principle, do so with reluctance. In Glenn v. Howard, 81 Ga. 383, 12 Am. St. Rep. 318, 8 S. E. 636, the court says: "I must say for myself that there is a great deal of reason in favor of the decision of Judge Brewer [Glenn v. Dorsheimer, 23 Fed. 695, supra], but the weight of authority is unquestionably against the ruling of the court below in this case."

In Semple v. Glenn, 91 Ala. 245, 24 Am. St. Rep. 894, 6 So. 46, 9 So. 265, the court declared that the prescription of twenty years from the date of the assignment might be pleaded as a defense, saying: "This court has adhered with uniform tenacity to the doctrine of prescription, and has repeatedly held that the lapse of twenty years, without recognition of right, or admission of liability, operates an absolute rule of repose." And in Glenn v. Saxton, 68 Cal. 353, 9 Pac. 420, it was held that the California statute of two years (Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 339) applied to a contract "founded upon an instrument of writing executed out of the state."

It should be observed that the "Glenn" cases all turn upon a contract in which the subscriber agreed to pay when the president and directors should demand payment. There seems no reason, therefore, why they should not have been deemed to continue liable until the call was made by the proper authority, and if that authority would not act, why the court should not act for it, unless it be held that the insolvency of the corporation worked a change in the contract, or terminated it, and the right of the credi-inconvenient, and whether it is so proximately certain as to be adequate to right the wrong complained of." Testing by this standard the numerous actions that would be required at law, and comparing that remedy with the superior certainty, uniformity, and convenience of the present bill, we have no hesitation in holding that it is a proper case for equitable jurisdiction.

The remaining question, the substantial issue in the case, concerns the statute of limitations. Stated generally, it is whether, when demand is necessary to start the running of the statute, it must be made within six years of the contract. Stated in detail, with reference to the particular facts of the case, it is well expressed in the twelfth assignment of error, thus: "The stock subscription having been made in 1888, and all the calls made in 1888 having been paid, and no further call for the unpaid portion of the stock having been made by the directors, and the insolvency of the company having occurred more than six years from the date of the last call and the payment thereof, this action for the unpaid portion of the stock subscription, begun more than ten years thereafter, is barred by the statute of limitations." In Swearingen v. Sewickley Dairy Co. 198 Pa. 68, 53 L. R. A. 471, 47 Atl. 941, the law was thus stated: "The general rules are: First, that on an obligation for the payment of money on demand the statute begins to run at once. Suit is a sufficient demand, and must be brought within six years. Andrews's Appeal, 99 Pa.

tors to sue at once attached upon the happening of that event. It would seem that the United States court does not take the view that insolvency affects the contract, although apparently the decision in Hawkins v. Glenn, supra, turns upon the fact that the decree of the chancery court of Richmond was sustained by the court of last resort in Virginia, and could not be attacked collaterally, or, at least, that such reason had great force in the determination.

The following cases in the state courts are in substantial agreement with the rule that when a demand is required, the statute will begin to run only when the demand is made by the directors, whatever be the lapse of time, or by the court if the directors refuse to act. Great Western Teleg. Co. v. Gray, 122 Ill. 630, 14 N. E. 214; Stark v. Burke, 9 La. Ann. 341; Clinton & P. H. R. Co. v. Eason, 14 La. Ann. 828; Shropshire's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 527; Re Haggert Bros. Mfg. Co. 19 Ont. App. Rep. 582; Williams v. Taylor, 120 N. Y. 244, 24 N. E. 288; Liberty Sav. Bank v. Otter View Land Co. 96 Va. 352, 31 S. E. 511; Cherry v. Lamar, 68 Ga. 541.

In this last case the rights of the creditors of the bank, no longer a going concern, were declared to rest upon judgments, still alive, against the bank, as to the bank, and, as against the subscribers, "upon the contracts of subscription by which the subscriber became bound to the bank." Cherry v. Lamar was held not in conflict with the case of Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365, because in the Cherry Case the charter made a call and notice by the directors conditions precedent to the collection of unpaid subscriptions, while in Terry v. Anderson such provisions were absent from the charter, and, for all that appeared, the stockholders were liable to suit at any time for the recovery of the balance. Terry v. Anderson held that, under the circumstances of the case, the legislature might constitutionally shorten a statute of limitations in force when the bank made an assignment, since the prescribed time was not too short or unreasonable.

The statute begins to run when the instalments, as fixed by a call for them, fall due. Haynes v. Wall, 13 La. Ann. 258; Consolidated Asso. v. Lord, 35 La. Ann. 425; Modern Life Ins. & Improv. Trust Co. v. Keller, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 118.

In two cases in Maryland subscriptions to the stock required a payment of $1 at the time of subscription, and $1 per share each sixty days thereafter, until such payments should be declared unnecessary by the directors. A call for the second instalment was made a month later, thereupon the other instalments fell due each month thereafter, ending in April, 1892. Several instalments were paid by the subscriber, amounting to 50 per cent, when, in November, 1891, the directors passed a resolution declaring that dividends would pay the remaining instalments. In 1892 the legislature amended the charter, declaring that the stock should not be liable for further assessments after 50 per cent was paid in, and that full-paid certificates might be issued to the subscribers, and that they should not be liable for debts contracted after the passage of the act. It was decided that as to a debt contracted before the act was passed the statute began to run from April, 1892, when the last instalment was due. Williams v. Waters, 97 Md. 113, 54 Atl. 767; Williams v. Taylor, 99 Md. 306, 57 Atl. 641.

A company made several calls which were adopted by the court in a report made to it in creditors' proceedings. As between the company and stockholders the statute was declared to have begun to run from the time when the assessments became due and payable. Subsequently the legislature passed an act Dec. 22, 1897, chap. 20, § 2, pp. 16, 17, Laws of Virginia, which the court construed to enable the stockholder, sued by a representative of the creditors, "to make the same defenses, including the plea of the statute of limitations, that he might have made to an action brought by the corporation." The court determined that the statute began to run against an action on the assessment when it became due and payable

421; Milne's Appeal, 99 Pa. 483; Boustead v. Cuyler, 116 Pa. 551, 8 Atl. 848. Secondly, where the contract is to pay on the future performance of a condition or happening of an event, or at a certain time after demand, there a demand is necessary to a right of action, and the statute does not begin to run until demand is made. Smith v. Bell, 107 Pa. 352; Eichman v. Hersker, 170 Pa. 402, 33 Atl. 229; Taylor v. Witman, 3 Grant, Cas. 138. Whether there is a third rule, that, if demand is necessary, it must be made within six years from the contract, has been both affirmed and denied in our cases, which are much at variance on the question. It was asserted in Laforge v. Jayne, 9 Pa. 410, and expressly held in Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, 32

Pa. 22, 72 Am. Dec. 770, McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 32 Pa. 25, Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 36 Pa. 77, and Franklin Savings Bank use of Miller v. Bridges, 5 Sadler (Pa.) 238, 20 W. N. C. 43, 8 Atl. 611. On the other hand, it was denied generally in Taylor v. Witman, supra, and expressly rejected in Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. 39 Pa. 92, 80 Am. Dec. 507, Smith v. Bell, supra, and other cases." The case then before us did not call for a decision on the last question, and it was accordingly passed with only the foregoing incidental reference. In the present case, however, the same point is squarely presented, and is now to be met.

The cases, as already said, are much at variance, and require critical examination.

on the company's calls. Gold v. Paynter, 101 Va. 714, 44 S. E. 920.

A verbal subscription to stock was construed by the court in Williams v. Matthews, 103 Va. 180, 48 S. E. 861, which subscription was made upon terms and conditions as set forth in the prospectus. The subscription was an agreement to pay "$1 down, . . . $1 per share at the call of the directors, and $1 per share sixty days thereafter, if needed, until the whole amount is paid." The prospectus was in the same terms, but ended: "Until by a sale of the lots of the company such payment shall be declared unnecessary by the board of directors." The court held the words "if needed" should be construed together with the terms of the subscription as appearing in the prospectus, and, therefore, after the first call of the directors, "the instalments became due automatically every sixty days thereafter until fully paid," or until the sale of the lots, "which latter contingency never arose."

In this case it will be observed that, although the instalments after the first were automatic, they were dependent upon the call for the first to set the time running as to each instalment thereafter.

In McCarter v. Ketcham, 62 Atl. 693, the New Jersey court of errors and appeals had before it an action brought by the receiver of an insolvent corporation to recover a balance due on unpaid subscriptions. A certificate of incorporation had been filed setting forth the objects of the company, the amount of its stock, and the name and residence of the stockholders, with the number of shares subscribed. Nothing is shown in the report as to when the subscriptions were to be paid, and it is not disclosed that any statute determined that. But the directors were authorized to call in from the stockholders a part of their subscription at a special meeting of the directors, to be paid at a certain date. This assessment was not paid by defendant. The corporation became insolvent, a receiver was appointed, and, ten years subsequent to the above call, was directed by the chancellor to levy an assessment on the stockholders. This was done and demand made. In the same year action was brought. The court said: "The original subscription for stock in the certificate of organization was liable to be paid immediately and as soon as call for the same was made. . . . This amount then became due and payable, and left 60 per cent subject to be called when required."

2. From insolvency.

The courts have not been a unit in declaring that a statute will begin to run only after a demand has been made upon the stockholders, for some have held that, by the act of insolvency itself, the cause of action to the creditor accrues immediately. This was held so even in a case where the subscription was to be paid in instalments "as called for by the board of directors" of a bank. Calls were made within a few months after the bank ceased to be a going concern. The court says: "As creditor it had the power to fix at once its debtor's liability. Delay for a single day was inexcusable, and the statute commenced to run at once;" that is, when, "by order of the board of directors, the bank suspended." It was further held in the same case that a statute prescribing the times when stock subscribed for should be paid, where passed subsequently to the contract of subscription, determined within the limits of the contract the time and amount of payments of the balance, and the statute began to run when the default occurred. West v. Topeka Sav. Bank, 66 Kan. 524, 63 L. R. A. 137, 97 Am. St. Rep. 385, 72 Pac. 252.

In Jones v. Whitworth, 94 Tenn. 602, 30 S. W. 736, in an action to compel stockholders, to whom stock had been issued for land at an excessive valuation, to pay the balance of subscription, the statutes of limitations of six and of ten years were held inapplicable, although more than twelve years had expired since the conveyance of the land for the stock, the court declaring that the statute begins to run when a call is made either by the directors or by a court of equi-

In favor of the rule, and as contended for by appellants, are Laforge v. Jayne, Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Graham, Franklin Sav. Bank use of Miller v. Bridges, supra, and some other cases, such as McKelvy's Appeal, 72 Pa. 409, in which the foregoing have been cited, though generally arguendo and obiter. Laforge v. Jayne, supra, was an action of assumpsit on a duebill for "one hundred and seventy-two dollars in Pike county checks, which I promise to return on demand." Suit, being brought after six years, was supported by the plaintiff on the ground that "Pike county checks" were a specific kind of personal property, and therefore demand for their return was a necessary preliminary to suit. But this court held that the obligation was to pay money on demand, and therefore the statute began to run from the date. In the opinion, Coulter, J., refers to Codman v. Rogers, 10 Pick. 112, the leading case on the view that where demand is necessary it must be made in a reasonable time, and, where no cause for delay is shown, such time is measured by the period of the statute. But the case was decided on the other ground, and therefore is not really in point in the present discussion. In Franklin Sav. Bank use of Miller v. Bridges, supra, the syllabus is that six years is a bar to an action by a corporation on a subscription when no call or assessment has been made in that time; but there the corporation had been insolvent for more than

ty. It was also further stated that it would begin to run when the insolvency of the corporation is established, either by a general assignment or by a judgment and return nulla bona. In this case, in the absence of a call, or of judgments and return, the insolvency of the company and an assignment of the corporate property set the statute running.

The Michigan statute, chap. 282, § 12, 2 How. Anno. Stat., providing for the dissolution of corporations, was construed in Webber v. Hovey, 108 Mich. 49, 65 N. W. 619. The statute required a receiver to proceed immediately to collect any sums remaining due upon any share of stock subscribed, authorizing a suit in equity or at law. The court construed this statute to require the receiver to call in immediately unpaid subscriptions, and made it his duty to do so, "unless the person indebted shall be wholly insolvent." It was determined that, although if the corporation were a going concern no right of action would accrue until a call by the directors, the corporation having been dissolved by the appointment of a receiver the balance of subscriptions then became due and the statute began to run from that time. The court felt called upon to distinguish the case of Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 155, 26 L. ed. 973, declaring that the court in that case was dealing with and construing a statute under which the only duty of the assignee was to collect in, upon unpaid stock, a sum which would be sufficient to satisfy the creditors. And it was said there: "If it should turn out that the other assets were sufficient, no action would lie against the stockholder for the balance due on his stock; for if, in a bankruptcy proceeding, any surplus remained after payment of debts, it would go to the company, and not to the stockholders; and we have seen that the company in this case would have no right to any surplus." But in this case the statute required a receiver to collect unpaid subscriptions, and distribute the surplus, if any, among the stockholders.

firming 105 Ill. App. 271, chap. 32 of Hurd's Rev. Stat. (Ill.) § 25. Where a right of action accrued to a creditor against a stockholder whose stock had been paid for by property taken at a fraudulent overvaluation, when the corporation ceased doing business, leaving debts unpaid, it was held to be "a civil action not otherwise provided for" within the meaning of chap. 83, § 15, of Hurd's Rev. Stat. (Ill.), and governed by the five years' statute of limitations, which began to run from the time the corporation ceased business, leaving unpaid debts. It was further held in this case that, where there are two methods provided to enforce a stockholder's liability for unpaid subscriptions, the statute of limitations begins to run when the creditor can proceed by either method; and "when the statutory period counting from that time has elapsed, the right to proceed by either method is barred." It was further held in this case that, by chap. 83, § 22, Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1901, limiting an action after the person entitled to bring the same discovers that he has such a cause of action, it must be averred that the person liable "fraudulently conceals the cause of such action."

In Wyman v. Bowman, 62 C. C. A. 189, 127 Fed. 257, it was held, in an action by a receiver appointed as ancillary receiver in Iowa, that the cause of action on a subscription as modified by the Nebraska Constitution could not accrue until the debts of the corporation should be ascertained and the corporate property exhausted; therefore it was not barred by the Iowa statute. In this case the defendants had stock in a Nebraska corporation, and gave notes for the unpaid portion of the subscription, payable at such time as the board of directors should prescribe; but four years later they sold their stock to others, thereby modifying their contract into a guaranty to pay corporate debts to the amount of the unpaid subscriptions, when those debts should be ascertained, and the corporate property exhausted, as provided under Neb. Const. art. 11b, § 4. The defendants had pleaded a five years' limitation on unwritten contracts six years and the decision was put explicitly on that ground, which is now well settled. The case, therefore, is not in point. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers and McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., supra, are the main authorities in appellant's favor. Both were actions by the corporation to recover the amount of subscriptions to the stock, and in each the call on which the action was based was made more than six years after the subscription. This court, citing Codman v. Rogers, supra, held that the statute of limitations was a bar. But it is notable that the defense was not rested on the mere lapse of time, but also on the abandonment of the corporate enterprise. In the Byers Case, Woodward, J., says: The act "contemplated an early commencement and completion of the road. . . . It is not reasonable to suppose the legislature meant that subscribers to such a stock should be indefinitely bound. The road was to be promptly commenced and vigorously maintained." And in the McCully Case the same judge still more explicitly said: We have held in the case against Byers that "the company were bound from analogy to the statute of limitations to call in payments on stock subscriptions within six years after their date; or, if the delay was not satisfactorily accounted for, subscribers would be at liberty, after that lapse of time, to consider the enterprise abandoned and their subscriptions canceled. The presumptions of abandonment in such cases are very reasonable and necessary.

and also a ten years' limitation on written contracts, as provided by a statute of Iowa.

3. When statute not applicable.

In Mathis v. Pridham, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 58, 20 S. W. 1015, in an action against all defaulting stockholders, it was held that the statute did not apply until the creditors had exhausted their remedy against the corporation, and had all of its property applied to their claims.

In Cumberland Lumber Co. v. Clinton Hill Lumber & Mfg. Co. 64 N. J. Eq. 517, 54 Atl. 450, in directing a receiver to call upon stockholders for a certain amount of their subscriptions, the court of chancery held that the defense of the statute of limitations was not available in an application of that nature, but could only be set up and considered in an action to recover a subscription.

In Chrisman-Sawyer Bkg. Co. v. Independence Wool Mfr. Co. 168 Mo. 634, 68 S. W. 1020, it was declared that a statute making stockholders personally liable for the debts of a company without regard to the amount of stock owned by them has no application to the indebtedness of a stockholder to the company on his unpaid stock, and that the statute of limitations applicable to such statutory liability does not apply to actions to recover such unpaid balances.

In England the statute is held not to be applicable, because the debt is founded on a statute, and therefore a specialty. Cork & B. R. Co. v. Goode, 13 C. B. 827, 22 L. J. C. P. N. S. 193, 17 Jur. 555. But in Canada the case of Barnes's Bkg. Co. v. Reynolds, 36 U. C. Q. B. 256, determined that such a debt was not a specialty debt in Canada, although proceeding brought under the English "company's act 1862."

b. By assignee or trustee in bankruptcy.

In Foreman v. Bigelow, 4 Cliff. 508, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 457, Fed. Cas. No. 4,934, a suit was brought by an assignee in bankruptcy to compel owners of stock to pay the unpaid balance of stock issued to them as 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fully paid through fraudulent action of directors. The action was brought after call made by him, pursuant to the order of the bankrupt court. The court referred to the rule that "liability of the stockholders upon their unpaid subscriptions is that of debtors to the bank, and that all such balances passed to the assignee under the assignment," and for all that appeared in the record "the stockholders were liable to suit at any time for the recovery of the balance due from them as such stockholders. . . . Apply that rule to the case before the court, and it follows that, even if the bill of complaint had charged that the respondents had notice of the fraud, or were put upon inquiry in that regard, it would not have benefited the complainant, as in that event his claim would have been barred by the two two years' limitation of the bankrupt act."

In Scovill v. Shaw, 4 Cliff. 549, Fed. Cas. No. 12,552, it was declared that "for the reason given in Foreman v. Bigelow, supra, the claim is barred by the statute of limitations." The court further said: "Creditors, after the failure of the corporation, could have brought a bill in equity against the corporation, and joined the stockholders to enforce the payment; and it is equally clear that the assignee might have sued the moment the title to the estate of the bankrupt was duly conveyed to him as such assignee. . . . Stockholders, under such circumstances, are debtors to the corporation; consequently, as Chief Justice Waite held, the claim against them passed to the assignee as part of the property, estate, and credits of the bankrupt. Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365. Since that decision, it seems to be unnecessary to argue in support of the proposition, as it is established by the highest authority known to our law."

In Payson v. Coffin, 5 Dill. 473, Fed. Cas. No. 10,859, the bankruptcy court ordered an assessment on unpaid stock nearly four years after the adjudication in bankruptcy and the execution of the deed of assignment. The charter of the company provided that "in all cases of losses . . . each stock-

. . . But this case is not left to stand on presumptions of abandonment. We have direct and conclusive evidence of it in the testimony of Addison, Kelly, and Robinson. Not only was the project abandoned, but the money of many subscribers was refunded to them, and they released from all further obligations to the company." Special attention was called to this feature in Hanover Junction & S. R. Co. v. Grubb, 82 Pa. 36, 46, and some other cases which will be referred to later on. It must be conceded, however, that, notwithstanding the references to the peculiar facts, the court put the cases fairly on the principle that the action for subscriptions to stock must be brought within reasonable time, and, unless cause for delay be shown, such time is measured by the statute of limitations. Morrison v. Mullin, 34 Pa. 12, was an action by the sheriff on a refunding receipt stipulating to repay if, on settlement of the liens, it should [appear] that I am not entitled to this money. Suit was brought twenty-three years after the date of the receipt, and the point made by the plaintiff that until a settlement of the liens was shown the statute did not begin to run. But the court, on the authority of Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, supra, held that, the plaintiff not having shown a settlement within a reasonable time, the statute was a bar. It is notable that two of the five justices dissented on this point; one of them being Woodward, J., who wrote the opinions in the Byers and McCully Cases. And in Gir- holder shall be liable to the amount of unpaid stock held by him." The court said: "The contention of the defendant is that the statute commenced to run at least from the time when the deed of assignment was executed. If so, the action is barred." The court quoted from and followed Scovill v. Shaw, supra.

The decision in Payson v. Coffin was declared, in Walker v. Towner, 4 Dill. 165, Fed. Cas. No. 17,089 to have "authoritative force in this circuit, and it is needless to enforce the arguments by which it may be sustained as a sound exposition of the limitation provisions of the bankrupt act."

But in the case of Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968, the court declared that the action does not accrue to the assignee until a call, when a call is required, has been made either by the directors of the company or by a court of equity, where the directors fail to do their duty. The court says: "But under such circumstances, before there is any obligation upon the stockholder to pay without an assessment and call by the company, there must be some order of a court of competent jurisdiction, or, at the very least, some authorized demand upon him for payment. And it is clear the statute of limitations does not begin to run in his favor until such order or demand. . . . Upon the bankruptcy of the company his obligation was to pay to the assignees, upon demand, such an amount upon his unpaid stock as would be sufficient, with the other assets of the company, to pay its debts. He was under no obligation to pay any more, and he was under no obligation to pay anything until the amount necessary for him to pay was at least approximately ascertained. Until then, his obligation to pay did not become complete. . . . The proceeding for an assessment in the bankruptcy court was . . . to accomplish two purposes . . . second, to fix the amount which . . . [the stockholder] should be required to pay. Until these things were done the cause of action . . . did not accrue, although his primary obligation was assumed 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) at the time when he subscribed the stock." Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365, was distinguished.

c. By creditors of the corporation.

1. After demand.

While an assignee for creditors or in bankruptcy is acting for the creditors to collect the assets belonging to the corporation in order to pay its debts, and therefore represents them, he also represents the company. But creditors have been allowed in many cases to bring proceedings directly against the stockholders, in some cases also joining the corporation, to collect the unpaid subscriptions due from defaulting subscribers. In these cases there is considerable contrariety as to whether the statute of limitations should begin to run only after demand by the company or by the court, or whether the cause of action has accrued upon the insolvency, and the statute begins to run from that period.

Payne v. Bullard, 23 Miss. 88, 55 Am. Dec. 74, is probably the leading case on this point. It was there held that the statute did not run until call made in an action by a creditor to compel a subscriber to bank stock to pay the unpaid balance after return nulla bona upon judgment against the company. The court declared that the stock subscribed was in the nature of a trust fund for the payment of its liabilities. "The stock is the fund which the creditors trust. They have no direct means of compelling its payment until they have obtained judgments at law. They become the beneficiaries of the trust by receiving the notes, and the stockholders, as the persons bound by the trust, cannot oppose the statute of limitations to their claim to have the stock paid up. If the corporation does not compel payment of the stock, the subscribers must be deemed to hold it for the corporation, subject to its call. It is a continuing, subsisting trust and confidence to which the statute of limitations has no application." To the same effect are Curry v.

ard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. 39 Pa. 92, 102, 80 Am. Dec. 507, the suggestion is made that this case can be sustained on the presumption of payment after twenty years. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Graham, supra, was an action by the same railroad under substantially the same facts as Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, and McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., supra, except that the subscription was conditional "that the construction of said road is prosecuted." The element gave additional force to the defense of abandonment, and the previous cases were naturally followed.

The cases holding the other view may be said to begin with Sinkler v. Indiana & C. Turnp. Road Co. 3 Penn. & W. 149, where it was held that on a subscription to stock payable at such times as the managers may determine, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until a call is made. The defense was that the action was brought more than six years after the subscription, though within six years from the call. The call, however, was within six years from the subscription, and this fact is referred to in the Byers Case, 32 Pa. 22, 72 Am. Dec. 770, as sustaining a distinction. But the court in Sinkler v. Indiana & C. Turnp. Road Co. supra, puts its decision plainly on the other ground. "No action," said Kennedy, J., "could have been maintained for defendant's subscription, or any part of it, until the managers had first fixed a time for the payment of it. . . . The statute of limitations does not begin to run before

Woodward, 53 Ala. 371; Athens Car & Coach Co. v. Elsbree, 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 618; Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 19 Nev. 171, 3 Am. St. Rep. 881, 7 Pac. 870; Warner v. Callender, 20 Ohio St. 190.

In Brown v. Union Ins. Co. 3 La. Ann. 177, the charter of a corporation having divided the subscriptions into two portions, one to be paid in instalments at fixed times, and the other at such times as the directors should see fit, the statute was declared to run from the time when the last instalment fell due under the first division, and from the time when calls were made under the second division.

There is no direct evidence as to the terms of the oral subscription in Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co. 135 Cal. 579, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, 67 Pac. 1057, but in a resolution passed by the directors after organization, the secretary was directed to notify the subscribers that the stock was ready to issue, "and that all subscriptions are now due and payable at the office of the company." It will be observed that there is nothing to indicate that the subscription was to be made when the directors called for it, and there is nothing to show that it was not due when the notice thus directed was given. Only a part of the subscription was paid, and no further call was made, and yet it was held that the statute had not run because no further call had been made.

2. From fixed period.

Of course, if the subscription is, by its terms or by the charter of the company, or by any other statute, fixed as to times of payment, a cause of action upon the unpaid balance will accrue to the company at least as soon as the instalments become due, without any call being required by the company. Therefore, in South Carolina Mfg. Co. v. Bank of State, 6 Rich. Eq. 227, stock being required to be paid at certain times during four years, an action by the creditors was held barred because the company was barred, and the creditors had no greater 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

right than the company to the rights to which they were subrogated.

In Moses v. Ocoee Bank, 1 Lea, 398, notes given for subscription to bank stock were declared not to be such payment as was required by the statute, and were held subject to the limitation of actions which began to run from the time they fell due according to their terms. No formal call was shown upon which a defaulting subscriber could have been sued by the bank.

Where the by-laws of the company and agreement of subscription provided for payments by monthly instalments, the statute began to run from the day when each instalment became due, no call being necessary. Hawkins v. Donnerberg, 40 Or. 97, 66 Pac. 601, 908. But a voluntary appearance of the defendant in this suit when the statute had not yet run was held to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

In Harris v. Gateway Land Co. 128 Ala. 652, 29 So. 611, on demurrer to the complaint, it was averred that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. The complaint alleged that the subscriptions were made payable on call of the company, but on amendment the subscription paper, so termed, was inserted and showed as to the subscription only this,— "that the names of shareholders, and the number of shares held by each, are as follows, to wit (the names and number of shares being set forth). The court said: "If this paper by itself had been set out to show the subscriptions and how they were to be paid, it could not be contended that they were payable on call of the board of directors. There is nothing in it limiting the payments of stock to a call, or other contingency. Since the complainants have set up this document as the written evidence on which they rely to show that the subscriptions were payable on call, they are bound by it; and the instrument itself, thus set up as the highest and best evidence of the subscriptions and how they are payable, must control. It contradicts and nullifies the other averments in construction of the writ-the plaintiff has a right to bring his suit." The decision was cited as authority for this principle in McCarty v. Selinsgrove & N. B. R. Co. 87 Pa. 332, and again in Smith v. Bell, 107 Pa. 352. Sinkler v. Indiana & C. Turnp. Road Co. supra, was decided before the Byers and McCully Cases, and, though antagonistic in principle, did not expressly pass upon the distinction set up in those cases. With the next case in order of time, however,—Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. 39 Pa. 92, 80 Am. Dec. 507,—the conflict really began. That was an action by the holder of a certified check against the certifying bank more than six years after the date of the check, the date of the certification not appearing. The court held that the holder of such check stood upon the same footing as a depositor, and as the contract of the bank with its depositor was not to pay absolutely and immediately, but when payment should be required, a demand was necessary, and the statute did not begin to run until it was made. The Byers and McCully Cases were cited, but the court, per Strong, J., distinguished them on the ground of their special facts, saying: "The contract of subscription was a peculiar contract; the legislature had fixed five years limit within which the construction of the road should be commenced. It was the duty of the company to commence it, and to prosecute it vigorously, and, of course, to make the calls without delay." He then cited Morrison v. Mullin, supra, and, after suggesting that in that case "the twenty-ing, that the subscriptions were payable on call. . . . It follows that this being the only subscription ever made by defendants, it imports, without more, no obligation on them to pay at the call of the directors. If it imported any obligation to pay at all, it was to pay presently. We do not decide, however, that the paper by itself created any obligation of the parties signing it, to pay in any event. From what we have said, it follows that the complainants, if they ever had a right to maintain the bill for the alleged subscriptions of stock, were long barred of their right to maintain it, before the commencement of this suit."

3. From insolvency.

Does the cause of action accrue to the creditor immediately upon the insolvency of the company, or only after he has exhausted his remedy against the corporation? Upon this rock the courts usually split. But since the liability of the stockholder to the creditor, except when fixed by statute, is usually regarded as secondary, and not primary, it is not clear how the cause of action could accrue until the remedy against the company had been exhausted. Perhaps in cases where insolvency alone has been regarded as the starting point, the court has looked upon this liability as primary; but it is not always clear that such was the ground for the holding. Here, also, the contract of subscription should be carefully observed, for the subscriber should certainly be held to his contract, unless, by the insolvency of the company, what had been a continuing liability becomes thereby fixed without call.

In First Nat. Bank v. Greene, 64 Iowa, 445, 17 N. W. 86, 20 N. W. 754, the creditor had a right of action for his debt against the company in 1875, but did not bring action and recover judgment until 1878. Execution was not issued until 1880, and the suit against the stockholder was not brought until 1881,—more than five years after the cause of action accrued against the company. It was alleged in the answer, which 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) was demurred to, that the company was insolvent in 1875 and had no property upon which an execution could have been levied.

The court stated that the liability of the stockholder for unpaid balance was fixed, under the Iowa Code, §§ 1082-1084, by the "inability of the creditor to collect his claim from property owned by the corporation, or, more properly, the fact that the corporation has no property from which the claim may be collected," and asks: "When did plaintiff's cause of action accrue? Clearly, when his claim became the ground of proceedings against the stockholder; that is, a claim against him. . . . But plaintiff insists that a judgment against defendant could not have been recovered until an action was prosecuted against the corporation and judgment recovered." But, the court said: "The action and judgment against the corporation are simply matters of preparation for the trial of the action against the stockholder. . . . It could not be said that a plaintiff had no cause of action until he had secured and prepared his evidence." The statute, Code, § 2529, limits actions within the prescribed time after "their causes accrue, not after a time when the plaintiff has prepared his proof, and is thereby able to recover judgment." The action was held barred.

In Branch v. Knapp, 61 Ga. 614, it was declared that the unpaid stock became payable to the assignees without further call or notice to the shareholder, and, further, that the statute of limitations began to run as soon as the surrender of the charter was accepted by the legislature. The assignees were barred when the bill of the creditors was filed. Hence the creditors also were barred.

In Washington Sav. Bank v. Butchers & D. Bank, 107 Mo. 133, 28 Am. St. Rep. 405, 17 S. W. 644, it was held that, as against the company, where the stock was payable upon call of the directors, the statute would not run until that call had been made. In the case of notorious insolvency the statute began to run from the time of insolvency. But it was held further, that if the

 v. Sewickley Dairy Co. 198 Pa.
 R. A. 471, 47 Atl. 941, already are: First, that on an obligation for years. Secondly, where the contract is ning from the time when the plaintiff might first maintain an action to recover the full amount, and that was when first default was made and without demand. This case was declared not antagonistic in New England F. Ins. Co. v. Haynes, supra.

In Boyd v. Mutual Fire Asso. 116 Wis.
 155, 61 L. R. A. 918, 96 Am. St. Rep. 948, 90
 N. W. 1086, 94 N. W. 171, "cash policies" were issued, a premium note being given, payable in instalments as required by the officers. Assessments were required to be made upon the members of the insurance company to meet liabilities, but none were made before the insolvency of the company and the appointment of a receiver in 1890.
 Assessments were thereafter made by the court in 1894, again in 1899, with notice and demand to the holders of premium notes.
 The court decides, in an action brought to wind up the company, that the statute began to run against the policy holders from the time that the company was adjudged insolvent. A member of the association, it was declared, "must be regarded in a similar position to a stockholder of such association."

VI. When should demand be made, in cases where a demand is necessary.

Must a demand upon a stockholder be made within a reasonable time after his subscription, when, by the terms thereof, the demand must be made before payment?
 Can a corporation wait an indefinite time before demanding payment when it is within its power to make a call, and within its discretion to make the call at any time?

In Great Western Teleg. Co. v. Purdy, 83 Iowa, 430, 50 N. W. 45, a subscription was to be paid in instalments, as the directors might, from time to time, order. A receiver was appointed in 1874 and assessments on unpaid stock were ordered by a court in Illinois in 1886, and an action begun in 1889.
 In 1872 the board of directors had ordered all arrearages on the subscriptions to be can be brought, that demand must be made or that act done within six years from the date of the promise or the statute will begin to run from the date," was clearly stated and distinctly repudiated; Strong, J., referring to Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. 39 Pa. 92, 80 Am. Dec. 507, as having settled the law to the contrary. Allibone v. Hager, 46 Pa. 48, was a suit by a creditor against subscribers to the stock of a manufacturing company under the act of April 7, 1849 (P. L. 563), for unpaid subscriptions, and it was held that, though no call had been made for eleven years, the statute of limitations was not a defense; the court saying that the Byers, McCully, and Graham Cases, where the work had not been prosecuted as required by the act of incorporation, did not apply. The next case (Smith v. Bell, supra) was an action against a former policy holder in the mutual insurance company, more than six years after his policy had expired and he had ceased to be a member. His contract, however, was to pay his share of losses when an assessment should be levied by the directors. It was held that the right of action did not accrue, nor the statute begin to run, until such assessment, and he was, therefore, liable, although the loss occurred more than six years before the assessment was made, which was not until after he ceased to be a member. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers and Morrison v. Mullin, supra, were referred to by the court, but set aside with a citation of Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn clared that the liability of the stockholder to the creditor of a corporation was a secondary one, but when the corporation was dissolved it became primary, and, not having been presented to the administrator within two years, was barred. To the same effect is Washington Sav. Bank v. Butchers & D. Bank, 107 Mo. 133, 28 Am. St. Rep. 405, 17 S. W. 644.

In Illinois the case of Snyder v. Swan Land & Cattle Co. 154 Ill. 220, 40 N. E. 466, Reversing 51 Ill. App. 211, determined that an assessment for unpaid stock against a decedent's estate was barred as to assets then disclosed, since the claim was not made within two years from the grant of letters of administration, although the assessment itself was not made until after the two years had expired.

But in Payson v. Hadduck, 8 Biss. 293, Fed. Cas. No. 10,862, it was held that an assessment ordered by the court after the administrator had distributed the assets to the heirs and been discharged was not barred by such two-years' statute.

In Priest v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 311, 4 U. S. App. 509, 51 Fed. 405, which was one of the "Glenn" cases referred to supra, it was declared that the two-year period for presenting claims against decedents' estates in Missouri did not begin to run until the cause of action accrued. And in this case it did not begin to run until the assessment was made.

In Moses v. Ocoee Bank, 1 Lea. 398, where the bar had run in favor of the personal representative of a deceased stockholder upon notes taken for stock, resort was allowed to his original liability for stock, which, remaining unpaid, and not due, because not called, was not barred by the statute.

The plea of the statute was held good in Saytes v. Bates, 15 R. I. 342, 5 Atl. 497.

IV. Statutory liability for unpaid balance.

In several of the states, statutes have been passed making the stockholder liable for the debts of the corporation. This has 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

taken several forms in the various states, but in some the liability attaches only to the unpaid portion of the stock subscription. For this reason these cases are included here. The general rule to be deduced from them is that the remedy against the corporation must have been exhausted before the creditor can resort to his right of action against the stockholder. And this has been held generally to mean a return nulla bona after judgment against the company. Handy v. Draper, 89 N. Y. 334, Reversing 23 Hun, 256; King v. Pony Gold Min. Co. 28 Mont. 74, 72 Pac. 309; Kelly v. Clark (Kelly v. Fourth of July Min. Co.) 21 Mont. 291, 42 L. R. A. 621, 69 Am. St. Rep. 668, 53 Pac. 959; Van Pelt v. Gardner, 54 Neb. 701, 74 N. W. 1083, 75 N. W. 874; Phillips v. Therasson, 11 Hun, 141.

Under a statute making stockholders liable for debts of the company until the capital is all paid in and certificates recorded, and further providing that all the capital must be paid in within two years, it was decided that an action against a stockholder would be barred at the expiration of six years from the termination of the said two years. Phillips v. Therasson, 11 Hun, 141. But it was held in Knox v. Baldwin, 80 N. Y. 613, that such an action was barred after the expiration of six years from the time that the liability was incurred.

V. Actions on premium or "stock" notes of mutual insurance company.

The general rule as to premium or deposit or "stock" notes, as they are sometimes called, of a mutual insurance company, is that the statute does not run until a demand has been made by the directors of the company or by the court. These notes are regarded as capital stock.

Cooke v. Pomeroy, 65 Conn. 466, 32 Atl. 935; Re Slater Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 R. I. 42; Bigelow v. Libby, 117 Mass. 359; Wardle v. Hudson, 96 Mich. 432, 55 N. W. 992; Peake v. Fuller, 123 Mich. 684, 82 N. W. 847; Langworthy v. Garding, 74 Minn. 325, 77 N. W. 207; Langworthy v. C. C. Washburn Flour-

Twp. supra, as governing the case. Smith v. Bell, supra, was reaffirmed and followed in the latest case on the subject (Eichman v. Hersker, 170 Pa. 402, 33 Atl. 229), although, as our Brother Dean called attention to in the opinion, "the assessment was not made within six years from the date of the policies and the premium note, nor within six years from the date of the losses, the payment of which had created the debt now sought to be satisfied by assessment." Distinctions based on the wording of the charters or the statutes under which they were conferred were repudiated, and the decision put explicitly on the general principle that the obligation was not to pay at once, but upon a future event,—the levying of an assessment by the directors,—and the statute did not begin to run until such assessment.

This detailed review of the cases shows clearly that, while they are in some apparent conflict, yet there has been a uniform trend in the later ones to rest on the correct application of a general principle admittedly sound. The rules, as stated in Swearingen v. Sewickley Dairy Co. 198 Pa. 68, 53 L. R. A. 471, 47 Atl. 941, already quoted, are: First, that on an obligation for the payment of money on demand, the statute begins to run at once. Suit is a sufficient demand, and must be brought within six years. Secondly, where the contract is to pay on the future performance of a condition, or happening of an event, or at a certain time after demand, there a demand ing Mills Co. 77 Minn. 256, 79 N. W. 974; Howland v. Cuykendall, 40 Barb. 320; Kilbreath v. Gaylord, 34 Ohio St. 305; Solly v. Moore, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 333; Smith v. Bell, 107 Pa. 352; Eichman v. Hersker, 170 Pa. 402, 33 Atl. 229; New England F. Ins. Co. v. Haynes, 71 Vt. 306, 76 Am. St. Rep. 771, 45 Atl. 221.

In all these cases the notes were made, substantially, payable as the directors might require, and clearly fall within the general rule that when a demand is required the statute will not run until a demand has been made. The courts declare that they are not similar to notes payable "on demand," because they were clearly intended to be a fund for the payment of the corporate debts.

In Raegener v. Medicus, 67 App. Div. 127, 73 N. Y. Supp. 574, the requirement of the statute under which the mutual company was incorporated was printed on the back of the note, while on the face thereof such note was made subject to the conditions and limitations of that insurance law.

In Crofoot v. Thatcher, 19 Utah, 212, 75 Am. St. Rep. 725, 57 Pac. 171, the stock note was a promise to pay "on demand after date," and yet it was decided that the parties "must have intended that they should be paid upon call by the corporation, when it required part or all the proceeds thereof, and not before," and that such a note was "not merely to be governed by the law controlling ordinary negotiable instruments." In this case the corporation became insolvent before a call was made.

But in Howland v. Edmonds, 24 N. Y. 307, and Osgood v. Strauss, 55 N. Y. 672, notes given to a mutual fire insurance company were declared to be payable on demand, and therefore the statute began to run from the time the notes were given, although by their terms they were payable "at such time or times as the directors of said company may require."

In Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Batcheller, 62 Vt. 148, 19 Atl. 982, on a note somewhat similarly worded, but where an act provided that on neglect or refusal to pay the sum assessed the directors "may sue for and recover the whole amount of his deposit note or notes," the statute was held to begin running from the time when the plaintiff might first maintain an action to recover the full amount, and that was when first default was made and without demand. This case was declared not antagonistic in New England F. Ins. Co. v. Haynes, supra.

In Boyd v. Mutual Fire Asso. 116 Wis. 155, 61 L. R. A. 918, 96 Am. St. Rep. 948, 90 N. W. 1086, 94 N. W. 171, "cash policies" were issued, a premium note being given, payable in instalments as required by the officers. Assessments were required to be made upon the members of the insurance company to meet liabilities, but none were made before the insolvency of the company and the appointment of a receiver in 1890. Assessments were thereafter made by the court in 1894, again in 1899, with notice and demand to the holders of premium notes. The court decides, in an action brought to wind up the company, that the statute began to run against the policy holders from the time that the company was adjudged insolvent. A member of the association, it was declared, "must be regarded in a similar position to a stockholder of such association."

VI. When should demand be made, in cases where a demand is necessary.

Must a demand upon a stockholder be made within a reasonable time after his subscription, when, by the terms thereof, the demand must be made before payment? Can a corporation wait an indefinite time before demanding payment when it is within its power to make a call, and within its discretion to make the call at any time?

In Great Western Teleg. Co. v. Purdy, 83 Iowa, 430, 50 N. W. 45, a subscription was to be paid in instalments, as the directors might, from time to time, order. A receiver was appointed in 1874 and assessments on unpaid stock were ordered by a court in Illinois in 1886, and an action begun in 1880. In 1872 the board of directors had ordered all arrearages on the subscriptions to be is necessary to a right of action, and the statute does not begin to run until demand is made.

The question is then suggested whether there is a third rule, that, if demand is necessary, it must be made within six years from the contract. On this our cases were said to be much at variance, and the review of them has to some extent confirmed the statement. It will not be amiss at this point to consider on principle the foundations of rules 1 and 2. Negotiable instruments payable on demand were originally classed together, and held, like checks and bills of exchange, necessary to be presented with due diligence according to the residence of the parties. Byles, Bills, *213. "But a common promissory note payable on demand is very often originally intended as a continuing security, and . . . is not necessarily to be presented the next day after it has been received in order to charge the indorser." But the term "payable on demand" imports that the debt is already due, and therefore the statute of limitations begins to run from the date. Byles, Bills, *347. The obligation to pay in such case is absolute and present; the only element not fixed with certainty is the time of payment; and as that is at the option of the creditor, and the debtor must be prepared eo instante, the time of payment, and with it the statute, begins to run at once. If, however, the debt is not absolutely or presently due, but either the obligation to pay or the time of payment is contingent on the paid, and directed the secretary to notify the stockholders and demand payment. But it does not appear that these notices were ever given. The statute was declared to be a bar to the action, the court saying: "It rested with the corporation, by proper orders and notices, or other acts, to acquire the right to maintain an action." And again: "It would be wholly unreasonable to say that the company had not the right to commence an action for the reason that it had not ordered payment and given notice thereof."

This case went to the Supreme Court, reported in 102 U. S. 329, 40 L. ed. 986, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 810. That court declared that limitations of actions are governed by the lex fori and controlled by the legislation of the state in which the action is brought, even if the judicial construction there differs from that of other jurisdictions. It is declared by the court: "The question at what time the cause of action accrued in this case within the meaning of the statute of limitations of Iowa was not a Federal question, but a local question, upon which the judgment of the highest court of the state cannot be reviewed by this court." It should be observed that this corporation was an Illinois corporation, and that the courts of Illinois have held that the cause of action would have accrued at the time the assessment was called for in an order for an assessment, and not before.

But it is in Pennsylvania that this question has been mostly discussed, and where most of the cases on the point are to be found.

In Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, 32 Pa. 22, 72 Am. Dec. 770, it was held that the company was bound to demand payment of subscriptions to its stock within six years from the date of the subscription, or, at least, to call in an instalment in that period, although the contract was to pay "in such manner and proportions, and at such time and places, as shall be determined by the board of directors" pursuant to statute. It is worthy of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

note that the court seems to have put great stress upon the fact that the company meant to abandon the contract. "We ground a presumption on the statute that a party who did not employ the other means afforded for enforcing the contract within the period of the statute meant to abandon the contract."

McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 32 Pa. 25, was to the same effect. And the doctrine was reaffirmed in Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 36 Pa. 77.

In Shackamaxon Bank v. Disston, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 201, 20 W. N. C. 297, an action on a subscription of bank stock was held barred by failure to make a call for eleven years, during which time the bank was solvent, and the defendants had transferred the stock at least eight years before the action. The stock was subscribed subject to demand and call by the bank. The cases of Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, and McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., supra, were approved, and the doctrine there laid down sustained.

And in Franklin Sav. Bank use of Miller v. Bridges, 20 W. N. C. 43, 8 Atl. 611, the appellate court declared that the trial court had not committed any error in ordering a nonsuit, at which time it filed an opinion holding that, as the company was insolvent, "the creditors were at that time in the position of one to whom an obligation is due on demand, or who can make demand upon the doing of an act himself."

"In such cases the statute of limitations begins to run at the time of the promise. Was an assessment or decree of the court necessary to entitle the plaintiff to sue? If so, it could have been made then; and the creditors or their representative, the assignee, should have taken that action. Immediately upon the assignment, the plaintiff or creditors, through him, were entitled to demand the execution of the subscribers' contracts to pay."

But the cases in Pennsylvania apparently are not all in unison on this point. For in Allibone v. Hager, 46 Pa. 48, it was held that it by no means followed that the statute performance of some act, the happening of some event, or the lapse of a specified period of time, then the happening of the event is a condition precedent to the present obligation to pay, and the debtor is not in default, nor the creditor entitled to call for performance, until the condition is fulfilled, and the statute cannot begin to run until that time.

These principles are of uniform application and lie at the foundation of all our cases. Applying them to the present case, it is plain that, where a subscription to stock is not presently payable in full, but, by its terms, is to be payable from time to time as called for by the company, there is no substantial basis for the existence of a third rule, as queried in Swearingen v.

was a defense because the company had not once, in eleven years, called for the balance of the stock. It declares "calls may have been made and paid within six years; the delinquent stockholders may have been all the time directors. . . . Nothing to the contrary of this appears, and it would be strange if, in addition to this, the stockholders, being the directors, could, by a failure to call in subscriptions from themselves, raise a bar in favor of themselves." The cases in 32 and 36 Pa. supra, were distinguished.

In Bell's Appeal, 115 Pa. 88, 2 Am. St. Rep. 532, 8 Atl. 177, the court seems to have determined that the cause of action on the unpaid subscription began to run from the date of the incorporation, but ceased to run from the time of an amendment by which defendant was brought in, on the same principle as the bringing of an action stops the running of the statute, and therefore the plea was not a defense. Some doubts seem to have assailed the court later, however, for in Swearingen v. Sewickley Dairy Co. 198 Pa. 68, 53 L. R. A. 471, 47 Atl. 941, while the court declared that the cases of Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, and McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., supra, and kindred cases were still the law in Pennsylvania, never having been overruled, it "leaves" the necessity of "demand in six years open to consideration."

In Athens Car & Coach Co. v. Elsbree, 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 618, the court also evaded this point, declaring that "it is safe to say that a call made by a board of directors within six years from the date of a subscription payable under the by-laws as required by the directors fixes the liability of the subscriber for the amount so called, and that suit for the said amount by an assignee for creditors brought within six years from the date of the call is not barred by the statute."

But the conflict in the Pennsylvania supreme court has, of course, been finally set at rest in COOK v. CARPENTER.

It should be noted here that in Alabama 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Sewickley Dairy Co. supra. Until such call, there is no obligation on the stockholder to pay. It may never be made. If the enterprise is successful and profitable from the start, or the provision for capital has been larger than actual needs require, the duty of payment is only a reserve duty for possible contingencies; and until they happen, either by calls by the corporation on the subscriptions or by the rights of creditors, there is no duty of the subscriber to pay, no right of action against him for nonpayment, and no starting point for the statute of limitations. As already said, the principles at the basis of the decisions are clear and undisputed, and the later and more authoritative cases have tended distinctly to rest upon them. We conclude, there-a demurrer was sustained to a complaint, on the ground that the action was barred by the statute, in which complaint there was set forth, as a subscription, a writing stating the object of the proposed company, the amount of the capital stock, and "that the name of shareholders and the number of shares held by each are as follows, to wit" (with the means and number of shares following). The complaint had averred that the subscription was made subject to call. The court said: "This being the only subscription ever made by defendants . . . if it imported any obligation to pay at all, it was to pay presently." And further: "It follows that the complainants, if they ever had a right to maintain the bill for the alleged subscriptions of stock, were long barred of their right to maintain it." Harris v. Gateway Land Co. 128 Ala. 652, 29 So. 611.

VII. Miscellaneous.

In Georgia Mfg. & Paper Mill Co. v. Amis, 53 Ga. 228, in an action brought on a note made by the company to the plaintiff, defendant pleaded as a set-off a subscription to its stock. The trial judge instructed the jury: "In the absence of proof to the contrary . . . the right of action accrued at the time of the subscription, and that the right of the defendant to plead the subscription . . . as a set-off . . . was barred by the statute of limitations." This charge was held not to be erroneous.

In Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Plummer, 37 Pa. 413, the statute was held to run only from the time when a subscriber, acting as agent to obtain other subscriptions, delivered the subscription book to the company, and not from the time that he first appended his own name.

In Meyer v. Bristol Hotel Co. 163 Mo. 59, 63 S. W. 96, a stockholder was denied the right to intervene in an action by a creditor of the corporation against the corporation, in order to plead the statute of limitations against the debt. S. P. M.

fore, that Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Byers, 32 Pa. 22, 72 Am. Dec. 770, McCully v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 32 Pa. 25, Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 36 Pa. 77, and the cases which have followed them, are not authorities for a general rule in cases of subscriptions to corporate stock, but must be sustained, if at all, as exceptions, resting on their own peculiar facts of abandonment of the corporate enterprise, which released the subscriber's contract to pay further. The court below was right in applying the general rule to this case.

Decree affirmed.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS, Resp.,
v.

T. LIESSING, Appt.

(.... Mo.)

1. Milk—standard of purity.

An ordinance forbidding the sale of milk containing less than seven tenths of 1 per cent of ash is not unreasonable or oppressive.

2. Same—inspector—constitutional rights.

Designating only one officer to determine whether milk reaches the required standard does not deprive the dealer of any constitutional right.

3. Same—registration—license fees.

Prescribing a registration fee of $1 per annum for milk venders, and an occupation tax of $2.50 per wagon for each six months, and $25 for wholesalers, does not render an ordinance regulating the sale of milk invalid.

4. Seizure for inspection.

Seizure of necessary milk for inspection without a warrant may be authorized under the police power.

5. Ordinance—severable provisions.

The court will not examine provisions of an ordinance alleged to be invalid where the section under which the prosecution is instituted is valid and severable from the rest.

6. Ordinance—entitling—generality.

The generality of the title of an ordinance is not objectionable so long as it is not made to cover legislation incongruous in itself.

7. Judicial notice—ordinance.

Judicial notice will not be taken of municipal ordinances.

8. Appointment of officer—validity.

Appointment of a city chemist under a provision of a municipal ordinance requiring the approval of the board of health to the act of the mayor and common council is not ineffectual, although the charter places the appointing power in the mayor and council.

Case Note.—The group of cases here reported well illustrate the attitude of the courts generally toward police regulations of the milk supply. The importance of securing to the community at large cleanliness, wholesomeness, and purity in so important a food as milk, has led to the very general enactment throughout the country of regulations as to the standard of quality of milk sold, the care and feeding of milch cattle, and the sale of the product. And, while such regulations have been frequently assailed upon the ground that they deprive the dairyman and milk vender of their property without due process of law, or unjustly discriminate against them, the regulations have been sustained with practical unanimity, whether made by the state through the operation of a general statute, or by the municipal council through local ordinances.

The regulations most frequently tested in the courts are those establishing an arbitrary standard of quality without regard to the question of adulteration or extraction, and prohibiting, under penalty, the sale of milk falling below the required standard. St. Louis v. Liessing is typical of the decisions upon this question. The authorities are there very thoroughly gathered; but see, especially, also, as sustaining regulations of similar character, State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344; State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419, 13 Atl. 585; State v. Stone, 46 La. Ann. 147, 15 So. 11; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Com. v. Hough, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 51; Kansas City v. Cook, 38 Mo. App. 660; State v. Crescent Creamery Co. 83 Minn. 284, 54 L. R. A. 466, 85 Am. St. Rep. 464, 86 N. W. 107; People v. West, 106 N. Y. 293, 60 Am. Rep. 452, 12 N. E. 610; People v. Kibler, 106 N. Y. 323, 12 N. E. 795; People v. Cipperly, 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107, Reversing 37 Hun, 319; State v. Groves, 15 R. I. 208, 2 Atl. 384.

The intent to evade the regulation is no part of the offense, and a dealer is guilty though he sells the milk exactly as drawn from the cows, when it falls below the required standard. State v. Campbell, supra; Pain v. Boughtwood, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 353; People v. Kibler, supra; People v. Schaeffer, 41 Hun, 23; Com. v. Farren, 9 Allen, 489; Com. v. Warren, 160 Mass. 533, 36 N. E. 308.

Milk so found deficient may be condemned upon the spot, taken into custody of the officers, and poured upon the ground, without violating the constitutional provision of due process of law. State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469; Deems v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 164, 26 L. R. A. 541, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339, 30 Atl. 648.

Provision that the dairyman shall give up a sample to inspectors without compensation is also sustained as a valid exercise of the police power. State v. Dupaquier, 46 La. Ann. 577, 26 L. R. A. 162, 49 Am. St. Rep. 334, 15 So. 502; Com. v. Carter, 132 Mass. 12.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction convicting him of violation of an ordinance regulating the sale of milk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. F. Stone for appellant.

Messrs. Charles W. Bates and William F. Woerner, for respondent:

If the wholesomeness of a food article is at all bona fide disputable, the legislative determination is conclusive, and the courts will not interfere.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a prosecution by the city of St. Louis against the defendant for violation of § 18 of ordinance 20,808 of said city. The defendant was fined, and appealed to the St. Louis court of criminal correction. The third count in the information is as follows: "It is further charged that T. Liessing, the defendant aforesaid, on the 14th day of January, 1903, and on divers other days and times prior thereto, did, opposite 3027 S. Broadway, in the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, then and there control, carry, and expose for sale milk, which said milk did show on analysis less than seven tenths of one per cent ash; the said ash being estimated by weighing the residue after incineration of the total solids at a dull red heat until all the organic matter had been destroyed. Contrary to the ordinance in such cases made and provided."

A motion was made by the defendant to quash this information on 12 different grounds, as follows: "(1) Because the statement filed herein against the defendant charges the defendant with no violation of the city ordinance. (2) Because the charge herein contained in said statement is so indefinite, vague, and uncertain, and that no valid judgment can be rendered under the same against the defendant. (3) Because the ordinance upon which the prosecution is based and predicated is unconstitutional and void, in that it is repugnant to the provisions of § 28, art. 4, of the Constitution of the state, and also § 13, art. 3, of the charter of the city of St. Louis, in that said ordinance contains more than one subject, and the subject-matter of said ordinance is not clearly expressed in the title to the same. (4) Because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void for the reason that the same is unreasonable in the provisions, and it is practically impossible to comply with and enforce the same. (5) Because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void for the reason that it is repugnant to § 4, art. 2, and § 30, art. 2, of the Constitution of this state, in that it deprives the defendant of his natural rights to liberty and enjoyment of the gains of his own industry and of his property and liberty without due process of law. (6) Because the ordinance is unconstitutional and void, in that it is inconsistent with the statutes of this state. (7) Because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void, in that it is beyond the power of the municipal assembly of the city to enact the same. (8) Because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void, in that the charter of the city of St. Louis contains no express grant to the municipal assembly of the city to enact the same. (9) Because said laws and ordinance on which this prosecution is based are void and unconstitutional, in that they were enacted under and contain an unlawful delegation of power. (10) Because the laws and ordinances in question are void and unconstitutional, in that they are a class legislation, and provide for taxation under the form and name of a license. (11) Because said ordinance as a whole is void and in violation of § 28, art. 3, of the charter of St. Louis, in that §§ 27 and 29 of said ordinance are in conflict with the general ordinance of a prior date, to wit, article 9, chap. 11, of ordinance 19,991, which ordinance has not been repealed in express terms by the ordinance under which this prosecution is brought. (12) Because said ordinance is void and unconstitutional for the reason that it is repugnant to § 1, art. 14, of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives the defendant of his liberty and property without due process of law, and denies to him the equal protection of the law."

Section 18 of ordinance 20,808 of the city of St. Louis is as follows: "Sec. 18. No milk shall be sold, kept, offered or exposed for sale, stored, exchanged, transported, conveyed, carried, or delivered, or with such intent as aforesaid be in the care, custody, control, or possession of anyone, unless it show on analysis not less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat, 8 5-10 per cent solids not fat, and seven tenths of 1 per cent ash, of which 50 per cent shall be insoluble in hot water. Provided, however, that in contested analysis of milk condensed under this ordinance, butter fat shall be estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper coil process; total solids by evaporation, and nonfatty solids by difference between total solids and butter fat, and ash by weighing the residue after incineration of total solids at a dull red heat until all the organic matter is destroyed. Anyone violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100 for each and every offense."

The testimony of Milk Inspector Comer showed that the defendant was on the day charged in the information delivering milk in his regular milk wagon at 1227 South Broadway, St. Louis. The inspector "took a sample of milk from his wagon," or, rather in his presence, from the customer to whom he had just sold the same, and gave as a reason why he did not take it from the can in the defendant's wagon was because the defendant dumped some cream into the can before the inspector could get a chance to take a sample out of the can. This sample, with proper precaution to preserve same in proper condition, was turned over to the city chemist for analysis on the same day, within an hour or two. City Chemist Walter Bernays testified as to the identity of the sample, and that it was received by him on the same day it was taken by the inspector. About 12 o'clock he made the analysis, and testified that this milk contained "65/100 per cent of ash." Dr. Bernays described the method used to determine the ash, as follows: "Weigh accurately a platinum dish, add approximately 5 cubic centimeters of milk; weigh the platinum dish plus the milk accurately; that gives the weight of the milk; evaporate in water both to apparent dryness brought to constant weight, thus determining the total solids. The dish containing the total solids is placed in a larger nickel dish, and the whole heated at a low heat, somewhat less than a dull red, until all the organic matter is destroyed and the ash perfectly white. I tested the heat to see that there was no chloride of sodium and potassium. I did this by heating a weighed quantity of pure sodium chloride and potassium in the same manner, and ascertained there was no loss of weight. . . . In other words, the method used for determining the ash is accurate; there is no loss." He further testified that there was another method known, which, however, "is a modification of the same method in which, before incineration, some nitric acid is added to facilitate incineration, and that, with this exception, it is the same identical method." On cross-examination, he defined "ash" to be the mineral constituent of milk left after all the organic matter is destroyed by incineration. He stated that he followed the ordinance and incinerated the total solids in the analysis of the sample of defendant's milk to a dull red heat until all the organic matter was destroyed. He explained that there were other methods of ascertaining the amount of ash in milk, but there was no decided difference in the results, and that they must give practically the same results, though there might be a very slight difference. He also testified that compared with the average cow's milk, the amount of ash required by the ordinance was below the average. The defendant on his part called three experts, Gottschalk, Richter, and Keiser. There were some discrepancies between their testimony and that of Dr. Bernays on scientific points. Gottschalk testified that other methods might be used than that prescribed by the ordinance to determine the per cent of ash. The one he thought the most reliable was a long method, not ordinarily carried out on that account. In his opinion, as well as the other two experts, the test imposed by the ordinance was not the best. None of them, however, testified as to any facts in this case, nor did the defendant call any witness to contradict any of the city's testimony as to the actual facts.

At the conclusion of the testimony the defendant asked an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which was overruled, and defendant excepted. He then prayed the court to give the following instructions: "The court, sitting as a court, instructs the court, sitting as a jury, that the ordinance upon which the statement in this case is based is unconstitutional and void, and for that reason this suit cannot be maintained, and the verdict of the court, sitting as a jury, must be for the defendant." "The court, sitting as a court, instructs the court, sitting as a jury, that the ordinance upon which the statement in this case is based is invalid, for the reason that it is unreasonable as a matter of law and as shown to be by the evidence in this case, and the court, sitting as a jury, must find and return a verdict for the defendant." These were denied, and the defendant duly excepted. As already said, the court found the defendant guilty of violation of the ordinance, and fined him $25 and costs. In due time the defendant filed motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment, which were overruled, and exceptions saved and an appeal allowed to this court. This appeal is in this court on two grounds: First. Because the city of St. Louis, a political subdivision of the state, is a party to the action, and second, because the constitutionality of the St. Louis milk ordinance is directly challenged and involved in the determination of this appeal.

1. The ordinance upon which this prosecution is based is challenged as unconstitutional on various grounds, and we will endeavor to examine them seriatim. It is first said that the production, sale, and distribution of milk is a legitimate and lawful occupation, conducted as a matter of right, and not as a privilege, and that unusual and arbitrary restrictions cannot be lawfully imposed upon it by ordinance; nor can harsh, expensive, and burdensome provisions be enacted against persons engaged in an innocent and useful business, so as to deprive them of the right to devote their property thereto and destroy their freedom and liberty. The ordinance assailed has for its subject-matter the inspection of milk and cream and the regulation of the sale thereof. It is obviously a police regulation to guard against the sale or dissemination of an unwholesome and injurious quality of milk and cream, and to protect the public against imposition, fraud, and deception as to an article of food almost universally used by the people. The city of St. Louis, as has been repeatedly declared by this court, derives its charter in pursuance of constitutional provisions, and the police powers delegated therein are conferred by the state upon the municipality, and, so long as they are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, they are valid upon all who come within their scope and authority. St. Louis v. Fischer, 167 Mo. 654, 64 L. R. A. 679, 99 Am. St. Rep. 614, 67 S. W. 872, 194 U. S. 361, 48 L. ed. 1018, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673; Kansas City v. Marsh Oil Co. 140 Mo. 458, 41 S. W. 943. By the express provision of § 26, art. 3, of the charter of St. Louis, authority is given "for the inspection of butter, cheese, milk, lard, and other provisions," and "to secure the general health of the inhabitants by any measure necessary," and "to pass all such ordinances as may be expedient in maintaining the peace, good government, health, and welfare of the city, its trade, commerce, and manufactures." None of the objects sought to be secured by the charter are of more importance than the health of its inhabitants, and ordinances having such in view have been often upheld as an exercise of the police power of the state delegated to the city. St. Louis v. Galt, 179 Mo. 8-18, 63 L. R. A. 778, 77 S. W. 876; Ferrenbach v. Turner, 86 Mo. 416, 56 Am. Rep. 437; Smith, Modern Law of Mun. Corp. §§ 1322 et seq.; Crossman v. Lurman, 192 U. S. 189, 48 L. ed. 401, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 234. The provisions of the Federal Constitution, invoked by appellant, were not designed to interfere with the exercise of the police power by the states, and they have not shorn the states of their police power to regulate trades and occupations so as to guard against injury to the public, nor of regulating the use of property so as to prohibit that which is injurious and dangerous to the community. St. Louis v. Fischer, supra; State v. Addington, 77 Mo. 110; State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo. 335, 33 S. W. 317; Powell v. Com. 114 Pa. 265, 60 Am. Rep. 350, 7 Atl. 913, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257. Perhaps on no one subject has this police power been affirmed as often as the right to inspect and regulate the sale of milk and cream. Numerous decisions of courts of last resort sustain the right of cities in safeguarding the health of their citizens and in the prevention of deception upon them by fixing a reasonable standard of purity, to be scientifically ascertained, of milk and cream sold within their limits, and prohibiting the sale of milk of the quality inferior to that required by such municipal standard. When the courts have come to deal with such municipal regulation, they have announced the rule that, if the article is universally conceded to be so wholesome and innocuous that the court may take judicial notice of it, the legislature under the Constitution has no right to absolutely prohibit it; but, if there is a dispute as to the fact of its unwholesomeness for food or drink, then the legislature can either regulate or prohibit it. The constitutionality of the law is not to be determined upon a question of fact in each case, but the courts determine for themselves, upon the fundamental principles of our Constitution, that the act of the legislature or municipal assembly is not to be declared void unless the violation of the Constitution is so manifest as to leave no room for reasonable doubt. State v. Layton, 160 Mo. 498, 499, 62 L. R. A. 163, 83 Am. St. Rep. 487, 61 S. W. 171, and cases cited.

Subject to the foregoing qualification, the courts start out with a presumption in favor of an act of the general assembly or the municipal authorities passed for the regulation and inspection of food products. It will scarcely be asserted that all milk is so wholesome and nutritious that there can be no doubt in the mind of the court of its wholesomeness. To do so would be to deny our common experience and to condemn legislation on this subject in almost every state in the Union. In People v. Cipperly, 37 Hun, 324, Learned, P. J., announced that the court could not take judicial notice whether milk below the standard is or is not unwholesome or dangerous to the public health. In that case the defendant took the ground that the legislature of New York could not, under the Constitution, prohibit the sale of milk drawn from healthy cows, which, in its natural state, fell below the standard fixed by the act, unless such milk, or articles made from it, were in fact unwholesome or dangerous to the public health. The learned justice asked the question: "Is that to be a question for the jury? If so, the court must charge a jury in each case that, if they find milk below that standard to be unwholesome, then the statute is constitutional; if they find it to be wholesome, then the statute is unconstitutional. Evidently a constitutional question cannot be settled, or, rather unsettled, in that way. The constitutionality would vary with the varying judgments of juries. Either, then, the legislature can . . . forbid the sale of milk below a certain standard, whether such milk be in fact wholesome or not, or else they cannot do this, whether that milk be in fact wholesome or not. If they may fix a standard, they must judge whether or not milk below that standard is wholesome. The courts cannot review that judgment." His views were adopted by the court of appeals in the same case, in 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107. That it was within the legislative power he adds: It may be known to the legislature that certain kinds of foods produce different degrees of richness in milk, and it may be known to the legislature that certain kinds of foods "will cause a great flow of watery milk, and it may be known to the legislature that this watery milk supplied as food to children cheats them with the appearance of nourishment and deprives them of that nutritious food which they need. It may be known to legislators, then, that milk below the standard which they fix by this law is unsuitable for food and should not be sold. At any rate, all this is a matter for the legislature." And the learned judge applies the test that the courts may declare a law unconstitutional when it appears on its face that it is not intended to promote the public health and would have no such results, but that a law fixing the standard for the purity of milk on its face is evidently intended for the public health, and, such being the case, it was within the legislative power to enact it. That case is in entire harmony with the decision of this court in State v. Layton. In State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419, 13 Atl. 585, a statute prohibiting the sale of adulterated milk, and providing that milk should be deemed adulterated, whenever it showed on analysis over 87 per cent water or under 13 per cent milk solids, was sustained by the supreme court; and this, though the defendant offered to show that pure milk from his cows showed less than the required solids. The court said: "The statute tends to discourage the breeding of a certain class of cattle for the supply of the milk market. The difficulty of guarding against the adulteration of milk may have influenced the legislature in fixing a standard of richness. Practically it makes no difference whether the milk is diluted after it is drawn from the cow, or whether it is made watery by giving her such food as will produce milk of an inferior quality, or whether the dilution regarded by the legislature as excessive arises from the nature of a particular animal or a particular breed of cattle. The sale of such milk to unsuspecting consumers for a price in excess of its value is a fraud which the statute was designed to suppress. It is a valid exercise by the legislature of the police power for the prevention of fraud and the protection of the public health, and as such is constitutional." And the court quoted with approval from Learned, P. J., in People v. Cipperly, supra. In State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344, a statute fixing the standard of milk at not over 88 per cent water, nor less than 12 per cent solids, and not less than 2½ per cent milk fats, and providing that milk not of that standard shall be deemed adulterated, was sustained by the supreme court of the state; the court saying: "It is equally a fraud on the buyer, whether the milk which he buys was originally good and has been deteriorated by the addition of water, or whether in its natural state it is so poor that it contains the same proportion of water as that which has been adulterated. Again, since it may sometimes happen, though we presume infrequently, that milk as it comes from the cow is below the standard of quality, . . . it would . . . be difficult . . . to prove that its poor quality was due to adulteration, although in a very large majority of cases such would probably be the fact. By putting such milk in the same category with adulterated milk, the prosecution is relieved from the difficulty," etc. It was held, further, that the law was not unconstitutional on the ground that it was unequal and partial in its operation and discriminated in favor of owners of cows which gave rich pure milk and against owners of cows giving milk of inferior quality.

Without repeating the reasoning of the courts, it must suffice to say that the same principle is announced in Weigand v. District of Columbia, 22 App. D. C. 559; State v. Fourcade, 45 La. Ann. 717, 40 Am. St. Rep. 249, 13 So. 187; State v. Dupaquier, 46 La. Ann. 577, 26 L. R. A. 162, 49 Am. St. Rep. 334, 15 So. 502; State v. Stone, 46 La. Ann. 147, 15 So. 11; Deems v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 164, 26 L. R. A. 541, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339, 30 Atl. 648; Blazier v. Miller, 10 Hun, 435; Norfolk v. Flynn, 101 Va. 473, 62 L. R. A. 771, 99 Am. St. Rep. 918, 44 S. E. 717; State ex rel. Smith v. Smith, 69 Ohio St. 196, 68 N. E. 1044; Com. v. Proctor, 165 Mass. 38, 42 N. E. 335; People v. Kibler, 106 N. Y. 321, 12 N. E. 795; State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, 642, 51 L. R. A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 698. So that the validity and constitutionality of the ordinance as a police regulation in its general characteristics and its general scope and purpose rest upon satisfactory reasons, as well as upon the great weight of authority in this country. The specific provision, the validity of which is in question in this case, is that part of § 18 prohibiting the sale of milk showing an analysis of less than seven tenths of 1 per cent of ash. This in effect is the same as fixing the amount of milk fats, or solid matter, that the milk must contain, which is one of the nutritious ingredients in milk, and the diminution of which deteriorates the quality of milk in a corresponding degree. Authorities above cited are all in harmony on the proposition that it is perfectly competent in the interest of the health of a community to fix the standard of quality, and that there is nothing unreasonable or oppressive in the ordinance in that respect.

2. The specific objection to the ordinance made by the defendant is that it commits to the will of a single officer perfectly absolute power in controlling this necessary article of food. It may be seriously doubted whether this objection is open for review in the condition of the pleadings and evidence, inasmuch as § 18 is the only portion of the ordinance involved in the pleadings or proof or motion for a new trial; but, as the case is thoroughly briefed on both sides on this proposition, we do not deem it amiss to consider this objection at this time. Referring to this first section of the ordinance, providing that the inspection shall be placed in charge of the city chemist, in connection with § 18, it is plain that the fixing of the legal standard to which all milk is subjected is not left to the city chemist, but was adopted by the municipal assembly itself, and not only so, but the method and the standard by which milk is to be tested is also fixed as a definite rule of action by which all persons dealing in milk are to be governed. Dealers in milk would unquestionably have a much more valid grievance if each case had to be submitted to the police justice or a jury, to determine the standard of milk according to their own ideas, and making their individual judgment a standard of right and wrong. The ordinance, as passed, instead of leaving the standard of milk to the caprice of the city chemist, contains a permanent legal provision which operates generally and impartially for its enforcement. The fact that the city chemist has charge with the duty of analyzing all milk submitted to him by the various inspectors in no sense deprives the seller of milk of any constitutional right. It was pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 48 L. ed. 1018, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, that it was perfectly competent to delegate such a power as is conferred upon the city chemist by this ordinance to a single individual. In Wilson v. Eureka City, 173 U. S. 32, 43 L. ed. 603, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 317, an ordinance providing that no person should move any building into or upon any of the public streets, etc., without a written permission of the mayor or president of the city council or any other person a councilor, was challenged on the ground that it committed the rights of the plaintiff to the unrestricted discretion of a single individual, and thereby removed them from the domain of law; but the Supreme Court of the United States held that the ordinance was valid, and was based on the necessity of the regulation of rights by uniform and general laws; and in Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, an ordinance of the city of Chicago authorizing the issue of a license by the mayor of the said city to sell cigarettes, and forbidding their sale without license, was held no violation of the Federal Constitution, and the amount of the tax named for the license was in the power of the state to fix. In that case the contention was that the ordinance vested arbitrary power in the mayor to grant or refuse such license, and that such arbitrary power was a violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; but the court held that it was not an unusual case that discretion should be lodged by law in public officers or bodies to grant or withhold licenses to keep divers other places for the sale of spirituous liquors and the like, when one of the conditions is that the applicant should be a fit person for the exercise of the privilege, and the fact of such offenses submitted to the judgment of an officer or board named. Nowhere in the ordinance before us is an analysis of the city chemist made conclusive of the quality of the milk sold or offered for sale by a dealer in milk, but the particular section challenged in this case simply provides one uniform standard of quality of milk and for a uniform test in case of contested analysis of milk condemned under this ordinance. The owner of the milk is in no manner deprived of his right to contest the analysis of the city chemist; but it is his right and privilege, when prosecuted for violation of this section, to have his milk tested by other competent chemists and by the same standard, so that it cannot be said that such dealers are deprived of the due process of law in the protection of their personal rights or property. State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. loc. cit. 475, 476. The validity of the provision providing for the inspection of milk violates no law or constitutional right of the defendant.

The registration fee exacted for the conducting of the milk business is only $1 per annum, and the occupation tax is only $2.50 for each six months of the year, and $25 for wholesalers. It is apparent that there is nothing oppressive in the amount of the registration fee or the occupation tax. In State v. Dupaquier, supra, an ordinance of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the city of New Orleans requiring venders of milk to the public to furnish gratuitously, on application of the sanitary inspector, samples of milk not exceeding one-half pint for inspection and analysis, was held not unconstitutional as forcing dairymen to furnish evidence against themselves or as taking private property for public use without compensation. In that case the decision in Com. v. Carter, 132 Mass. 12, was freely quoted from. In the latter case it was held that a statute of Massachusetts authorizing inspectors of milk to enter all carriages used in the conveyance of milk, and, whenever they have reason to believe any milk found therein is adulterated, to take specimens thereof for the purpose of analyzing or otherwise satisfactorily testing the same, was constitutional; the court saying private property is held subject to the exercise of such public rights for the common benefit, and in the case of licensed dealers in merchandise the injury followed by inspection is accompanied by advantages which must be regarded as a sufficient compensation. Bancroft v. Cambridge, 126 Mass. 438. Such a seizure of milk for the purpose of examination is a reasonable method of inspection, and does not require a warrant. It is a supervision under the laws by a public officer of a trade which concerns the public health, and is within the police power of the commonwealth. Com. v. Ducey, 126 Mass. 269. In State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469, it was held that the ninth section of the act, which conferred upon the city inspector of milk power to condemn, to pour upon the ground, or return to the consignor, any milk which he finds upon inspection to be adulterated, was constitutional, and it was further held that the provision as to the analysis of milk was not intended to operate as a rule of evidence to be conclusive of the guilt of the defendant in selling adulterated milk, but it was simply intended to prohibit the sale of milk under a certain standard of excellency, and this exercise of authority was within the police power of the city.

3. The learned counsel for the defendant has attacked various and sundry other provisions of this ordinance outside of § 18, under which this prosecution was begun and has been maintained. Section 18 is clearly severable from any other provision of this ordinance concerning which there can be any doubt, and can be enforced independently of any of the other provisions attacked. The rule is well settled in this state that, where certain provisions of ordinances or law are assailed which of themselves are valid and are severable from, and not dependent upon, invalid parts, the whole enactment will not be declared void because of such invalid portions, provided this will not defeat the general object of the enactment. We must decline to investigate and decide upon the validity of various provisions of this ordinance to which counsel have referred us, because in our opinion § 18 is a valid provision and susceptible of enforcement without any reference to such other sections of the ordinance. State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo. 335, 38 S. W. 317.

4. It is insisted, however, that this ordinance is unconstitutional and invalid for the reason that it contains more than one subject and the subject-matter of said ordinance is not clearly expressed in the title of the same. In Tarkio v. Cook, 120 Mo. 1, 7, 41 Am. St. Rep. 678, 25 S. W. 202, it was held that the constitutional provision of this state, that no bill should contain more than one subject, which should be clearly expressed in the title, was intended to apply only to state legislation, and has no application to ordinances of cities; but § 13, art. 3, of the charter of St. Louis is also invoked. Conceding, as we do, the charter must control, it is perfectly obvious, we think, that this ordinance is not violative of this charter provision. The title of the ordinance is an ordinance to license and regulate the sale of milk and cream, to provide for the inspection thereof, and prescribe penalties to prevent the sale and distribution of any but pure, wholesome milk and cream, and to fix the minimum limit of its composition and defining its quality, being ordinance No. 20,808, approved August 27, 1902. All the provisions of the ordinance are germane to the one subject of regulating the business of vending milk and cream, and the generality of the title is not an objection, so long as it is not made to cover legislation incongruous in itself. Sound policy and legislative convenience dictate a liberal construction of the title and subject-matter of enactments to maintain their validity. There is but one subject to this ordinance, and that is clearly expressed in the title. St. Louis v. Weitzel, 130 Mo. 600, 31 S. W. 1045; State v. Whitaker, 160 Mo. 59, 60 S. W. 1068.

5. Again, the defendant asserts that this ordinance 20,808 is void because it conflicts with the former general ordinance not expressly repealed, to wit, ordinance 17,157, or §§ 478, 481, 483, 484, 519, 522, of the Municipal Code; such expressed repeal of bill or inconsistent or conflicting ordinances being required by § 28 of article 3 of the city charter. Ordinance 17,157 was not offered in evidence or referred to in any way in the criminal court, nor is it referred to in the motion for a new trial. Nothing is better settled in this state than that courts will not take judicial notice of the ordinances of municipalities. St. Louis v. Roche, 128 Mo. loc. cit. 544, 31 S. W. 915, and cases there cited. It is plain, therefore, that, if ordinance 20,808 is in any manner in conflict with that ordinance, it was not made to appear in the trial of the case, and this court cannot consider it.

6. But learned counsel of the defendant, while urging that ordinance 20,808 is invalid because it does not expressly repeal ordinance 17,157, asserts that the latter ordinance is unconstitutional and void because the mode and manner of the appointment of the city chemist is not in compliance with the provisions of the charter, §§ 2, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, and 14 of article 4 of the charter placing the appointing power in the mayor and city council, and nowhere else. His contention is based upon the fact, as urged by counsel, that § 478 of the Municipal Code creates the office of city chemist, and provides that he should be appointed by the mayor, with the approval of the board of health, and subject to confirmation by the city council. The insistence is that, because the ordinance requires the approval of the board of health in the appointment of the city chemist, it violates the charter provision. Several answers suggest themselves to this proposition. Sections 478 to 485, inclusive, of the Municipal Code, creating the office of city chemist, were not introduced in evidence, and therefore, strictly speaking, are not before us for review; but, if they are, and conceding all that the counsel claim they are, we think there is no merit in the contention. By that ordinance the city chemist is appointed by the mayor and confirmed by the council, just as the charter requires, and the charter does not anywhere prohibit other qualifications which may be deemed necessary by the municipal assembly. The mere fact that he should be approved by the board of health, in addition to the other qualifications provided by the charter, certainly in no manner disqualifies him. If that requirement was contrary to the charter, it would simply be void, but would not affect the other legal steps which were followed in his appointment in pursuance of the charter; but certainly it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant in this case to object that greater qualifications were required and demanded of the city chemist than provided by charter; and the same may be said of the other point that under § 484 the removal of this officer differs from that pointed out in the charter, since the ordinance itself says that he should be subject to all the laws and regulations governing city officers; that the municipal assembly had the right to create the office of city chemist and define his duties under §§ 28 and 45 of article 4 of the charter and to provide for his removal, § 26 of article 3 of the charter, there can be no sort of question.

7. The information was and is sufficient. It specifically advised defendant of the time and place and the particular in which he had violated the ordinance. Nothing more definite was necessary to apprise the defendant of the nature of the complaint against him. The testimony was sufficient to justify the court in finding for the plaintiff, and, outside of the attack on the validity of the ordinance, there was practically no defense. That the defendant sold milk at the time and place charged which fell below the legal standard there can be no reasonable doubt.

We hold the ordinance to be a valid exercise of the police power conferred upon the city and not open to any of the objections urged against it; and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Brace, Ch. J., and Marshall, Burgess, Valliant, Fox, and Lamm, JJ., concur.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GRAFEMAN DAIRY COMPANY.

(.... Mo.)

Milk—regulation of standard—reasonableness.

A municipal ordinance prohibiting the sale of milk containing less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat, to be estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper coil process, cannot be declared void for unreasonableness as matter of law.

Case Note.—The cases which sustain the validity of ordinances or statutes providing for tests of the purity or quality of milk are somewhat common, as shown in the note to St. Louis v. Liessing, ante, 918. But in most of them nothing is decided as to any particular test or analysis.

In none of them does it appear that the particular test prescribed in St. Louis v. GRAFEMAN DAIRY Co. was named, though in several of the cases the amount of butter fat or milk solids has been made the standard. For instance, in State, Shivers, Prosecutor, v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469, the milk was required to show at least 12 per cent of milk solids, but the case did not show the process or method of making the analysis.

In the Liessing Case, just named, arising under the same ordinance as that under which the GRAFEMAN DAIRY Co.'s Case was 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction to review a judgment quashing an information which had been filed in the First District Police Court of the City of St. Louis, charging defendant with violation of an ordinance regulating the sale of milk. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles W. Bates and William F. Woerner, for plaintiff in error:

The ordinance was within the police power.

brought, a different provision was involved, which required the milk to show, among other things, "7-10 of 1 per cent ash." The ordinance provided that the ash should be estimated "by weighing the residue after incineration of total solids at a dull red heat until all the organic matter had been destroyed." Several witnesses testified that the test imposed by the ordinance was not the best, but the result shown by the tests made in the case were not contradicted, and the ordinance was enforced.

Tests by litmus paper and by a mechanical instrument known as a lactometer were prescribed by the ordinance considered in Deems v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 164, 26 L. R. A. 541, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339, 30 Atl. 648, and, without any particular discussion of them, they were upheld as sufficient to justify destruction of the milk if it failed to stand the tests prescribed by the ordinance.

Mr. E. F. Stone for defendant in error.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This record is before us on writ of error to test the validity of § 18 of ordinance No. 20,808. The statement filed in the first district police court charged a violation of said section by the defendant company in that it did, on April 28, 1903, carry and expose for sale, at Leonard and Washington avenues, milk, which said milk did show on analysis less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat; the said butter fat being estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper coil process, contrary to the ordinance in such case made and provided. On a trial in the police court defendant was found guilty and fined $25. It appealed to the St. Louis court of criminal correction, and in that court filed its motion to quash, in the nature of a demurrer to the complaint, on twelve different grounds. The said court sustained said motion and dismissed the cause, and thereupon the city sued out its writ of error in due time and form.

Without repeating the various grounds of the motion to quash or demurrer, it will suffice to say that in substance they assailed the said section of the ordinance along the same lines that were followed in St. Louis v. Liessing, ante, 918, 89 S. W. 611, which was argued and submitted along with this case at the same time. We have already expressed our views on the objections to this section of the ordinance in St. Louis v. Liessing. The particular provision involved in this appeal is the charge in the information that the defendant company sold milk showing "on analysis less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat; the said butter fat being estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper coil process." In this series of cases we have already determined, in harmony with great weight of authority in this country, that under its charter the city of St. Louis has the right to fix a standard of purity for milk and cream sold and offered for sale within its municipal limits, and to prohibit the sale of milk which does not conform to that standard, even though it be natural milk from healthy cows; that the purpose of the ordinance is to prohibit, not merely the dealing in milk which has been in fact adulterated, but also the sale and offering for sale of milk of such inferior quality that it falls below the prescribed standard of purity. We also hold that, in view of scientific knowledge and the numerous legislative enactments and ordinances in other states, the standards of milk and cream fixed by this ordinance are not so unreasonably high as to justify this or any other court in holding it void on that ground, and this court is not justified in holding that milk below the said standard is so universally conceded to be wholesome and innocuous that the ordinance is void on that account.

The one question remaining is, Does the fact that the ordinance in contest requires that milk on analysis shall show not less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat, "estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper coil process," make it void? Having reached the conclusion that it was within the power of the municipal assembly to fix the standard of purity, this court cannot say, as a matter of law, that it was unreasonable for the assembly to provide that the weight of the butter fat should be estimated, calculated, or ascertained gravimetrically, or measured by weight, nor that the adoption of the "Adams paper coil process" was not a proper gravimeter. The assembly unquestionably had the right, dealing, as it was, with a scientific question, to fix a scientific standard, and, in the absence of all showing to the contrary, this court cannot take judicial cognizance that the Adams paper coil process was not a proper test. By so fixing it, a definite standard, controlling alike upon the city and one charged with a violation of the ordinance, was established, and the weight of the milk can be ascertained scientifically, and not left to the uncertain opinion of witnesses, whether experts or laymen, and the judgment of inspectors. On the contrary, if no fixed standard or test was established by ordinance, the vender of the milk might well complain that his rights had been left to the unregulated judgment of the inspectors, or, if no one gravimeter had been specified, then he might well complain that different tests might lead to different results and to varying standards of purity. This ordinance looks to his protection by providing that, when an inspector takes a sample of milk or cream for analysis, "the person, firm, or corporation from whom the sample is taken shall, on demand therefor, then and there, have a right to a duplicate of said sample, sealed with the seal of the officer, on tendering him a suitable receptacle therefor." In this manner he can have his milk of the same quality tested by any disinterested chemist by the same method, and is not conclusively bound by the analysis of the city chemist. The argument of inconvenience urged by defendant we do not regard as of great weight. The ordinance does not attempt to change the rules of evidence, but is scrupulous to preserve to the vender evidence under the official seal of the inspector which he may submit to an unbiased, disinterested chemist, to be tested by identically the same standard as that which the city proposes to use to determine whether he has or has not violated the ordinance. He has his day in court, and by his counsel can subject the city chemist to the most rigid examination as to his method of testing the milk, and then, if adverse, meet it with the testimony of his own expert. The ordinance nowhere makes the test of the city chemist conclusive upon defendant. It simply fixes a standard, and leaves the question of whether or not his milk is up to that standard, according to the prescribed test for all alike, to be ascertained by settled principles of legal evidence.

We think there is nothing to differentiate this case in principle from the others in which we have sustained the constitutionality of the ordinance.

The St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction erred in dismissing the petition, and its judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to be tried in accordance with the views herein announced.

JOSEPH H. SCHULER, Appt.

Milk—prohibition of preservative.

The police power extends to the prohibition of the sale of milk containing any preservative, although there may be preservatives which are not deleterious to health.

Case Note.—If the establishment of a standard below which, if the quality of the milk fall, its sale shall be prohibited irrespective of the fact of actual adulteration and of its injuriousness to the health, is generally sustained as a police regulation (see St. Louis v. Liessing, ante, 918, and note), it is natural that the validity of a provision prohibiting the addition of any substance thereto, whether deleterious or not, should be upheld as it is in St. Louis v. SCHULER.

It is similarly held in State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, 642, 51 L. R. A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 698, that the treatment of milk with boracic acid in hot weather and with the knowledge of customers, though beneficial to the condition of the milk and harmless to health, is an adulteration punishable under a statute declaring "the

State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, 642, 51 L. R. A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 698.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in this case is charged with violating ordinance No. 20,808, § 17, in that in the city of St. Louis on the 28th of July, 1903, he did then and there carry, control, and expose for sale, at Twenty-first and Chestnut streets, milk which did contain a preservative known as "formaldehyde." On a trial on appeal he was convicted in the St. Louis court of criminal correction, and fined $25. From that judgment he appeals to this court on the ground that said ordinance and said section thereof are unconstitutional and void, in that they deprive the defendant of his natural rights to liberty and the enjoyment of the gains of his own industry, and of his property and liberty without due process of law, and because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void, in that it is beyond the power of the muniaddition of water or any other substance or thing" to be such.

The use of "formaldehyde" as a preservative is punished in Isenhour v. State, 157 Ind. 517, 87 Am. St. Rep. 228, 62 N. E. 40, under a statute providing against the addition of anything injurious to the health.

In People v. Biesecker, 169 N. Y. 53, 57 L. R. A. 178, 88 Am. St. Rep. 534, 61 N. E. 990, a statute making it unlawful to sell dairy products containing a preservative other than salt, sugar, or spirituous liquors in specified cases, or to sell preservatives for such use, was held unconstitutional in a case of its alleged violation by sale of a preservative for butter. But the court held that the statute was not aimed against adulterations, and that it could not constitutionally prohibit the use of preservatives unless they were unwholesome or injurious.

cipal assembly to pass and enact the same. Section 17 of said ordinance provides: "Any person, firm, or corporation, who shall sell, expose for sale, exchange, deliver, dispose, or transport, convey or carry, or with any such intent as aforesaid have in his or her care, custody, control, or possession any milk or cream having therein or containing any foreign substance of any kind whatever, or coloring matter, or any adulteration, or preservative, whether for the purpose of artificially increasing the quality of the milk or cream, or for preserving the condition or sweetness thereof, or for any purpose whatever, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. The evidence on the trial disclosed that on July 28, 1903, one of the deputy milk inspectors of said city did take a sample of milk from a wagon of the defendant, put it in a bottle and sealed it, and handed it to the city chemist; that this sample was analyzed by the said city chemist on the same day, and found to contain a preservative known as "formaldehyde;" that formaldehyde is an "organic compound oxidation product of alcohol," and was used by defendant to prevent the milk from becoming sour. J. C. Cabanne, an expert for the city, testified he was a milk dealer since 1868, and in business in St. Louis since 1872, and now supplied the city business to the extent of 5,000 gallons a day. He showed that milk could be kept sweet and good by simply keeping it cold, and that it was not at all necessary to use formaldehyde for that purpose, and that he "always refused to take milk with preservatives in it;" also, that he had "kept milk stored for twenty-one days without preservatives in it, just at a temperature of 34. His milk is shipped into the city from a distance as far as a hundred miles." The quantity of formaldehyde in this particular instance was not determined, as the ordinance did not require it, but the testimony was that there were only small quantities of it in the sample. There was evidence tending to show that the test used by the city chemist was not a conclusive one, but there was no pretense that either of the experts, Dr. Richter or Professor Keyser, made any test of the sample in question. On the part of the defendant, evidence was offered to show that formaldehyde in sufficient quantities to preserve milk from souring was not injurious to the health. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant prayed the court to declare the law to be that, under the testimony and the law, the plaintiff could not recover, and that the ordinance was unconstitutional and unreasonable as a matter of law and as shown by the evidence in the case. This instruction the court refused. After motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were filed, heard, and overruled, the defendant appealed to this court.

1. This case involves some of the objections to the constitutionality and validity of the ordinance in question that were made and decided adversely to the defendant in St. Louis v. Liessing, and hence we must decline to again consider those objections.

2. The real question in this case is whether it is competent for the legislature or the municipal assembly of the city of St. Louis to prohibit the preservation of milk by placing a preservative therein. On the part of the city, it is insisted that it was entirely competent to prohibit the addition of any foreign substance, which, of course, includes preservatives in milk offered for sale, whether the said foreign substance or added matter is or is not injurious to health; and that a buyer has the right to assume that the milk he buys will go through the natural processes of oxidation and decomposition. On the other hand, it is insisted that the legislature cannot forbid or wholly prevent the sale of a wholesome article of food, and that this section of the ordinance is clearly distinguishable from those considered in the other cases which we have decided under this ordinance at the present term, in that it cannot be justified as an exercise of power to prevent fraud or imposition, nor can it be sustained under the power of the legislature or municipality to require a standard of purity for milk or other food products, but it strikes down the preservation of food and milk, which is a proper and lawful purpose in itself. The defendant insists that the use of formaldehyde or other preservative is not to practise any form of deception or to artificially improve the standard of the milk, but its purpose is to prevent decay in a product which, without the presence of such preservative, naturally becomes unfit for use in a very short period, and that there is a marked distinction between the protection of health by requiring a proper standard of purity and the prevention of imposition on consumers and the mere preservation of an article otherwise up to the standard, and the introduction of such preservatives having no tendency to deceive consumers and purchasers. Another contention of the defendant is that the ordinance itself does not declare or ordain the adding of such a preservative an adulteration. It will be seen that these diverse contentions raise a most important question, one somewhat more difficult of solution than either of those presented in the other milk cases considered by the court at this time. The insistence on the part of the defendant has the full support of the court of appeals of New York in People v. Biesecker, 169 N. Y. 53, 57 L. R.

A. 178, 88 Am. St. Rep. 534, 61 N. E. 990. In that case a statute of New York, which provided that "no person shall sell, offer or expose for sale any butter or other dairy products containing a preservative; but this shall not be construed to prohibit the use of salt in butter or cheese, or spirituous liquors in club or other fancy cheese, or sugar in condensed milk,"—was held unconstitutional. In that case Judge Cullen, speaking for the whole court, reviewed previous decisions of that court, sustaining legislation which prohibited the manufacture or sale of any article so compounded as to imitate butter, as in People v. Arensburg, 105 N. Y. 123, 59 Am. Rep. 483, 11 N. E. 277, and People v. Kibler, 106 N. Y. 321, 12 N. E. 795, defining what should be deemed unwholesome or adulterated milk, and People v. Girard, 145 N. Y. 105, 45 Am. St. Rep. 595, 39 N. E. 823, forbidding the manufacture or sale of vinegar containing any artificial coloring matter, but drew a distinction between the statutes upon which those cases rest and the statute prohibiting the use of a preservative in butter, and reached the conclusion that the latter could not be justified as an exercise of the police power to prevent fraud or deception on buyers and consumers, and that the preservation of food was a lawful and laudable object. The learned judge conceded that in the use of these preservatives there was danger of adulteration and of the use of processes injurious to the public health, and that the regulation of these subjects for the protection of the public health and the prevention of imposition on consumers was within the power of the legislature, and the propriety of its exercise could not be questioned, but that, under the guise of regulation, the legislature could not destroy the industry, and that it was not a valid regulation which, in dealing with the means of preserving food, makes the preservation of food itself an unlawful act; that ingredients and processes might be prohibited as unwholesome, or causing deception, but not solely because they preserve. It is well in all these cases to keep constantly in view the fundamental principles involved in them. Under our system of government, the legislative branch is empowered to enact all laws necessary to protect the public health, but it is conceded that its acts must have such a relation to the public health that the courts by inspection can discern that they relate to and are convenient and appropriate to promote the public health, and are not mere arbitrary provisions which the courts can see have no natural connection with the professed purpose of subserving the public health. Happily in these cases it is manifest upon the face of the ordinance that the municipal assembly was exercising its police power in regard to a subject affecting the public health, to wit, an article of food of general use and prime necessity, and that the purpose of the ordinance was to preserve the purity of the milk supply and to secure to the people of St. Louis pure and unadulterated milk. As said in St. Louis v. Liesing, 89 S. W. 611: "On no one subject has this police power been affirmed so often as the right to inspect and regulate the sale of milk and cream."

The subject-matter, then, was clearly within the powers of the city council to regulate, and the sole question remaining for us to determine at this time is whether, in the attempt to regulate the sale of milk, the municipal assembly went beyond the limits of legitimate legislation on that subject. It is insisted by the defendant, and in that he is supported by the court of appeals in New York, in People v. Biesecker, 169 N. Y. 53, 57 L. R. A. 178, 88 Am. St. Rep. 534, 61 N. E. 990, that this provision against the use of any preservative in milk is to be distinguished from those cases sustaining the exclusion of annatto and other coloring substances, for the reason that the use of a preservative does not tend to deceive or mislead purchasers and consumers. We think the ground upon which this prohibition against the use of preservatives in milk rests is the right of the legislature, and in this case the municipal assembly, to pass all needful and proper ordinances to secure the purity of milk, and to prevent any tampering with milk by absolutely prohibiting the use of artificial preservatives therein. As said by the court of appeals of New York in People v. Girard, 145 N. Y. loc. cit. 109, 45 Am. St. Rep. 595, 39 N. E. 824: "Food should be pure,—absolutely and unquestionably pure. No tricks should be played with it. The legislature may resolutely protect it." The argument of the defendant that a preservative stands upon a different basis from mere coloring matter which is liable to deceive is in our opinion more plausible than sound. It is a matter of common knowledge that milk is a necessary food of the sick and of the infirm, of the old and the young, that through the agency of impure milk the germs of many diseases are disseminated, and, even where there is an absence of any deleterious impurity of the germs of specific diseases, adulterated or diluted milk is not wholesome and nutritious. Norfolk v. Flynn, 101 Va. loc. cit. 475, 62 L. R. A. 771, 99 Am. St. Rep. 918, 44 S. E. 717. In State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, loc. cit. 645, 51 L. R. A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 699, the supreme court of that state said: "But it is said that the legislature had no power to forbid the sale, without deceit or fraud, of a harmless and wholesome article of food. This may be true as a general proposition; but it is also true that, in virtue of the police power, it may pass such laws as are, or may reasonably appear to be, necessary for the health, comfort, and safety of the people.

. . . . That the sale of milk to which water and boracic acid have been added may amount to a fraud upon the purchaser is evident. He has the right to assume that the milk he buys is unadulterated, and that it will go through the natural processes of oxidation and decomposition. He may wish to use sour milk for culinary purposes, and has the right to assume that nothing has been added to prevent chemical change.

. . . It may be conceded that the milk sold by defendant was not harmful to the health of those who used it, but it is certainly dangerous to the public to permit milkmen and those dealing in milk to adulterate it in such manner as to change its constituent properties. The statute does not deprive the defendant of his property, but it does impose upon him the duty of so using it that no injury will result to others most likely to be affected by a disregard on his part of the reasonable health regulations that it enacts." In that case the defendant put boracic acid in the milk which he sold, and testified that he used it as a preservative, and that its use was necessary to keep the milk from souring; and he introduced experts to show that the quantity of boracic acid used tended to prevent decomposition and would have no deleterious effect on the consumer. The court held that it was not enough to show that the defendant did not intend to defraud, or that the milk he sold was not unwholesome. If that be true, almost any law intended to protect the public health and safety might be overthrown; that it was enough that the adulteration such as prescribed by the statute might defraud and prove deleterious to the public health, or comfort; that the legislature might well determine that the adulteration of milk tends to facilitate vicious processes, and that it ought to be prohibited.

In Com. v. Waite, 11 Allen, 264, 87 Am. Dec. 711, the court used the following language: "It is innocent and lawful to sell pure milk, and it is innocent and lawful to sell pure water, [and the argument is that] . . . the legislature has no power to make the sale of milk and water, when mixed, a penal offense unless it is done with a fraudulent intent. But it is notorious that the sale of milk adulterated with water is extensively practised with a fraudulent intent. It is for the legislature to judge what reasonable laws ought to be enacted to protect the people against this fraud, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and to adapt the protection to the nature of the case. They have seen fit to require that every man who sells milk shall take the risk of selling a pure article. No man is obliged to go into the business, and by using proper precautions any dealer can ascertain whether the milk he offers for sale has been watered. The court can see no ground for pronouncing the law unreasonable, and has no authority to judge, as to its expediency." In People v. Biesecker, 169 N. Y., loc. cit. 60, 57 L. R. A. 178, 88 Am. St. Rep. 534, 61 N. E. 991, the court said: "There is doubtless in the prosecution of these industries danger of adulteration and of the use of processes injurious to public health." In State v. Layton, 100 Mo. 474, 62 L. R. A. 163, 83 Am. St. Rep. 487, 61 S. W. 171, the act of March 11, 1899, making it "unlawful for any person or corporation doing business in this state to manufacture, sell, or offer to sell, any article, compound, or preparation . . . of food, in which article, compound, or preparation, there is any arsenic, calomel, bismuth, ammonia, or alum," came before this court on a prosecution of the defendant for selling and offering for sale Layton's Health Food Baking Powder, a compound and preparation containing alum. The act was challenged as unconstitutional, because it was insisted that the said baking powder was wholesome and innocuous and the small amount of alum used therein was not deleterious. It was clear that the baking powder in question was not an imitation of any standard baking powder, and therefore did not fall within the doctrine of State v. Addington, 77 Mo. 110, and State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo. 336, 38 S. W. 317, but the constitutionality of the statute was upheld on the ground that it was competent for the legislature to protect the health, morals, and safety of the people, so long as enactments did not transgress the rights secured by the state and Federal Constitutions, and that the court approached the charge of invalidity and unconstitutionality of the act with the presumption in favor of the law, and that, when it appeared that there was a dispute as to the wholesomeness of an article of food or drink, then it was a legislative question, and the legislature had the right to inquire for itself an either prohibit or regulate its manufacture or sale as to it might seem best; that the constitutionality of the act could not be made to depend upon the proof in each individual case whether the article was or was not wholesome. It was said in that case that, if an article of food is so universally conceded to be wholesome and innocuous that a court may take judicial cognizance of that fact, the legislature has no right, under our Constitution, to prohibit its sale or use.

Much of the argument in this case is predicated upon this last proposition, and the defendant insists that because formaldehyde works such a chemical change in the character of milk that it will not sour, and because it is for this reason classed as a preservative, the municipal assembly could not lawfully prohibit its use in milk. The trial court refused to go into the evidence tendered that formaldehyde in proper quantities was not injurious to health. Evidently it cannot be said that the effect of formaldehyde in milk is so well known not to be deleterious that the courts must take judicial cognizance of that fact. That its action is such that it changes the chemical properties of the milk so that it will not sour was established and conceded on the trial, and it was for this reason that it was insisted that, as it preserved the milk from souring, it was claimed to be highly beneficial. We cannot accept this conclusion. It must be recognized that it was a legislative function in the passage of this ordinance for the preservation of health to insist that milk should have neither adulterants nor preservatives placed in it, and to inquire as to the effect thereof. The municipal assembly may have investigated and found this very fact, that, when formaldehyde or boracic acid was placed in milk, it would change its chemical properties and prevent its souring, and prevent it going the natural processes of oxidation and decomposition, and that thereby the housewife desiring to have the milk sour for culinary purposes, or the physician administering it as a food to children and sick persons, would be misled in his calculations as to its effect on his patients. But, in addition to this, the municipal assembly might well have reasoned that, while one preservative used in carefully prepared proportions might not be injurious to the health of consumers, it would be exceedingly dangerous to permit the venders of milk, with little or no scientific knowledge and less scruples, each to select his own so-called preservative and use it without knowledge as to the quantities which were safe which would open the door to all sorts of dangerous adulterations and to the use of highly injurious processes; and that the discovery of such practices might never be made until incalculable injury had occurred; and that the only safe course, considering the nature of the business, was to prevent absolutely the placing of such preservatives in milk having such an effect as was shown in this case. In so doing the municipal assembly in no manner destroyed or affected the defendant's right of property. He had the right to sell pure and unadulterated milk of the standard prescribed by the ordinance, and the purchaser and the consumer of milk had the right to purchase from him pure milk unmixed with any foreign matter added to it, and this was what the ordinance required, no more and no less, and in so doing it infringed no provision of the organic law of this state or any article of the Federal Constitution.

The judgment of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

F. SANDERS, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(.... Ky.)

Impure milk—still slop—police power.

The police power of the state extends to the prohibition of the sale of milk from cows fed by still slop, although there is nothing to show that such milk is not a pure and wholesome article of food, since the court may assume that the legislature had sufficient information to justify the belief that milk from cows fed on such food had ample opportunity to become impregnated with elements dangerous to public health.

(December 9, 1903.)

Case Note.—When the courts have upheld regulations against adulterating milk, or selling any that falls below a specified standard, as they have done in the preceding cases of St. Louis v. Liessing, ante, 918, St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. ante, 926, and St. Louis v. Schuler, ante, 928, and other cases referred to in the accompanying case notes, it is but going one step further under the police power to eradicate the sources of danger by forbidding the sale of milk drawn from swill-fed cattle, as is done by the statute considered in the SANDERS CASE. The only other case found after considerable search in which such a provision is considered is Johnson v. Simonton, 43 Cal. 242, where it was collaterally drawn in question in an action for libel. "If it indeed be a fact," says the court, "that the milk of cows fed in whole or in part upon still slops is unwholesome as human food, there can be no doubt of either the authority or the duty of the board to enact the ordinance in question."

Regulations of dairymen's business going to the extent of requiring the registration of their herds, lighting, ventilation, and drainage of the stables, the storing of the milk, etc., were sustained in full in State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L. R. A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Division of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County convicting him of violating the statute against the sale of impure milk. Affirmed.

Mr. C. J. Pratt also for appellee.

Burnam, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Fred Sanders, was indicted, tried, and convicted in the Jefferson circuit court for having knowingly sold milk from animals fed upon "still slop," in violation of the provisions of § 1274 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1899, which reads as follows: "Whoever shall knowingly sell, or cause to be sold, to any person in this state, milk diluted with water, or in any way adulterated, or milk from which any cream has been taken, or sell milk commonly known as 'skimmed milk,' with intent to defraud, or shall knowingly sell any milk, the product of a diseased animal, or from animals fed upon 'still slop,' 'brewer's slop,' or 'brewer's grains,' or shall knowingly use any poisonous or deleterious material or milk from animals diseased or fed as aforesaid, in the manufacture of butter or cheese, shall be fined in any sum not less than $25 nor more than $200." A reversal of the judgment of the circuit court is asked upon the ground that so much of the statute as prohibited the sale of milk from animals fed upon still slop is obnoxious to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides, in § 1, that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Appellant's contention is based upon the claim that still slop, when used under proper conditions, is a wholesome and innocuous food for dairy cows, and that the milk from cows fed thereon is a pure and wholesome article of food for human beings. Our attention is called to the fact that there is nothing in the statute, nor the indictment which is the foundation of this prosecution, which negatives either of these contentions, and that no testimony was introduced by the commonwealth upon the trial of the case for the purpose of establishing that such was the fact; that the whole proceeding rests upon the naked prohibition contained in the statute itself. The section upon which the prosecution is based is one of the provisions of the statute aimed at offenses against the public health, and was exercised under the police power of the state for the protection of the health of its citizens. No exact definition of the extent of this power has, or perhaps can be, given. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, has approved that given by Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, as the most satisfactory and complete to which his attention has been called. It is as follows: "All property in this commonwealth . . . is . . . held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient. . . . The power vested in the legislature by the Constitution to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth and of the subjects of the same. It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its exercise." And this power, under the American constitutional system, is left with the individual states. It cannot be taken away from them, either wholly or in part. See United States v. Dewitt, 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 593. "Neither can the national government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the states. All that the Federal authority can do is to see that the states do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution." See Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. 831, and authorities there cited.

The 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution was first called to the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394. In construing a statute of Louisiana vesting in a slaughterhouse company the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting a live-stock landing and slaughterhouse business, and requiring that all animals should be landed at the stock landing and slaughtered at the slaughterhouse of the company, and nowhere else, it was held that the statute did not conflict with the provisions of the 14th Amendment. The scope of this amendment, in so far as it relates to the question before us, has been very clearly stated by Judge Cooley as follows: "The guaranteed equal protection is not to be understood to require that every person in the land shall possess the same rights and privileges as every other person. The amendment contemplates classes of persons, and the protection given by the law is deemed to be equal if all persons in the same class are treated alike under like circumstances and conditions, both as to privileges conferred and liabilities imposed. The classification must be based on reasonable grounds. It cannot be a mere arbitrary selection." Cooley's Constitutional Law. And the text is supported by numerous adjudged cases.

It is a canon of statutory construction that every presumption must be indulged in favor of the validity of the statute, as the Constitution confers upon the general assembly the lawmaking power. But, notwithstanding this general presumption, the courts must obey the Constitution, and determine in a particular case whether its limits have been passed. As was said in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60: "To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may at any time be passed by those intended to be restrained." "If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health . . . is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution." See Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. In Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257, it was held that the 14th Amendment to the Constitution was not designed to interfere with the exercise of the police power by the state for the protection of health, prevention of fraud, or the preservation of the public morals; and that it was competent for the state of Pennsylvania to prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine butter. In that case the defendant offered to prove that he made large profits from the sale of the prohibited article, and that it was a wholesome and innocuous food; that the statute upon which the prosecution was founded was not a lawful exercise of the police power, because it deprived him of the lawful use of his property without compensation. The court sustained an objection to the evidence, and the defendant was adjudged to pay a fine and the cost of the prosecution. The judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. 114 Pa. 265, 60 Am. Rep. 350, 7 Atl. 913. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the question was whether the prohibition of the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine—a wholesome article of food—was a lawful exercise by the state of the power to protect by police regulations the public health. In discussing this question, the court, through Judge Harlan, said: "As it does not appear upon the face of the statute, or from any facts of which the court must take judicial cognizance, that it infringes rights secured by the fundamental law, the legislative determination of those questions is conclusive upon the courts. It is not a part of their functions to conduct investigations of facts entering into questions of public policy merely, and to sustain or frustrate the legislative will embodied in statutes as they may happen to approve or disapprove its determination of such questions. The power which the legislature has to promote the general welfare is very great, and the discretion which that department of the government has in the employment of means to that end is very large. . . . Both its power and its discretion must be so exercised as not to impair the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property. . . . The legislature of Pennsylvania, upon the fullest investigation, as we must conclusively presume, and upon reasonable grounds, as must be assumed from the record, has determined that the prohibition of the sale, or offering for sale, or having in possession to sell, for purposes of food, of any article manufactured out of oleaginous substances or compounds, other than those produced from unadulterated milk, or cream from unadulterated milk, . . . will promote the public health, and prevent frauds in the sale of such articles. If all that can be said of this legislation is that it is unwise or unnecessarily oppressive to those manufacturing or selling wholesome oleomargarine as an article of food, their appeal must be to the legislature or to the ballot box, not to the judiciary. The latter cannot interfere without usurping powers committed to another department of government."

In State v. Layton, 160 Mo. 474, 62 L. R. A. 163, 83 Am. St. Rep. 487, 61 S. W. 171, the supreme court of Missouri had before it an act of the general assembly prohibiting the sale of "alum baking powders," as unhealthy. In this case there was no question of deceit in the sale of the prohibited article. The statute upon which the prosecution was based embodied no idea of imitation of a superior article, and the court said: "No baking powder is recognized as the standard, as is butter from unadulterated milk in the oleomargarine statute. Here the statute must be upheld, if at all, upon the right of the legislature to make all needful laws to preserve the public health. . . . While it is true that there are limits, under our system, to this power, we must start with the presumption in favor of the act. While we do not accede to the proposition that the legislature can arbitrarily declare any article of food in general use, and concededly wholesome and innocuous, to be unhealthy, and its production and sale a crime, and would have no hesitancy in declaring such an act void when the act on its face disclosed its arbitrary and unreasonable character, . . . if it be an article so universally conceded to be wholesome and innocuous that the court may take judicial notice of it, the legislature . . . has no right to absolutely prohibit it; but if there is a dispute as to the fact of its wholesomeness for food or drink, then the legislature can either regulate or prohibit it. . . . 'That an act of the legislature is not to be declared void unless the violation of the Constitution is so manifest as to leave no room for reasonable doubt;'" citing Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed., and numerous opinions.

It was decided in the case of State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L. R. A. 435, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771, that the legislature could, "under the police power," require the registration with "the live-stock sanitary board" of all herds of cattle of persons selling milk for food, and prohibit the sale of milk from premises found in an unsanitary condition.

The development in the science of bacteriology in recent years has conclusively proved that the microbe is a most potent agent in the propagation of contagious diseases, and that there is no more favorable element for their absorption, growth, and development than milk, and that milk contaminated by their presence communicates diphtheria, typhoid fever, tuberculosis, and other kindred contagious diseases, to human beings, especially to the young. And it is a matter of common knowledge that the conditions usually prevailing around places where "still slop" is produced are also highly favorable to the development of many forms of bacilli. The heat, dampness, and fermentation—all essential elements in the production of still slop—are favorable to germ growth. So that we may fairly assume that the general assembly, in the enactment of this statute, had sufficient information to justify the belief that milk from cows fed on still slop had ample opportunity to become impregnated with elements dangerous to the public health. Nearly every police regulation affects to some extent property rights; and, whilst this power cannot be made the excuse for oppressive and unjust legislation, the courts are not permitted to say that the legislature may not enact laws apparently necessary for the public health. We have reached the conclusion that, under the facts of this case, this court has no power to hold that the general assembly did not have under the "police power" authority to enact the statute under which appellant was convicted.

Judgment affirmed.

Writ of error from Supreme Court of United States dismissed by stipulation January 30, 1905.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
GRAFEMAN DAIRY COMPANY.

(.... Mo.)

1. Information—motion to quash.

A motion to quash an information charging violation of an ordinance in several particulars will not prevail if a good cause of action is stated as to either of the defaults complained of.

2. Ordinance—severable provisions.

Provisions of an ordinance requiring milk dealers to register in the office of the health commissioner and pay a fee therefor, and those requiring them to pay a license fee, are severable, so that one may be sustained although the other fails.

3. Milk dealer—registration of.

Requiring milk dealers to register with the health commissioner and pay a registration fee is a valid police regulation.

Case Note.—The constitutionality of other provisions of the ordinance considered in this case was passed upon in St. Louis v. Liesing, ante, 918; St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. ante, 926; and St. Louis v. Schuler, ante, 928.

A very common method of regulating occupations and business coming within the scope of the police power is to require a license to be procured as a condition of the privilege of engaging therein; and ordinances requiring that a license be taken out by persons engaged in selling milk have uniformly been held valid when reasonable and free from discrimination.

The power of a city to exact a license fee from persons engaged in the sale of milk will be upheld by the courts when plainly intended as a police regulation, and the revenue derived therefrom is not disproportionate to the cost of issuing the license and the regulation of the business. Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L. R. A. 588, 47 Am. St. Rep. 697, 60 N. W. 724.

An ordinance making it unlawful for any person to peddle or deliver milk in any cart, wagon, or vehicle through any of the public squares, streets, or alleys of the city, without first having been licensed to do the same; and providing that any person violating the ordinance shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor and subjected to a fine; and giving to the mayor authority to grant licenses to

4. Same—authority of municipality.

Charter authority to provide for the inspection of milk empowers a municipal corporation to require venders to register in the office of the health commissioner.

5. Police regulation—fee as tax.

Requiring payment of $1 as a registration fee for milk dealers is not invalid as a tax.

6. Milk—regulation of sale of.

The fact that selling milk is a lawful trade or business does not exempt it from reasonable police regulations.

7. Ordinance—provisions within title.

A provision requiring the registration of venders and the payment of a registration fee is within the title of an ordinance "regulating the sale of milk and cream."

8. Same—conflict with statute.

An ordinance requiring payment of a fee to the "city collector" is not void because the statute designates the one who is to receive it as the "license collector."

9. Milk venders—authority to license.

Charter authority to make provision for the inspection of milk, and to license occupations, authorizes a municipal corporation to license milk venders as distinguished from general merchants.

(June 28, 1905.)

ERROR to the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction to review a judgment dismissing an information which had been filed in the First District Police Court of such persons as in his judgment shall appear proper, and to fix the fees within certain limits,—was held valid in People ex rel. Larrabee v. Mulholland, 19 Hun, 548.

The right of a city to pass an ordinance making it unlawful for any person to sell, expose for sale, or deliver, milk within its limits without first procuring a license, and to provide punishment for its violation, was also sustained in Chicago v. Bartee, 100 Ill. 57.

So an ordinance requiring payment of a license fee by milk venders to pay the salary and expenses of the milk inspectors is held, in Norfolk v. Flynn, 101 Va. 473, 62 L. R. A. 771, 99 Am. St. Rep. 918, 44 S. E. 717, not to violate a statute forbidding the municipality to impose any tax, fine, or penalty on persons selling their own farm or domestic products in the city.

And the requirement in an ordinance that an applicant for a license to sell milk within the city shall consent that the animals from which he obtains the milk shall be subjected to the tuberculin test was held, in State v. Nelson, 66 Minn. 166, 34 L. R. A. 318, 61 Am. St. Rep. 399, 68 N. W. 1066, not to be unreasonable.

But an ordinance against selling milk without a license was held, in Pierce v. Aurora, 91 Ill. App. 674, to be invalidated by a provision exempting the owners of two cows only, peddling milk by hand.

the City of St. Louis charging defendant with violation of an ordinance for the regulation of the sale of milk. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Measrs. Charles W. Bates and William F. Woerner, for plaintiff in error:

That provision which requires venders of cream and milk to register with the health commissioner is strictly within the reasonable exercise of the ordinary police power lawfully delegated to the city.

Modern Law of Mun. Corp. § 1347; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1255.

Mr. E. F. Stone for defendant in error.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the first district police court of the city of St. Louis for violation by defendant of § 10 of ordinance 20,808, relating to the licensing and regulation of the sale of milk and cream and the inspection thereof, "by carrying on the business of a vender of milk and cream without a license, and by failing to register as such at the office of the health commissioner, and for failing to pay the registration fee." A motion to quash was lodged in the St. Louis court of criminal correction, which was sustained and the suit dismissed, from which action the plaintiff city appeals to this court.

There are 17 grounds assigned for quashing the action. Seven of these grounds, to wit, 1, 2, 6, 7, 11, 15, and 17, are abandoned in this court. The remaining general grounds are as follows: "(3) Because the ordinance upon which the prosecution is based and predicated is unconstitutional and void, in that it is repugnant to the provisions of § 28, art. 4, of the Constitution of the state, and also of § 13, art. 3, of the charter of the city of St. Louis, in that said ordinance contains more than one subject and the subject-matter of said ordinance is not clearly expressed in the title of the same. (4) Because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void for the reason that the same is unreasonable in its provisions, and it is practically impossible to comply with and enforce the same. (5) Because said ordinance is unconstitutional and void for the reason that it is repugnant to § 4, art. 2, and § 30, art. 2, of the Constitution of this state, in that it deprives the defendant of his natural rights to liberty and the enjoyment of the gains of his own industry and of his liberty and property without due process of law. . . . (8) Because the said ordinance is unconstitutional and void, in that the charter of the city of St. Louis contains no express grant to the municipal assembly of the city to enact the same. (9) Because said laws and ordinances upon which this prosecution is based are void and unconstitutional, in that they were enacted under and contain an unlawful delegation of power. (10) Because the laws and ordinance in question are void and unconstitutional, in that they are a class legislation and provide for taxation under the form and name of a license. . . . (12) Because said ordinance is void and unconstitutional for the reason that it is repugnant to § 1, art. 14, of the Amendments of the Constitution to the United States, in that it deprives the defendant of his liberty and property without due process of law and denies to him the equal protection of law. (13) Because the ordinance and section upon which the prosecution is based, is unconstitutional and void because it designates the wrong officer to collect the license fee, and is inconsistent with the state law, in that it gives neither the license commissioner nor license collector any authority or duty in the premises. (14) Because said ordinance and section upon which the charge herein is based and predicated is void and unconstitutional in this,—it discriminates between merchants who sell and deal in different classes of merchandise, and imposes a license upon milk venders different from and in addition to regular merchants' license. . . . (16) Section 10, upon which this prosecution is based, is void and unconstitutional because it was not uniform in its operation upon all milk venders or merchants, and is unequal, unjust, oppressive, and unreasonable."

The record does not disclose upon which of the seventeen grounds the court of criminal correction sustained the motion to quash. The 10th section of ordinance No. 20,808, is as follows: "Sec. 10. Every person, firm, or corporation who shall sell, or offer for sale, expose for sale, dispose of, exchange, or deliver, or with the intent so to do as aforesaid, have in his or her possession, care, custody, or control, milk or cream, in or from any store, stand, booth, market place, milk depot, warehouse, dairy, cow stable, or any building, erection, or establishment of any kind, or shall transport, convey, or deliver the same by wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, or by hand, shall first be licensed to do so, and shall register as a milk vender in the office of the health commissioner, and pay to the city collector the license fee provided for by this ordinance. Every person, firm, or corporation selling or disposing of milk or cream at retail shall, within thirty days after this ordinance goes into effect, and semiannually on the first Mondays of January and July thereafter, pay license fees as follows: Every milk or cream vender shall pay for the privilege of conducting a milk business, a registration fee of $1 per annum; and, in addition thereto, each vender shall pay, for every wagon or other vehicle from which milk or cream is sold or delivered, a semiannual license fee of $2.50. And every vender of milk or cream at wholesale, by which shall be understood, meant, and is hereby defined, a person or corporation selling to others milk or cream in quantities to any person, firm, or corporation, of 16 gallons or more on 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) any one day, shall pay, semiannually, as aforesaid, a wholesale license fee of $25. If any person, firm, or corporation commence or engage in the traffic or handling of milk or cream at any periods other than those hereinbefore mentioned, he or they, before doing so, shall pay the pro rata license fees in their cases required, which license so issued, as well as other licenses herein required, shall be good for a period ending with either the first Monday of January or the first Monday of July, as the case may be, following the issuance and delivery thereof. Every person, firm, or corporation violating this section, or any of its provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100 for each and every offense."

The information charged four distinct violations of this § 10: First, in failing to observe that part of said section forbidding the sale of milk without a license; second, failing to register as a milk vender in the office of the health commissioner; third, failing to pay to the city collector the license fee of $1 for registration; fourth, failing to pay the semiannual license fee of $2.50 for each wagon used. There was no motion filed by the defendant to require a separate count for each of these offenses, nor any objection to their manner of statement in petition. The motion to quash must be treated as a demurrer to the whole statement, and, if there is a good cause of action stated as to either one of the defaults complained of, it was error to dismiss the case. It may be well to remark here that there was no evidence in the record that the defendant had already paid all that was required to pay a merchant's tax, which authorized it to sell milk, or that there is any such license required. The learned city counselor in this case waives the right to recover, but insists that the motion to quash the whole case was erroneous because the second and third offenses, to wit, the failure to register and the failure to pay the $1 registration and inspection fee, were based on valid provisions which were not rendered invalid, even though the others were void.

1. The first assignment is that the criminal court of correction unreasonably dismissed the whole action. No motion to compel plaintiff to elect on which breach of the section it would rely was filed, and no objection was made on the ground of misjoinder in one count of the several breaches. In Gallatin v. Tarwater, 143 Mo. 40, 44 S. W. 750, this court, speaking of an ordinance, said: "Separate and distinct offenses mentioned disjunctively in the same section of the statute, all of which are of the same class and punishable by the same penalty, may be charged conjunctively in one count, . . . and such count will be sustained by proof of one of the offenses charged." To the same effect, see also Polinsky v. People, 73 N. Y. 65. If, therefore, the complaint in this case alleged one or two breaches of valid provisions of the said ordinance, the court erred in quashing the whole action, even though the motion was well taken as to other alleged breaches; but it is insisted that the section in question refers to both registration and license and they are used conjunctively in the section, and are therefore not severable, and hence, if one of the provisions is invalid, then the whole section must fall. We cannot give our concurrence to this contention. That part of § 10 of ordinance 20,808, requiring a vender of cream and milk to register in the office of the health commissioner, and that part requiring the payment of $1 as a registration fee, are clearly severable from the other provisions requiring the payment of a license tax. It has been uniformly ruled by this court that, where provisions of a statute or ordinance are severable, and are not interdependent one upon the other, the whole will not be declared void because a part is invalid, but the void parts or portions will be eliminated and the valid parts upheld and enforced, provided this will not defeat the substantial object of the enactment. St. Louis v. St. Louis R. Co. 89 Mo. 44, 58 Am. Rep. 82, 1 S. W. 305; Tarkio v. Cook, 120 Mo. 1, 41 Am. St. Rep. 678, 25 S. W. 202; State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 17, 14 Am. Rep. 471; State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo. 335, 38 S. W. 317. The provision requiring venders of cream and milk to register with the health commissioner and pay a registration fee was clearly a valid police regulation, looking to the protection of the health and administering to the welfare of the public, and came strictly within the charter powers of the city of St. Louis, giving authority for the inspection of milk, and license from the inspector is a guaranty to the community that they can with safety purchase milk from the dealer thus registered and licensed. St. Louis v. Fischer, 167 Mo. 654, 64 L. R. A. 679, 99 Am. St. Rep. 614, 67 S. W. 872, Affirmed in 194 U. S. 362, 48 L. ed. 1018, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673. This provision was clearly not a tax within the meaning of the law, but merely as an inspection fee, designed as a compensation for the service rendered. Norfolk v. Flynn, 101 Va. 473, 62 L. R. A. 771, 99 Am. St. Rep. 918, 44 S. E. 717; Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 30 L. ed. 237, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

The fact that the selling of milk is a lawful trade or business does not exempt it from reasonable police regulations. In Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, the Supreme Court of the United States tersely stated the recognized rule on this subject: Regulations respecting the pursuit of a lawful business or trade are of very frequent occurrence in the various cities of the country, and what such regulations shall be, and to what particular trade, business, or occupation they shall apply, are questions for the city to determine, and their determination comes within the proper exercise of the police power of the city; and, unless the regulations are so contrary, unreasonable, and extravagant in their nature and purpose that the property and personal rights of the citizens are unnecessarily and in a manner wholly arbitrary interfered with or destroyed without due process of law, they do not extend beyond the power of the state to pass. When it is considered that no article of food is more universally used by the public, and that no other article is perhaps so sensitive to atmosphere and vegetable influences as milk, and that it is within a common knowledge that impure milk is a fruitful source of disease and disorders, especially among children, it needs no discussion to show that the milk business is one which particularly falls within the power of the state and its municipality to regulate, and that the imposition of $1 a year for registration is in no sense an onerous or unjust burden, and is intended as a pure police measure to cover in part the cost of inspection of milk and cream, is too plain for discussion. We have no hesitancy in holding that the statement, in so far as it charged a failure to register and the failure to pay the $1 registration and inspection fee, stated a good cause of action, and therefore the criminal court of correction erred in quashing the whole case; nor is this section obnoxious to the objection that it infringes the charter provision requiring the subject-matter to be expressed in the title of the ordinance. This provision of the ordinance is clearly within the title and germane to the one controlling subject of regulating the sale of milk and cream. State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo. 335, 38 S. W. 317; Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774; State v. Whitaker, 160 Mo. 59, 60 S. W. 1068.

2. It is, however, argued by defendant that the registration and license fees must both be paid to the city collector, and that no one else can refuse so to issue licenses thereon, and that for this reason this provision of the ordinance is void, because in conflict with an act of the legislature, approved March 26, 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 80), which created the office of license collector and conferred upon him exclusive authority to collect the payment for all licenses and to issue licenses in the city of St. Louis. The answer to this contention is that there is no such officer as city collector, and that it is obvious from the ordinance itself that the person designated by that name is the license collector, and, at most, the provision of the section in this respect is an inaccurate designation of the proper officer who alone could be intended. There is, then, here no duty imposed nor authority conferred upon a wrong officer within the meaning of the argument of counsel for defendant and to sustain which he cites various authorities, but merely a misnomer of the only officer authorized to collect the registration fee.

3. Again, it is insisted by the defendant that the action was properly dismissed because there was no authority in the city to license venders of milk, and that they can only be classed as merchants and be required to pay a merchant's license, and not being specifically named in the charter a license cannot be imposed on that business. Section 26, art. 3, of the charter of St. Louis, expressly provides: "That the mayor and assembly shall have power in the city by ordinance not inconsistent with the Constitution or any law of this state, or of this charter, to make provision for the inspection of butter, cheese, milk, lard, and other provisions, and to license, tax, and regulate occupations and secure the general health." No more definite and adequate provision and authority could have well been given to the city to enable it to provide all reasonable regulations for the inspection of milk, and to exact a reasonable inspection fee therefor, and we have already ruled that, as to the inspection fee in this case, it is not a tax within the meaning of that term as understood in our Constitution and general statute; that the state and this city under this specific grant of power may make any business requiring police legislation pay the expense of regulating and controlling it; and that this may be done by exacting inspection fees from those engaged in the business is no longer an open question in this country. The authority will be found collated in a recent decision of the supreme court of Montana in State v. McKinney, 29 Mont. 375, 74 Pac. 1095, loc. cit. 1099. State v. Bixman, 162 Mo. 1, 62 S. W. 828.

4. The constitutionality of the ordinance as a whole has been examined and sustained in St. Louis v. Liessing, ante, 918, 89 S. W. 611, and we deem it unnecessary to again go over the various grounds upon which the ordinance has been attacked, but refer to the discussion had in that case, and content ourselves with saying that for the reasons therein given the ordinance is 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

valid and constitutional as to the various sections assailed in this and the other cases argued with it at the same time.

The result is that the judgment of the Criminal Court of Correction of St. Louis must be, and is, reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF ELKHART, Appt.,

v.

FORREST MURRAY.

(.... Ind.)

Ordinance—vesting discretion in officials.

An ordinance requiring the use on street cars of a particular fender, or "some other fender equally as good, to be approved" by certain officials, is invalid as vesting an arbitrary discretion in the officials.

(October 10, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Elkhart County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a penalty for the alleged violation of an ordinance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John M. VanFleet and Vernon W. VanFleet, for appellant:

The city had power to compel the use of fenders upon street cars.

Case Note.—The above case is a distinct addition to, and development of, the previous rulings in Indiana on questions which the court says are the same in principle. It is suggested that a reference to the Indiana cases will show a distinction which, while it may not work a difference in the principle applicable to them and the ELKHART CASE, certainly will show that that case goes further than the early Indiana cases.

Bessonies v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189, cited in the above case, held an ordinance void which made the granting of permits to locate or operate a hospital in the city discretionary with the common council. And in the case of Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 13 L. R. A. 587, 28 Am. St. Rep. 180, 23 N. E. 312, the court declared invalid an ordinance declaring it unlawful to keep or store explosive oils without the permission of the common council, who are vested with discretion to grant such permission if the location, building, and the purpose of the keeping of such oils are deemed suitable and proper.

The city might designate the kind of fender to be used, and the burden rested upon appellee to prove that such use would be unreasonable and oppressive.

Messrs. Brick & Bates and Perry L. Turner, for appellee:

The ordinance was unreasonable, arbitrary, and void.

If, in the ELKHART CASE, the ordinance had forbidden the use of street cars without fenders, except with the permission of the common council, and had given to such officials the power to determine whether such permission would be granted, the ordinance would be more nearly identical with those referred to.

Certainly an ordinance which absolutely forbids the doing of a particular thing, except in cases where the consent of certain specified officials is obtained, without determining the rules that are to govern the granting of such consent, vests a more arbitrary discretion than an ordinance which, for the purpose of bringing about a well-understood and much-desired result, declares that all instrumentalities of a specified nature shall be equipped with a safety appliance, and leaves to specified officials the duty of determining whether the particular appliance furnished is sufficient to accomplish the purpose intended.

Possibly the difficulty of describing in an ordinance a fender which would be sufficient on cars of the different types and kinds likely to be operated in the municipality involved, so as to leave nothing to be done in the discretion of the officials, makes applicable the reasoning of the court in Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310, where, in upholding an ordinance forbidding the alteration or repair of wooden buildings within prescribed fire limits without the written permission of the fire wardens, it stated that no general rule could be established beforehand that would meet the emergencies of individual cases, and that, therefore, the power to give relief in particular instances is conferred on certain officers; and it is not to be presumed that they will exercise that power wantonly.

The authorities are not in entire harmony in determining just how much discretion may be vested in a city official in enforcing a municipal regulation. As will appear from an examination of the following illustrations (L.R.A. (N.S.)) trative cases, some of the authorities hold that the ordinance should lay down rules and tests to guide and control the officer in the exercise of his discretion, while others are not so strict in limiting the official's discretion.

An ordinance prohibiting the use of a pleasure driveway with traffic vehicles is unreasonable and void where the enforcement of it is made to depend upon the discretion of the village trustees by requiring their permission for such use. Cicero Lumber Co. v. Cicero, 176 Ill. 9, 42 L. R. A. 696, 68 Am. St. Rep. 155, 51 N. E. 758. In this case the court said: "The ordinance in no way regulates or controls the discretion vested thereby in the board. It prescribes no conditions upon which the special permission of the board is to be granted. . . . The ordinance should have established a rule by which its impartial enforcement could be secured."

In Noel v. People, 187 Ill. 587, 52 L. R. A. 287, 79 Am. St. Rep. 238, 58 N. E. 616, the court held invalid a statute providing that the board of pharmacy may, "in their discretion," issue permits to persons not registered as pharmacists, to sell domestic remedies and proprietary medicines. In so holding, the court said that the official discretion conferred upon the board is unregulated, and no conditions are prescribed upon which the permit is to issue.

In Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 33 Am. Rep. 239, an ordinance was held to be invalid which declared that all permits granted for steam boilers or engines might be revoked, and the steam engine or boiler removed, after six months' notice from the mayor, upon the ground that it did not prescribe regulations for the construction, location, or use of the engine, or lay down rules for the execution of the provision of the ordinance, but left the matter to the arbitrary discretion of a single public officer.

An ordinance is invalid which prescribes that a person must receive from the city building inspector a permit before erecting any building or addition thereto within the Monks, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the city of Elkhart for the violation by appellee of an ordinance which provides that "it shall be unlawful on and after May 1, 1903, to run any street car within the limits of said city without having securely fastened to its front end a Hunter automatic fender, made by the Hunter Automatic Fender Company, of Covington, Kentucky, or some other fender equally as good, to be approved by the common council or its street committee." The court below held the ordinance invalid, and rendered judgment in favor of appellee.

There was no law in force in 1903, when said ordinance was passed, granting in express words to cities of the class to which appellant belonged the power to require street cars running within the city limits to be equipped with fenders. But, assuming that such power may be implied from those granted (People v. Detroit United R. Co. 134 Mich. 682, 63 L. R. A. 746, 749, 104 Am. St. Rep. 626, 94 N. W. 36, and cases cited), was said ordinance a reasonable exercise of that power? Such power, if possessed by the city, must be exercised by ordinance. The ordinance must contain perma-city limits, and which gives such inspector absolute authority to grant or refuse such permit, without attempting to determine what shall be deemed necessary to constitute a safe building, or laying down any rules for the guidance or control of the building inspector in arriving at his decision, except that the building must be in accordance with the provisions of the statute which prescribes general building regulations. Sioux Falls v. Kirby, 6 S. D. 62, 25 L. R. A. 621, 60 N. W. 156. Kellam, J., dissented upon the ground that under the ordinance involved the granting of the permit was not left to the arbitrary, wilful, or capricious decision of the building inspector.

In Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064, an ordinance was held invalid which declared it to be unlawful for any person to engage in the laundry business within the corporate limits without having first obtained the consent of the supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed of either brick or stone, upon the ground that such ordinance does not prescribe a rule and condition for the regulation of the use of laundry property, but confers a naked arbitrary authority upon the board to give or withhold consent.

In Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, where it was held that equal protection of the laws is not denied by a statute giving the mayor power to determine whether a person applying for license to sell cigarettes has good character and reputation, and is a suitable person to be intrusted with their sale, the court, in discussing the effect upon the statute of the granting of discretionary power, distinguished the Yick Wo Case, saying that the ordinance in question does not grant an arbitrary power such as existed in the Yick Wo Case, as the mayor was bound to grant a license to every suitable person of good character and reputation, and that the fact of fitness, submitted to the judgment of the officer, called for the exercise of judicial discretion.

the use of bicycles on a certain road without the permission of the superintendent of the road was upheld. In discussing the question as to whether the discretion vested in the superintendent was an arbitrary one, the court said, in opposition to this contention, that he is the agent of the law, and "is bound to exercise the discretion vested in him honestly, fairly, reasonably, and without prejudice or partiality, for the just purpose of effectuating the intention of the statute;" that the creation of the discretion implies that there may be occasions, or times, or seasons when bicycles may be used on the road.

The court distinguished the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra, on the ground that the manifest purpose of the ordinance in that case was not a just and reasonable regulation, but unlawful, and the discretionary powers conferred were intentionally arbitrary. And the court also distinguished Baltimore v. Radecke, supra, in the same way.

In Eureka City v. Wilson, 15 Utah, 53, 48 Pac. 41, an ordinance was upheld which made the privilege of moving buildings upon a street dependent upon permission of the mayor, or the president of the city council, or, in their absence, a member of the council. This ordinance did not attempt to lay down any rules to guide the officials in granting their permission.

In Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 48 L. ed. 1018, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, it was held that equal protection of the laws was not denied by an ordinance forbidding the establishment or maintenance of a dairy or cow stable within prescribed limits without having received permission from the municipal assembly. The court, in reply to the defendant's main contention that the ordinance made it possible for the municipal assembly to discriminate between persons in granting the permit, held that the dispensing power must be vested in someone, and that the court was bound to assume that the discrimination would be made in the interest of the public, and upon conditions applying to the health and comfort of the neighborhood.

nent legal provisions operating generally and impartially upon all within the territorial jurisdiction of such city, and no part thereof be left to the will or unregulated discretion of the common council or any officer. If an ordinance upon its face restricts the right of dominion which the owner might otherwise exercise without question, not according to any uniform rule, but so as to make the absolute enjoyment of his own depend upon the arbitrary will of the city authorities, it is invalid, because it fails to furnish a uniform rule of action, and leaves the right of property subject to the will of such authorities, who may exercise it so as to give exclusive profits or privileges to particular persons. Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 13 L. R. A. 587, 28 Am. St. Rep. 180, 28 N. E. 312, and cases cited; Bills v. Goshen, 117 Ind. 221, 3 L. R. A. 261, 20 N. E. 115; *Bessonies v. E. 758, and authorities cited; Noel v. People, 187 Ill. 587, 591, 592, 52 L. R. A. 287, 79 Am. St. Rep. 238, 58 N. E. 616; Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430, 433, 26 N. E. 359; State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 609, 612, 613, 15 L. R. A. 423, 28 Am. St. Rep. 715, 14 S. E. 287, and cases cited; State Center v. Barenstein, 66 Iowa, 249, 23 N. W. 652; *Jacksonville v. Ann. 496, 498, 9 So. 480; May v. People, 1 Colo. App. 157, 27 Pac. 1010.

In Bessonies v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind., at pages 197 and 198, this court said: "Without any provision as to the location or management of hospitals, the ordinance attempts to make it unlawful for anyone to establish or conduct one without a license or permit from the common council and board of aldermen; and the granting or refusal of the license or permit is not governed by any prescribed rules, but rests in such case in the uncontrolled discretion of the common council and board of alderman. It is apparent that, under the ordinance, if valid, the common council and board of aldermen have the power to grant or refuse the license in any given case at their mere pleasure; and that no one can conduct or maintain a hospital within the city, however harmless or beneficial it might be, except by the consent of the common council and board of aldermen. It is not necessary to suppose that the common council and board of aldermen would abuse the power thus assumed by them to grant or refuse the license as they might think . . . for the public good. It is sufficient to say that, if the ordinance is valid, the common council and board of aldermen have it in their power to grant one person a license and refuse another under the same circumstances. No law could be valid which by its terms would authorize the passage of such an ordinance. The 23d section of the Bill of Rights provides that 'the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens.' What the legislature cannot do directly in this respect, it cannot authorize a municipal corporation to do." In Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 116, 117, 13 L. R. A. 587, 28 Am. St. Rep. 180, 28 N. E. 314, this court said: "It seems from the foregoing authorities to be well established that municipal ordinances placing restrictions upon lawful conduct or the lawful use of property must, in order to be valid, specify the rules and conditions to be observed in such conduct or business; and must admit of the exercise of the privilege by all citizens alike who will comply with such rules and conditions; and must not admit of the exercise, or of an opportunity for the exercise, of any arbitrary discrimination by the municipal authorities between citizens who will so comply."

It will be observed that said ordinance requires the use of the particular fender described therein, or some other fender equally as good, to be approved by the common council or street committee. The ordinance, if valid, vests in the common council and street committee an arbitrary discretion, which they may exercise or not at their pleasure. They have the power to approve a fender for use by one street railroad company, and refuse approval of the same fender for use by another company, under the same circumstances and conditions. They also have the power to approve one or more fenders, and refuse approval of other fenders equally as good or better, whether made by the street railroad company or someone else, thus arbitrarily discriminating in favor of some manufacturers and against others. It is the fact that said officers have the power to do this, and not that they will do so, that renders said ordinance invalid.

- I. Scope, 944.
- II. Duty of master to inspect.
 - a. In general, 944.
 - b. When defect is obvious to employee, 948.
 - c. Ordinary tools in every-day use, 949.
 - d. When duty of inspection rests on employee, 950.
 - e. When tool is property of fellow workman, 950.
- III. Right of employee to assume that tools are safe, 950.
- IV. Right to complain of failure to inspect when safe tools are available, 952.

I. Scope.

This note is limited to a consideration of the master's duty to inspect ordinary tools and implements capable of personal use, as distinguished from machinery, and which do not form a component part of some mechanical device.

II. Duty of master to inspect.

a. In general.

It is a well-settled rule of law that the master must use ordinary care to inspect and keep appliances and tools in a reasonably safe condition for the use of his servants.

In McDonald v. Standard Oil Co. 69 N. J. L. 445, 55 Atl. 289, it is said that, among the legal principles fully recognized in the state, one is that, "under the contract of employment, it becomes the master's duty to use reasonable care to provide a proper and safe place in which the servant may work, to furnish suitable tools and implements with which he may work, to inspect and repair the apparatus at reasonable intervals and with ordinary prudence."

New Omaha Thompson-Houston Electric I L.R.A. (N.S.)

the District Court for Bell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Terry and A. H. Culwell, for plaintiff in error:

Where the evidence shows that the railway company had used ordinary care to furnish its servant with a lantern globe that was reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was intended; and that such globe was of standard make and pattern; and that, if there was a defect in the same, it was latent; and that, if plaintiff had taken any precautions he might have discovered its condition,—then no liability is shown against the railway company.

Light Co. v. Rombold (Neb.) 97 N. W. 1030, is not a case exactly in point, but the judge, in delivering the opinion, says that it is not only the duty of the employer to provide suitable tools and appliances in the first instance, but also to use all reasonable care in keeping them safe and serviceable, and to make seasonable inspection of the condition thereof with that end in view.

That reasonable care involves proper inspection is stated in Byrne v. Eastmans Co. 163 N. Y. 463, 57 N. E. 738.

In Boyce v. Schroeder, 21 Ind. App. 28, 51 N. E. 376, where an employee was injured because of the defective condition of a two-wheeled truck which he was using, it is said: The implied undertaking of the master is not that an implement furnished by him is absolutely free from danger in its uses, but that, according to its kind, it is sound and fit for the use to which it is to be put, so far as ordinary care and prudence can discover; and that he will exercise ordinary care and prudence to keep it in such condition.

A foreman in charge of workmen engaged in unloading grindstones from a car is bound to see that a stick used by thrusting it through the hole in the center of the grindstone to prevent it from sliding is ordinarily fit for the purpose for which it is used. It is his duty to use all fair means of knowing that the stick is sufficient for the purpose, to examine it, and to know its strength, to use ordinary care in selecting the stick, and to have ordinary knowledge at least of the strength of wood. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Corcoran, 14 Ohio C. C. 377.

It follows, from the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care in inspection, that he is liable for an injury sustained by a servant, without fault, while using a defective tool, if the defect was discoverable by reasonable inspection.

In an action brought against a railroad company by an employee to recover for injuries sustained by reason of a defective lifting jack, there was some evidence in the record that the jack, on account of its cogs

W. 540; Throckmorton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 14 Tex. Civ. App. 222, 39 S. W. 174; Quintana v. Consolidated Kansas City Smelting & Ref. Co. 14 Tex. Civ. App. 347, 37 S. W. 369; Fordyce v. Yarborough, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 260, 21 S. W. 421.

If the defect in this lantern globe was patent, then plaintiff was in a better position to know and see its condition than any other man in the service, and his failure to so note the defects would preclude recovery herein.

being worn or broken, was sent in to the railroad shops of the company for repairs; and it was held that if, in repairing the worn or broken cogs of the jack, it was, or ought to have been, the practice of the shops, before the jack was sent out for use, to examine and inspect all parts, to ascertain if any other defects existed therein, and any reasonable examination or inspection at the shops would have disclosed the defect which caused the injury, then the company would be negligent in furnishing from its own shops a defective jack for use, even if the defect in the jack was not visible, or even if, after such repairs, a man of ordinary skill, prudence, and diligence would not, by any usual and ordinary inspection, have discovered the defect before the jack broke. Kansas City & P. R. Co. v. Ryan, 52 Kan. 637, 35 Pac. 292.

Where a servant was injured by reason of the splitting of the head of a jackscrew which had been given him to use, and the evidence showed that the injury to the plaintiff was due to the break in the jackscrew; that the break had begun before the jackscrew was given to the plaintiff for use; that the defect would have been discovered upon reasonable inspection; and that no such inspection was made,—it was held that from these facts the jury might find negligence on the part of the master; and a judgment in favor of the servant was affirmed. Kennedy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 57 Minn. 227, 58 N. W. 878.

In an action to recover for injuries sustained by a workman struck by a maul which slipped from the handle while in use by a fellow workman, the question of the master's negligence in permitting the maul to become loose, and to be used in that condition, is properly submitted to the jury on proof that the maul was wedged by one small wire nail only, which was insufficient, and that wedging was necessary, and that all handles were wedged when placed in the maul. Deckerd v. Wabash R. Co. 111 Mo. App. 117, 85 S. W. 982.

Plaintiff ought not to be permitted to recover, for the reason that he had equal knowledge with the defendant company of the condition of the lantern globe, and he owed the duty to himself to use ordinary care in his own behalf.

screw with a crowbar which broke, whereby he was precipitated from an elevated position, is entitled to recover for the injury sustained, where the crowbar had been injured by fire several days previously, and a reasonable inspection by the master would have disclosed its defective condition. Miller v. Great Northern R. Co. 85 Minn. 272, 88 N. W. 758.

An inexperienced employee in the service of a railroad company was directed to line rails on a bridge on its road, and furnished with a chisel bar which was straight without any curve at the end, whereas he should have had a pinch bar, with a curved end, and, by reason of its being an improper instrument, it slipped in doing the work, and he was injured. A judgment for the plaintiff under these circumstances was reversed for another reason; but in the opinion in the case the court said: "If the master knows, or would have known if he had used ordinary care to ascertain the fact, that the tools which he provides for the use of his servant are unsafe, and his servant, without contributory fault, suffers injury thereby, the master is liable therefor." Smith v. Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 65 S. W. 83.

In Reichla v. Gruensfelder, 52 Mo. App. 43, where it was alleged that the master had furnished the servant unsuitable and defective wrenches with which to do the work required, the court said: If the servant complains of defects in the instrumentalities of the business, he must show that the defects complained of were not obvious, and were unknown to him, and that the master had knowledge thereof, or might have had by ordinary inspection.

A workman on the section force of a railroad was engaged in drawing spikes from railroad ties, to do which he inserted a clawbar under the head of the spike, and, when the spike was driven so tight that it would not take the clawbar, a fellow workman drove it under with a stroke of a highly tempered spike maul, a splinter from which struck the eye of the person holding the upon the master, and the master cannot shift this duty from himself to the servant by rules, bulletins, etc.

On petition for rehearing.

The ordinarily prudent man would certainly exercise a greater degree of vigilance in providing and keeping in proper condition a signal lantern designed to be used by his servant in the protection of a railway train than he would in furnishing a lantern to his servant to be used to give light while at work around his premises.

How can this court say, as a matter of clawbar and caused him a serious injury. The court instructed the jury that it was the duty of the master to furnish safe and suitable tools to its workmen, and that, if it failed to do so, and the defect in the spike maul was known to the master, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care, and the workman did not know of such defect, then they should find for the plaintiff; and this, on appeal, was affirmed. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Roberts, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1160, 70 S. W. 833.

In an action for an injury caused by a defective tool, an instruction that, if the jury believed that the plaintiff, who was employed by the defendant railroad company as section foreman or boss, was, while in the discharge of his duties as such employee, without carelessness or negligence on his part which contributed directly thereto, struck in his right eye by a piece of steel or iron flying off from a large hammer furnished him to use in the work of cutting iron rails, and that the hammer was unreasonably unsafe and unsound to use for the purpose for which it was furnished, and that the defective and unsafe condition of said hammer was unknown to the employee, and could not have been known to him by ordinary care or caution on his part, but was known to the employer, or might have been known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence on its part, or its servant or agent who made or repaired it, they must find the issue for the plaintiff,—was upheld. Johnson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 96 Mo. 340, 9 Am. St. Rep. 351, 9 S. W. 790.

In Morris v. Eastern R. Co. 88 Minn. 112, 92 N. W. 535, it was held on demurrer that a cause of action was stated by a complaint alleging that the defendant company carelessly and negligently provided for the use of a minor in its employment a "flogging hammer" so called, to be used by him and a coemployee in connection with a side set (a cold chisel with a handle attached), in cut-law, that no duty of inspection of such lantern rests upon the railway company?

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Larkin had served as a fireman for about eight months prior to his injury. Upon each locomotive there were two lamps,—one white and the other red; the latter be-ting off rivets from the tank frame of a locomotive tender, in the shop in which they worked; that this hammer was manufactured by the company itself; that it was defective and dangerous, in that the surface of its head was not smooth, and contained several holes or indentations which made it a dangerous, unsafe, and unfit tool; that these defects were the result of careless and improper manufacture; that, during the process of manufacturing, the defendant could readily have discovered these holes or indentations, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence; that, had said hammer been properly inspected by experienced men before it was turned over to defendant's employees, these defects could have been discovered readily; and that the injury complained of was caused by the defect stated.

A master is liable to a servant injured by the breaking of the hickory handle of a hammer, which the master had neglected to inspect, where such wood, when cut green and left with the bark on, is liable to become decayed and worm-eaten, and the master could, by a reasonably prudent and careful inspection of the handle of the hammer, have ascertained the fact that it had been cut for so long a time as to render it unsafe for use. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Amos, 20 Ind. App. 378, 49 N. E. 854.

It is the duty of the master to inspect tools furnished his employees, and he is liable to one injured by being struck by the head of a maul which flew from its handle when wielded by a fellow workman, if the maul was originally defective, or the master had notice of its defective condition after it became so and allowed it to be used, or, perhaps, left it where it was liable to be used, or if he would have had notice of its defective condition if there had been a proper inspection of the tools, had there been an opportunity for such inspection after it became defective. Dwyer v. Shaw, 22 R. I. 648, 50 Atl. 389.

ing intended for use at night in giving signals. Larkin had been running upon this engine for three days, and had used the same lantern during that time, unless it had been changed the night before his injury, while the engine was in the roundhouse at Temple. He had the exclusive possession and control of the lantern, and it was his duty to keep it clean and see that it was in proper condition for use. No other person was authorized to clean it. The lantern was usually left upon the engine when the latter was not in service. There was no evidence that the railroad company caused this lantern to be inspected. While on the engine in the daytime, running from the town of Temple to Cleburne, Larkin undertook to clean the globe of the red lantern; and in doing so the glass globe broke and cut his left wrist, severing the tendons, from which injury his hand became seriously affected, by drawing down and stiffening of the fingers. Upon a trial in the district court of Bell county, Larkin recovered a judgment against the railroad company, which was affirmed by the court of civil appeals.

The railroad company at the trial asked the court to give to the jury the following charge, which was refused by the court: "The jury is charged that, the plaintiff having failed to show that he was injured by or through any act of negligence on the part of the defendant, you will return a verdict for the defendant."

The only negligence charged against the plaintiff in error is that it failed to have the lantern which was furnished to the plaintiff inspected before furnishing it, or after it had been furnished, and while he was using it. Inspection is only the means by which the master exercises the care required of him for the servant's protection. It is not the duty of a railroad company to inspect

It is the duty of a master to keep and maintain a crucible in which molten metal is carried in a reasonably safe condition for use; and a servant may recover for injuries due to a defect in the crucible, of which the servant had no knowledge, and could not have known by the use of ordinary care, but of which the master had knowledge, or might have known by the exercise of ordinary care. Ahrens & O. Mfg. Co. v. Rellihan, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 919, 82 S. W. 993.

But an iron moulder injured by reason of the breaking of the handle of a ladle containing molten iron which he was assisting in carrying, whereby the molten metal was spilled upon him, is not entitled to recover in the absence of evidence that the defect was an obvious one which the master might have discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. Reilly v. Campbell, 8 C. C. A. 438, 20 U. S. App. 334, 59 Fed. 990.

In McGrath v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 69 N. J. L. 331, 55 Atl. 242, an employee who placed a "sprag" or wedge-shaped piece of oak wood on the track in front of a car to stop it, as was customary, was injured because the sprag, being rotten, broke, allowing the car wheel to run over his hand. It was held that, if the master, for the sole object of a test, had caused the block of which the sprag was made to be sawed in five separate dimensions, i. e., with the grain, across the grain, and obliquely, besides two lateral cuts but 2 inches apart, without disclosing any defect, it could scarcely be said that he had not used ordinary care to acquaint himself with the structure of the material he was using; and, it appearing that this was exactly what was done in the course of the manufacture of the sprag, the judgment of the supreme court rendered in favor of the master was affirmed.

There was a strong dissent in which three of the judges joined, the one writing a short opinion saying that the fact that the sprag was unsound, as shown by the rottenness of the wood fibers when examined after the accident, was proved and hardly disputed at the trial; that the opinion of the court demonstrates the great probability, if not the certainty, that such unsoundness would be disclosed by the various sections to which the material had been subjected in making the sprag, and that, this being so, two questions remain: First, whether it could reasonably be decided that the maker of the sprag, who was the alter ego of the master, and a worker in wood, would have perceived the defect and discarded the material if he had exercised due care in the process of manufacture, and a due regard for the safety of those who were to use the sprag; and, second, whether it could reasonably be decided that the defect might have escaped the observation of the servant, even though he exercised due care in using the sprag. That considering, on the one hand, the ample opportunity for examination afforded to the manufacturer, and the high degree of care required of him, in view of the serious danger incurred by the use of a rotten sprag, and, on the other hand, the right of the user to presume that sound material had been employed, and the slight opportunity for observation afforded to him as he picked up the sprag to stop an advancing car, it was lawful to submit each of these questions to the jury, and that the jury had the legal right to decide both of them in favor of the servant.

In Clements v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 127 Ala. 166, 28 So. 643, the plaintiff, who was employed as a member of the defendant company's bridge crew, was thrown from the trestle or bridge on which he stood and injured while using a steel bar to put the track in alignment. It was alleged that the steel bar which was furnished the plaintiff for use was blunt, dull, and in defective condition, but there was no averment that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, every implement or tool that it furnishes to its employees, but that duty arises whenever the machinery or implement is of such character that a man of ordinary prudence would, under the same circumstances, inspect the machinery or implement as a precaution against injury to the servant. If an individual, being an ordinarily prudent man, would not have inspected the lantern before furnishing it to the servant, or after it had been furnished and while it was in use, then the railroad company was not required to do so in this case. A master is not required to inspect the common tools and appliances which are committed to the custody of a servant who has the capacity to understand their character and uses. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 89; Miller v. Erie R.

Co. 21 App. Div. 45, 47 N. Y. Supp. 285; Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56; Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. 118 Mich. 275, 76 N. W. 497. In Miller v. Erie R. Co. a switchman was engaged in aiding to move some cars by means of a push pole, which broke, by which he was injured. In a suit for damages it was alleged that the railroad company failed to have the pole inspected, and was therefore negligent. The supreme court of the New York appellate division said: "There is no duty resting on an employer to inspect, during their use, those common tools and appliances with which everyone is conversant. If a spade, a hoe, or a push stick either wears out or becomes defective, the employer may ordinarily rely on the presump-that the bar was unsafe and unsuitable for the purpose for which it was furnished to be used, and a demurrer to the complaint was upheld.

See note on "Knowledge as an element of an employer's liability to an injured servant," in 41 L. R. A. 33, subdivisions VII. and VIII. of which treat of the master's duty of, active inspection of instrumentalities when first used and while in use.

But inspection need not be attempted when it would be inefficient or is impracticable.

One of the questions in Shea v. Wellington, 163 Mass. 364, 40 N. E. 173, was whether there was evidence of negligence on the part of the master in failing to have certain instruments known as exploders of dynamite cartridges used in blasting rock inspected after he had bought them and before they were used. It was shown that he had procured the best article of its kind, manufactured by a reputable company, and the court directed a verdict for the master on the grounds that it was obvious that an inspection could not be effectively made unless a skilled expert was employed, possessed of the mechanical and chemical knowledge involved in the manufacture of the exploders, and because, upon the admitted facts, the exploders were manufactured with a view of rendering such inspection unnecessary, being composed of dangerous chemicals put up in boxes to be sold in the market, and to be used as they were purchased by quarrymen, who would not be competent to inspect them.

b. When defect is obvious to employee.

If, however, the defect which caused the injury was one apparent upon ordinary inspection by the employee, or one within the power of a reasonably careful employee to discover, his failure so to do is negligence which will preclude him from complaining of the master's failure to inspect.

In McGrath v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 68 N. J. L. 425, 53 Atl. 207, it appeared that, on occasions when cars could not be stopped by the use of a brake, it was the custom of the company and the duty of the employee and other servants to use what was called a "sprag" to bring them to a standstill. This sprag was a wedge-shaped piece of oak wood, and was placed on the track in front of the wheel. On the day of the accident the plaintiff saw a car coming down the dock, in the direction of the chute where it was intended to be stopped, and saw that the brakeman in charge of it was not able to control it, and that it would overrun the chute. In order to prevent this from occurring he took up a sprag, which he had previously selected, from among those furnished by the company to its employees, and placed it upon the track in front of the wheel of the car. The sprag, although new, being rotten, broke, and the wheel ran over his hand crushing it. It was held that, while the master's duty to furnish a proper implement for the purposes intended was undoubted, yet, inasmuch as the employee, by an ordinary inspection, could have seen that the sprag was rotten, he was not entitled to recover for his injury. The court says in its opinion that, although the master is bound to use reasonable care in the selection of the appliances to be used by the servant, and to make proper inspection thereof, yet this does not absolve the latter from all responsibility with relation to their condition. The duty of self-protection requires him to make such inspection of the appliances furnished to him for his work as will disclose to him any obvious defect therein, and to exercise a proper watchfulness to see that, during use, they do not become so defective as to be more dangerous than they otherwise would be. Failure to do this is negligence on his part which will prevent a recovery for an injury received.

It is as much the duty of the employee as of the employer to have a pike pole used in bracing electric-light poles sharpened and repaired when necessary, provided the means are furnished by the master with which the repairing may be done. A reasonably prudent employer performs his duty by furnishing proper pike poles, and a reasonably tion that those using the article will first detect its defect." [21 App. Div. 46.] In the case of Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. the injured party was using a ladder which was defective, through which defects he was injured. The supreme court of Michigan said: "In heavy or complicated machinery, and where the person called upon to use the appliance may not possess the skill to detect unfitness, or the opportunities to do so, the law may require diligence upon the part of the master; but where the appliance is a common tool, of which the man who uses it is necessarily well qualified to judge, and, who, when he uses it, has an opportunity to know its condition, a distinction may be made, and the master may rely upon the servant to inform him of the defect, or not use the tool if it is unsafe."

The undisputed evidence in this case shows that the railroad company purchased its lanterns from reliable manufacturers, and that they were of good and standard make. It was not proved that this particular globe was inspected, but the evidence, which was undisputed, shows that actual inspection was made of a large per cent of the globes which were purchased. But we are of opinion that no ordinarily prudent man who is buying a lantern for use upon his own premises, in the ordinary affairs of life, would think of going into a minute examination of it to detect some latent defect; nor could it be said that such man, after purchasing the lantern and delivprudent employee would not use a pike pole after the point has become dull and blunt. Towne v. United Electric Gas & Power Co. 146 Cal. 766, 70 L. R. A. 214, 81 Pac. 124. The court said: "It is the duty of the employee to use ordinary care and skill, and it certainly is the duty of the employee to know whether the tools with which he is working have become dull or in need of sharpening. Having eyes, he must use them, and, being informed, he must act upon the information."

That the employee may not recover if the defect was an obvious one is also incidentally recognized in the following cases: Reichla v. Gruensfelder, 52 Mo. App. 43; Johnson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 96 Mo. 340, 9 Am. St. Rep. 351, 9 S. W. 790,—supra, II. a; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Leverett, 48 Ark. 333, 3 Am. St. Rep. 230, 3 S. W. 50; Indiana Natural & Illuminating Gas Co. v. Marshall, 22 Ind. App. 121, 52 N. E. 232; Galveston, H. & N. R. Co. v. Newport, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 583, 65 S. W. 657; Guthrie v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 11 Lea, 372, 47 Am. Rep. 286,—infra, III.

c. Ordinary tools in every-day use.

In a few instances the courts have made a distinction in regard to what they call the small and common tools in every-day use, and have held the master relieved from responsibility for their freedom from dangerous defects, on the theory that the employee, being in the habit of using them, is as much or more familiar with their nature and construction than the master himself, and, therefore, that in the employee, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, lies the duty of their inspection.

It has been held that the master's duty of periodical inspection does not extend to the small and common tools in every-day use, of the fitness of which for use the servants who use them may reasonably be supposed to be better judges than the master, or any person that he can employ for the purpose of inspection. Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. 118 Mich. 275, 76 N. W. 497.

So, in Miller v. Erie R. Co. 21 App. Div. 45, 47 N. Y. Supp. 285, where it appeared that the plaintiff, while engaged in the work of shifting cars, used what was known as a push pole, which proved to be defective, a charge by the trial court that "proper inspection for the purpose of discovering defects which may arise from use is part of the duty which the company owed the plaintiff, as well as reasonable inspection to determine its fitness before it was used,"—was held to be improper, as instructing the jury that they might find the defendant negligent in failing subsequently to inspect the pole; and it was held that there was no duty resting on the employer to inspect during their use those common tools and appliances with which everyone is conversant. The court said further: "If a spade, a hoe, or a push stick either wears out or becomes defective, the employer may ordinarily rely on the presumption that those using the article will first detect its defect."

In Garnett v. Phoenix Bridge Co. 98 Fed. 192, it was held that an employee who endeavored to turn a nut with a wrench, and who set the wrench on the nut, which was about 2 feet above his head, and pulled with his right hand on the end of a piece of pipe with which he had enlarged the leverage of the wrench, which opened in the jaw, in consequence of which he fell from the trestle on which he was standing, and was seriously hurt, could not recover of his employer on the ground that the instrument furnished him was an improper tool. The reason given for the decision by the court is as follows: "The knives of a planing machine, the saws of a sawmill, the revolving wheels of a factory, and many other mechanical devices and accessories, are, in their nature, dangerous, and therefore the employer is justly required to adopt proper measures for the protection of those engaged in and about their operation; but the notion that the conductors of the vast industrial enterprises which distinguish our age and country are deficient in ordinary prudence if they do not take care that none of the many to whom they give employment shall be hurt through the breaking instruction that, if they found the tool inspector furnished the servant the hammer, they should take into account that circumstance, in deciding whether the latter was excused from not discovering or knowing its defects; and further, that, where the master employs an agent or inspector to care for and inspect its tools, and the servant is given a tool by such inspector, the servant has a right to presume it to be in proper condition,—reasonably safe for use,—were upheld.

IV. Right to complain of failure to inspect when safe tools are available.

A servant who uses a defective tool or improper implement when a suitable one is at hand cannot complain that the master has failed to inspect the appliance used.

Thus, in O'Brien v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 36 Tex. Civ. App. 528, 82 S. W. 319, where a railroad employee used a worn-out wrench which had been left about the premises, although a tool house containing suitable tools was near at hand, and was injured, the court denied that any duty of inspection rested on the employer.

In Hefferen v. Northern P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 471, 48 N. W. 1, 526, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was a minor, had been at work for the defendant company for two years and a half, doing various kinds of work, and on the occasion when the accident occurred, which was the subject of the action, he was directed by the foreman of the defendant to go to work with another workman cutting off the heads of rivets on the tank of a locomotive. For this purpose a tool was used known as a "side set." It was made of steel and had a cutting edge, and the opposite side, which the court designated as the "head," was formed for and intended to receive the blow of a hammer. While the plaintiff was holding the side set and the other man was using the hammer, a thin scale of steel broke from the head of the side set as the hammer fell upon it, and was driven into the plaintiff's eye. The uncontradicted evidence in the case showed that the defendant kept a tool repairer in the shops, whose business it was to repair the tools; and kept a full supply of tools of this kind in the closet and scattered about the shop; that when a workman was to use a tool he would get it for himself, selecting such as he required; and that, when a workman found that a tool needed to be repaired, he would take it to the tool repairer for that purpose, and there was nothing to show that in selecting the tools for use the workman had not the opportunity to act deliberately, and select such as might be fit for use in the work to be done. In view of all these facts, it was held that a judgment for the plaintiff must be reversed.

A servant, who, while engaged with others in making holes through a plate or section of boiler iron, was struck in the eye by a piece of steel which flew from a sledge hammer wielded by one of his fellow workmen, is not entitled to recover when the improper or dangerous condition of the tool would have been disclosed by inspection, and the use of the particular hammer was not directed or obligatory, but a suitable one was available, and there was a tool repairer in the shop whose special business it was to repair the tools. Rawley v. Colliau, 90 Mich. 31, 51 N. W. 350.

An experienced machinist injured by the slipping of a dull pinch bar which he had selected for the purpose of attempting to move a locomotive in a roundhouse is not entitled to recover. The rule that the master must furnish proper, perfect, and adequate tools and appliances for the proposed work is not applicable where the servant has knowledge equaling that of the master of the machinery or appliances employed in the performance of the work devolving upon him, or when, by reasonable attention, he might have such knowledge. This is especially true when the servant has the selection of the tools and appliances with which his work is to be done. A pinch bar is a simple mechanical tool. By inattention to its condition a servant takes upon himself the risk of there being some defect in it. Holt v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 94 Wis. 596, 69 N. W. 352. A. W. R.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

HIRAM L. HART, Appt.

v.

CITY OF NEILLSVILLE, Respt.

(.... Wis.)

1. Drains—defective plan.

A city having, by its governing body, duly adopted a plan for a sewerage system, and executed the same, it is not liable for injuries caused thereby to private property, not involving an unconstitutional taking thereof, produced by defects in such plan.

2. Same.

The basic principle of the rule aforesaid is that the due adoption of the plan re-

Headnotes by MARSHALL, J.

Case Note.—The court in the above case, by placing the liability of the municipality upon the ground that no plans of drainage had in fact been adopted by the municipal authorities, and thereby avoiding the conflict between the decisions absolving the municipality from liability for injuries resulting from a defective plan of drainage and those holding that such nonliability does not exist unless the plan has been adopted by competent authorities, finds a very narrow resting place, and one which could exist only on rare occasions. The adoption of plans is one of the first things to be done in case of any drainage improvement. It is absolutely necessary if the cost is to be placed on the abutting property owners, and it quires the exercise by the governing body of the city of discretionary authority of a quasi judicial nature.

3. Same—absence of plan.

In case a city constructs a sewerage system, not according to any plan, or according to any plan adopted in the manner aforesaid, the rule stated does not apply.

4. Pleading—construction.

Where a pleading is open to construction, that reasonable meaning which will support it should be adopted, rather than one which will defeat it.

5. Drains—knowledge of defects.

Though a city is not liable for damages to private property caused by mere defects in the plan of its duly adopted and executed sewerage system, if it acquires knowledge of such defects, and that, unless they are remedied, they will produce direct injury to private rights, it should exercise ordinary care to prevent such a result, and is responsible for damages caused by failure in that regard.

6. Same—connection—injury.

If, by reason of defects in a plan of sewerage contemplating that private property will, as a matter of right, be connected therewith, such property is injured because of water accumulated in a sewer flowing therefrom, through such a connection to such property, the injury is direct within the meaning of the last foregoing rule.

7. Same—effect of connection.

Where, as a matter of right, a private drain is constructed, connecting private property with a main sewer through an opening left by the city therefor, and damages result to such property by accumulated sewage flowing from such sewer to such property, would probably be necessary in case public funds were to be expended therefor. Farnham, Waters, p. 1020.

Therefore, the cases would be rare where no plans had been adopted. The cases seem to agree, however, that, if in any case a municipality can be relieved from liability notwithstanding defective plans, it must have exercised the power given it, and not attempted to delegate the formation of the plans or adopt those devised by others. Allen v. Boston, 159 Mass. 324, 38 Am. St. Rep. 423, 34 N. E. 519; Ft. Wayne v. Coombs, 107 Ind. 75, 57 Am. Rep. 82, 7 N. E. 743.

The great weight of authority is in favor of the rule that, if the municipality commits a direct trespass upon the property of a private individual, although it is in consequence of the adoption of a plan, its judicial discretion will not save it from liability therefor. As stated in Farnham, Waters, p. 1136, it has no discretion to commit a trespass, and, if the plans adopted by it necessarily result in so doing, it is just as liable as though it deliberately turned the water out of its course onto the abutting land. Dixon v. Baker, 65 Ill. 518, 16 Am. Rep. 591; Lehn v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 76, 4 Pac. 965; Seaman v. Marshall, 116 Mich. 327, 74 N. W. 484; Van Pelt v. Davenport, 42 Iowa, 308, 20 Am. Rep. 622; King v. Kansas City, 58 Kan. 334, 49 Pac. 88. Even the Wisconsin court seems to have given its assent to this doctrine in Schroeder v. Baraboo, 93 Wis. 95, 67 N. W. 27, in holding that a municipal corporation is liable for damages caused by the overflowing of property by reason of the insufficiency of the catch basin of a sewer, unless such insufficiency is due to an extraordinary storm such as a person of ordinary prudence would not anticipate and provide against.

Even when a direct trespass is not committed on the abutting property there is a strong tendency on the part of the courts to hold that it is not sufficient that the plan should be adopted by the municipal authorities, unless they were competent to deal with the question, and had such technical knowledge that their decision would be regarded as an intelligent one.

Farnham, Waters, p. 1140, states that members of a common council, having no expert knowledge of the size of pipe necessary to carry a certain quantity of water, cannot be permitted to determine that water from a certain section shall all be made to flow in one direction, and that a pipe of a certain size shall be provided to carry it away, when such pipe may be entirely inadequate for the purpose.

Upon this point, in addition to the cases cited in the opinion in HART v. NEILLSVILLE, see Harrigan v. Wilmington, 8 Houst. (Del.) 140, 12 Atl. 779.

Herring v. District of Columbia, 2 Mackey, 87, states that carelessness in the selection of an agent to prepare the plans is as much a ground for liability on the part of the municipality as is negligence in the construction of the work.

The decisions absolving the municipality from liability in case a plan has been selected are mostly founded on the English doctrine, in which the power of Parliament is absolute, and its authorization of the selection of a plan sufficient to absolve the municipality from all liability (Dixon v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 418); or on the peculiar New England theory that the officers in charge of the work are not the servants of the municipality, so that it is not liable for their acts. Thus, Boston Belting Co. v. Boston, 149 Mass. 44, 23 N. E. 320, states that the reason for exempting a municipal corporation from liability for injuries caused by a defect in the plan or system of sewerage built by order of the mayor and aldermen is that the mayor and aldermen, in laying out sewers, act as an independent body of officers, and that the city has no control over, and no responsibility for, the plan or system adopted. This theory is quite general in the New England states, as will be seen by consultation of Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41, 81 Am. Dec. 680; Bulger v. Eden, 82 Me. 352, 9 L. R. A. 205, 19 Atl. 829; Willett v. St. Albans, 69 Vt. 330, 38 Atl. 72.

the mere circumstance that without such drain no such result would have happened will not save the municipality from liability for such damages.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Clark County sustaining a demurrer to a complaint filed to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by the wrongful construction and maintenance of a sewer. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

This is an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency. The material facts stated in the pleading for a cause of action are these: For more than twenty years last past plaintiff has owned and occupied as a family home lots 5, 6, 16, 17, 18, and 19, block 8, Hewitt's addition to the city of Neillsville. Under all parts of the dwelling house thereon there is a basement walled up with stone, and a well adjacent thereto upon which the family depend for a water supply. From time to time prior to July 3, 1903, without having adopted any system therefor, said city, by its authorized officers, constructed a sewer system and maintained the same to drain property abutting upon some of its streets. In July, 1902, at the expense of the owners of abutting property said city constructed a sewer along the street in front of plaintiff's lots for the purpose of draining such abutting property, plaintiff paying the cost thereof apportioned to his lots. An opening was left in such sewer to enable him to connect therewith a drain leading from his basement thereto. In October thereafter such connection was made. The sewer system of the city was negligently constructed and maintained in that no plan was adopted therefor by the city; the pipe on the street last mentioned from the outlet thereof was too small to properly dispose of the sewage turned into it; catch basins were so placed as to direct into the sewer surface water much in excess of its capacity, the sewer was not laid at a proper slope to make it efficient, a part of the sewer system was so constructed as to turn surface water flowing down a ravine known as "Goose creek" into it, to such an extent as of itself to fill the pipe so that the added water from catch basins and ordinary drainage necessarily caused sewage to back up into the sewer in front of plaintiff's premises and through the pipe leading to his property into his basement. By reason of such defects, at various times between July 3, 1903, and March 24, 1904, such basement and the well aforesaid were flooded from the sewer, rendering the well useless and the home for considerable periods of time untenable, and at other times unsuitable for residence purposes, causing the basement wall under the house to settle and to a considerable extent to fall, and the house to settle and crack and otherwise to be injuriously affected, to his damage in the sum of $1,500. The defendant knew during the time of the construction of the sewer system that it was not proceeding according to any plan having regard to the work that would be required of such system; that the work was being negligently done, and that the system would be inefficient. After the system was constructed the defendant had notice of the insufficiency aforesaid which caused the damage complained of, and that such damages could be prevented by diverting the waters of "Goose creek" from flowing into the sewer pipes, and enlarging the main pipe at the outlet leading into O'Neill creek. When plaintiff connected his basement with the sewer, as aforesaid, he did not know of any of the defects which thereafter caused the damages complained of. He was careful at all times to guard against his property being damaged in the manner in which it was. The damages were caused wholly by the negligence of the defendant, as stated.

Mr. James Wickham, with Messrs. Mars. & Schoengarth, for appellant:

A city is liable for damages caused by its negligence either in its construction or maintenance of a sewer.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned trial court held the complaint to be fatally defective, supposing, from the facts alleged, that the injuries complained of were produced by defects in the original plan of the sewer; and that, since such defects were rendered injuriously operative as to appellant's property by his voluntary act in connecting his private drain with the main sewer, the result was not referable to any fault of the respondent. The reasoning which resulted in such conclusions is embodied in an elaborate opinion by the judge containing a careful review of numerous authorities supposed to be in point.

While the law is well settled that, in case the governing body of a city, duly authorized thereto by its charter, adopts a plan for a sewerage system and executes the same, it is immune from injuries resulting to private property, not involving an unconstitutional taking thereof, but which are referable to defects in the plan itself (Gilluly v. Madison, 63 Wis. 518, 53 Am. Rep. 299, 24 N. W. 137; Champion v. Crandon, 84 Wis. 405, 19 L. R. A. 856, 54 N. W. 775; Schroeder v. Baraboo, 93 Wis. 95, 67 N. W. 27; Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41, 81 Am. Dec. 680; Johnston v. District of Columbia, 118 U. S. 19, 30 L. ed. 75, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 923; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 1051), the mere circumstance of the construction of a sewerage system by the properly authorized officers of a city does not satisfy that rule. The basic principle thereof is that, discretionary authority being vested in the governing body of a city to adopt a plan for a system of sewage, defects in a plan so adopted are referable to mere errors in judgment, and, as regards resulting liability for injuries to private rights, are governed by the same rule as mistakes generally in the exercise of quasi judicial authority. It follows necessarily that where such authority is not exercised at all, where, though a system of sewage is constructed by a city without any plan therefor, passed upon and adopted by the governing body of the corporation, the reason for exempting it from liability for defects attributable to faults in the plan does not exist. It is not the mere construction of a sewage system by a city which exempts the corporation from liability for injuries caused by its operation growing out of defects in the plan thereof, but such construction according to a plan stamped with judicial approval, so as to speak, of the proper governing body.

It has been held, as indicated by cases cited by appellant's counsel, that, in order to satisfy the rule stated, the city council must not only adopt a plan, but do so with sufficient care to warrant the belief that legal discretion was exercised in the matter; that action in reckless disregard of consequences, as by adopting a palpably defective plan, or adopting one without the aid of some skilled person, where that in all reason is required, cannot reasonably be attributed to mere error of judgment. Louisville v. Norris, 111 Ky. 903, 98 Am. St. Rep. 437, 64 S. W. 958; Terre Haute v. Hudnut, 112 Ind. 542, 13 N. E. 686.

The sufficiency of the complaint before us does not depend upon our going to the length of the two cases last cited. It states plainly that the system of sewage was not constructed according to any plan adopted by the city; that, on the contrary, the city negligently failed to adopt any plan.

The trial court held contrary to the foregoing upon the theory that the allegation in respect to failure to adopt a plan was intended merely to charge that the city did not employ a skilled engineer and have a plan laid out on paper and filed with the city clerk. We are unable to appreciate how such a meaning can be read out of the pleading. It seems to have been supposed that the allegation that the sewerage system was constructed part at one time and part at another, is so inconsistent with its not having been constructed according to any plan adopted by the city, that the pleader's purpose must have been to charge mere failure to cause a diagram to be made by a skilled person and filed. We cannot so construe the pleading. The more reasonable view seems to be, that the pleader, in charging municipal neglect to adopt a plan for the sewerage system, had in mind such a plan as, if it had been adopted, would exempt the city from liability for defects in respect thereto under the familiar rule on the subject. That was the only kind of a plan material to the controversy. If the pleading will reasonably bear the construction which the learned court gave to it, it will also bear the one we have suggested, if indeed it be necessary to resort to construction in order to read that out of the paper. By a familiar rule, the permissible construction which will support a pleading should be adopted rather than one which will defeat it. Miller v. Bayer, 94 Wis. 123, 68 N. W. 869; Ean v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 95 Wis. 69, 69 N. W. 997; Emerson v. Nash (Wis.) 70 L. R. A. 326, 102 N. W. 921.

If we were to come to the same conclusion as did the trial court on the point above discussed, it would not affect the final result, since the complaint states that appellant had no knowledge of the insufficiency of the sewerage system prior to the demonstration thereof by the flooding of his property, as alleged, and that the city had such knowledge prior thereto and failed to remedy the defect, or to make any effort in the matter though there was ample opportunity for efficiently doing so. A mistake of judgment in the adoption of a sewerage system is one thing, inexcusable omission to remedy demonstrated defects in one, liable, in view of the manner in which such system is designed to be used, to directly invade and injure private property, is quite another thing. The former involves mere error of judgment, the latter failure to perform a duty which the city owes to the persons whose property is liable to be so injured. It is not only the duty of a city to exercise ordinary care in constructing its sewerage system but also in maintaining it. That is breached by constructing a system known to be so defective as to necessarily cause injury to private rights, or continuing it without making reasonable efforts to remedy known defects therein, which would otherwise naturally and directly cause such injury. Tate v. St. Paul, 56 Minn. 527, 45 Am. St. Rep. 501, 58 N. W. 158; Evansville v. Decker, 84 Ind. 325, 43 Am. Rep. 86; Seifert v. Brooklyn, 101 N. Y. 136, 54 Am. Rep. 664, 4 N. E. 321. In the last case cited the court said: "We are also of the opinion that the exercise of a judicial or discretionary power, by a municipal corporation, which results in a direct and physical injury to the property of an individual, and which from its nature is liable to be repeated and continuous, but is remediable by a change of plan, or the adoption of prudential measures, renders the corporation liable for such damages as occur in consequence of its continuance of the original cause after notice, and an omission to adopt such remedial measures as experience has shown to be necessary and proper."

That case and the others cited, as also the elementary works on the subject (see 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 243), indicate that only defects in a plan duly adopted for a city sewerage system, which, when put in operation according to the design, result in some direct injury to private rights, is within the rule rendering a city liable for failure to proceed with ordinary care, after notice of the facts, to remedy the matter. However, since, where a sewer is constructed under such circumstances as those stated in the complaint it is designed that the abutting property owners shall connect their property therewith, if the operation of the system with connections thus made, by reason of a defect in the plan of the system, results in water flowing from the sewer to the private property with injurious effects, such injury is direct within the meaning of the cases cited. It was so held, in effect, in Tate v. St. Paul, supra. Judge Thompson in his work (Neg. vol. 5, § 5376) formulated the rule thus: "But even if it were a good answer to make to the injured property owner, that the city had made a mistake in its plan, yet it would not be so after the city had acquired a knowledge of the inadequacy of the plan and of the injury inflicted thereby upon the property owner; since it would be its duty to abate the evil by changing its plan and rectifying its error."

That seems to accord with familiar principles covering the liability of a municipality for negligence. We adopt it. The allegations of the complaint before us call for its application. In the light thereof the pleading states a good cause of action independently of the first subject discussed, unless the contrary must prevail because the defective character of the sewer was rendered operative to the injury of plaintiff's property through the medium of his private drain.

We are unable to approve the decision that, in a case like this, the injured property owner is remediless because of the existence of his private drain. Plaintiff had a legal right to connect his property with the main sewer, as he did. The sewer was constructed partly at his expense with the expectation and design that such connection would be made. An opening therefor was left by the city, which, in effect, represented to him that the connection could safely be made. No negligence whatever can be imputed to plaintiff because of his private drain up to the time he knew a discontinuance thereof was necessary to save his property from being injured. It would be exceedingly unjust to hold, that if a city constructs a sewer in a public street at the expense, in whole or in part, of the owners of abutting property, upon the theory that such property will be specially benefited by the facilities afforded to drain the same by means of a proper connection with the sewer, and the result is that because of defects in the sewer, known to the city to be liable to cause direct injury to such property, such an injury occurs, the corporation can successfully answer the owner's claim for damages by alleging that had such connection not been made such injury would not have happened.

The cases relied upon by the trial court and the respondent's counsel on the subject above discussed we do not find in point. Baxter v. Tripp, 12 R. I. 310, seems to be an authority upon which great reliance is placed. There the property owner was permitted to connect his private drain with the main sewer only upon condition of his "executing to said city a release of all damages which may at any time happen to such estate in any way resulting from such connection." The plaintiff complied with that condition, and his claim for damages was defeated solely on that ground. In Graves v. Olean, 64 App. Div. 598, 72 N. Y. Supp. 799, the overflow from the main sewer occurred at a time of unusually high water, and the decision was placed mainly on that ground. In Sheriff v. Oskaloosa, 120 Iowa, 442, 94 N. W. 904, the recovery was denied because the plaintiff was a mere licensee, and knew when he connected his property with the main sewer that it was insufficient and that by reason thereof injury had resulted from time to time for over a year to property in the vicinity of his premises. In Dermont v. Detroit, 4 Mich. 435, the sewer was not constructed at the expense, in whole or in part, of the owners of abutting property. The plaintiff connected his premises with the sewer as a mere licensee. The decision was grounded on those circumstances. In Roll v. Indianapolis, 52 Ind. 547, the decision turned on the fact that the property owner, as a condition of making his connection with the main sewer, gave a release as in Baxter v. Tripp, supra. In all those cases it was inferentially, at least, held that liability would exist under such facts as are alleged in the complaint before us.

When the precise question we are dealing with was presented for decision in Ft. Wayne v. Coombs, 107 Ind. 75, 57 Am. Rep. 82, 7 N. E. 743, the court said: "We find that the authorities settle this question against the corporation, for it is held, without diversity of opinion, that the municipality is liable in such cases."

See also, on the same point, Semple v. Vicksburg, 62 Miss. 63, 52 Am. Rep. 181; Murphy v. Indianapolis, 158 Ind. 238, 63 N. E. 469; Barton v. Syracuse, 36 N. Y. 54.

The general result of the foregoing is that a city is not liable for injurious consequences to property abutting on a street resulting from connecting such property with a public sewer constructed by the city in such street according to a plan adopted by its governing body,—such injury being referable to defects in such plan, and not, in effect, an unconstitutional taking of such property. That rule does not apply where a sewerage system is constructed without the judgment of the proper body being exercised in the matter in the adoption of a plan for the work, though the system is in fact constructed according to some plan. If a sewer is constructed by a city in one of its streets according to a properly adopted plan, but, by error of judgment, such a plan is defective, so that, when the sewer is put in operation as contemplated, it causes direct injury to private rights, the municipality is liable if, after notice of the defect, it fails to act with reasonable diligence to remedy the same. When the design of a sewerage system constructed by a city is that abutting property owners will connect their premises therewith, and they are required to pay for special benefits to such property by bearing in whole or in part the expenses of the work, and the operation of the sewer results in a direct invasion of such property through the medium of a private drain, the injury thus caused is direct within the meaning of the rule as to the duty of a municipality to use ordinary care to correct known imperfections in its sewerage system liable to cause injury to property lawfully connected therewith. If a property owner exercises his right to connect his premises by a private drain with a public sewer, he not knowing of a defect therein, which by reason of such connection will produce injury to such property, and such injury is caused before he knows of the danger, or, knowing thereof, has reasonable time to guard against the same, his instrumentality in the matter will not preclude him from recovering compensation for the injury, if it is referable to negligence on the part of the city. Negligence in such a case may consist of failure to adopt a plan for the sewer; failure to exercise ordinary care in constructing the same; or failure to act with reasonable promptness to remedy defects in the plan, causing direct injuries to abutting property, after notice of the existence of such defects. These 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) principles require us to hold that the complaint states a good cause of action.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer and further proceed according to law.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLES H. POND, Resp't.,

v.
NEW ROCHELLE WATER COMPANY,
App't.

(.... N. Y.)

Water company—consumer's right to enforce contract.

A consumer may maintain a suit to compel a water company to furnish water at the rates stipulated in the contract between the company and the municipality, made at the time the right to lay mains in the streets was granted to the company.

(January 9, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an interlocutory judgment of a Special Term for Westchester County sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to affirmative matter set up in the answer in a suit to enjoin defendant from compelling plaintiff to pay rates for water in excess of those fixed by a contract between the water company and the municipal corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—The above case is a material contribution to the law governing the relation between a water company operating under contract with the municipality and a private consumer. The general rule, as shown by the cases cited in the appellant's brief, is that, in case a fire results from a breach by the water company of its contract, the private consumer cannot maintain an action upon the contract. The reason for this rule is stated, in Wainright v. Queens County Water Co. 78 Hun, 146, 28 N. Y. Supp. 987, to be that the cases which have permitted one for whose benefit a contract was made to sue thereon have proceeded upon the ground that he was specially named in the contract, or that the promisor received money or property which he agreed to pay over to the beneficiary, or the promisee was under a legal obligation to the beneficiary which the promisor assumed as his own, and thus connected himself with the transaction. The court of appeals now ignores these limitations, and places the right of the consumer upon the broad ground that the contract was made for his benefit, and it will be interesting to know whether that

Mr. Henry G. K. Heath, for respondent:

Where a contract for a valuable consideration contains covenants intended to benefit a certain class not parties to the agreement, but within the contemplation of the parties at the time, who are expressed as a class; and the promisee has some duty or liability to such class, and interest that the covenant be performed,—any person coming within such class may bring an action in his own name, in equity, to compel performance of the covenant against the promisor.

court would permit the private consumer to recover his fire loss for breach of the contract which it permits him to maintain a private action to enforce.

In dealing with the right to recover a fire loss, the court, in Gorrell v. Greensboro Water Supply Co. 124 N. C. 326, 46 L. R. A. 513, 70 Am. St. Rep. 598, 32 S. E. 720, and Duncan v. Owensboro Water Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 35, 12 S. W. 557, placed their ruling upon the ground that the consumer is the real party in interest, and that the contract was made by the municipality as his agent, he furnishing the consideration; and that, therefore, he has the right, upon well-settled principles, to enforce the contract. This would seem to be a more satisfactory ground for the ruling than that adopted in POND v. NEW ROCHELLE WATER COMPANY, since, in order to adopt the rule of the latter case all the limitations which have hitherto been thrown around the doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, must be abandoned.

There would seem to be no ground for denying the right of the consumer to enforce 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the contract so far as delivery of water and rates are concerned, although the court, in Robbins v. Bangor R. & Electric Co. post, 963, seems to place the right of the consumer, in part, at least, upon the theory that the water company, being a public-service corporation, is bound to supply all applicants without discrimination and at reasonable rates. The fact, however, that the consumer may enforce the contract as to supply and rates does not necessarily require a ruling that he can hold the water company liable for fire losses.

Farnham, Waters, p. 846, states that the water company does not undertake to extinguish fires, and that the fire loss cannot be said to be the proximate result of a mere failure to furnish water, and that the rule of damages, which is that they must be such as were within the contemplation of the parties, cannot be held to extend to a liability for the result of a conflagration, although it may be in part due to a breach of the contract to supply water.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellate division, in allowing this appeal, certified two questions, as follows:

(1) Does the complaint in this action state a cause of action? and (2) Is the affirmative matter set up in the answer sufficient in law, upon the face thereof, to constitute a defense in this action? Neither the special term nor the appellate division handed down an opinion, and we are remitted to the record as is frequently the case in appeals from all the departments, without the views of the supreme court.

The plaintiff, a resident of the village of Pelham Manor, Westchester county, and a customer of the defendant water company furnishing the village with its supply of water, seeks in this action a permanent injunction restraining the company from enforcing collection of a water rate in excess of the amount fixed by the existing contract with the village. In October, 1892, the New York & Westchester Water Company supplied private consumers under a written contract, wherein it agreed with present and prospective private consumers to supply water to them at a rate per annum not to exceed $22.50 for each private house and $5 for each private barn. This contract extended to November 1, 1897. On or about October 22, 1894, a franchise was granted to the New York City District Water Supply Company by the village, authorizing the company to lay its mains for the purpose of supplying water; that at the same time a contract under seal was entered into between the village and the company, which contained, among other provisions, a covenant that for and during the term of ten years, from October 22, 1894, and an extension for twenty years thereafter, if voted by the village pursuant to law, it would supply private consumers and corporations in the village with pure and wholesome water at not exceeding the rates then charged by the New York & Westchester Water Company. It further appears that on May 31, 1904, the village voted to extend this contract for thirty years from its original date, October 22, 1894, to October 22, 1924, as permitted by transportation corporations law, § 81 (Birdseye's Rev. Stat. vol. 3, 3d ed. p. 3763), and the contract with the New York City District Water Supply Company was thereby extended for the same period. Some time prior to February 11, 1904, the defendant, New Rochelle Water Company, became the assignee and successor of the rights of the New York City District Water Supply Company, and subject to all its obligations. On February 11, 1904, the defendant notified this plaintiff in writing that it would furnish water to him after April 1st next only upon written application for water to be taken through a meter. This notice was subsequently withdrawn, but later, on or about April 11, 1904, the defendant again sent to this plaintiff a printed notice to the effect that no water would be supplied by the company except through meters on and after October 22, 1904, and at rates largely in excess of those fixed by the contract, to which reference has already been made. On August 1, 1904, the defendant again sent to the plaintiff a printed notice repeating substantially the last above notice. The foregoing statement of facts contains the substance of the complaint.

The defendant served an answer, which was practically a general denial, and pleaded three affirmative defenses. The first defense was, in substance, that compliance with the alleged contract, as claimed by the plaintiff, would amount to a confiscation of the defendant's property and the rights of certain municipalities it was supplying with water, and would work a forfeiture of its franchise; the fixed rate being too low. The second defense alleged that the contract which the plaintiff seeks to enforce is ultra vires. The third defense alleged that the defendant is ready and willing to furnish the inhabitants of the village of Pelham Manor with pure and wholesome water at reasonable rates and cost; that, should the defendant attempt to enforce the alleged contract against the small consumers, it would lead to a multiplicity of suits which it could not successfully defend; that it would be ruinous for the defendant to furnish the large consumers an unlimited supply of water at the rates fixed by the alleged contract, and would amount to a confiscation of its property; that, if the alleged contract is valid and enforceable, it amounts to an exclusive franchise, which the village had no power to grant; that, if the contract was valid, it gave the plaintiff no cause of action.

The plaintiff interposed separate demurrers to each of these affirmative defenses, on the ground that each was insufficient in law upon the face thereof. The appellate division affirmed the interlocutory judgment sustaining the plaintiff's demurrers to the affirmative matter set up in the answer, and sustaining the complaint as stating a cause of action. We agree with the decision of the learned appellate division as above stated, and deem it necessary to discuss only one question of law presented by the pleadings. It is clear that the defendant company rests under a contract obligation extending to October 22, 1924, to furnish the consumers of water in the village of Pelham Manor at a fixed rate per annum. The defendant not only attacks the validity of this contract, but insists that, even if it is an existing and binding obligation, it cannot be enforced at the suit of an individual private consumer. The plaintiff argues that, "where a contract for a valuable consideration contains covenants intended to benefit a certain class not parties to the agreement, but within the contemplation of the parties at the time, who are expressed as a class, and the promisee has some duty or liability to such class, and interest that the covenant be performed, any person coming within such class may bring an action in his own name in equity to compel performance of the covenant against the promisor." In support of this contention the familiar case of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, and other authorities are cited.

In Lawrence v. Fox, supra, there was a money indebtedness due on a day certain from Holly to Lawrence, and, in consideration of the loan from Holly to Fox, the latter agreed to pay his debt to Lawrence. It is obvious that the case cited and other actions at law following it do not present the precise question raised in the case at bar, which is a suit in equity, although a kindred principle is involved. The question may be thus stated: The village of Pelham Manor, in granting privileges to a water company extending over a long period of time, made the same subject to a written contract under seal, having for its object the protection of the present and future private consumers of water. The defendant company, which has been subrogated to all rights and liabilities of the original contracting company, threatened to violate that contract by a printed notice served on a private consumer, the plaintiff, that after a certain day it would no longer abide by the contract rates, but charge a larger amount. The question is, Can the plaintiff, under these circumstances, ask a court of equity to permanently enjoin the defendant from violating the contract and compel it to perform the same? That this action can be maintained is no longer an open question in this state. This court held, in Coster v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 399, that if one person contract, whether with or without seal, with another for the benefit of a third person, such third person may maintain an action on the agreement. At page 411, Folger, J., says: "It is settled in this state, that an agreement made on a valid consideration by one with another, to pay money to a third, can be enforced by the third in his own name. Lawrence v. Fox, supra; Secor v. Lord, 3 Keyes, 525. And, though a distinction has sometimes been made in favor of a simple contract (Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Westchester County Bank, 4 Denio, 97), it is now held that when the agreement is in writing and under seal the same rule prevails. Van Schaick v. Third Ave. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 346; Ricard v. Sanderson, 41 N. Y. 179. Nor need the third person be privy to the consideration. Secor v. Lord, supra. Nor need he be named especially as the person to whom the money is to be paid. In that class of cases which holds that a grantee of mortgaged premises, who takes them subject to the lien of the mortgage, which by words in the deed of conveyance to him he assumes to pay, is personally liable to the holder of the mortgage for the amount of the mortgage debt, no question seems to be made but that the action may be maintained in the holder's name, though the agreement be not made immediately for the benefit of the plaintiff, nor he be named in the deed. Thus, in Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178, 80 Am. Dec. 327, the clause in the deed described the mortgages as held by John Cramer, which mortgages the grantee thereby assumed to pay. And the case last cited was not an action in equity for the foreclosure of the mortgage in which the mortgagor and his grantee were both parties. See page 179 of 24 N. Y., 80 Am. Dec. 327. It was an action to recover a personal judgment against the grantee. The question was distinctly raised that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant. And the decision against the defendant was put, in the language of Denio, J., upon the broad principle that, if one person make a promise to another for the benefit of a third person that third person may maintain an action on the promise." Judge Denio further said, continuing the above quotation (p. 180 of 24 N. Y., p. 329 of 80 Am. Dec.): "Upon that question there has been a good deal of conflict of judicial opinion. As long ago as 1817, Chancellor Kent laid it down as a point decided, and referred to not less than eight English and American cases as sustaining the principle (Cumberland v. Codrington, 3 Johns. Ch. 255, 8 Am. Dec. 492); and since then it has been frequently affirmed by judges, after an attentive examination of cases, as in Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 45, 43 Am. Dec. 726, and in the cases therein referred to."

The case of Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195, illustrates the general principle here involved. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage and to hold liable a grantee who had received a conveyance subject to the mortgage, and which she assumed and agreed to pay. The mortgage was executed in August, 1873, by one Evans, who then owned the mortgaged premises.

He conveyed the same to one Mitchell, and through various mesne conveyances the title came to one Sanborn. In none of these conveyances did the grantee assume to pay the mortgage. Sanborn conveyed the premises to defendant, Harriet B. Turner, by deed, which contained a clause stating that the conveyance was subject to the mortgage, "which mortgage the party hereto of the second part hereby covenants and agrees to pay off and discharge; the same forming part of the consideration thereof." The referee found that Mrs. Turner, by so assuming payment of the mortgage, became personally liable therefor, and directed judgment against her for any deficiency. The general term affirmed this judgment. This court, in reversing the judgment, held that, as Mrs. Turner's grantor was not personally liable to pay the mortgage, her covenant was made with a stranger and could not be enforced. This court said (p. 283 of 69 N. Y., p. 197 of 25 Am. Rep.): "To give a third party who may derive a benefit from the performance of the promise an action, there must be, first, an intent by the promisee to secure some benefit to the third party, and, second, some privity between the two, the promisee and the party to be benefited, and some obligation or duty owing from the former to the latter which would give him a legal or equitable claim to the benefit of the promise, or an equivalent from him personally. It is true there need be no privity between the promisor and the party claiming the benefit of the undertaking, neither is it necessary that the latter should be privy to the consideration of the promise; but it does not follow that a mere volunteer can avail himself of it. A legal obligation or duty of the promisee to him will so connect him with the transaction as to be a substitute for any privity with the promisor, or the consideration of the promise; the obligation of the promisee furnishing an evidence of the intent of the latter to benefit him, and creating a privity by substitution with the promisor. A mere stranger cannot intervene and claim by action the benefit of a contract between other parties. There must be either a new consideration or some prior right or claim against one of the contracting parties by which he has a legal interest in the performance of the agreement." The judgment was reversed in this case because defendant's grantor was not liable to pay the mortgage. If in all the mesne conveyances the grantees had assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage executed by Evans, the mortgagee or his assignee could have enforced the covenant made by the defendant, Mrs. Turner, as it would have been a promise to pay the debt due him, made to one also liable to discharge it.

The general principle that, if one person contracts for the benefit of a third person, such third person may maintain an action on the agreement, has been applied since early in the seventeenth century in a large number of cases; the facts in each differing to some extent. The leading case in England is Dutton v. Pool, 1 Vent. 318, 332, decided in the reign of Charles II. The plaintiff declared in assumpsit that, his wife's father being seised of certain lands now descended to the defendant, and being about to cut £1,000 worth of timber to raise a portion for his daughter, the defendant promised to the father, in consideration that he would forbear to fell the timber, that he would pay the daughter £1,000. After verdict for the plaintiff on nonassumpsit, it was moved in arrest of judgment that the father ought to have brought the action, and not the husband and wife. The court said: "It might be another case if the money had been to have been paid to a stranger; but there is such a nearness of relation between the father and child, and 'tis a kind of debt to the child to be provided for, that the plaintiff is plainly concerned." The judgment was affirmed in the exchequer. 2 Lev. 212, T. Raym. 302. Some criticism having been expressed as to the soundness of this decision, Lord Mansfield said of it, one hundred years later, that it would be difficult to conceive how a doubt could have been entertained about the case. Martyn v. Hind, 2 Cowp. 443, 1 Dougl. 142. The case has been repeatedly followed in this state.

The principle established by this case has been applied to contracts entered into by a father for the benefit of his daughter and by a husband for the benefit of his wife. As to the latter instance, see Buchanan v. Tilden, 158 N. Y. 109, 44 L. R. A. 170, 70 Am. St. Rep. 454, 52 N. E. 724. In the case before us we have a municipality entering into a contract for the benefit of its inhabitants, the object being to supply them with pure and wholesome water at reasonable rates. While there is not presented a domestic relation like that of father and child or husband and wife, yet it cannot be said that this contract was made for the benefit of a stranger. In the case before us the municipality sought to protect its inhabitants, who were at the time of the execution of the contract consumers of water, and those who might thereafter become so, from extortion by a corporation having granted to it a valuable franchise extending over a long period of time. We are of opinion that the complaint states a good cause of action.

The order and interlocutory judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

and the first question answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

CHESTER W. ROBBINS

v.

BANGOR RAILWAY & ELECTRIC COMPANY.

(.... Me.)

1. Water company—contract for supply.

A water company taking the benefit of a contract between a town and its promoters is bound by the obligations of the contract.

2. Same—service and rates.

One who, for the purpose of securing a hydrant contract with a town for fire purposes, agrees to furnish water to its inhabitants at certain rates after obtaining the benefit of the contract, is bound to fulfil the agreement as to service and rates to individual water takers.

3. Mandamus—duties of water company.

Mandamus lies to compel a water company to supply an individual applicant with water at reasonable rates, as part of its public duties, although the relation between the water company and the town and its inhabitants has been the subject of contract.

4. Water company—rates.

A water company may change from a flat to a meter rate if no contract prevents, and the new rates are reasonable and do not discriminate.

5. Same—waste—meter rates.

For unnecessary waste of water, a consumer may be required to pay reasonable meter rates.

6. Same—basis for fixing rates.

The quantity of water used, and the cost of the individual service, are the principal elements for consideration in fixing the charges for water supply, as between individual takers or classes of takers.

7. Same—rates—establishment—usage.

To make the original classification of a building for purposes of water rates, which was continued for a long period of time, controlling as to the rate to be applied at a particular time on the ground of usage, the circumstances must appear to have remained the same.

8. Same—family rates—boarding house.

A contract for water supply, at specified rates, to a dwelling house containing a family, does not apply to a building used primarily as a boarding house, although the family of the keeper lives in it.

(November 20, 1905.)

R EPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition for a writ of mandamus to require defendant to furnish water to petitioner. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clarence Scott, for petitioner:

Mandamus is the proper remedy to be employed by an inhabitant against a private corporation engaged in furnishing commodities for public use,—like gas and water.

Spelling, Inj. & Extra. Rem. § 1592; People v. Manhattan Gaslight Co. 45 Barb. 136; Haugen v. Albina Light & Water Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424, 28 Pac. 244; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Wisdom, 5 Heisk. 125.

Mandamus is the appropriate action to compel the supplying of water.

Water companies are quasi-public, or public, service corporations.

They must serve the public faithfully and impartially, and treat all customers fairly and without unjust discrimination.

Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 60 L. R. A. 856, 54 Atl. 6; Wiemer

Case Note.—The court, in the above case, seems to have avoided some of the difficulty which confronted the court in Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co. ante, 958, by holding that, although the water company is bound to fulfil its agreement as to service and rates to individual water takers, the consumer might maintain a mandamus proceeding to enforce the duty of the corporation, as a public-service corporation, to supply water at reasonable rates; implying that the contract rates were the reasonable ones.

Mandamus is the proper remedy, on behalf of the municipality, to compel the water company to comply with its contract. Farnham, Waters, p. 836. And, in view of the fact that the water company is a public-service corporation, there is no doubt that the private consumer might maintain mandamus to compel it to perform its public duties. Furthermore, as shown by the note to Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co. ante, 958, it would seem that the consumer had sufficient interest as principal in the contract to be entitled to maintain an action to enforce the contract itself so far as the duty of furnishing the water and the rates are concerned.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Petition for a writ of mandamus to require the defendant company to furnish water to the petitioner at a house owned by him, and occupied by a tenant, in Old Town. The case was heard upon the petition and answer, as upon an alternative writ and return, and, at the conclusion of the evidence, the case was reported to this court for its "determination as to whether a peremptory writ of mandamus shall issue, or the petition be dismissed. Some technical questions of procedure and pleading have been argued, but, as the case comes up on report, it is unnecessary to consider them. Pillsbury v. Brown, 82 Me. 450, 9 L. R. A. 94, 19 Atl. 858; Elm City Club v. Howes, 92 Me. 211, 42 Atl. 392; Rush v. Buckley, 100 Me. 322, 61 Atl. 774.

The essential facts are these: On October 16, 1889, Laughton & Clergue were promoters of a water company to be incorporated in Old Town. In fact the organization had been partly perfected at that time, but the approval of the certificate of incorporation by the attorney general was not given until October 24, 1889. October 12, the inhabitants of Old Town, in town meeting assembled, appointed a committee to make a contract with "Laughton & Clergue, or such corporation as Laughton & Clergue may organize, or with any other party or parties, to furnish and supply the town of Old Town with water for proper municipal purposes." October 16th, the committee, acting for the town, entered into a contract with Laughton & Clergue which provided that Laughton & Clergue should organize a corporation, which should accept an assignment of the contract and undertake to carry it out. In the contract the promoters also agreed, among other things, to put in 60 hydrants for the use of the town for fire purposes for a rental named, and to be paid by the town. They also agreed to furnish water for a display fountain, and for certain other public purposes. The fifth paragraph of the contract reads as follows:

"Said first party (the promoters) agrees that the rates for water used in dwelling houses shall not exceed the following: For each dwelling house containing a family of not more than four persons, with one faucet for use within the tenement, $5 per annum; for each additional person in the family, 50 cents per annum; for the first wash hand basin set, $2 per annum; for each additional hand basin, $1 per annum; for one bathing tub, $3 per annum; for each additional bathing tub, $1 per annum; for one water-closet, $3 per annum; for each additional closet, $1 per annum; for a dwelling house occupied by two or more families, each family to pay three fourths of the above rate per annum."

Thereupon Laughton & Clergue completed the organization of the corporation known as the Penobscot Water & Power Company, to which they assigned the contract. The corporation accepted the assignment and assumed and agreed to perform "all the duties and obligations by said Laughton & Clergue to be performed according to the terms of said contract." Among the corporate purposes of the Penobscot Water & Power Co. was "the construction of waterworks and laying of pipes in any place or places, and buying, selling, or leasing of water." The corporation built a system of waterworks in Old Town, and entered upon the business of supplying water to the town under its contract, and to the inhabitants for power and for domestic purposes. Annual or flat rates were fixed by the corporation payable semi-annually, in advance, for the supply of water to dwelling houses according to the terms of the Laughton & Clergue contract, and to hotels, boarding houses, and other buildings and places at other and varying amounts.

June 1, 1891, the Penobscot Water & Power Company conveyed all its franchises and other property to the Public Works Company, by which they were conveyed, April 7, 1905, to the defendant corporation. The business of supplying water to the town or city of Old Town has been carried on continuously by these corporations in succession to the present time. And the water system referred to has been the only source of public water supply for the city or its inhabitants during all this time.

About the beginning of the year 1903, the Public Works Company, then owning the plant, revised and changed its schedule of rates, and thereafter charged customers according to the new schedule. For water supplied to dwelling houses containing families the rates were left unchanged, being the same annual amounts provided for in the Laughton & Clergue contract. All other services were metered, and were charged for monthly, according to the amount of water supplied. The charge for water used for power was 11 cents for the first 10,000 cubic feet, 8 cents for the second 10,000 feet, and 6 cents per 10,000 feet for all water in excess of 20,000 feet in each month. For all other metered service, including hotels and boarding houses, the charge was 25 cents per 100 feet for the first 2,000 feet, 20 cents per 100 feet for the second 2,000 feet, and 15 cents per 100 feet for all water in excess of 4,000 feet in each month.

The petitioner, an inhabitant of Old Town, owned a house on Main street, which was piped for water, and connected with the water company's mains. The house was occupied from time to time by tenants, who kept boarders. From the outset down to 1904, this house was classed as a dwelling house, and the company charged and the petitioners paid the annual flat rates for dwelling houses, which were named in the Laughton & Clergue contract. In the later 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

years, the tenant's own family consisted of five persons. The number of boarders varied, but was estimated by the company. The company charged and the petitioner paid for 15 persons in the family, boarders and all, $5 semiannually. In 1902 or 1903, a water-closet was put into the house for which the petitioner paid at the rate of $5 per annum. Prior to January, 1904, the company complained to the owner of waste of water, through defects in piping and plumbing. It also claimed that the house should properly be classed as a boarding house and pay according to the meter rates established for boarding houses. About the beginning of 1904 the company notified the petitioner of its intention to put in a meter. A meter was put in April 6, 1904. In May following, a bill was rendered to the petitioner for flat rates from January 1, 1904, to April 1, 1904, and for 3,003 feet of water in April, at meter rates for boarding houses. From that time on the petitioner was charged at meter rates. He declined to pay, and on September 10, 1904, the company shut the water off. There was then due, according to its rates, the sum of $23.71 for water from January 1, 1904. Both before and after the water was shut off the petitioner tendered the full amount due according to the flat rates for dwelling houses, and now offers to pay the same. He prays that the company be commanded to restore his service.

Upon these facts, concerning which there is little dispute, the defendant contends that the petitioner is not entitled to mandamus against it, as a matter of law. It says that the petitioner's rights, if any, rest in contract, and, so far as alleged in the petition, in the Laughton & Clergue contract, that the contract was made by the town, and that the petitioner was not a party to it, or in any privity with the parties, and that mandamus will not lie to enforce contractual duties in any event. Furthermore, it is argued that the defendant is not bound by the Laughton & Clergue contract. We will consider the last proposition first.

It is not necessary to inquire when and how far and in what manner a corporation is bound by the engagements entered into by its promoters. It is at least settled that, if the corporation adopts such a contract expressly or impliedly, and obtains its benefits, it must take it with its obligations and burdens, cum onere. It must do what the promoters agreed to do. 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 241; 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 262; note to Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, 17 Am. St. Rep. 161. In this case, the Penobscot Water & Power Company took an assignment of the Laughton & Clergue contract and its benefits, and expressly assumed its obligations. That contract limited the rates for water supplied to dwelling houses containing families. The corporation became bound by that limitation. While a town is not an agent of the individual citizens, and authorized to make contracts binding upon them personally, we have no hesitation in saying that, when a person or corporation, as a consideration, or even as a mere inducement, for the making of a hydrant contract with a town for fire purposes, engages to supply water for the inhabitants at rates not exceeding certain specified sums, and so obtains the contract and its benefits, the contractor is under obligations to fulfill the agreement as to service and rates to individual water takers. And the rights of the Penobscot Water & Power Company, with the corresponding duties and obligations, have come to the defendant.

It is true that mandamus is not the proper remedy for the enforcement of mere contractual duties. It does not lie to enforce rights of a private or personal character, or obligations resting entirely upon contract, and not involving any question of trust or official duty, or growing out of public relations. 2 Spelling, Extra. Relief, § 1379. But that is not the situation in this case. The defendant is a public service corporation. By undertaking a public service, namely that of furnishing a supply of water for the public, it comes under obligations to the public, not only to the public as a whole, but to the public as individuals, and that independent of its contract duties. It must serve impartially, or on equal terms and at reasonable rates, all who apply for service. Indeed, from the existence of such a public duty the law will imply a contract, if necessary, with each of the inhabitants served. McEntee v. Kingston Water Co. 165 N. Y. 27, 58 N. E. 785. It is the duty of the defendant as a public service corporation to supply water to this petitioner at reasonable rates, fairly, and without discrimination. Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 60 L. R. A. 856, 54 Atl. 6. The duty is a public one which does not depend on the Loughton & Clergue contract, although that limits the maximum rate in some instances; but it arises from the character of the service it undertakes to perform. Because a duty of this kind is public, each owner of a building which may be served is entitled to have the water served to him. That is his particular, personal right, and is independent of the rights that others or the general public may have. He does not hold that particular right in common with the public. Mandamus lies to enforce the performance of public duties. It does not lie at the suit of an individual for the enforcement of those rights which he holds in common with the public at large, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but it does lie when his personal and particular rights have been invaded beyond those that he enjoys as a part of the public, and that are common to everyone. Sanger v. Kennebec County, 25 Me. 221; Baker v. Johnson, 41 Me. 15; Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, 18 Atl. 325; Knight v. Thomas, 93 Me. 494, 45 Atl. 499. The petitioner therefore may prosecute the writ.

It is not questioned but that a public-service corporation may adopt reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its business, to which the individual water takers must conform, that it may require payment for a reasonable time in advance, or that it may cut off water from a customer who refuses or neglects to pay reasonable rates. Wood v. Auburn, 87 Me. 287, 29 L. R. A. 376, 32 Atl. 906. And we think there can be no question of the right of such a corporation to revise and change its schedule of rates, if no contract prevents, provided that the new rates are reasonable, and do not discriminate. Within these limitations, it may change from an annual or flat rate to a meter rate. In fact, a reasonable meter rate seems the more equitable and just. We have recently discussed what are reasonable rates in Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 60 L. R. A. 856, 54 Atl. 6, and Brunswick & T. Water District v. Maine Water Co. 99 Me. 371, 59 Atl. 537; and this case calls for no further discussion. Nor do we think there can be any doubt that in case of unnecessary waste, the company may apply a meter, and charge reasonable meter rates. Again, while it may be lawful to classify water takers, not arbitrarily, but upon reasonable grounds,—as, for instance, as between boarding houses and private dwelling houses; and while it may be true in instances that a charge to small customers is not necessarily unreasonable, because in excess of what a large customer would have to pay for the same amount of water,—still, as bearing upon the question of discrimination, it must be true that the quantity of water used and the cost of the individual service are the principal elements for consideration in fixing the charges as between individual water takers or classes of takers. And it has been held that a public-service company cannot make a difference in price according to the use made by the customer; nor is a discrimination proper based on the value of the service to the customer. Baily v. Fayette Gas-Fuel Co. 193 Pa. 175, 44 Atl. 251; Richmond Natural Gas Co. v. Clawson, 155 Ind. 659, 51 L. R. A. 744, 58 N. E. 1049. And, of course, the water company had the right to establish reasonable rates for service to all customers not provided for in the Loughton & Clergue contract.

An application of these principles will eliminate from further consideration all essential questions except two, and these are questions of fact. The petitioner bases his claim upon the dwelling-house clause in the Laughton & Clergue contract. He says that his house was a "dwelling-house containing a family," within the meaning of that contract, and therefore that the maximum charge for a family of 15, exclusive of the water-closet, was $10 a year; and further, that the family in the house did not exceed 15 in number. All his tenders and his offer in the petition to pay are limited upon that theory. And if it were otherwise, the record does not disclose sufficient data to enable the court to pass upon the reasonableness of the meter rates themselves. The defendant, on the other hand, claims that the building is not a dwelling house within the meaning of the contract, but is a boarding house; and further, that its predecessor was justified in putting in a meter, by reason of the unreasonable waste of water.

The decisive question, and the only one we need to consider, is whether the petitioner's building was a "dwelling house containing a family," as specified in the original contract, or was a boarding house. It is urged in the first place that the company itself has so classified it for quite a long period of years, and that, in consequence, its status is now fixed beyond the power of the company to change. The construction which the parties by their acts place upon a contract frequently is, in cases of doubt, of great value in determining what the contract meant. And when, by long-continued usage, they have given a practical construction to it, it may be beyond the power of one party to change it. West Hartford v. Water Comrs. 68 Conn. 323, 36 Atl. 786. But if we were to assume that such a usage should control, it ought to be a usage which has been practically fixed and unvarying. The case shows that all three of the tenants who have occupied the house since the petitioner bought it have kept boarders, but to what extent and under what conditions the two earlier tenants kept them does not appear. And, as we shall hereafter see, the mere fact that boarders are kept in a house is not necessarily inconsistent with the claim that it is a "dwelling house containing a family." Moreover, the house was first classified at a time earlier than the petitioner's ownership, and the record shows nothing in regard to the nature of the occupancy at that time, except that boarders were kept. This ground therefore is not tenable, and we must inquire further.

The building itself seems to have been built originally for family use. But it had been used by tenants for keeping boarders, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and was being so used when the meter was put on. The tenant, his wife, and three sons lived there. The number of boarders was as low as 3 at times, and at others as high as 10, and perhaps more. The boarders were not transients. They stayed more or less permanently. The term "dwelling house" does not always have the same sense in all cases. It may mean one thing under an indictment for burglary or arson, and another under a homestead law, and another under a pauper law, and another under a contract or devise. A boarding house certainly is a dwelling house. So is a hotel; or a jail (People v. Van Blaricum, 2 Johns. 105); or a single room (People v. Horrigan, 68 Mich. 491, 36 N. W. 236).

But the Laughton & Clergue contract limited the meaning which might be given to the term "dwelling house." The phrase there is "dwelling house containing a family." The word "family" is also of flexible meaning. The meaning varies as the question arises under homestead laws, or exemption laws, or pauper laws, or under insurance policies or wills, or other conditions. Its primary meaning is a collection of persons who live in one house and under one head or management. Dodge v. Boston & P. R. Co. 154 Mass. 289, 13 L. R. A. 318, 28 N. E. 243. In that sense it has frequently been defined as synonymous with "household." Webster gives the primary meaning as "persons collectively who live together in a house or under one head or manager; a household, including parents, children, and servants, and, as the case may be, lodgers or boarders." This definition is sometimes quoted in the cases, but we have found no cases sustaining the definition as to boarders in which the matter of boarders was in issue or decided, except two, and they were decided on grounds not involved here. Oystead v. Shedd, 13 Mass. 520, 7 Am. Dec. 172; Race v. Oldridge, 90 Ill. 250, 32 Am. Rep. 27. To constitute the family relation between persons so living together it must be of a permanent and domestic character, and not of those abiding together temporarily as strangers. Tyson v. Reynolds, 52 Iowa, 431, 3 N. W. 469. They must be living in one domestic establishment. Pearson v. Miller, 71 Miss. 379, 42 Am. St. Rep. 470, 14 So. 731. Family means all whose domicile or home is ordinarily in the same house and under the same management or head. Cheshire v. Burlington, 31 Conn. 326. It is all the individuals who live together under the control of another, including the servants. Poor v. Hudson Ins. Co. 2 Fed. 432. It embraces a household composed of parents or children, or other relatives, or domestics; in short, every collective body of persons living together within one curtilage, subsisting in common and directing their attention to a common object, the promotion of their mutual interests and social happiness. Wilson v. Cochran, 31 Tex. 677, 98 Am. Dec. 553. It may mean the husband and wife, having no children, or it may mean children, or wife and children, or any group constituting a distinct domestic or social body. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McKinsty, 67 Mo. App. 82. Lord Kenyon said: "In common parlance, the family consists of those who live under the same roof with the pater familias; those who form (if I may use the expression) his fireside." King v. Darlington, 4 T. R. 800. The relation is one of social status, not of mere contract, and usually is held to include a legal or moral obligation on the head of the family to support the other members, and a corresponding state of dependence on the part of the other members for their support. 3 Words & Phrases, 2673, and cases cited.

If the foregoing definitions gathered from the cases give a correct view of the various phases of a family relationship as applicable to this case, from the judicial point of view, as we think they do, it is clear that boarders do not constitute the family or a part of it. A family living together in a house as a home is none the less a family because incidentally there are boarders in the same house, and perchance eating at the same table. But a boarding house is none the less a boarding house, when used as such, because the boarding-house keeper and his wife and children live in it while the business of keeping a boarding house is being carried on. The Laughton & Clergue contract limited the rates for a "dwelling house containing a family" to annual flat rates for specified amounts. It contemplated, as we think, a dwelling house containing a family living together in domestic and social relations in the house as a home, and not a place of carrying on the business of keeping boarders. The test is whether the petitioner's tenant occupied the house as a home for himself and his wife and children, and incidentally kept boarders also, or whether he occupied it as a place for carrying on the business of keeping boarders, although while prosecuting the business, and as a means of prosecuting the business, he and his wife and children live in the house also. Under this test, neither the size of the house, nor the number of the boarders, is of importance, except as evidence that they may have weight in determining which is the principal use for which the building is occupied.

Applying the test to the evidence in this case, we are satisfied that the petitioner's house should be classed as a boarding house, and that it is not within the limitation for 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dwelling houses in the Laughton & Clergue contract. The tenant used the house for carrying on the business of keeping boarders, and his living there was incidental to that. That was his business and his only business of any consequence, as he testified.

Accordingly the petitioner's claim is not sustained, and his petition must be dismissed. But we decide nothing more. The petition is not framed to raise the question whether the rates charged to the petitioner for the house as a boarding house are excessive or not. Neither, as we have already said, is there sufficient evidence upon which to answer such a question. Nor do we say that the rates which the defendant demands are or are not unjust by reason of unlawful discrimination in the classification made by it, and in the charges made to the several classes, nor that the defendant has or has not the right to demand as much of the petitioner as it does, for the unpaid water service. When a customer charges 25 cents a hundred feet to one customer for one use, and only 11 cents for 10,000 feet to another customer for another use, if the water be supplied from the same source, by the same system, in the same pipes, there is an apparent discrimination, but whether it is real or not cannot now be said. See Baily v. Fayette Gas Fuel Co. and Richmond Natural Gas Co. v. Clawson, supra.

Petition dismissed.

KANAWHA HARDWOOD COMPANY,
Appt.

(139 N. C. 283.)

1. Eminent domain—private railway.

The right of eminent domain cannot be conferred to secure a right of way for a private railway to transport timber to market.

2. Same—public use.

Case Note.—The power to exercise the right of eminent domain to secure a right of way for a logging railroad has been considered in a number of cases and with some variety of opinion.

According to an able commentator on the subject, in its broad signification eminent domain "embraces all cases where, by authority of the state and for the public good, the property of the individual is taken, without his consent, for the purpose of being devoted to some particular use, either by the state itself or by a corporation, public or enterprise therein is not a public use for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised.

3. Same—limited easement.

The fact that only an easement for a limited time is to be taken for a private railway does not change the rule forbidding the exercise of the right of eminent domain for that purpose.

4. Same—effect of legislative determination.

The legislative determination as to what is a public use for the exercise of the right of eminent domain is not conclusive.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Cherokee County continuing a temporary injunction to restrain the construction of a railway over plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

Plaintiff alleged: That he was the owner of a tract of land in Cherokee county, upon which he had erected a dwelling and planted a large number of fruit trees and made many other valuable improvements, requiring outlay of many thousand dollars. That the defendants are partners, conducting a general lumber business under the firm name and style of the Kanawha Hardwood Company. That defendants are threatening, and pursuant to such threats proceeded, to construct a railway over and through his lands for the purpose of hauling timber and timber products from their own lands. That in grading the route for such railway, and erecting trestles over the mountain, great and permanent damage will be done his property, etc. He applied to the resident judge of the district for a restraining order until the hearing, and a permanent injunction, etc. Upon the return day of the order to show cause, his Honor, Judge Ferguson, upon hearing the complaint and answer, supported by affidavits, found the following facts: The defendants, after notice, applied to the highway commission of Valleystown township, in said county, for a right of way to construct and operate a private railroad from the town of Andrews, a railroad station on the Southern Railway, to standing timber owned by the defendants in Graham county, which right of way would pass over the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff filed an answer to the petition. From the order, the highway commission finding that it was necessary, reasonable, and just that the petitioners should have the right of way, and appointing a jury to lay it off, plaintiff appealed to the board of commissioners of Cherokee county. From the order of the said board of commissioners, affirming the proceedings of the highway commission, the plaintiff appealed to the superior court. The appeal is now pending in said court.

private, or by a private citizen. Apart from constitutional considerations, it is not essential, in order to constitute an act of eminent domain, that the use for which the property is taken should be of a public nature. . . . Doubtless the definitions which restrict eminent domain to a taking for public use have been inspired by the constitutional provisions which prevail in the United States and impose this limitation on the exercise of the power." Lewis, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 1. And he goes on to say (§ 157) that while only a few of the state Constitutions in terms prohibit the taking of private property for private use, all courts agree in holding that this cannot be done. "Different courts find different reasons for this conclusion, some putting it on the ground of an implied prohibition in the eminent domain provision of the Constitution, some on the ground that it would be contrary to the provision that no person shall be deprived of his property except by the law of the land, others, on the ground that it would be subversive of the fundamental principles of free government, or contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. The conclusion is undoubtedly a correct one, and is too well settled by authority to necessitate any inquiry into the true grounds upon which it rests." See also Wood, Railway Law, p. 636.

courts, seem to take the view that the power is essentially limited to taking for a public use. See, inter alia, Mills, Em. Dom. § 1; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 584; 15 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 557; Beach, Railways, § 773; Varick v. Smith, 5 Paige, 159, 28 Am. Dec. 417; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. ed. 773; Weir v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 18 Minn. 155, Gil. 139; Giesy v. Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. 4 Ohio St. 308.

Whichever view is taken, it is indisputable that the taking must be for a public purpose, except in states which have adopted constitutional provisions authorizing a taking for private use in cases where the general welfare will thereby be promoted.

The decisions as to the meaning of the words "public use" are numerous and varied; some holding that to constitute a public use the public must use or have a right to use the property taken, while others hold that the words mean public utility, advantage, or what is productive of public benefit. It has been suggested that a possible ground for reconciling decisions apparently inharmonious may be found in the difference in local needs, giving rise to different local policies.

On the question whether a road solely for the transportation of logs or timber is for a

That the defendants are the owners of standing timber from which no public road leads and to which no water is convenient. That the proposed road leads from a railroad station to such standing timber, and that such standing timber cannot be marketed with a profit to the defendants without the construction of a railroad. That the construction of a railroad is necessary for the profitable marketing of such timber, and that the route across the plaintiff's land is a reasonable route. That in taking such route no injustice is done the plaintiff. That there is no reason why his land should not be taken, as well as the land of any others over which the road might be constructed. That five years will not be an unreasonable time in which to remove such standing timber. Defendants have graded a considerable portion of the proposed road, not on the lands of the plaintiff, but other portions of the proposed route. They have bought and contracted for iron rails, locomotives, and other appliances for operating said road. Defendants are not a corporation, and do not propose to become liable as common carriers, but propose to construct and use the road for their sole and exclusive use in removing their timber and timber products from their lands in Graham county to the railroad station at Andrews and to the markets. There are other large boundaries of timber land of like kind contiguous to the defendants' timber. Defendants do not propose to transport over their proposed railroad such timber for reasonable charges to be fixed by the corporation commission or other authority of the state. Defendants do not claim any other right to enter upon plaintiff's land other than such as they acquired by the order of the highway commission. His Honor, upon the foregoing facts, continued the injunction to the hearing. Defendants appealed.

public use, however, the cases seem in substantial agreement.

In Weidenfeld v. Sugar Run R. Co. 48 Fed. 615, where it appeared that the real purpose for which a railroad was organized was the transportation of bark to the tanneries of the principal stockholder, and no public use or necessity for the railroad or any public traffic that it would obtain when constructed was shown, it was held that such railroad could not exercise the power of eminent domain.

In Bridal Veil Lumbering Co. v. Johnson, 30 Or. 205, 34 L. R. A. 368, 60 Am. St. Rep. 318, 46 Pac. 790, it was held that a railroad chartered to extend from a certain town past a sawmill, through rough, mountainous, timbered, and sparsely-settled country, to the middle of a certain section on lands of the United States, without ground near any other town, city, or settlement or other railroad, but which had been built only from the sawmill, about 2 miles from the town, for 5½ miles into the timbered region, and has no freight or passenger depots, passenger coaches, or freight cars, except trucks, and has never charged passengers any fare, is a public way for which eminent domain may be exercised, where it is not shown that it was intended simply as a logging road, and everyone having occasion to use it as a passenger or for the transportation of freight has a right to require the service.

In Apex Transp. Co. v. Garbade, 32 Or. 582, 62 L. R. A. 513, 52 Pac. 573, 54 Pac. 367, 882, it was held that a skid road, both termini of which were on and entirely surrounded by the property of a lumbering company whose business it was designed to facilitate, to which the public had no access except over private land, and which would not connect with nor be accessible at any point by a public highway, was not for such a use as would authorize the taking of private property without the consent of the owner.

The right to condemn private property for a logging road and water way was also denied in Healy Lumber Co. v. Morris, 33 Wash. 490, 63 L. R. A. 820, 99 Am. St. Rep. 964, 74 Pac. 681, quoted at length in COZAD v. KANAWHA HARDWOOD CO.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants insist that, pending the proceeding instituted before the highway commission, the courts should not interfere by injunction with the construction of their proposed railway. This contention would be unanswerable, but for the fact that plaintiff insists that in no point of view can the result of that proceeding affect his right to enjoin defendants, for that: (1) No power is conferred upon the highway commission to order a railway of the character or for the purpose contemplated by the defendants to be laid out. (2) That, if the statute undertook to confer such power, it would be invalid, violating the elementary principle that private property can only be taken for a public use, and then with compensation. These contentions render it necessary to examine the provisions of the statute creating the highway commission of Valletown township. Pub. Laws 1905, chap. 210, p. 222.

By the 1st section of the statute provision is made for electing three persons, who shall constitute the highway commission for said township, naming those who shall act until the time appointed for the first election. By the 2d section, the commission is vested with the powers, rights, etc., exercised by the board of supervisors of public roads, etc. "They shall have power and authority to order the laying out of public roads," etc. "They shall also have power and authority to lay out cartways, rights of way for tramroads, church and mill roads, and to discontinue the same in the way and manner provided in §§ 2033, 2056, 2057, 2062, 2063, of the Code or any amendments thereof." It is clear that the highway commission established by the act has no larger or other power in regard to ordering cartways or tramways to be opened than is exercised by the boards having jurisdiction over such matters under the general public laws. It is equally clear that the road proposed to be opened and operated does not come within the definition of cartways provided by §§ 2056, 2057 of the Code. This right is conferred only on persons "settled upon or cultivating any land." The cartway authorized to be opened "shall be kept open for the free passage of all persons on foot or horseback, carts and wagons." Section 2057 provides that persons over whose lands cartways have been opened "may erect gates or bars across the same." The section was amended by chapter 46, p. 97, Laws 1887, by inserting in line 1 the words "or shall own any standing timber," and in lines 6 and 15, between the words "cartway" and "to," the words "tram or railway," and in line 18 striking out the word "way," and inserting the words "cartways established under this act." Section 2057 is amended by inserting in line 1 the words "tram or railways," and by inserting in line 6, between the word "just" and "and," the words "cartways, tramways, or railways for the removal of timber shall continue for a period not longer than five years, and, in entering cultivated land, shall protect the same by sufficient stock guards." The effect of these amendments is to confer upon owners of land upon which there is any standing timber the right to have opened tramways or railways, with the exclusive use of them, confining to cartways the right of all persons to pass over them. The right to maintain such tramways or railways is confined to a period of five years, with the duty of erecting stock guards when they pass through cultivated land, thus depriving the owner of the land through which such tram and rail ways pass the right to erect gates or bars across them. It appears that the highway commission ordered the laying out of a private way for a private railway through and over the plaintiff's land, with "such curves and grades as are necessary, according to the survey made, in order to reach the lowest gap on top of the mountain. . . . Said right of way, when it extends through woodland, or said tract, to be of the width of 150 feet, and through cultivated fields or cleared land to be of sufficient width for the roadbed, trestles, and cuts only."

The construction of § 2056 of the Code, being chapter 508, Acts 1798, providing for the opening of cartways, has been frequently before this court. Its constitutionality has never been questioned, and is not involved in this appeal. The validity of similar statutes has been discussed and sustained in other jurisdictions upon the ground that, although established and opened upon the petition of private land-owners, and primarily for their benefit, they are, as provided by our statute, open for the free passage of all persons on horse, foot, in wagons, or carts. This extension of their use impresses upon them a public character. In this way the power to invoke the right of eminent domain, for the purpose of opening and maintaining them, is sustained. It is said: "Roads and streets used by the public, with a right in all the public to use them, are undoubtedly public, and private property may be appropriated for the purpose of constructing such ways. The test is not simply how many persons do actually use them, but how many have a free and unrestricted right in common to use them; for, if the public generally are excluded, the way must be regarded as a private one; if the public have the right to use the way at pleasure and on equal terms, it is a public one, although in reality it is little used. When the way is a private one, the right of eminent domain cannot be successfully invoked. . . . The right itself exists only for the public, and no private interest, however weighty, can call it into exercise. The question, therefore, must always be, not 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) what private interests will be promoted, but what is the public requirement? The name given the way does not determine its character, for if a road be called a private road or a neighborhood road, but is in fact so laid out and maintained as to give the public a right to freely use it upon terms common to all, the road, notwithstanding its name, is a public one." Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 192. The converse of the proposition is stated in § 193, that if the road is so laid out as to give only a limited class of persons the sole right to use it, it is for that reason a private road, without regard to the name by which it is known or called. "If a class, to the exclusion of the citizens generally, acquire a right to use the road, it is no more than a private way." Id. Discussing the same question, it is said: "where the road though laid out on the application of, and paid for and kept in repair by, a particular individual, who is especially accommodated thereby, is in fact a public road, and for the use of all who may desire to use it, then it is regarded as accomplishing a public purpose. for which the land may be condemned. But when the road, after being laid out, becomes the property of the applicant, from which he may lawfully exclude the public, then the use is strictly private, and the law authorizing the condemnation of property therefor is void." Lewis, Em. Dom. 167. Speaking of private cartways over which the public are allowed to pass, the author says: "The roads here provided for are spoken of as quasi public, and have been sustained as a valid exercise of the power of eminent domain. . . . It has never, we think, been decided in any case that private property could be condemned for a private road for the exclusive use of the applicant, and we know of no principle upon which such a proceeding can be justified." Id. A statute similar to § 2057, as amended by chap. 46, p. 97, Laws 1887, was enacted by the legislature of Pennsylvania for the benefit of owners of land upon which there were deposits of anthracite coal. In Waddell's Appeal, 84 Pa. 90, the validity of the act was discussed and denied, because the way authorized to be opened was not for the use of the public. The supreme court of Indiana, in Wild v. Deig, 43 Ind. 455, 13 Am. Rep. 399, said: "Concede that the public exigency requires that a way should be opened to every man's farm, and that the state may and should provide for the establishment of a public road or highway to enable every citizen to discharge his duties and travel to and from his farm; it does not follow that such ways should be private and owned by the party applying for them. If it would be of public utility to establish the road, then it should be a highway. If not, then the right of eminent domain cannot be exercised to establish it. It is not the amount of travel—the extent of the use of the highway by the public—that distinguishes it from a private way or road. It is the right to so use or travel upon it, not its exercise.” In a well-considered opinion delivered by Dillon, Ch. J. (Bankhead v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 540), it is said: “Could not the plaintiffs in this case, after having procured the road in question, abandon it at their pleasure? Could they not relinquish it to the defendants without consulting the board of supervisors? If this is so, does it not incontestably establish that it is essentially private? For it must be private, if it is of such a nature that the plaintiffs can at their pleasure use or forbid its use, abandon or refuse to abandon it, relinquish or refuse to relinquish it.”

The defendants' counsel, in an able and interesting argument before us, conceding the general principle governing the right to take private property or impose burdens thereon, insist that, by reason of the peculiar conditions developed by the affidavits in the record, the use for which the plaintiff's land is sought to be subjected to the easement is public in its character. They call to our attention the large and valuable timber standing upon the mountains of western North Carolina, the removal and marketing of which brings wealth into the state and opens the land to cultivation and homes for the people now there and who are coming into that section of the state. They say that while the logs may be hauled over the mountain roads, but at very large expense, the portions of the trees,—limbs, tops, etc.,—unfit for lumber, which are now wasted, may be made useful and valuable for many purposes, and that it is their purpose to establish tanneries and factories for utilizing these products, etc.; that by these means the revenues of the state will be increased, the development of the natural resources encouraged, immigration brought into that section, and many other benefits accrue to the public. These views, with the facts upon which they were based, were presented with much force by counsel. They have received, as they were entitled to, most careful consideration. They have been made in other cases in other courts. They invite courts to find in the term “public use” a broader and larger meaning. Their persuading and almost compelling force may be seen in the legislation of the states and the decisions of the courts. While they have in some cases stimulated material growth and development, it is manifest that valuable private property rights and stores of natural wealth and resources for feeding, clothing, and making comfortable the rapidly increasing population have been sacrificed to them; that great and dangerous monopolies have been fostered by the liberal construction put upon the term “public use.” It has sometimes happened that a stubborn and possibly sentimental owner of land has stood in the way of the development of the country, and of the impatient, strenuous promoter and industrial pioneer. It may be that his rights have not received, either in the legislature or the courts, the consideration to which they were entitled. It is conceded that courts and authors have found much difficulty in defining the term. It does not concern us to attempt to do so to any other or further extent than is necessary to a decision of this appeal. Mr. Lewis, after an interesting discussion of the subject, says: “Perhaps no better example of a public use can be given than that of the ordinary highway, where the easement or right of way vests in the public for the common and equal use of all.” Em. Dom. § 166. The terms upon which the public may use the highway are, of course, subject to legislative regulation, as on railroads or steamboats, by paying the prescribed fare, going upon and leaving at regular stations, and conforming to those reasonable regulations made by the corporation or other agency for the protection of the public, and on the ordinary country highways by conforming to those statutes or immemorial customs which have become the “law of the road,” etc. In Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. v. Benwood Iron-Works, 31 W. Va. 710, 2 L. R. A. 680, 8 S. E. 453, the term “public use,” as applied to the right of a railroad company to condemn private property for the purpose of constructing a lateral road to reach a particular customer, is discussed and the authorities reviewed; Johnson, P., concluding his opinion: “As far as the public is concerned, when what they need is for ‘public use,’ they have a right to invoke the exercise of eminent domain; but, in so far as that which concerns them as to their private interests, their profits, and gains is concerned, they stand as individuals, or as merely private corporations in which the public has no concern, and for such private purposes cannot call into exercise the power of eminent domain.” In reply to the argument of counsel that by such holding a deadly blow was aimed at the industries of the state, the learned judge said: “It seems to us, if railroad corporations were permitted ad libitum to do what this defendant in error asks to be done, ‘no deadlier blow could be dealt the private rights of the citizens.’” “The true criterion by which to judge of the character of the use is whether the public may enjoy it by right or only permission, and not to whom the tax or toll for supporting them is paid." Note in 2 L. R. A. 681; 15 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 583; Board of Health v. Van Hoesen, 87 Mich. 533, 14 L. R. A. 114, 49 N. W. 894.

The question presented by this appeal, and the argument to sustain the right, was discussed in Healy Lumber Co. v. Morris, 33 Wash. 490, 63 L. R. A. 820, 99 Am. St. Rep. 964, 74 Pac. 681. A statute similar to ours, as amended, was enacted, enabling owners of timbered lands to condemn a right of way for tramroads and railroads for the purpose of transporting timber to market. The exact question before us was presented; Dunbar, J., saying: "This case presents the important questions, deserving the most serious consideration, involving, as it does, the respective interests of private rights and of property of the state sought to be protected and fostered through the exercise of the high prerogative of sovereignty; the former being guaranteed by the fundamental law and the latter being the subject of universal interest and concern. Eminent domain is the right or power of a sovereign state to appropriate private property. . . . The learned attorneys for appellant have favored the court with an exhaustive and earnest argument in their brief, and a painstaking showing is made of the magnitude of the lumbering business and interest of this state and the effect that it presumably has upon the general prosperity of the commonwealth, and we are urged to announce a broad and statesmanlike principle in determining this question, and one which would further the business prosperity of the state, rather than one which would hamper and retard it. But the court cannot invade the province of the lawmaking powers of government and intrude into its decrees its opinion on questions of public policy. Its duty is to strictly recognize its legal limitations and confine itself to the narrower duties of interpretation and construction." To the argument that a liberal construction should be given to term "public use," because in the section of the state in which the proposed road is to be built the removal of the standing timber is promotive of the improvement of that section, the answer is that "the Constitution is the fundamental law. Its enactments, whether they constitute grants or limitations, are presumed to be stable and uniform, and to constitute a check on the more mutable sentiment and actions of members of different legislatures. And it seems to us that the result of such construction would be a virtual removal of any constitutional inhibition on legislative power in this respect." Ibid. There is a distinction between public policy or public welfare and public use. "It might be of unquestionable public policy and for the best interest of the state to allow condemnation of lands in every instance where it would result in aiding prosperous business enterprises which would give employment to labor, stimulate trade, increase property values, and thereby increase the revenues of the state, even if the enterprise was purely private; for such is the relation, under our form of government, between public and private prosperity that one cannot be enjoyed to any appreciable extent without favorably influencing the other. But it is evident that this was not the kind of public use that was within the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and it seems to us that the logic of those courts which have sustained appellant's contention is justified solely on grounds of public policy." Ibid. The question is exhaustively discussed in Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. R. R. Co. 18 Wend. 9, 31 Am. Dec. 313, in which it is said: "When we depart from the natural import of the term 'public use,' and substitute for the simple idea of a public possession and occupation that of public utility, public interest, common benefit, general advantage or convenience, or that still more indefinite term, 'public improvement,' is there any limitation which can be set to the exertion of legislative will in the appropriation of private property? The moment the mode of its use is disregarded, and we permit ourselves to be governed by speculations upon the benefits which may result to localities from the use which a man or set of men propose to make of the property of another, that moment we are afloat, without any certain principle to guide." Judge Cooley says: "It seems not to be allowable, therefore, to authorize private roads to be laid out across the lands of unwilling parties by an exercise of this right. The easement in such a case would be the property of him for whom it was established." Const. Lim. 652. To the suggestion that only an easement for the period of five years is imposed upon plaintiff's land, and that such period is a reasonable time to remove the timber, we quote the same eminent authority: "And, although the owner would not be deprived of the fee in the land, the beneficial use and exclusive enjoyment of his property would in greater or less degree be interfered with. Nor would it be material to inquire what quantum of interest would pass from him. It would be sufficient that some interest, the appropriation of which detracted from his right and authority and interfered with his exclusive possession as owner, had been taken against his will; and, if taken for a purely private purpose, it would be unlawful." Ibid. Again he says: "The public use implies a possession, occupation, and enjoyment of the land by the public at large or by public agencies." Ibid. Without pursuing the subject further, we entertain no doubt that the amendment made to §§ 2056, 2057 of the Code by chap. 46, p. 97, Laws 1887, in so far as it authorizes owners of timber lands to condemn a right of way for tramways or railways over the lands of other owners for the exclusive use of the owners of the timber, is unconstitutional and invalid. This conclusion does not affect the right of condemnation of a cartway, as provided by the statute, over which all persons may pass, etc. We see no objection to the extension of this privilege to owners of timber lands under the same limitations and conditions as persons settled upon or cultivating lands. It is manifest that the defendants are not seeking this restricted right. They say that it is their purpose to construct the railway for their exclusive use. This concession deprives them of the benefits of the statute, eliminating the amendment of 1887.

Counsel call to our attention the decisions of this court sustaining the drainage acts. Without discussing these acts, it is sufficient to say that they expressly confer upon all persons having lands adjoining or capable of drainage through the drains or canals authorized to be opened the right to avail themselves of these benefits. This distinguishes those statutes from the one under discussion. It is also contended that it is peculiarly the province of the legislature to say what is a public use, and that its decision may not be reviewed by the courts. While it must be conceded that expressions are to be found in decided cases, several of which are cited by counsel, and in some text-books, which seem to sustain this contention, it will be found that they are subject to the limitation that the question is primarily one for the legislature, but its decision is not conclusive; otherwise, the legislature could nullify the principle protecting private property. The correct view is stated by Judge Cooley: "The question What is a public use? is always one of law. Deference will be paid to the legislative judgment as expressed in enactments providing for the appropriation of property, but it will not be conclusive." Const. Lim. 660; Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. v. Benwood Iron-Works, 31 W. Va. 710, 2 L. R. A. 680, 8 S. E. 453. "The question whether a particular use is public or not is ultimately a question for the courts. This is necessarily true, in view of the constitutional provisions of the different states that private property can be taken only for a public use, since the interpretation of constitutional provisions is within the province of the judiciary." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1066; Call v. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wilkesboro, 115 N. C. 337, 20 S. E. 468, in which Shepherd, Ch. J., says: "Whether a particular use is public or not, within the meaning of the Constitution, is a question for the judiciary"—citing Lewis, Em. Dom. 185; Mills, Em. Dom. 10, 11. The distinction is this: whether a use is public is for the ultimate decision of the courts; if the use is public, the expediency or necessity for establishing it is exclusively for the legislature. In the discussion of the question presented, we have assumed that the provisions limiting the power of the legislature to take private property were constitutional. As is well known to the profession, no such provision is found in our state Constitution; but, since the opinion of Ruffin, Ch. J., in Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Davis, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 451, the principle has been treated as fundamental, and as existing with the same universal application as if imbedded in the Constitution. Rodman, J., in Johnston v. Rankin, 70 N. C. 555, says: "The principle is so grounded in natural equity that it has never been denied to be a part of the law of North Carolina." Southport, W. & D. R. Co. v. Platt Land, 133 N. C. 266, 45 S. E. 589. While, as found by his Honor, it is reasonable, and even necessary to the successful operation of defendants' enterprise, that they carry their timber and timber products over plaintiff's land to reach the markets, and while there may be no injustice to him in permitting them to do so, and while his opposition may be either sentimental or selfish, yet the courts may not violate or weaken a fundamental principle, upon the strict observance and enforcement of which the security of all private property, so necessary to the safety of the citizen, is dependent. The guaranties upon which the security of private property is dependent are closely allied, and always associated with those securing life and liberty. Where one is invaded, the security of the others is weakened.

The judgment of his Honor, continuing the injunction, must be affirmed.

HIGHLAND BOY GOLD MINING COMPANY, Resp't.,

v.

JOHN STRICKLEY et al., Appts.

(28 Utah, 215.)

1. Eminent domain—public use.

A statute granting the right of eminent domain will be upheld against a claim that it is for a private use, unless it clearly appears that the use is private and in no sense public.

2. Same—in aid of mining industry.

The construction of roads and tramways for the development of the mining industries of a state is a public use for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised.

(October 26, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to condemn a right of way to a mining claim. Affirmed.

Statement by McCarty, J.:

Plaintiff brought this action to condemn a right of way for its aerial tramway over defendants' mining claim. The record discloses the following facts, viz.: That plaintiff is a mining corporation and authorized to acquire, maintain, and operate aerial tramways for the transportation of ores and other materials. Its mines are situated about 2 miles from the upper portion of Bingham, and in altitude about 2,700 feet above the valley. The tramway, which consists of two cables supported on wooden towers, extends from the mines to Bingham.

Case Note.—The right to take private property by eminent domain for a mining road has come under discussion in two classes of cases. In one class, since, as appears by the authorities cited in the case note appended to Cozad v. Kanawha Hardwood Co., ante, 969, the power of eminent domain may be exercised only for a public use, the solution of the question is regarded as depending upon whether the development of the mining industry may be considered a public purpose. In the other class the decisions hinge upon whether such road may possibly be put to some use admittedly of a public character.

The division of opinion as to what constitutes a public use extends through the first class of cases. In harmony with HIGHLAND BOY GOLD MIN. CO. v. STRICKLEY is the case of Dayton Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Seawell, 11 Nev. 394, therein cited, in which the constitutionality of an act declaring the mining, milling, and smelting of ores to be for public use, and authorizing the exercise of the right of eminent domain therefor, was sustained, upon the ground that, mining being the paramount interest of the state, "anything which tends directly to encourage mineral developments and increase the mineral resources of the state is for the benefit of the public, and is calculated to advance the general welfare and prosperity of the people."

In New Central Coal Co. v. George's Creek Coal & I. Co. 37 Md. 537, the condemnation of private property by a mining company for a railroad to transport coal from its mines was held to be for a public use, on the ground that the development of its mineral re-

The towers in some places are 1,000 feet apart, and in others are close together, the space depending upon the contour of the ground. In case of gullies they are far apart; in going over ridges they are close together. The buckets run on wheels on the cables, and are moved by a single endless cable to which they are attached. Loaded buckets are carried down, and the empty buckets brought up. Each bucket holds about 700 pounds of ore, and in them there is carried over 500 tons of ore per day every day of the year. This has been continued since the spring of 1899. The plaintiff has in sight ore sufficient to last for about seven years, and reasonably expects, in the meantime, to develop ore for four or five years longer. All this ore is to be taken from the mines to Bingham, then loaded into railroad cars and shipped to plaintiff's smelter in Salt Lake valley. There is also taken over the tramway from Bingham up to the mines about 5 tons of coal a day; also supplies used in the operation of the mines are taken up in the same way. The placer claim over which the right of way is sought to be condemned is on a hillside, the surface of which is rough and irregular, and four towers are sufficient to cross the claim. A width of 25 feet is required for the towers, and for a sources would add to the wealth and revenues of the state. It is to be observed, however, that, by the terms of the act authorizing the construction of such railroads, it was made their duty to carry all persons and property at the same rates allowed by law to a certain railroad company, thus making such mining roads common carriers; and, further, that the decision is expressly based on Hays v. Risher, 32 Pa. 169, which sustains the exercise of the power of eminent domain in constructing mining roads upon the ground that a similar duty is imposed.

On the other hand, the construction of a tramway from mines to sampling works was said, in People ex rel. Aspen M. & S. Co. v. District Court, 11 Colo. 147, 17 Pac. 298, without discussion of the subject, to be for a private use.

In Sholl v. German Coal Co. 118 Ill. 427, 59 Am. Rep. 379, 10 N. E. 199, it was held that land could not be condemned for a tramway from a coal mine to a railroad track, since such use is private. The court says: "The character of the business proposed to be done, and the manner of doing it, must be looked to in determining whether the use will be a public or private one. If, from the nature of the business and the way in which it is to be conducted, it is clear no obligations will be assumed to the public, or liability incurred, other than such as pertain to all strictly private enterprises, it may safely be concluded the use is private, and not public. It is also believed to be generally, if not universally, true, that benefits resulting from a public use, capable of in-team to pass over the ground when necessary for the purpose of making repairs thereon. About 200 men are employed at plaintiff's mines, and about 200 at its smelter, which reduces only the ores from plaintiff's mines. A jury was impaneled and assessed the damage caused by the erection and operation of the tramway, and the court entered its findings and decree condemning a right of way for the occupation, maintenance, and use of plaintiff for its tramway. The decree, among other things, provides that "said plaintiff is to move said towers to, or rebuild the same on, at any time, different points on said strip hereby condemned, and as often as requested, and at plaintiff's expense, when reasonably required by the owners of said mining claim for using the part of said claim not sought to be condemned, as well as the part sought to be condemned; and such use of the said part of said surface by said plaintiff is entirely consistent with the use by said defendants of all of said claim, except as aforesaid, for the purpose of mining and working the same and removing the surface again and again; and the said defendants, or the owners of said claim, as the case may be, may work said claim as they see fit and proper, or otherwise use the same; and, whenever the rights herein given to said plaintiff interfere with such use, the said plaintiff is subject to remove said towers, as aforesaid, for the purpose of allowing the owners of such claim full use and enjoyment thereof, except as aforesaid." From that part of the judgment which decrees plaintiff a right of way over defendants' mining claim, defendants have appealed to this court.

Mr. Frank Hoffman for appellants.

Messrs. Sutherland, Van Cott, & Allison, for respondent:

The use of the road of the respondent for its aerial tramway is a public use.

Nash v. Clark, 27 Utah, 158, 101 Am. St. Rep. 953, 75 Pac. 371.

Primarily the question what is a public dividual appropriation, are open to all alike, upon the same terms and conditions."

In Valley City Salt Co. v. Brown, 7 W. Va. 191, a salt company, which desired to obtain a supply of coal for its own use and to sell to the people of the vicinity, was not permitted to obtain by condemnation a subterranean right of way from its mine, it appearing that the people could procure coal from other sources, and that the public would not use such right of way.

A coal railroad intended to connect a mine with a railroad, wholly unnecessary for the conveyance of passengers both in the present and the future, the ground adjacent being wholly unfit for manufacturing purposes, is not for a public use, so as to authorize taking land by eminent domain; nor is its nature affected by the possibility that it might be extended so as to open up other coal fields. Edgewood R. Co.'s Appeal, 79 Pa. 257.

A right of way for a tunnel for the private use of a mine owner in working his mine cannot be acquired by condemnation. Amador Queen Min. Co. v. Dewitt, 73 Cal. 482, 15 Pac. 74.

The question whether mining may be considered as a public use has also arisen in cases where condemnation of a right of way for a ditch to carry water for mining purposes has been sought. It has been answered affirmatively in Hand Gold Min. Co. v. Parker, 59 Ga. 419, and negatively, in Lorenz v. Jacob, 63 Cal. 73.

Nor may a right of way for a flume to carry off tailings be acquired by condemnation. Consolidated Channel Co. v. Central P. R. Co. 51 Cal. 269.

In the second class of cases, hereinbefore referred to, the right to exercise the power of eminent domain for the construction of a road intended chiefly to facilitate mining operations is upheld on the ground that such railroads are bound by law to transport the persons and property of the public when occasion arises. See Dietrich v. Murdock, 42 Mo. 279; Butte, A. & P. R. Co. v. Montana Union R. Co. 16 Mont. 523, 31 L. R. A. 304. 50 Am. St. Rep. 508, 41 Pac. 232; Kansas & T. Coal R. Co. v. Northwestern Coal & Min. Co. 161 Mo. 288, 51 L. R. A. 936, 84 Am. St. Rep. 717, 61 S. W. 684.

Of this class are cases arising under the Pennsylvania lateral railroad act of May 25, 1832. Hays v. Risher, supra.

The right is sustained even where the authorizing statute merely refers to such roads as public ways. Phillips v. Watson, 63 Iowa, 28, 18 N. W. 659.

An extreme instance is the case of State, De Camp, Prosecutor, v. Hibernia Underground R. Co. 47 N. J. L. 43, which holds that a right of way may be condemned for an underground railroad having one terminus in an ore vein and the other at dumps beside a surface railroad. The court says: "This enterprise does not lose the character of a public use because of the fact that the projected railroad is not a thoroughfare, and that its use may be limited by circumstances to a comparatively small part of the public. Every one of the public having occasion to send materials, implements, or machinery for mining purposes into, or to obtain ores from, the several mining tracts adjacent to the location of this road, may use this railroad for that purpose, and of right may require the company to serve him in that respect; and that is the test which determines whether the use is public."

The same considerations govern decisions involving the right to construct branches or side track to some one mine or quarry. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Petty, 57 Ark. 359, 20 L. R. A. 434, 21 S. W. 884; Ulmer v. Lime Rock R. Co. 98 Me. 579, 66 L. R. A. 387, 57 Atl. 1001.

use is a legislative question rather than a judicial one.

The development of the mining industry is a public use.

Dayton Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Seawell, 11 Nev. 394; Overman Silver Min. Co. v. Corcoran, 15 Nev. 147; Hand Gold Min. Co. v. Parker, 59 Ga. 419; Douglass v. Byrnes, 59 Fed. 29; Butte, A. & P. R. Co. v. Montana Union R. Co. 16 Mont. 526, 31 L. R. A. 298, 50 Am. St. Rep. 508, 41 Pac. 232; Oury v. Goodwin, 3 Ariz. 255, 26 Pac. 376; Ahern v. Dubuque Lead & Level Min. Co. 48 Iowa, 140.

The states have the right to take private property for any use, unless there is provision to the contrary in the Constitution.

Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 406, 25 L. ed. 207; 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 163; Tuttle v. Moore, supra.

A public use is not determined simply by the question whether a physical use is made by the public; but the question is deeper and depends upon whether the use subserves the public good, or tends to that end.

Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 308; Stockton & V. R. Co. v. Stockton, 41 Cal. 172; Jones v. Mahaska County Coal Co. 47 Iowa, 39.

McCarty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff bases its right to condemn on § 3588, Rev. Stat. 1898, as amended in 1901 (Sess. Laws, chap. 25, p. 19), which provides that "the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: . . . (6) Roads, railroads, tramways, tunnels, ditches, flumes, pipes, and dumping places to facilitate the milling, smelting, or other reduction of ores, or the working of mines. . . ." Appellants (defendants below) contend that the foregoing provision of the statute is in conflict with § 22, art. 1, Utah Const., which provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation," for the reason that the use made of the right of way sought to be condemned is not a public use.

There appears to be an irreconcilable conflict in the authorities as to what constitutes a public use. This, no doubt, is largely due to the fact that in many cases what would be a public use in one jurisdiction would not be in another or different jurisdiction. Thus it has been almost uniformly held throughout the Pacific Coast states that the construction and operation of irrigation ditches is a public use, which doctrine, when applied to the arid region, has been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, whereas in Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, and other states where irrigation is not followed and is practically unknown, it would undoubtedly be held not a public use. Therefore what shall be considered a public use often depends somewhat upon the locality, the wants and necessities of the people, the conditions with which they are surrounded, and the nature and character of the natural resources of such locality, state, or commonwealth. And while it is for the legislature to determine, in the first instance, whether the use is a public use, and to provide the means of condemnation, yet the great weight of authority holds that the declaration of the legislature is not final, and that it is ultimately for the courts to determine whether a particular use is public or not. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 2d ed. 158. The text writers on eminent domain, and the adjudicated cases, practically all agree that, when the legislature has declared a use to be public, such declaration will be respected and followed by the courts, unless the act is clearly and palpably unconstitutional, or the necessity for the taking is plainly without reasonable foundation. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. 600; United States v. Gettysburg Electric R. Co. 160 U. S. 668, 40 L. ed. 576, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427; Dayton Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Seawell, 11 Nev. 394; Tuttle v. Moore, 3 Ind. Terr. 712, 64 S. W. 585; Mills, Em. Dom. 2d ed. 10; Lewis, Em. Dom. 158; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1070. For a further discussion of the general and well-established rule that legislative enactments are presumed to be constitutional unless the contrary clearly appears, see Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 128, 3 L. ed. 175; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Stewart v. Polk County, 30 Iowa, 1, 1 Am. Rep. 238; State ex rel. Wells v. Tingey, 24 Utah, 225, 67 Pac. 33, and cases cited; State ex rel. Breedon v. Lewis, 26 Utah, 120, 72 Pac. 388.

The reason for the rule, when applied to the law of eminent domain, is very apparent, as there are some uses for which private property may be condemned, the public character of which is so plain that there is no room for argument; and, on the other hand, there are innumerable uses for which property may be and is used, the private character of which is equally clear and plain. As stated by counsel for respondent, in their brief: "Between these two extremes, however, courts can approach a dividing line which is so shadowy that it leaves room for argument as to whether or not a statute is constitutional. A short distance on either side of the line the decision is plain, but on the line, and for a short distance on each side, it is doubtful." And, as hereinbefore stated, whenever the court is in doubt, it holds the statute constitutional. Therefore, unless it clearly appears that the use made of the right of way in question is private and in no sense public, the validity of the statute must be upheld. Some general rules by which the question as to what constitutes a public use may be determined were declared by this court in the case of Nash v. Clark, 27 Utah, 158, 101 Am. St. Rep. 953, 75 Pac. 371. In that case it was in effect held that when the taking is for a use that will promote the public interest, and which tends to develop the great natural resources of the state, such taking is for a public use.

The mining industry in this state is second in importance only to that of irrigation, and this court held in the case of Nash v. Clark, supra, that the construction and operation of irrigation ditches is a public use. Counsel for appellants, in his brief, concedes "that irrigation is a public use, and that the condemnation of lands for irrigation ditches is for a public use;" and again he says: "There is no person, I take it, of ordinary intelligence, that would assert or think for a moment that the system of irrigation, as adopted and used throughout this whole western country, is not surely a public benefit and a public use." In Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Fernald, 47 N. H. 444, the court, after speaking of the interests that New Hampshire had in the improvement and development of her natural water power, says: "No state of the Union is more interested than ours in the improvement of natural advantages for the application of water power to manufacturing purposes. Nature has denied to us the fertile soil and genial climate of other lands, but by way of compensation has endowed us with unrivaled opportunities of turning our streams of water to practical account. The present prosperity of the state is largely due to what has already been done towards developing these natural advantages, and there is no assignable limit to our resources in this respect if extended and connected enterprises for the improvement of the water power in the state should be successfully prosecuted hereafter. In no part of the world have the public a deeper interest in the success of all undertakings which promise to assist in the development of these great natural advantages. Whether we look to the interpretation which has been given in other jurisdictions to the term 'public use,' in reference to the right of taking private property for such a use; to the legislative practice under the provincial and state governments before and at the time when the Constitution was adopted; to the language of the Constitution itself; to the early and continued legislative practice under the Constitution; to the decisions of the courts in this state; or to the character of our business and the natural productions and resources of the state,—we are drawn to the conclusion that the legislature have power to authorize a private right that stands in the way of an enterprise set on foot for the improvement of the water power in a large stream like this river to be taken without the owner's consent, if suitable provision is made for his compensation; and that the act of 1862 is constitutional and valid."

The same reasons that hold that manufacturing is necessary to the public welfare in New Hampshire and other New England states can be urged in behalf of mining in Utah and other Western states. The mining industry in this state, and in others similarly situated, not only produces a home market for the products of the farm, and furnishes thousands of men with steady employment at liberal and remunerative wages, but also produces wealth which has enabled other industries to be created and to flourish, which, without the stimulus thus furnished, would languish. In Dayton Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Seawell, supra, Mr. Chief Justice Hawley, speaking for the court, aptly portrays some of the conditions and disadvantages under which the mining industry is prosecuted in this inter-mountain region, as well as some of the benefits derived therefrom, as follows: "The mining and milling interests give employment to many men, and the benefits derived from this business are distributed as much and sometimes more among the laboring classes than with the owners of the mines and mills. The mines are fixed by the laws of nature, and are often found in places almost inaccessible. For the purpose of successfully conducting and carrying on the business of 'mining, milling, smelting, or other reduction of ores,' it is necessary to erect hoisting works, to build mills, to construct smelting furnaces, to secure ample grounds for dumping waste, rock, and earth; and a road to and from the mine is always indispensable. The sites necessary for these purposes are often confined to certain fixed localities." We have in this state, in addition to the extensive deposits of gold, silver, lead, and copper ores, large areas of lands containing coal in almost limitless quantities, and we depend almost exclusively upon the coal mines for the fuel used in our manufacturing establishments and for domestic purposes. Now, it is of vital importance to the people that the coal, as well as the other hidden resources of the state, be opened up and developed, and that the mining industry in general, which has been the source of so much wealth to the people of this and other Western states, be conducted on the same extensive scale in the future that has characterized its operations in the past. Therefore the public policy of the state, as exemplified by the act of the legislature under consideration, is to encourage the people to open up and exploit the mines with which the state abounds, and thereby not only give to the state the wealth which will enable other industries to be created, but furnish thousands of laborers with remunerative employment.

It being conceded, and this court having held, that the construction and operation of irrigating ditches in this state is a public use (Nash v. Clark, supra), it follows that the construction of roads and tramways for the development of the mining industry is a public use, as the same line of reasoning that applies in support of the doctrine in the one case holds good in the other. Otherwise a party owning a few acres of farming land, or only a few square rods for that matter, could invoke the law of eminent domain, and by condemnation proceedings acquire a right of way across his neighbor's land for an irrigation ditch to convey water to his small holdings; whereas the owners of mines and of works for the reduction of ores, the operations of which furnish thousands of men in this state with employment at good wages, and to which the general prosperity of the state is largely due, would be denied the right to invoke this same rule of law in order to acquire, when necessary to the successful operation of their business, rights of way for the transportation of ores from the mines to the mills and smelters, and for the construction of tunnels for drainage and other purposes. And parties holding the title to ground necessary and suitable for these purposes, which, in many cases, except for such purposes, might be entirely worthless, would be clothed with power to demand and compel payment of an unconscionable price for their lands before parting with the title, or they could refuse, absolutely, to grant the easement required on any terms, and thereby in some cases cripple mining enterprises, or destroy them altogether. Such a policy would not only be inconsistent and unreasonable, but would greatly retard the development of one of the greatest natural resources of the state. We are therefore of the opinion, and so hold, that the construction and operation of roads and tramways for the development and working of mines is a public use. The act of the legislature under consideration makes ample provision for the payment of a fair price to the owner for lands sought to be condemned, and for all damages that he may suffer because of such taking, and is therefore valid.

There are several other questions of minor importance raised and discussed by appellants in their brief, but as neither the abstract nor brief contains a specification of the points relied upon as grounds for a reversal, as required by rule 6 of this court (49 Pac. xi.), they cannot be considered.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed, with costs.

DURHAM TRACTION COMPANY.

(138 N. C. 288.)

Street railway—overhanging curb—rights of abutting owner.

Laying a street railway track under authority of the municipal corporation so near a sidewalk the title to which is in the municipality, at a point where streets intersect at an acute angle, that passing cars will overhang it a few inches, gives no right of action to the abutting owner where his right of ingress to and egress from his property is not impaired.

(May 2, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged interference with plaintiff's rights in the highway in front of his property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Winston & Bryant and Fuller & Fuller, for appellant:

The legislature cannot authorize the taking of sidewalks for street railway purposes. If the abutter is injured by the street railway this would be an additional burden, and subject the company to damages.

Case Note.—Campbell v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078, presents features very similar to those of FESTER v. DURHAM TRACTION CO.

The complaint in that case showed the construction of defendant's street railway within 13 inches of the curbstone, that the grade of the street in front of plaintiff's property was steep, and that it was frequently necessary, in order to get the cars up the hill, to attach an extra pair of horses.

Merrick v. Intramontaine R. Co. 118 N. C. 1083, 24 S. E. 667.

If the principle were once ingrafted into our law, a street railway could, with the approval of the legislature, sweep away an entire sidewalk, and thereby destroy the value of abutting property, even in the business portion of the city. Commenting upon cases of this kind, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 181, 17 L. ed. 561, said that this class of decisions has gone to the utmost limit of sound, judicial construction, and in some cases beyond it.

The complaint then alleged that the defendants "often drive their horses and mules under the lash, causing the animals and mules to plunge, rear, pitch, and jump upon the sidewalk along and in front of plaintiff's property and house, greatly to the annoyance and disturbance of plaintiff and his family." A demurrer to the declaration was sustained, the court saying that while, under a constitutional provision for compensation for property "taken or damaged" for public use, an action might be maintained on proof of special damage to property by the construction of the railway, yet in the complaint before it there appeared no allegation of damage to the property of the plaintiff, but merely an allegation of annoyance to the occupants, which did not constitute an element of damage.

"If," says the court, however, "the matters complained of in this amendment damaged the property, the jury might consider them."

owner in cases of this sort is for an interference with his means of egress and ingress. Upon this subject, see note on "Injury to abutting owner by laying street railway tracks near side of street," in 43 L. R. A. 554. But in the HESTER CASE there was no impairment of the means of egress and ingress.

Where the injury complained of is not to the means of access, the right to damages for a given use of the sidewalk most frequently depends upon the question whether such use falls within the purposes for which the highway was dedicated. Thus, it has been held that the right of the public upon the highway is to pass and repass; and, consequently, one who stops upon the sidewalk for the purpose of abusing and vilifying the owner of the premises becomes a trespasser, and is liable as such. Adams v. Rivers, 11 Barb. 390. No question of this kind arises, however, in the HESTER CASE, as the street railway is undeniably a legitimate aid to travel.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff owns the lot which occupies the apex of the acute angle which lies at the junction of Main and Chapel Hill streets in the city of Durham. The defendant, by permission of the board of aldermen of the city, laid a curved track to pass from one street to the other, as per below diagram:

This track was located and laid under the direction of the street commissioner, who made his report to the board of aldermen, the expenses of the work being borne by the defendant. This curved track was used in the summer in the evenings from 6:30 until the cars went to the barn for the night, about 11 or 11:30. The curve was laid for the convenience of the public in going from West Durham to the park and returning. Prior to its being laid, the passengers had to be transferred at that point, known as "Five Points," or else the West Durham car had to go down Main street, and, reversing fenders, seats, and trolley, run back up Chapel Hill street. To avoid this great inconvenience to the public, the board of aldermen authorized this curve to be put in to run round the sharp angle at the junction of the two streets. Only passenger cars are used,—no freight cars. On Main street the nearest rail of the track is $15\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the outside edge of the sidewalk, and it is $13\frac{1}{2}$ feet on Chapel Hill street from the nearest rail to curb. The curved track in rounding the point does not touch the sidewalk, but at the southeast corner as the curve enters Chapel Hill street, the edge of the car for a few inches of distance is slightly over the edge of the sidewalk. The complaint avers that the rear of the car does this, but this is evidently a mistake, for, as the concave side of the curve is toward the plaintiff's lot, the rear of the car necessarily swings outward, not in. It is also in evidence that at the southeast corner of the sidewalk the cross-ties, extending 18 inches further than the rail, have their extreme ends under the sidewalk. They are not above the surface, but under, and as the cross-ties, thus imbedded out of sight, cannot impede the use of the sidewalk, which is the property of the city, the plaintiff can have no possible ground of action on that account. The sidewalk on Main street is 10 feet wide, and that on Chapel Hill street is 8 feet. The southeast corner, where the passing car overhangs, is diagonally distant about 11 feet from the southeast corner of the plaintiff's lot.

The plaintiff's cause of action depends upon whether he is injured in the use of his property by the slight overhanging of the pavement by the car for an instant of time as it passes the southeast corner where the curve enters or leaves Chapel Hill street. The charter of the city of Durham shows that, as usual, the city has the same right and title to the sidewalks as to the rest of its streets. The defendant's track was laid under authority of its charter, "permission being first had" of the city as required. The construction of a street passenger railway "does not impose any additional servitude upon the property fronting on the street so occupied." Merrick v. Intramontaine R. Co. 118 N. C. 1081, 24 S. E. 667, Citing Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. 167 Pa. 70, 27 L. R. A. 766, 46 Am. St. Rep. 659, 31 Atl. 468; State, Kennelly, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 57 N. J. L. 293, 26 L. R. A. 281, 30 Atl. 531; Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 558; Cooley, Const. Lim. 683; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 723. To the same purport, Carolina C. R. Co. v. Wilmington Street R. Co. 120 N. C. 523, 26 S. E. 913; Smith v. Goldsboro, 121 N. C. 350, 28 S. E. 479; Cumberland Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. United Electric R. Co. 93 Tenn. 492, 27 L. R. A. 239, 29 S. W. 104; La Crosse City R. Co. v. Higbee, 107 Wis. 389, 51 L. R. A. 923, 83 N. W. 701; Booth, Street Railways, § 83; Joyce, Electric Laws, §§ 336-339, 341; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 27-29.

The authorities, with singular uniformity, concur that it is "now well settled that the use of the streets in cities or villages for a street railway is one of the ordinary purposes for which such streets and highways may be used, and does not impose an additional burden or servitude, so as to entitle the abutting property owner, as a matter of right to compensation before such use can be made. . . . This rule 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) is generally recognized, irrespective of the question whether, in the original laying out of the street, a mere easement was taken, leaving the fee simple in the abutting property." The rights, powers, and liability of the municipality extend equally to the sidewalk as to the roadway, for both are parts of the street. Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671, 19 S. E. 767; 2 Smith, Mun. Corp. § 1304; Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 20. This is recognized by Code, § 3803, and by the courts, which hold towns and cities to the same degree of liability for failure to repair sidewalks as to repair the other part of the street. Bunch v. Edenton, 90 N. C. 431; Russell v. Monroe, 116 N. C. 726, 47 Am. St. Rep. 823, 21 S. E. 550; Neal v. Marion, 129 N. C. 345, 40 S. E. 116; Wolfe v. Pearson, 114 N. C. 621, 19 S. E. 264; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 780, note 1, 1008, 1012. In Bunch v. Edenton, 90 N. C. 431, "it was the positive duty of the corporate authorities of the town to keep the streets, including the sidewalks, in proper repair." The charter of Durham gives the same powers over sidewalks, and imposes the same liabilities upon the city for failure to repair the sidewalks, as in regard to the other part of the street. In La Crosse City R. Co. v. Higbee, 107 Wis. 402, 51 L. R. A. 929, 83 N. W. 701, it is said: "There is no limit to the public right to use a street, and every part of it, so long as that use is in aid of public travel thereon, and does not unnecessarily interfere with the common use of the way by ordinary modes of travel, and is no substantial impairment of private rights of property."

The complaint avers three grounds of damage:

(1) That 2 inches of the plaintiff's lot is covered by the defendant's track. But the evidence shows that the rail at the nearest point of the curve is 3 inches outside the curbing to the sidewalk, and the pleadings admit that no part of the plaintiff's lot (inside the sidewalk) is overhung by the car in passing.

(2) That vehicles have almost no approach to the lot. But the evidence is that between the outer edge of the sidewalk and the defendant's nearest rail there is 15½ feet on Main street and 13½ feet on Chapel Hill street. It is only at the apex—at the toe of the boot, so to speak—that the track approximates the outer edge of the sidewalk. There is ample evidence that the curve does not interfere with carriages standing on either street in front of the plaintiff's lot. As the toe of the plaintiff's lot is only 7 feet 7 inches, and, being an acute angle, it would be barely 4 feet, perhaps, at the edge of the sidewalk, a carriage could not stand there. The toe of the sidewalk (the cross sidewalk) is 22 feet $5\frac{1}{4}$ inches, but over 18 feet of this is "frontage," not of the plaintiff's lot, but caused by continuation of the two sidewalks, for, if the plaintiff's lot were extended to the eastern edge of the sidewalk at that place, it would be narrowed, as already said, to a point with almost no front at all.

(3) That cars frequently run off the track at that point. The only evidence is that they did run off the track three or four times when the curve was first used. There is no evidence of any injury to the plaintiff from this cause.

The sidewalk is simply a part of the street which the town authorities have set apart for the use of pedestrians. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 103; Ottawa v. Spencer, 40 Ill. 217; Chicago v. O'Brien, 111 Ill. 532, 53 Am. Rep. 640. The abutting proprietor has no more right in the sidewalk than in the roadway. His rights are simply that the street, including roadway and sidewalk, shall not be closed or obstructed so as to impair ingress or egress to his lot by himself and those whom he invites there for trade or other purposes. Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681, 10 S. E. 689; White v. Northwestern North Carolina R. Co. 113 N. C. 610, 22 L. R. A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 639, 18 S. E. 330. As said in State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1014, 48 L. R. A. 446, 35 S. E. 473: "An abutting owner to a street and sidewalk has an easement in his frontage which he may use in subordination to the superior rights of the public." Sidewalks are of modern origin. Anciently they were unknown, as they still are in Eastern countries, and in perhaps a majority of the towns and villages of Europe. In the absence of statutes, a town is not required to construct a sidewalk. Atty. Gen. v. Boston, 142 Mass. 200, 7 N. E. 722. It is for the town to prescribe the width of the sidewalk. In the absence of statutory restriction, it may widen, narrow, or even remove, a sidewalk already established. Ibid. To widen a sidewalk narrows the roadway. To widen the roadway narrows the sidewalk. The proportion of the street to be preserved for pedestrians and vehicles, respectively, is in the sound discretion of the town authorities. Here they might narrow the sidewalk at the toe of the plaintiff's lot by drawing in its outer edge, or it might make the outer edge curving to correspond with the curve of the car track, and thus prevent the car overhanging the edge of the sidewalk. If so, it may, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, let the car overhang the corner instead of cutting off that corner from the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sidewalk. If the sidewalk were so far narrowed as to impede the circulation of passers-by on foot, so as to hinder the ingress and egress to the plaintiff's building, he would have cause of complaint; but such is not the case here. If the overhanging of the car were to injure anyone walking on the sidewalk, such person might possibly have a cause of action against the city or the defendant, for the establishment and maintenance of the sidewalk are an invitation to pedestrians to walk anywhere thereon, but the plaintiff would not be injured thereby in his property rights to the lot, which is this cause of action. As to pedestrians, the city can protect itself by reducing the width of the sidewalk at that point, or, by condemning a few inches of the plaintiff's lot, it could make a cut-off at the outer corner without reducing the width of the sidewalk; but it should be remembered that that small space, occasionally overhung by a passing car, is at a corner of the street, and therefore the sidewalk, measured diagonally, is wider there than elsewhere, and would still be wider, though the little space overhung were cut off from the sidewalk, or the outer curbing of the sidewalk were drawn in and made curving at that point.

In holding that the acts of the defendant complained of by the plaintiff were not unlawful and did not constitute a cause of action, there was no error.

Case Note.—It is now held in nearly every state that the liability of a common carrier for the loss of property transported may be limited, to some extent at least, by a special express contract; but the weight of authority denies the right of the carrier to exempt itself from liability for loss resulting from its own negligence or the negligence of its employees. A contract limiting liability must be reasonable and supported by some consideration. A carrier cannot force such a contract upon the shipper, but must give him the option of having his property transported at a higher carriage rate without limitation upon the carrier's liability.

The weight of authority upholds the validity of a contract limiting a common carrier's liability to an agreed or limited goods and failure to deliver are shown, and both loss and responsibility are admitted.

2. Same—limited valuation—approval by state commission.

The approval by the state commission of a freight rate based on limited valuation of the property does not, although the carrier is bound to transport at that rate, absolve it from liability for full value of the property if it is lost through its negligence.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pamlico County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of property lost while in defendants' possession for transportation. Affirmed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

The plaintiffs brought action for damages sustained by failure of the defendants to deliver certain packages of freight, delivered to the defendant the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company at Elizabeth City, North Carolina, on October 22, 1901, to be transported for hire over the lines of the defendant Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company, via Norfolk, Virginia, to Thomasville, North Carolina, on the Southern Railway. The defendants did not deny that certain parcels or packages of freight delivered to the Norfolk & Southern had not been delivered to the plaintiffs on demand. Both defendants admitted that under the evidence, as it stood, each of them was liable to the plaintiffs for damages, but contended that the amount was only $30. The following facts also appeared from the record: The goods were shipped on a released bill of lading, wherein they were valued at $5 per 100 pounds, with a freight rate approved by the corporation commission. The following were the approved rates on household goods, calculated by 100 pounds, to be carried 100 miles: (1) Unlimited in value and unreleased, classified as double first-class, rate 96 cents. (2) Unlimited in value but released, first-class rate 48 cents. (3) Limited in value to $5 per hundredweight, but unreleased, first-class rate 48 cents. (4) Limited to $5 in value and released, fourth-class rate 24 cents. The goods were shipped under the last-named classification and rate. The portion of goods lost weighed 600 pounds, which, according to the valuation specified in the bill of lading, would amount to $30. The jury found that the goods lost were worth $250. The question presented to the jury on the issue agreed upon was, What was the actual value of the goods lost by the defendants? The question sub-valuation of the property transported, if such contract is just and reasonable, and a reduction in freight charges is made in consideration for it.

4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1510; Lawson, Contracts of Carriers, pp. 24-57; Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. § 250, and Baldwin, Am. Railroad Law, pp. 344-347, lay down substantially the same doctrine.

The leading case on this subject is Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, in which the court sustained the validity of a contract limiting a railroad company's liability to an agreed sum, in consideration of special transportation rates, and denied the right of the shipper to recover the real value of the horses shipped and lost through the negligence of the carrier, although such value was greater than the agreed valuation. The court said that, "where a contract of the kind signed by the shipper is fairly made, agreeing on the valuation of the property carried, with the rate of freight based on the condition that the carrier assumes liability only to the extent of the agreed valuation, even in case of loss or damage by the negligence of the carrier, the contract will be upheld as a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier may be responsible and the freight he receives, and of protecting himself against extravagant and fanciful valuations."

But where a stipulation in the bill of lading places a limited valuation on the property carried in case of loss through the default of the carrier, the shipper is not bound when the stipulation is not made in consideration of special shipping rates. Mc-mitted to the court under the admitted facts of the case and the verdict was, "Shall the plaintiff recover $250, the value of the articles lost as found by the jury, or $30, the value of the articles as specified in the bill of lading?" On the verdict, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for $250, and the defendants excepted and appealed.

Messrs. F. H. Busbee & Son, for appellants:

The later cases point out the difference between a contract releasing a carrier from liability arising out of its negligence, on the one hand, and a contract in which, in consideration of a reduced rate of carriage, it is stipulated that the value of articles shipped, in case of loss, shall not exceed a definite amount.

A common carrier is entitled to be fairly informed as to the value of the property confided to his care; and, where a shipper enters into an agreement with a carrier as to the value of the property shipped, and receives the benefit of low rates by reason of placing a low valuation upon the property, he is estopped from recovering a higher valuation after the loss occurs, although loss may be the result of negligence on the part of the carrier, provided the same is not gross, wanton, or wilful. furnishing the basis of the liability assumed and the compensation to be paid is valid.

6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 400.

In the present case the rates are not made by the carrier, but are prescribed for it by the administrative body, known as the corporation commission, exercising the legislative power of rate making. The carrier, under heavy penalties, is obliged to carry out these rates. The carrier did not fix the valuation of the articles shipped, but the corporation commission representing the great body of citizens, including the shipper, has prescribed the exact terms of the contract to be made between carrier and shipper. In conforming to these terms the carrier cannot be held chargeable with a determination to evade its common-law or statutory liability.

Where the act was one in which the carrier would be only liable for negligence, or the loss was one within the exceptions provided by special contract of shipment, then "the burden is on the plaintiff to show negligence on the part of the carrier as the approximate cause of the loss; the mere fact of loss or injury creates in itself no presumption of negligence."

St. Rep. 397, 60 N. W. 1084.

The contract which the court is asked to construe is not a contract limiting the liability of the defendants. It is a contract under which the shipper and the carrier have agreed that if a low rate is given, the value of the property is conclusively fixed at a definite amount. The parties are not forbidden to make a reasonable contract limiting the value of the articles shipped, even in case of negligence.

Mr. A. D. Ward for appellees.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the law of this state that a common carrier may relieve itself from liability as an insurer upon a contract reasonable in its terms and founded upon a valuable consideration, but it cannot so limit its responsibility for loss or damage resulting from its negligence. In Capehart v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 81 N. C. 438, 31 Am. Rep. 505, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ashe, J., commenting on several decisions as to the right of a common carrier by contract to restrict its liability, thus sums up the matter: "That a common carrier, being an insurer against all losses and damages except those occurring from the act of God or the public enemy, may, by special notice brought to the knowledge of the owner of goods delivered for transportation, or by contract, restrict his liability as an insurer where there is no negligence on his part. (2) That he [a common carrier] cannot, by contract even, limit [his] responsibility for loss or damage resulting from [his] want of due exercise of ordinary care." Elsewhere in the opinion it is held, as stated, that a contract restricting liability as an insurer must be for valuable consideration and reasonable in its terms. The defendants having received the goods for transportation as a common carrier and failed to deliver on demand, and also admitting both loss and responsibility, the law will presume such loss attributable to the defendants' negligence. Mitchell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 124 N. C. 236, 44 L. R. A. 515, 32 S. E. 671; Raleigh Hosiery Co. v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 131 N. C. 238, 42 S. E. 602; Parker v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 133 N. C. 335, 63 L. R. A. 827, 45 S. E. 658. This presumption of the law, arising from the facts proved and admitted, is confirmed by the statement that the goods were shipped "released;" that is, released from liability against which the defendants were permitted to contract, to wit, loss occasioned otherwise than by their negligence.

We have it, then, established that the defendants, by their negligence as common carriers, caused the loss of the plaintiffs' household goods delivered to them for transportation, to the pecuniary value of $250; that by the valuation specified in the bill of lading the amount of the loss is limited to $30; and the question presented to the court is, for which sum shall judgment be rendered? It is the law of this state, declared by repeated decisions, that common carriers are not permitted to contract against loss occasioned by their own negligence. They can contract neither for total nor for partial exemption from loss so occasioned. Capehart v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 81 N. C. 438, 31 Am. Rep. 505; Gardner v. Southern R. Co. 127 N. C. 293, 37 S. E. 328. The same doctrine is very generally accepted in other jurisdictions. It would be an idle thing for the courts to declare the principle that contracts for total exemption from such loss are subversive of public policy and void, and at the same time permit and uphold a partial limitation which could avail to prevent anything like adequate and substantial recovery by the shipper. Therefore it is held that any limitation of liability by contract designed for the purpose is forbidden. Raleigh Hosiery Co. v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 131 N. C. 238, 42 S. E. 602. In Gardner v. Southern R. Co. 127 N. C. 293, 37 S. E. 328, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule of law, practically of universal acceptance, that for reasons of public policy a common carrier is not permitted, even by express stipulation, to exempt itself from loss occasioned by its own negligence;" citing Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469, and numerous other decisions. It is further said: "The measure of such liability is necessarily the amount of the loss; and, if the common carrier is permitted to stipulate that it shall be liable only for an amount greatly less than the value of the property so lost,—that is, for only a small part of the loss,—it is thereby exempted pro tanto from the results of its own negligence. Such a course, if permitted, would practically evade the decisions of the courts and nullify the settled policy of the law." In Moulton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 31 Minn. 89, 47 Am. Rep. 781, 16 N. W. 497, it is said: "The same reasons which forbid that a common carrier should, even by express contract, be absolved from liability for its own negligence, stand, also, in the way of any arbitrary preadjustment of the measure of damages where the carrier is partially relieved from such liability. It would, indeed, be absurd to say that the requirement of the law as to such responsibility of the carrier is absolute and cannot be laid aside, even by the agreement of the parties, but that one half or three fourths of this burden, which the law compels the carrier to bear, may be laid aside by means of a contract limiting the recovery of damages to one half or one fourth of the known value of the property. This would be mere evasion, which would not be tolerated." In United States Exp. Co. v. Backman, 28 Ohio St. 156, it is said: "To permit carriers to fix a limitation to the amount of their liabilities for negligence, is, in effect, to permit them to exempt themselves from such liability." In Hutchinson, Carriers, § 250, the doctrine is thus stated: "A . . . majority of the authorities in the United States hold that it is contrary to public policy to permit the carrier to stipulate for exemption from the effects of the negligence of himself or his servants," and "it is held by the majority of the courts that a contract limiting the liability of the carrier to a certain sum in case of loss,—that is, contracts designed to secure a partial exemption from liability,—while valid and conclusive where the loss is caused by something other than the carrier's neglect, cannot be allowed to operate where the loss was occasioned by the negligence of himself or his servants; but that in such a case the owner may recover the full value of the goods."

The defendants do not seriously contend that such is not the law of this state; nor do they controvert the position that they would ordinarily be responsible for the amount of the loss established by the verdict of the jury. It is claimed by the defendants, however, that the amount of recovery against them could only be for $30, because the value to that amount was fixed under the rating established and sanctioned by the corporation commission; that the defendants are compelled to take the goods at that rate, and, as they can only charge the rate, they should only be held to the valuation which is made the basis of the rate. This position is plausible, but not convincing. In the first place, it is fair to conclude that the corporation commission intended that this regulation should be in accordance with law, and that the valuation should only obtain in case of loss not arising from negligence. But, if it were otherwise, the result would be the same. The commission is authorized to make just and reasonable rates of freight, but it has no power to change the law, nor to make a rate based upon any such idea; and, if this regulation has the necessary effect of enabling the common carriers of the state, in shipments of this kind, to evade their responsibility for negligence, the conclusion is not that the law is thereby changed, but that the regulation itself is invalid. We are satisfied that in this instance both the commission and the railroads were prompted by a laudable motive to afford shippers of small means a lower freight rate. But we cannot allow such consideration in a particular case to change the rule of law that we here uphold. It is one in which the entire public is interested as well as the individual shipper, established and adhered to for grave and weighty reasons, and necessary for the protection of the great body of shippers. A principle so vital to the public interest should not be altered or weakened because, in a given instance, the motive is good and the particular result desirable. If this valuation entered as an essential element into the rate here contended for, and the result would enable carriers to evade the law, the rate itself is invalid, and to that extent is not a binding regulation.

There is a class of cases which permits the shipper and carrier to make an agreed valuation of goods delivered for transportation, and which, under certain circumstances in case of loss, will hold the shipper to the agreed valuation, though this be less than the actual value, and though the loss be occasioned by the carrier's negligence. In some jurisdictions, contracts of this kind are not sanctioned in respect to loss occasioned by negligence. In others, such agreements are upheld where, the carrier being without knowledge or notice as to the true value, the parties agree upon a valuation of the particular goods shipped, approximating the average value of ordinary goods of like kind, and make such valuation the basis of a just and reasonable shipping rate. In yet others, such agreements would seem to be upheld where the agreed valuation is known to be less than the actual value, provided the same are fairly entered into and made the basis of the shipping rate. But in none of these is the valuation relied upon in this bill of lading sanctioned or justified to the extent here claimed for it. So far as we can discover, all of them condemn an effort to limit liability for negligence by a uniform predetermined valuation arbitrarily fixed, and placed in a printed bill of lading without any reference to the actual value of the property, and without any estimate made or attempted to value the property of the particular shipment, more especially where the difference between the stipulated and actual value is so pronounced that the evident purpose and necessary effect are to practically deny recovery for negligence. The better considered authorities, as far as we recall, forbid and condemn a limitation of liability for negligence under the circumstances here described. See Moulton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 31 Minn. 89, 47 Am. Rep. 781, 16 N. W. 497; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Keener, 93 Ga. 808, 44 Am. St. Rep. 197, 21 S. E. 287; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wynn, 88 Tenn. 320, 14 S. W. 311; Willock v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 166 Pa. 184, 27 L. R. A. 228, 45 Am. St. Rep. 674, 30 Atl. 948; United States Exp. Co. v. Backman, 28 Ohio St. 156. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Keener was a case very much like the one we are now considering. In that case Simmons, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Where a shipper enters into an express contract with a common carrier by which he agrees, in consideration of a reduced rate of freight, that the carrier shall not be liable for more than a stated sum in case the goods shipped are lost while in the carrier's possession, the contract will be upheld as to loss not involving negligence on the part of the carrier; but carriers cannot by any special contract exempt themselves from liability for loss occasioned by their negligence; and this is so as well where the contract provides for partial or limited exemption as where it contemplates total exemption from liability." After stating that under certain circumstances an agreed valuation will be upheld, Judge Simmons continues: "But the principle which relieves the carrier from liability for more than the agreed value does not apply where the valuation is merely arbitrary and fixed without reference to the real value of the goods, and this is understood by the carrier as well as the shipper. In the present case there is no inquiry on the part of the carrier as to the value of the goods, and it is clear that a valuation of $5 per 100 pounds for wearing apparel and household goods, indiscriminately, could not have been understood to represent their actual value. The contract in question was simply an attempt to limit the liability of the carrier without regard to the actual value of the property; and it follows from what we have said that it was inoperative for that purpose if the loss was occasioned by negligence on the part of the defendant. There being no explanation as to how the loss occurred, the presumption is that it resulted from the defendant's negligence."

It is not claimed here that the carrier was misled or deceived in any way as to the kind or value of these goods. There is neither allegation nor issue, addressed to any such question, and, as we understand it, the defendants did not intend or desire to raise it. Some of the goods lost were perhaps not correctly classified as household goods, but the amount properly described as household goods was more than sufficient to justify the verdict. As a matter of fact, no inquiry was made about the value of the goods, and no statement made concerning them one way or the other. The agent just classified them at the established rate and uniform valuation provided for by the regulation and printed in the bill of lading, and no effort was made to estimate or put any value on the goods of this particular shipment. The defendants rest their defense, and, as we understand, desired to rest it, on the sole ground that they received the goods at a rate and on a valuation established and sanctioned by the corporation commission, and claim that by virtue of such regulation the recovery is limited to $5 per 100 pounds, amounting in the goods lost to $30. We declare our opinion to be that the valuation does not restrict the liability of the carriers for losses arising from their negligence, and that the rules of the corporation commission could give it no such effect, even if so intended. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount of his loss as declared by the verdict of the jury. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

W. P. HORTON, Appt.

(139 N. C. 588.)

1. Homicide—in commission of unlawful act.

Mere violation of a statute making it a misdemeanor to hunt on another's property without a permit is not such an unlawful act as to render an accidental homicide committed while so doing a criminal offense.

2. Offense malum in se.

An offense malum in se is one which is naturally evil as adjudged by the sense of a civilized community.

3. Game—property in.

Wild game is the property of the captor, and not of him on whose land it is taken.

4. Statute forbidding hunting—purpose of.

A statute forbidding hunting on another's property without a permit, under a penalty of not to exceed $10 fine, cannot be presumed to have been passed for the protection of human life.

(October 24, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Franklin County, convicting him of manslaughter. Reversed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

Indictment for manslaughter. The jury rendered a special verdict, and such verdict and proceedings thereon are as follows: "That in the month of November, 1904, to wit, on the — day thereof, the defendant, W. P. Horton, was hunting turkeys on the lands of another; that the following local statute, enacted by the general assembly of 1901, was in force at and in the place in which said defendant was hunting, to wit, chapter 410 of the Laws of 1901; that the said Horton, at the time he was so hunting, is said the unlawful act must be wilful, and not a mere misadventure. So the fact that, while persons were engaged in a friendly scuffle, a pistol which one of them unlawfully carried in his pocket was discharged and killed the other, did not make a case of homicide caused by the performance of a wrongful act, though carrying the pistol was unlawful.

In Potter v. State, 162 Ind. 213, 64 L. R. A. 942, 102 Am. St. Rep. 198, 70 N. E. 129, which was a case of the accidental discharge of a pistol, unlawfully carried, while persons were in a friendly scuffle, the court quoted 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 332, as follows: "It is malum prohibitum, not malum in se, for an unauthorized person to kill game in England, contrary to the statutes; if, in unlawful shooting at game, he accidentally kills a man, it is no more criminal in him than if he were authorized." But the court adds: "With equal reason and force it may be asserted, that the mere fact that the accused was unlawfully carrying the weapon in question at the time it was accidentally discharged is not, under the circumstances, a material element in the case, for it is manifest that such unlawful act did not, during the scuffle between the parties, render the pistol any more liable to be discharged than though the carrying thereof had been lawful." The court, also, in illustrating its position, said: "If, while engaged in hunting, in violation of the statute, the pistol, through, or by reason of, the culpable negligence of appellant, had been discharged, and killed the deceased, the law, under such circumstances, would not have attributed his death to the unlawful act of hunting, but would have imputed it to such negligence. In fact, under such circumstances, the unlawful act of hunting would not be a factor in or add anything to the case. It would constitute nothing more than a separate and distinct offense."

Case Note.—The opinion in the above case, deciding that an accidental homicide is not a criminal offense merely because it was committed while hunting on another's property without a permit, though that constituted a misdemeanor, since the prohibited hunting was merely malum prohibitum, and not malum in se, is fully supported by the authorities marshaled at length in the annotation in 63 L. R. A. 353, on the general subject of homicide in the commission of an unlawful act. The author's conclusion is, from the examination of the very great number of authorities, that to render one guilty of involuntary manslaughter for a killing without design while in the commission of an unlawful act, the act must have been malum in se, as distinguished from acts malum prohibitum, which are merely prohibited by law, but are not otherwise wrong; since such acts do not supply the criminal intent necessary to render one punishable for the killing. The most important cases, however, that are cited in support of that doctrine, are those which the court in the above case has discussed at length in its opinion; and in most of the cases in which accidental homicide has been committed as an unintended result of some unlawful act which is not a felony, the unlawful act has been one which the courts have regarded as criminal in its nature.

Thus, in People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 50 Pac. 675, and similar cases, the court held the homicide manslaughter because the unlawful act, though not a felony, was sufficiently dangerous to come under the condemnation of the law.

And in People v. Abbott, 116 Mich. 263, 74 N. W. 529, it is held that the unlawful act from which death results need not be a misdemeanor at common law in order to make the killing manslaughter, if it is a misdemeanor by statute.

And in Robbins v. State, 8 Ohio St. 138, it 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

had not the written consent of the owner of said land or of his lawful agent; that while so engaged in hunting he killed Charlie Hunt, the deceased, but that said killing was wholly unintentional; that the shooting of the deceased was done while the defendant was under the impression and belief that he was shooting at a wild turkey; that the hunting engaged in by the defendant was not of itself dangerous to human life, nor was he reckless in the manner of hunting or of handling the firearm with which the killing was done; that hunting at that season was not forbidden under the general game law of the state, but was prohibited only by the special statute referred to; that the shooting from which the killing resulted was not done in such grossly careless or negligent manner as to imply any moral turpitude or to indicate any indifference to the safeguarding of human life; that but for the said statute herein incorporated, the killing of the deceased by defendant does not constitute any violation of the law. If, upon the above findings of fact, the court should be of opinion that the defendant is guilty of manslaughter, we, for our verdict find the defendant guilty of manslaughter; but, if the court should be of opinion that the defendant is not guilty, we, for our verdict, find that the defendant is not guilty." Upon this special finding, the court, being of opinion that the defendant was guilty of manslaughter, so adjudged, and ordered a verdict of guilty of manslaughter to be entered, and gave judgment that the defendant be imprisoned in the county jail of Franklin for a period of four months. Defendant excepted to the ruling of the court, and appealed from the judgment against him.

Messrs. F. S. Spruill and W. H. Ruffin, for appellant:

It is not sufficient that the act or sport engaged in is merely malum prohibitum, i. e., unlawful or wrong because forbidden by some police regulation. It must, as an additional and essential element, be such an act or sport as, in itself, is dangerous; or it must be engaged in in a grossly careless and reckless manner.

State v. Vines, 93 N. C. 493, 53 Am. Rep. 466; State v. Turnage, 138 N. C. 566, 49 S. E. 913; State v. Capps, 134 N. C. 622, 46 S. E. 730.

Mr. Robert D. Gilmer, Attorney General, for appellee:

If acts involve any degree of public mischief or private injury they must belong to the class of actions denominated mala in se.

Key v. Vattier, 1 Ohio, 132; 1 Sharswood's Bl. Com. p. 58, note.

If the act be unlawful in itself, as shooting at deer in another's park, without leave, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

though in sport, and without any felonious intent, whereby a bystander is killed, it will be manslaughter.

1 East, P. C. p. 269; 1 Hale, P. C. p. 38; McClain, Criminal Law, § 23.

The distinction between malum prohibitum and malum in se (which never had the support of just reason) has disappeared.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Central Transp. Co. 65 Fed. 164.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It will be noted that the finding of the jury declares that the act of the defendant was not in itself dangerous to human life, and excludes every element of criminal negligence, and rests the guilt or innocence of the defendant on the fact alone that at the time of the homicide the defendant was hunting on another's land without written permission from the owner. The act, which applies only in the counties of Orange, Franklin, and Scotland, makes the conduct a misdemeanor, and imposes a punishment on conviction of not less than $5 nor more than $10. The statement sometimes appears in works of approved excellence to the effect that an unintentional homicide is a criminal offense when occasioned by a person engaged at the time in an unlawful act. In nearly every instance, however, will be found the qualification that if the act in question is free from negligence, and not in itself of dangerous tendency, and the criminality must arise, if at all, entirely from the fact that it is unlawful, in such case, the unlawful act must be one that is malum in se, and not merely malum prohibitum, and this we hold to be the correct doctrine. In Foster's Crown Law, it is thus stated, at page 258: "In order to bring the case within this description [excusable homicide], the act upon which death ensueth must be lawful. For if the act be unlawful,—I mean if it be malum in se,—the case will amount to felony, either murder or manslaughter, as circumstances may vary the nature of it. If it be done in prosecution of a felonious intention it will be murder; but if the intent went no farther than to commit a bare trespass, manslaughter." At page 259 the same author puts an instance, with his comments thereon, as follows: "A shooteth at the poultry of B., and by accident killeth a man. If his intention was to steal the poultry, which must be collected from the circumstances, it will be murder by reason of that felonious intent; but if it was done wantonly and without that intention, it will be barely manslaughter. The rule I have laid down supposeth that the act from which death ensued was malum in se. For if it was barely malum prohibitum, as shooting at game by a person not qualified by statute law to keep or use a gun for that purpose, the case of a person so offending will fall under the same rule as that of a qualified man; for the statutes prohibiting the destruction of the game under certain penalties will not, in a question of this kind, enhance the accident beyond its intrinsic moment."

One of these disqualifying statutes here referred to as an instance of malum prohibitum was an act passed (Stat. 13 Rich. II. chap. 13) to prevent certain classes of persons from keeping dogs, nets, or engines to destroy game, etc., and the punishment imposed on conviction was one year's imprisonment. There were others imposing a lesser penalty. Bishop, in his work entitled New Criminal Law (vol. 1, §§ 331, 332), treats of the matter as follows: "In these cases of an unintended evil result, the intent whence the act accidentally sprang must probably be, if specific, to do a thing which is malum in se, and not merely malum prohibitum. Thus Archbold [New Crim. Proc. 9], says: 'When a man in the execution of one act, by misfortune or chance, and not designedly, does another act, for which, if he had wilfully committed it, he would be liable to be punished,—in that case, if the act he was doing were lawful, or merely malum prohibitum, he shall not be punishable for the act arising from misfortune or chance; but, if malum in se, it is otherwise.' To illustrate: Since it is malum prohibitum, not malum in se, for an unauthorized person to kill game in England contrary to the statutes, if, in unlawfully shooting at game, he accidentally kills a man, it is no more criminal in him than if he were authorized. But to shoot at another's fowls, wantonly or in sport,—an act which is malum in se, though a civil trespass,—and thereby accidentally to kill a human being, is manslaughter. If the intent in the shooting were to commit larceny of the fowls, we have seen that it would be murder." To same effect is Estell v. State, 51 N. J. L. 182, 17 Atl. 118; Com. v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 19 Am. Rep. 362. An offense malum in se is properly defined as one which is naturally evil as adjudged by the sense of a civilized community, whereas an act malum prohibitum is wrong only because made so by statute. For the reason that acts malum in se have, as a rule, become criminal offenses by the course and development of the common law, an impression has sometimes obtained that only acts can be so classified which the common law makes criminal; but this is not at all the test. An act can be, and frequently is, mal- um in se, when it amounts only to a civil trespass, provided it has a malicious element or manifests an evil nature or wrongful disposition to harm or injure another in his person or property. Bishop, New Crim. Law, supra; Com. v. Adams, supra. The distinction between the two classes of acts is well stated in 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. at page 705: "An offense malum in se is one which is naturally evil, as murder, theft, or the like; offenses at common law are generally malum in se. An offense malum prohibitum, on the contrary, is not naturally an evil, but becomes so in consequence of its being forbidden."

We do not hesitate to declare that the offense of the defendant in hunting on the land without written permission of the owner was malum prohibitum, and, the special verdict having found that the act in which the defendant was engaged was not in itself dangerous to human life, and negatived all idea of negligence, we hold that the case is one of excusable homicide, and the defendant should be declared not guilty. We are referred by the attorney general to East's pleas of the Crown and Hale's pleas of the Crown as authorities against this position. We would be slow indeed to hold that the law differed from what these eminent authors declared it to be in their day and time, nor are we required to do so; for a careful examination of their writings will, we think, confirm the views expressed by the court. My Lord Hale does say in vol. 1, p. 39, that "if a man do ex intentione and voluntarily an unlawful act, tending to bodily hurt of any person, as by striking or beating him, though he did not intend to kill him, but the death of the party struck doth follow thereby within the year and day; or if he strike at one, and, missing him, kills another whom he did not intend, this is felony and homicide, and not casualty or per infortunium. So it is, if he be doing an unlawful act, though not intending bodily harm of any person, as throwing a stone at another's horse, if it hit a person and kill him, this is felony and homicide and not per infortunium; for the act was voluntary, though the event not intended; and therefore, the act itself being unlawful, he is criminally guilty of the consequence that follows." But this author says, in treating of the same subject, at pages 475, 476: "So, if A throw a stone at a bird, and the stone striketh and killeth another to whom he intended no harm, it is per infortunium; but if he had thrown a stone to kill the poultry or cattle of B and the stone hit and kill a bystander, it is manslaughter, because the act was unlawful; but not murder, because he did it not maliciously or with an intent to hurt the bystander. By the statute of 33 Hen. VIII., chap. 6, 'no person not having lands, etc., of the yearly value of £100 per annum, may keep or shoot in a gun upon pain of forfeiture of £10.' Suppose, therefore, such a person, not qualified, shoots with a gun at a bird or at crows, and by mischance it kills a bystander by the breaking of the gun or some other accident, that in another case would have amounted only to chance-medley, this will be no more than chance-medley in him; for, though the statute prohibit him to keep or use a gun, yet the same was but malum prohibitum, and that only under a penalty, and will not enhance the effect beyond its nature." Mr. East, while he gives an instance which apparently supports the view of the state, in treating further on the subject, in vol. 1, p. 255, says: "Homicide in the prosecution of some act or purpose criminal or unlawful in itself, wherein death ensues collaterally to or beside the principal intent. I say collaterally to or beside the principal intent in order to distinguish this kind of homicide from that before treated of under the general head of malice aforethought, where the immediate and leading purpose of the mind was destruction to another. And, first, it is principally to be observed that, if the act on which death ensue be malum in se, it will be murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances; if done in prosecution of a felonious intent, however the death ensued against or beside the intent of the party, it will be murder; but if the intent went no further than to commit a bare trespass, it will be manslaughter. As where A shoots at the poultry of B, and by accident kills a man; if his intent were to steal the poultry, which must be collected from circumstances, it will be murder by reason of that felonious intent; but, if it were done wantonly and without that intent, it will be barely manslaughter. A whips an horse on which B is riding; whereupon the horse springs out and runs over a child and kills it; this is manslaughter in A and misadventure in B." And again, at page 257: "So, if one be doing an unlawful act, though not intending bodily harm to any person, as throwing a stone, at another's horse, if it hit a person, and kill him, it is manslaughter. Yet in such cases it seems that the guilt would rather depend on one or other of these circumstances; either that the act might probably breed danger, or that it was done with a mischievous intent." So we have it that both Matthew Hale and Mr. East, to whom we were referred as supporting the claim of guilt, declared that the act must be malum in se and the instances given by them show that these writers had this qualification in mind whenever they state the doctrine in more general terms. Sir William Blackstone also says, in bk. 4, pp. 192, 193: "And in general, when an involuntary killing happens in consequence of an unlawful act, it will be either murder or manslaughter, according to the nature of the act which occasioned it. If it be in prosecution of a felonious intent, or in its consequences naturally tended to bloodshed, it will be murder; but if no more was intended than a mere civil trespass, it will only amount to manslaughter,"—citing Foster's Criminal Law. We take it that the distinguished commentator must have intended only such civil trespasses as involve an element malum in se, as he cites Foster's Criminal Law, and this author, as we have seen, states the qualification suggested.

Again, we are cited by the state to an instance put by East, at page 269: "But, though the weapons be of a dangerous nature, yet if they be not directed by the persons using them against each other, and so no danger to be reasonably apprehended, if death casually ensue, it is but misadventure. As if persons be shooting at game, or butts, or any other lawful object, and a bystander be killed. And it makes no difference, with respect to game, whether the party be qualified or not. But if the act be unlawful in itself, as shooting at deer in another's park without leave, though in sport and without any felonious intent, whereby a bystander is killed, it will be manslaughter; but if the owner had given leave, or the party had been shooting in his own park, it would only have been misadventure." Lord Hale, at page 475, gives the same instance. And it is urged that this instance is exactly similar to one before us, but not so. According to Sir William Blackstone, in his Commentaries (bk. 2, p. 415): "For some time prior to the Norman Conquest, 'every freeholder had the full liberty of sporting upon his own territories, provided he abstained from the King's forests; as is fully expressed in the laws of Canute and of Edward the Confessor. . . . 'Cuique enim in proprio fundo quamlibet feram quoque modo venari permissum.'" And further on it is said that "if a man starts game on another's private grounds and kills it there, the property belongs to him in whose ground it was killed; . . . the property arising ratione soli." "On the Norman Conquest, a new doctrine took place, and the right of pursuing and taking all beasts of chase or venary, and such other animals as were accounted game, was then held to belong to the King, or to such only as were authorized under him." Again: "But as the King reserved to himself the forests for his own exclusive diversion, so he granted out from time to time other tracts of lands to his subjects under the names of chases or parks, or gave them license to make such in their own grounds. . . . And, by the common law, no person is at liberty to take or kill any beasts of chase but such as hath an ancient chase or park." In Encyclopædia Britannica we read that the chases or parks were much the same, except that the parks were inclosed, having a tendency to make the game contained therein more completely and exclusively the property of the owner. Anyone who entered them was a trespasser, and in shooting the game therein his act can be likened to that of the case put by Foster, East, and Lord Hale, where one wantonly shot another's chicken. He was engaged in the effort to destroy another's property, and the act could well be considered malum in se. But not so here. We have never transplanted to this country either the Saxon or Norman theory as to the right to take and appropriate game. Here it is considered the property of the captor, except, perhaps, in the case of bees. It is said in Cooley on Torts: "As regards beasts of the chase, the English rule is that, if the hunter starts and captures a beast on the land of another, the property in him is in the owner of the land. Under the civil law, the property passed to the captor, and such is believed to be the recognized rule in America, even when the capture has been effected by means of a trespass on another's land." [*436]. State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744.

The act of the defendant, therefore, was not in the effort to destroy another's property, but was strictly malum prohibitum. State v. Vines, 93 N. C. 493, 53 Am. Rep. 466, and State v. Dorsey, 118 Ind. 167, 10 Am. St. Rep. 111, 20 N. E. 777, are cases apparently opposed to our present decision, but neither is really so. In State v. Vines the sport was eminently dangerous, amounting to recklessness; and in State v. Dorsey the element of criminal negligence was also present, and in this case a state statute governing the construction was given much weight. Neither the one case nor the other required any critical examination of the doctrine, as sometimes stated, that an unintentional homicide, occasioned when in the commission of an unlawful act, is manslaughter. The verdict in the case before us negatives both the elements of guilt (present in these two cases) declaring that the act was not in itself dangerous and that the defendant was not negligent.

malum prohibitum and malum in se is unsound, and has now entirely disappeared. Our own court so held in Sharp v. Farmer, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 255, and decisions to the same effect have been made several times since. Said Ruffin, Ch. J., in Sharp v. Farmer: "The distinction between an act malum in se and one merely malum prohibitum was never sound, and is entirely disregarded; for the law would be false to itself if it allowed a party through its tribunals to derive advantage from a contract made against the intent and express provisions of the law." It will be noted that this decision was on a case involving the validity of a contract, and the principle there established is undoubtedly correct. The fact, however, that the judge who delivered the opinion uses the words "was never sound," and that other opinions to the same effect use the words "has disappeared," shows that the distinction has existed; and it existed, too, at a time when this feature in the law of homicide was established. And we are well assured that because the courts, in administering the law on the civil side of the docket, have come to the conclusion that a principle once established is unsound and should be rejected, this should not have the effect of changing the character of an act from innocence to guilt, which had its status fixed when the distinction was recognized and enforced.

It was further suggested that the homicide was one of the very results which the statute was designed to prevent, and to excuse the defendant would be contrary to the policy of the act. But this can hardly be seriously maintained. It will be noted that it was not the owner of the land who was killed, but the defendant's comrade in the hunt; and of a certainty if our legislature thought that conduct like that of the defendant was dangerous, and the statute was designed to protect human life, some other penalty would have been imposed than a fine of "not less than $5 and not more than $10." It is more reasonable to conclude that the act in its purpose was designed to prevent and suppress petty trespasses and annoyances, such as leaving open gates, throwing down fences, treading over crops, etc.

The special verdict having established that the act of the defendant was entirely accidental, it is a relief that we can declare him innocent in accordance with accepted doctrine, and that in the case at bar the law can be administered in mercy as well as justice. Quoting again from that eminent judge and humane and enlightened man, Sir Michael Foster: "And where the rigor of law bordereth upon injustice, mercy should, if possible, interpose in the administration."

It is not the part of judges to be perpetually hunting after forfeitures where the heart is free from guilt. They are ministers appointed by the Crown for the ends of public justice; and should have written on their hearts the solemn engagement his Majesty is under to 'cause law and justice in mercy to be executed in all his judgments.'" [P. 264]. We know that in this spirit the judge below dealt with the defendant and his cause; for, though the judgment of his Honor impelled him to the conclusion of guilt, he imposed the lightest punishment permissible for the offense.

There was error in holding the defendant guilty, and, on the facts declared, a verdict of not guilty should be directed and the defendant discharged.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF JULIUS H. CLARK, Deceased.

L. J. CLARK, Resp't.,
v.

C. P. DuBOIS, Appt.

(.... Cal.)

1. Will—of resident—proof.

Under statutes providing that wills must be proved in the county of which the deceased was a resident at the time of his death, and that foreign wills allowed in other states may be allowed in the county

Case Note.—The courts seem to be unanimous in holding that statutes providing for the allowance or recording of wills admitted to probate in another jurisdiction, upon the production of a duly authenticated copy, do not apply where the testator's domicile at the time of his death was within the state. Two reasons are usually given for such decisions; one being that these statutes are to be construed with reference to others on the same subject, requiring probate at the place of decedent's domicile; and the other, that such statutes are intended to apply only where the court of the other state or country has jurisdiction, which is not the case with reference to realty situated, or personalty belonging to one having a domicile, without the state where the will is offered for probate.

In Wallace v. Wallace, 3 N. J. Eq. 616, it was held that such an act, the words of which taken literally embraced not only foreign wills, but those made and executed within the state by residents and proved in another state, should be construed with reference to another act the deficiencies of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in which testator left real estate, the will of a resident cannot be probated elsewhere than in the state, and then brought into the state for secondary or ancillary administration.

2. Statute—effect of title.

Sections under a title of a statute "Probate of Foreign Wills" must be held to refer to such wills, since the title will be read into them.

3. Will—proof in foreign state.

The duty of a state to give full faith and credit to the judgments of other states does not require it to permit the will of one of its residents to be probated first in another state, and then grant ancillary administration within the state on the foreign record.

On Rehearing.

4. Same—will of nonresident—effect of proof.

The probate of the will of a nonresident who dies, leaving property within the state, extends only to its effect upon property within the jurisdiction, and has no effect upon the validity of the will itself.

APPEAL by proponent from an order of the Superior Court for Yolo County denying probate to the will of Julius H. Clark, deceased, as a foreign will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. W. A. Anderson and George Clark, for appellant:

which it was intended to supplement, which had reference only to wills made in another state or country; and this view was further supported by a consideration of the consequences that would result from a literal construction.

In Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157, it was said that the law permitting probate of authenticated copies of wills proved according to the laws of another state or country must be construed with reference to the whole law on the subject of wills; and that since the foreign court had no jurisdiction over the will of one domiciled elsewhere, the courts of the state could take no jurisdiction of the copy of their record.

In Morris v. Morris, 27 Miss. 847, and in Bate v. Incisa, 59 Miss. 613, it was held, following the foregoing decision, that the statute did not embrace the case of a will whose maker is domiciled in the state, although executed out of the state, and although the testator died in the jurisdiction in which the will was admitted to probate.

of authenticated copies of wills executed and proved according to the laws of any state, etc., although sufficiently comprehensive in terms to embrace the case of every will executed by any person, in any place, in such a manner as to conform to the laws of any state, etc., was limited, by construction with reference to statutes in pari materia, to wills proved in a court to which the jurisdiction to make original probate in the case properly belongs, under the established rules of the common law.

In New Hampshire, under a statute providing for the filing of copies of a will and its probate in a foreign jurisdiction, if no sufficient objection should be made, it was held that the nonresidence of the testator in such foreign jurisdiction was a sufficient objection, since by the general rule, as well as by a statute declaratory of such rule, a will must be presented for probate where the testator was domiciled. Stark v. Parker, 56 N. H. 481.

In Tarbell v. Walton, 71 Vt. 406, 45 Atl. 748, an intention of the legislature that the statute providing for the allowance of wills proved and allowed in other states, etc., should not apply to a foreign probate of the will of a domiciled testator, was deduced from other provisions relating to the place of probate of the will of such a testator, and to the disposition, in the case of such allowance on a foreign probate, of property undisposed of by will in the manner provided in cases of nonresident decedents.

The same conclusion as to the effect of a foreign probate of a domestic will, independent of any question of statutory construction, was reached in Scripps v. Wayne Probate Judge, 131 Mich. 265, 100 Am. St. Rep. 614, 90 N. W. 1061, where it was held that the probate court of the domicile of the testator has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of a will; and that where it is admitted to probate by a court without jurisdiction, the decree or order of that court, except as to property located within its jurisdiction, is not conclusive upon the courts of other jurisdictions, under the rule of state comity, or under the United States Constitution.

Mr. Charles S. Wheeler, amicus curiæ.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Julius H. Clark died in the county of Yolo, in the state of California, on the 14th day of March, 1904, and was a resident of that county at the time of his death. He had resided in the county for more than twenty years continuously prior to his death. On the 13th of July, 1872, while visiting in Keene, New Hampshire, he executed his last will and testament. This will was executed in conformity with the laws of the state of New Hampshire, and also in conformity with the laws of the state of California. It was filed by the executrix named therein in the office of the county clerk of Yolo county, with a petition praying for the probate thereof. In addition to having been a resident of Yolo county at the time of his death, the deceased left estate in that county. Subsequent to the filing of the will and petition, the superior court of Yolo county in probate made an order permitting the original will to be withdrawn and forwarded to Keene, New Hampshire. The will was then probated in New Hampshire, and thereafter appellant herein filed his petition in the superior court of the county of Yolo, asking for probate of the same will upon an exemplified copy from the probate court of the state of New Hampshire. The superior court of Yolo county took evidence and determined that at the time of his death Clark was a resident of Yolo county. This finding is not 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in dispute. As a legal consequence, following this finding, the court concluded that Clark's will should be admitted to probate originally in the superior court of the county of Yolo, and was not entitled to admission as a foreign will. It denied the petition, and this appeal is taken.

We are here for the first time upon a direct proceeding, by appeal from an order refusing probate to such a will, called upon to construe our Code provisions governing the question. We say that we are for the first time called upon in direct proceedings, because, as will hereafter be shown, the cases in which the question may be considered to have arisen were either cases of collateral attack or cases where the precise question here presented was not made an issue, and therefore, under well-settled principles, cannot be said to have been decided. As all the provisions of the Code bearing upon a single subject-matter are to be construed together, and harmoniously, if possible, it may be well to set forth the sections touching the probate of wills. Section 1294 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "Wills must be proved and letters testamentary or of administration granted: (1) In the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, in whatever place he may have died." Article 3, chap. 2, of the same title (11) containing § 1294, above quoted, is devoted to the probate of foreign wills. The article is itself entitled "Probate of Foreign Wills," and § 1322 provides: "All wills duly proved and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state, may be allowed and recorded in the superior court of any county in which the testator shall have left any estate." Section 1323, following, provides that notice of a petition for proving a will shall be given when a copy of the will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, shall be produced by the executor, or by any other person interested in the will, with a petition for letters. Section 1324 provides that if on the hearing it appears upon the face of the record that the will has been proved, allowed, and admitted to probate in any other of the United States or in any foreign country, and that it was executed according to the law of the place in which the same was made, or in which the testator was at the time domiciled, or in conformity with the laws of this state, it must be admitted to probate and have the same force and effect as a will first admitted to probate in this state. Section 1299 declares: "Any executor, devisee, or legatee named in any will, or any other person interested in the estate, may, at any time after the death of the testator, petition the court having jurisdiction to have the will proved, whether the same be in writing, in his possession or not, or is lost or destroyed, or beyond the jurisdiction of the state." We take it that no jurist, feeling himself unembarrassed by earlier decisions, and at liberty to treat the question as a new one, would hesitate to say: First, that § 1294 fixes the place of jurisdiction for all grants of original probate, while § 1322 does the same for grants of ancillary probate of authenticated copies of wills proved and probated in foreign jurisdictions. Second, that these laws mean that the will of a resident of the state of California must be proved originally as a domestic will in the county of his residence; and that, so far as the state of California is concerned, it cannot be primarily proved elsewhere, and brought into this state for purposes of secondary and ancillary administration. In construing the language of § 1322, attention would be called to the fact that resort with propriety may be had to the title of an act, and often must be had, to determine its true scope and intent; that the title of § 1322, relating exclusively and in terms to foreign wills, will be read in, and of necessity must be read in, to the language of that section, so that "all wills" means, and should be read to mean, "all foreign wills;" and that "foreign wills," as the phrase is here employed, means all wills other than domestic wills, as plainly appears from the language of the section itself, which describes these wills as all those "duly proved and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state." In illustration, it might be pointed out that if the legislature had passed an act under the title of "An Act for the Government of Boys in Penal and Reformatory Institutions," and the body of the act had begun with the declaration, "All boys shall," etc., it would unhesitatingly be said that the phrase "all boys" had reference exclusively to all boys in penal and reformatory institutions in this state. We think this same unhampered jurist would point out that the matter of recognizing the judgment of a foreign state rested originally wholly in comity, and that, saving as exacted by § 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, still rests wholly in comity. It would be pointed out that while the states themselves, as has this state, have, by appropriate legislation, provided that full faith and credit should be given to the adjudications of sister states, this never has meant that the state itself has parted with any of its sovereign rights, with any of its rights of primary jurisdiction, nor with any of the rights of its subjects, to have the will of a fellow resident originally proved in the county of his residence, where, presumptively, he is the best known, and where they may the better litigate all questions touching the validity of the solemn instrument offered for probate.

Recognition would be given to the indisputable principle that every state has plenary power with respect to the administration and disposition of the estates of deceased persons as to all property of such persons found within its jurisdiction. Thus the courts of a state may and do grant original probate upon wills of deceased nonresidents who leave property within that state. In California this is expressly provided for by § 1294, supra, and the rule as to other states is the same. 1 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, *439; Shields v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 119 N. C. 380, 25 S. E. 951; Re Gordon, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 26 Atl. 268; Putnam v. Pitney (Washburn's Estate) 45 Minn. 242, 11 L. R. A. 41, 47 N. W. 790; Walton v. Hall, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803; Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238. But the limitations of the operation of this principle would also be recognized, namely, that this exercise of original jurisdiction over the estates of nonresidents affects, and can affect, only the property within the state. The judgment admitting the will to probate is valid in all other states only as to the property within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing the judgment. It has no extra-territorial force, establishes nothing beyond that, and does not dispense with nor abrogate the formalities and proofs which may be exacted by other jurisdictions in which the deceased also left property subject to their laws of administration. 1 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, *491. And in this connection it would be further pointed out that, if the position contended for by appellant is sound, it involves upon the part of the state a formal surrender of so much of its sovereignty and right of primary jurisdiction, conferring that upon foreign states, and at the same time, to this extent, is subversive and destructive of the rights of its citizens. It would be said with exact truth that the full faith and credit which is accorded to the adjudications of sister states is a full faith and credit, consonant with complete jurisdiction and control of the sovereign state over all its inhabitants, and over all the property within its boundaries. No less would the practical hardships of such an interpretation be pointed out, because, if it were so that all wills, therein including domestic wills of residents of this state, could be primarily proved in a foreign jurisdiction, and by mere exemplification of that proof be entitled to ancillary probate under the laws of this state, it would result in numerous instances that wills of residents of this state would be probated in foreign jurisdictions without the knowledge of those in interest resident in this state, and with-calf, is too feeble to come to the state of California, to apply for letters testamentary on said will, and it appearing from said petition that the said executrix desires to have said will probated in the county of Cheshire, state of New Hampshire, and that the said Julius H. Clark left estate in said county at the time of his death: Wherefore it is by the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the clerk of the said superior court of the county of Yolo be, and he is hereby, ordered and directed to send the will of the said Julius H. Clark, now on file in his said office, to Mrs. Paul Thomson, at West Hartford, Connecticut, by express, or to deliver to W. A. Anderson, the attorney for Mary M. Metcalf, the said will to be so sent. And the clerk is hereby ordered to preserve a certified copy of said will in his said office. E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Indorsed: Filed April 19, 1904. C. F. Hadsall, Clerk.

Thereafter, on May 18, 1904, the proponent Du Bois, to whom an interest in said estate had been conveyed by said Mary M. Metcalf, devisee and legatee of the said will, filed a petition in the superior court of Yolo county for admission to probate of said will upon a duly authenticated copy thereof and its probate in the state of New Hampshire. Upon notice of said application having been given pursuant to the statute, the contestant, L. J. Clark, son of the testator, and a legatee under the will, filed objections to the admission of the same upon the exemplified copy, upon the grounds, among others, that said Julius H. Clark, at the time of his death and at the date said alleged will was executed, was a resident of the county of Yolo, state of California; that said alleged will was a domestic will, and that the same could not be admitted to probate by virtue of having been previously admitted to probate by the courts of New Hampshire; that the superior court of Yolo county, state of California, had original and exclusive jurisdiction to hear an original petition to admit said will to probate; and that the courts of the state of New Hampshire had no jurisdiction to admit said will to probate, except for the purpose of carrying on an administration ancillary to that had in the state of California. Upon the hearing of the case, the superior court of Yolo county sustained the objection of the contestant upon the grounds stated, and denied the admission of the authenticated copy to probate, and from this order the appeal is taken. From the record it appears that the copy of the will was duly authenticated in conformity with the laws of New Hampshire, and that such will was valid under the laws of said state admitting it to probate; that all the proceedings thereon were regular, and that there was nothing upon the face of the record to dispute the jurisdiction of the court of such state admitting the will to probate; and that said will was made and executed in conformity, not only with the laws of said state, but also in conformity with the laws of this state. The question, therefore, presented, is whether, in the case of a testator who, at his death, resided in this state, a will filed for probate in this state upon a duly authenticated copy thereof from the court of a sister state, first having been duly probated therein according to the laws of said state, may be admitted to probate, or must the original will be produced here for that purpose? Section 1322, Code Civ. Proc., copied in the prevailing opinion, is taken from the act of 1850 to regulate the settlement of estates of deceased persons, being § 27 of said act. Stat. 1850, chap. 129, p. 377. The language of the Code sections bearing on the subject under consideration is plain and unambiguous, and cannot be controlled by any headlines of the chapter put there by the Code commissioners. "The mere classifications can scarcely be deemed part of the law." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 70.

In the case of Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 93, 24 Pac. 801, the plaintiff sued in the character of trustee of the estate of Jonathan Thompson, deceased, under his last will. The testator was a resident of the county of San Luis Obispo, and left estate therein. His last will had been duly proved and allowed in the Queen's probate court of London, on the 28th day of October, 1875. His heirs and devisees were residing in this state and in England. Upon petition filed for the probate of said will from an exemplified copy thereof from said English court, the probate court of San Luis Obispo county, this state, after notice and proceedings as required by the Code, admitted said will to probate in the following order: "It is ordered that the paper heretofore filed purporting to be a copy of the last will and testament of said deceased be admitted to probate as the last will and testament of said deceased; that the said John Thompson and John A. Patchett be and they are hereby appointed executors of said estate; and that letters testamentary issue to the said petitioners upon their taking the oath as required by law." Letters testamentary were accordingly issued to John Thompson and J. A. Patchett, who duly qualified. The will also appointed Thompson, Patchett, and Grierson trustees of the estate, and devised the property to them for the uses and purposes stated in the will. Thereafter, by an order of said superior court, Patchett was removed and plaintiff Goldtree was appointed in his place. On the trial of the case the defendant objected to the introduction in evidence of the record of the California probate proceedings of San Luis Obispo county, on the ground that the probate court of San Luis Obispo county never acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the probate of the will. Defendant's objections were overruled and judgment went for the plaintiffs which judgment on appeal was affirmed by this court in department. Appellant filed a petition for a rehearing, and made the point that, as Thompson was a resident of California at his death, his will was domestic to the state of California, and that the California court had no jurisdiction to grant ancillary or secondary probate, as was done in that case. A rehearing was granted, and appellant filed additional points and authorities upon the rehearing in bank, in which it is said: "Admittedly Jonathan Thompson was a resident of California at his death. It follows that his will, if any he left, was not a 'foreign' but a domestic will,—domestic to the state of California. . . . The English court had no jurisdiction to grant original probate of a will domestic to this state. The California court alone had such jurisdiction. The California court had no jurisdiction to grant auxiliary or secondary probate of the will in question." And appellant's counsel especially relied upon the point of want of jurisdiction in the probate court of this state in the premises, and this question seems to have been fully presented to this court on the rehearing. In the opinion upon the rehearing by the court in bank it is said: "The judgment appealed from in this case was affirmed January 31, 1890. A rehearing was granted, and the case has been reargued in printed briefs. We have carefully considered the arguments of the learned counsel for appellant on the rehearing, but find nothing in them having the effect to change the former opinion." Pages 96 and 97, 86 Cal., page 801, 24 Pac. This case, which is the latest expression of this court on the question, seems to hold directly that a will of a resident of this state can be admitted to probate in this state on an exemplified copy of its probate in a court outside of the state.

As already shown, the will in question, upon petition, was ordered by the lower court to be withdrawn and transmitted to New Hampshire, where the deceased left property, to be there first admitted to probate. It can hardly be supposed that the court in doing this at the same time entertained the view that said will could only be admitted to probate in the first instance in Solano county. To suppose so would be to suppose that the court set a snare to entrap petitioners, so as to deprive the legatees 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and devisees under the will of the principal benefit resulting from the same. Under the provisions of the Code as well as upon the authority of Goldtree v. McAlister, supra, the court below clearly erred in refusing to admit the will in question to probate under the circumstances, as shown, and the order to that effect should be reversed.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent, and think that the order appealed from should be reversed. In my opinion the language of § 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, "all wills duly proved and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state, may be allowed and recorded," etc., is entirely too clear and explicit to leave any room for the play of construction. The fact that the section is preceded by the subheading "Probate of Foreign Wills" is not sufficient to overcome the unmistakable meaning of the language of the section. Indeed, the word "foreign" does not necessarily mean in law a country other than a sister state of the American Union. In the majority of instances it includes such sister states, and this view of its meaning is so well established as to have gone into the text-books and law dictionaries as settled law. In "Words and Phrases Judicially Defined," vol. 3, p. 2881, it is said: "For all national purposes embraced by the Federal Constitution, the states and the citizens thereof are one, united under the same sovereign authority, and governed by the same laws. In all other respects the states are necessarily foreign and independent of each other; their Constitutions and forms of government being (though republican) altogether different, as are their laws and institutions." In Bouvier's Law Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 811, it is said: "The several states of the American Union are foreign to each other with respect to their municipal laws." In Abbott's Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 514, it is said: "In American usage the several states of the Union are foreign to each other with respect to matters governed by their municipal laws; while the relations of the general government and either state are domestic. This consideration qualifies the usage of several of the phrases mentioned under the present head. It is abundantly well settled that a bill of exchange drawn in one state, payable in another, is a foreign bill. The corporations created by one state are constantly called foreign corporations in any other. In each state the judgments rendered in, and laws enacted by, another state are foreign judgments and laws. A port of another state is a foreign port." Therefore the word "foreign," in the subheading is not at all inconsistent with the language of the section in question. And, of course, the legislature has full power over the whole subject of wills, descents, distribution of estates, and probate proceedings. There is not a word in the state Constitution limiting its legislative authority in such matters.

Shaw, J., dissenting:

I dissent. So far as the policy of the provisions of § 1322 of the Code of Civil Procedure is concerned, that is a question for the legislature, and not for the courts. There are considerations both for and against the proposition that the will of a person who dies a resident of this state may be first probated in some other state. In cases of persons who have recently become residents of this state it is often very much more convenient and less expensive to pursue this course. A large part of the population of this state has always consisted of persons who have lived here but a short period of time. It may be that the legislature, having these circumstances in view, believed it the best policy to provide that this might be done, and enacted this statute for the express purpose of allowing it to be done. But, in any event, in view of the plain language of the section, the matter of policy is immaterial. "A cardinal rule of interpretation is that a statute free from ambiguity and uncertainty needs no interpretation. This must be so; for all interpretation and construction is for the purpose of ascertaining the legislative will. When this is clear, interpretation is not allowable. In such case it cannot be argued that the result is unjust or against policy. The statute is itself conclusive upon these subjects." Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 387, 55 Pac. 1060. The section in question must have the same meaning now as it had when it was originally enacted. It first became a part of the statute law of this state in 1850, when it was enacted in § 27 of the probate act (Stat. 1850, chap. 129, 378), in precisely the same language as that contained in § 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, except that the words "superior court" have been substituted for "probate court." In the probate act there was no chapter, heading, or subheading which could have any effect. It is inconceivable that the legislature would have re-enacted the section in the same language, if it had intended to change the meaning by limiting its application to wills of persons who, at the time of their death, resided out of this state. The phrase "all wills" in the section plainly includes wills of every description, domestic and foreign. Where the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous, as in this case, the title of the act, chapter, article, or subheading of the section cannot be resorted to for the purposes of giving it a different meaning from that which the words import. Re Boston Min. & Mill. Co. 51 Cal. 624; Cohen v. Barrett, 5 Cal. 209; People ex rel. Flynn v. Abbott, 16 Cal. 366; Hagar v. Yolo County, 47 Cal. 232. Furthermore, it cannot be said that the decision will not tend to unsettle titles to real property. While it may be true that the determination of the court upon the question of fact that the residence of the deceased at the time of his death was in some other state or country is conclusive on collateral attack, and that this has been settled by the decisions of this court, yet it has never been decided that where, in case of the probate of a so-called foreign will, the petition on its face avers that the deceased died a resident of this state, but that the will had been first probated in some other state, the fact of lack of jurisdiction is not apparent on the face of the record, and may not be raised upon collateral attack. The records of this court show that there have been several cases where wills of this character have been proven as foreign wills, and it is a fair, if not necessary, inference that the actual cases of that character have been quite numerous. Whatever may be now said in the way of a discriminating review of the previous decisions of this court, it must be admitted that the general opinion has been that, under § 1322, the will of a resident of this state, having been first admitted to probate in some other state, may be probated in this state as a foreign will. I think the court below erred in refusing to entertain jurisdiction.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was made by Beatty, Ch. J.:

In their petition for a rehearing counsel for appellant reiterate the argument that our construction of the Code provisions relating to the proof of foreign wills (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1322-1324) can only be sustained by reading into the statute a qualification of the words "all wills," which will limit its application to wills "of a certain kind," contrary to the intention of the legislature and the general understanding of the courts of the state and the legal profession. I take leave to doubt this general understanding of the courts and the profession, and gain call the attention of counsel to the fact that it is wholly unnecessary to read anything into the statute in order to limit its application to wills of a certain kind. The qualifying words are plainly written in the statute, and the fault is with counsel in ignoring their existence and their force. The statute does not say "all wills," and stop there. Its language is (§ 1322) "all wills duly proved and allowed" in any other state or foreign country. Wills that have been duly proved and allowed are wills "of a certain kind," and in order to determine whether a particular will is of that kind we have to give a construction to the words "duly proved and allowed." When, therefore, is a will duly proved and allowed? The proof of a will is a proceeding in rem. To the validity of any judgment in rem—a judgment which, as to the res, binds all the world—there must be adequate public notice of the proceeding, and such notice must emanate from a court which has jurisdiction of the res. When the will of a resident of this state is the res, is it possible that the courts of every civilized country on the globe have a concurrent jurisdiction, upon published notice, to determine its validity? If we look to our own statute for a test of jurisdiction in such cases, we find that we confine the jurisdiction to the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, and this, it is safe to say is the ordinary rule. Authority to take proof of wills is confined to courts whose territorial jurisdiction includes the domicile of the decedent. The fact that in this state, as in other states and countries, wills of nonresidents are admitted to probate on original proceedings, for the purpose of administering upon their property within the state, is no impeachment of this proposition. In such cases it is the property within this state and subject to its jurisdiction which constitutes the res, and proof of the will is allowed as a mere incident or means of determining the disposition of that property. And the decree which has only that purpose is conclusive only to that extent. It binds that property here and everywhere that the decrees of our courts are accorded full faith and credit, whether by comity or by force of the Federal Constitution. But such a decree is not binding as to the will itself in other jurisdictions where the decedent may have left property, and still less is it binding upon the courts of his domicile. It is not conclusive in other jurisdictions, simply because, as a will and for all purposes, it has not been duly proved and allowed. It has been proved and allowed so far as it affects the disposition of the property within the particular jurisdiction, but no further.

The considerations thus briefly indicated it seems to me, ought to have prevented the hasty construction which we are told has been generally placed upon our statute by the profession and the courts in this state. As to the courts, it is true that in three instances, as shown by our records, the construction contended for by counsel has been accepted by the trial court; but in this court decrees admitting wills of residents of California to probate, on proof of foreign probate, have never been sustained, except as against collateral attack. My own opinion is clear that no will has been duly proved and allowed, within the meaning of §§ 1322-1324, Code of Civ. Proc., unless the proof has been taken in a court whose territorial jurisdiction includes the domicile of the testator. When a will has been admitted to probate here on proof of its admission to probate in some other jurisdiction, not including the domicile of the decedent, the decree and proceedings regularly taken under it are, of course, secure against what in Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 93, 24 Pac. 801, is held to be collateral attack, and this, irrespective of the question whether that decision can be reconciled with a correct construction of the statute. Correct or not, the rule of that case has become a rule of property, and as such must be upheld upon the doctrine of stare decisis, for the protection of vested rights.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

FRANK H. BALL, Admr., etc., of Henry Holland, Deceased,

v.

FRANK H. HOLLAND et al.

(.... Mass.)

Remainder—vested.

A vested remainder is created by a will giving testator's widow authority, for the maintenance of herself and children, to spend principal and income of the estate, and providing that at her death "then that Case Note.—In BALL v. HOLLAND, where the life tenant was given authority to spend the entire principal, thereby rendering it uncertain whether any of the property would be left for distribution among the remaindermen, the court nevertheless held the remainder to be a vested, and not a contingent, one.

That a vested remainder may be created notwithstanding the life tenant's power to dispose of the property is sustained by the authorities, among which are Roberts v. Roberts, ante, 782; and the following cases: Woodman v. Woodman, 89 Me. 128, 35 Atl. 1038; Shipp v. Gibbs, 88 Ga. 184, 14 S. E. 196; Heilman v. Heilman, 129 Ind. 59, 28 N. E. 310; Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, 197 Ill. 144, 64 N. E. 267; Dana v. Dana, 185 Mass. 156, 70 N. E. 49; Edwards v. Gibbs, 39 Miss. 166; Rhodes v. Shaw, 43 N. J. Eq. 430, 11 Atl. 116; Williams v. Peabody, 8 Hun. 271; Mitchell v. Knapp, 54 Hun. 500, 8 N. Y. Supp. 40; Evans's Estate, 155 Pa. 646, 26 Atl. 739; Kenyon's Petition, 17 R. I. 149, 20 Atl. 294; Chafee v. Maker, 17 R. I. 739, 24 Atl. 773; Willman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 475; Smith v. Bell, Peck (Tenn.) 102.

all of my property which she may possess shall be disposed of equally among all of my surviving children," where a preliminary clause of the will gives the property therein provided for "to my sons and daughters, should they be living at the time of my decease, or any of them that may be alive."

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Worcester County for the opinion of the full bench of an appeal from a decree of the Probate Court construing the will of Henry Holland, deceased. Affirmed.

The fifth clause of the will, which was the subject of controversy, was as follows: "I also direct that, should my said wife, Hannah Avery Holland, remain unmarried until her death, then that all of my property which she may possess shall be disposed of equally among all of my surviving children, unless in case of any of my minor children may survive their mother, who shall be provided for as stated in No. 3 of this my last will." The third clause gave the rest and residue of the testator's estate to her use and benefit as long as she should remain his widow, provided, nevertheless, that, "should any of my children be in their minority at the time of my decease, they shall be cared for by their mother out of my property until such time as they shall reach their majority."

At the time of testator's death eleven children were living; at the time of the widow's death seven children survived, and several grandchildren, daughters of deceased children, and the question was whether, under the will, the grandchildren took any interest as representatives of their deceased parents.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John B. Scott, for Frank H. Holland: The widow might have expended all the property of the testator, and therefore the remainders over were contingent.

Bowen v. Dean, 110 Mass. 438; Taft v. Taft, 130 Mass. 461; Bamforth v. Bamforth, 123 Mass. 280; Johnson v. Battelle, 125 Mass. 453.

The language used is itself apt to create a contingent remainder.

Hulburt v. Emerson, 16 Mass. 241; Denny v. Kettell, 135 Mass. 138; Coveny v. McLaughlin, 148 Mass. 576, 2 L. R. A. 448, 20 N. E. 165; Hale v. Hobson, 167 Mass. 397, 45 N. E. 913; Stone v. Bradlee, 183 Mass. 165, 66 N. E. 708; Whall v. Converse, 146 Mass. 345, 15 N. E. 660; Minot v. Taylor, 129 Mass. 160.

Words of survivorship following a life estate refer to those surviving at the time of distribution, and not at the time of the L.R.A. (N.S.)

testator's decease, unless the contrary intention is plainly manifested in the will.

Brograve v. Winder, 2 Ves. Jr. 634; Newton v. Ayscough, 19 Ves. Jr. 534; Wordsworth v. Wood, 2 Beav. 25; Wordsworth v. Wood, 1 H. L. Cas. 129; Howard v. Collins, L. R. 5 Eq. 349; Selman v. Robertson, 46 S. C. 262, 24 S. E. 187; Sinton v. Boyd, 19 Ohio St. 30, 2 Am. Rep. 369; Nicoll v. Scott, 29 Ill. 529; Den ex dem. Holcomb v. Lake, 24 N. J. L. 686.

Mr. Henry L. Parker, guardian ad litem.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The scheme of the will was to make full provisions for the support of the testator's wife, and, during minority, of their minor children living at his death. To accomplish this she was given full authority, so long as she lived or remained unmarried, to spend, not only the income, but the residue, of his entire property, after the payment of nominal pecuniary legacies provided for in the second clause of the will. Until her widowhood was terminated it could not be determined whether any of his property would be left for distribution under the fifth clause. If there was, he directed at her death "then that all of my property which she may possess shall be disposed of equally among all my surviving children." The widow having died unmarried, leaving surviving children and representatives of those that have deceased since the death of her husband, the question is, Among whom is the remainder of his property, not used by her, to be distributed?

The general rule is well settled that a remainder after a life estate is held to have vested at the death of the testator, unless, from the terms of the will, it clearly appears to have been his intention that it should not vest except upon the happening of the event on which the final distribution of any residue remaining is to be made. Cushman v. Arnold, 185 Mass. 165, 168, 169, 70 N. E. 43. If he had said, at the death or marriage of his widow, "I give all of my property which she may possess to such of my children as shall then be living," those alive at the time fixed would have taken a contingent remainder. Thomas v. Ludington, 104 Mass. 193. If the adverb "then" refers to his wife's death as the period when possession shall be taken, and not to the time when the estate is to vest, this construction does not dispose of the word "surviving;" for, if he had meant that all his children living at his decease should participate, ordinarily this word would seem to be unnecessary. Throughout the will the testator, when he has occasion to refer to them, invariably limits those that are to take to children living at the end of the period. Thus, in the fourth clause, which provides for a division if his widow again marries, he expresses his purpose by directing it to be among "my surviving children." It is possible to hold from these clauses that he meant such of his children as might be living at the termination of their mother's estate, and so bring the case within a line of decisions where, under language largely, if not exactly, similar, such a construction has been adopted. Olney v. Hull, 21 Pick. 311; Smith v. Rice, 130 Mass. 441; Denny v. Kettell, 135 Mass. 138; Coveny v. McLaughlin, 148 Mass. 576, 2 L. R. A. 448, 20 N. E. 165; Bigelow v. Clap, 166 Mass. 88, 43 N. E. 1037; Hale v. Hobson, 167 Mass. 397, 45 N. E. 913; Harding v. Harding, 174 Mass. 268, 54 N. E. 549.

But, upon resorting to the second clause, which is preliminary to his principal purpose, the gift by name is "to my sons and daughters, should they be living at the time of my decease, or any of them that may be alive." The will speaks only from his death, when eleven of the twelve children born of the marriage survived, and the more natural construction, in the light of the whole will and of this fact, is that he refers to these children as a class, in the sense that they were to take all of his property, subject to the devise in favor of his wife, although they might die before their mother. Bosworth v. Stockbridge (Mass.) 75 N. E. 712. We are of opinion, therefore, that the remainder vested at the death of the testator, and that his children then living, with the representatives of any child since deceased, are entitled to the residue of the estate.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Butler County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to rescind a conveyance of real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harreld & Willis and Speed Guffy for appellants.

Messrs. N. T. Howard and W. A. Helm for appellee.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The one question involved on this appeal is whether or not J. A. Beliles is entitled to have rescinded a conveyance made by him to his sister, Mrs. M. M. Summerville. In his petition he states the facts as to the conveyance from himself to his sister as follows: "That about the time the deed was made, plaintiff (J. A. Beliles) was threatened with a suit for damages or bastardy proceedings, which plaintiff knew to be wholly unfounded in truth, and false and unwarranted and malicious, and to discharge such a suit plaintiff, after he had brought suit to divide said land, and when the deed was to be made by master commissioner, plaintiff simply ordered the commissioner to make the deed to Margaret Summerville, wife of defendant M. M. Summerville, without consideration from her (Margaret), and without her knowledge or consent, and plaintiff afterwards informed her of what had been done, and she agreed that she would hold the land in her name and would deed it back to plaintiff upon his request to do so." If the foregoing statements are true, do they warrant a judgment of rescission as against appellants, who are the children and heirs at law of Margaret Summerville, now deceased? If so, the judgment must be affirmed; if not, it should be reversed.

c. False representations.

1. In general, 1012.

2. By one in confidential relations, 1012.

I. Scope.

This note does not include cases where the grantor conveyed property in contemplation of future indebtedness, but only those Eq. 551, the plaintiff alleged that she, being threatened with prosecution for a larceny, of which she was entirely innocent, in order to discourage it, made a conveyance of her property to Eliza, the wife of Charles Miller, upon the secret trust that she would hold it and reconvey it upon demand. In sustaining a demurrer to the bill, it was said: "If this bill can be maintained, the court must take the broad ground that, if a person charged with a crime conveys away his property for the avowed purpose of protecting it against the consequences of his conviction, if he escapes such conviction, a court of equity will aid him in recovering back his property. It is not alleged, in this case, that any fraud was practised upon the complainant by the defendants or by anyone else. It is not alleged that the prosecution was a malicious one, and that those concerned in it have been any way benefited by the conveyance, or that, by their advice, or through their contrivance, the complainant was induced to execute the deed. But the complainant was charged with larceny; and, although it is alleged that she was entirely innocent of the charge, it does not appear but that there were good grounds of suspicion, or that her accusers were actuated by any other than a most laudable desire to promote public justice. Under these circumstances, the complainant made the conveyance for the unlawful purpose of placing it beyond the reach of the law, if the threatened prosecution should prove successful. The information alleged to have been given where he erroneously supposed, at the time of making the conveyance, that a claim existed against him, or believed that an unjust demand was made or about to be made upon him, or where the claim is shown to have been unfounded on the trial of the suit brought thereon against the grantor.

II. Effect of the intent to avoid liability.

There is a conflict in the cases as to whether the mere intent of the grantor to defraud is sufficient to render the conveyance fraudulent, although there are really no valid claims outstanding against him to be defeated by the conveyance.

A person charged with larceny, who conveys her property to her niece for the avowed purpose of preventing the collection, by process of law, of any fine there might be imposed upon her in case of conviction, is not entitled to a reconveyance of the property, although it is alleged that the grantor was entirely innocent of the crime charged, when it does not appear that the prosecution was a malicious one, or that those concerned in it contrived to procure the conveyance, or had been in any way benefited by it. The court observes: She made the deed for the purpose of placing her property beyond the reach of the process of law in case she should be convicted. This was against public policy. The court cannot aid a person under such circumstances. The complainant confided in the honesty of her niece, and there the court must leave her. Tantum v. Miller, 11 N. J. Eq. 551.

A conveyance of property by the owner during the pendency of an action, for the purpose of defeating any judgment that might be rendered against him, will not be set aside, at the instance of the grantor or his heirs, after judgment has been rendered in his favor in such action, the conveyance having been made without the practice of any fraud or undue influence by the grantee, and without any promise by him to reconvey the property. The court says: The fact that the suit resulted in favor of the grantor can have but little bearing on the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) question of his fraudulent intent in conveying all his property for an expressed nominal consideration, but in reality without any consideration whatever. In many cases, such favorable result might well have been brought about by the conveyance itself, in causing the creditor to abandon his suit rather than enter upon the task of pursuing the property. If the grantor of property, not being certain whether his apprehensions as to the recovery of a judgment against him in a pending suit are well or ill founded, acts as if the judgment would be against him, and by conveyance puts his property in the name of another, under a secret trust, he cannot complain if a court of equity leaves the parties in the position in which it finds them, and declines to set aside the conveyance. The statute contemplates a grant or conveyance with intent to defraud creditors. It recognizes the moral quality of the act as residing in the intention. Pride v. Andrew, 51 Ohio St. 405, 38 N. E. 84.

One who conveyed his property, both real and personal, to another under an agreement that the latter would reconvey it on demand, which transfer was made in order to defeat any recovery that might be had in a suit pending against the grantor as security for a third person, is not entitled to recover the property, although, on the trial of the suit, it appeared that the debt for which he was sued had been paid by the principal debtor. The court states that the complainant is not entitled to recover, either under the statute against fraudulent conveyances, or by the principle that no one is entitled to the aid of a court of equity to enforce a contract entered into with a fraudulent intention, and for a fraudulent purpose. Jackson v. Marshall, 5 N. C. (1 Murph.) 323, 3 Am. Dec. 695.

An averment in a bill filed to have a deed set aside for fraud and want of consideration, that it was made by the grantor to his brother for the purpose of preventing the satisfaction of any judgment that might be recovered against him in a pending suit for slander, is fatal to the maintenance of the her by her friends was correct; her property was in jeopardy from the consequences of such a prosecution. If convicted, her property was liable for the costs. The court might, upon such conviction, impose a fine of $500, which would be a lien upon her property. She made the deed for the purpose of placing her property beyond the reach of the process of the law in case she should be convicted. This was against public policy. This court cannot aid a person under such circumstances. The complainant confided in the honesty of her niece, and there the court must leave her."

In Cameron v. Romele, 53 Tex. 238, the vendor conveyed property to the vendee under the belief, manufactured by the vendee, that she (the vendor) was about to be sued, and that she would, therefore, likely lose her property. In refusing to set aside the conveyance, the court stated the rule as follows: "It may, we think, be well questioned whether the alleged trust upon which this deed was executed is not of a character which the policy of the law forbids the courts to enforce. The purpose of the execution of the deed by appellee was to protect the property from liability for a debt which, through the fraudulent misrepresentations of Maher, she was induced to believe other parties were seeking to hold her liable. If the facts were as she supposed when she made the deed, however fraudulent may have been the conduct of the vendee, the court could give her no relief. But her motive in executing the deed is precisely the suit, although it is further averred that the action for slander was never brought to trial, but was dismissed by the plaintiff therein. Fletcher v. Fletcher, 2 MacArth. 38.

It is intimated in Cameron v. Romele, 53 Tex. 238, that a grantor cannot compel a reconveyance of premises even though they were conveyed by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of the grantee as to the grantor's liability for a debt. The court bases its opinion upon the ground that the grantor's motive in executing the deed was precisely the same, whether she acted upon a knowledge of the facts, or upon a mistaken belief in regard to them, induced by the fraudulent representations of the grantee. This case is referred to disapprovingly in Rivera v. White, 94 Tex. 538, 63 S. W. 125, infra.

One who had been in business which had proved unsuccessful, and had, together with his partner, compromised with their creditors by each giving a deed of trust upon their separate properties, with the understanding that each was to pay one half of the indebtedness, and, upon doing so, was to be released, and who had paid his share, and thereafter directed property purchased by him to be conveyed to his wife, because the courthouse in which the partnership agreement was recorded had been burned, and he was afraid he might unjustly be called upon to pay some of his former partner's debts, cannot rely upon his own wrong to defeat the title of the wife to the lands conveyed to her. He would be asking a court of equity to decree him relief from the consequences of his own fraud. Ratliff v. Ratliff, 102 Va. 880, 47 S. E. 1007.

A husband who buys lots, pays the purchase money, and requests that the deed be made to his wife, in order that the property may be beyond the reach of legal process if he should be prosecuted upon a certain demand, which he regards as unjust, is not entitled to the reconveyance of the premises. The maxim, In pari delicto melior est conditio possidentis et defendentis, applies. Holliday v. Holliday, 10 Iowa, 200.

Nor are the heirs of one who conveyed land to hinder or delay the collection of any judgment that might be rendered against him in a contemplated bastardy proceeding entitled to recover the land conveyed. The court observes: Conceding that the prosecutrix had no valid claim, it does not help the plaintiffs. The fact that no suit is pending at the time of the conveyance cannot vary the application of the principle, that one who conveys property with intent to defeat the satisfaction of such judgment as may be recovered against him in a suit cannot, after judgment in such suit in his favor, have the aid of a court of equity to compel the grantee to reconvey the property to him. The fact of the conveyance having been made may have dissuaded the girl from commencing any suit. Kihlken v. Kihlken, 59 Ohio St. 106, 51 N. E. 969.

But another class of cases conflicts with the decisions above shown, and advocates the doctrine that if the claim feared proves unfounded, the grantor may have a reconveyance of his property. These cases go on the theory that the apprehended creditor being in reality not a creditor, no one has been injured by the conveyance except the grantor himself, and it is, therefore, immaterial what motive he had in making the conveyance,—that where there is no creditor to be injured, there is no fraud.

In Smith v. Bowen, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 296, it is said: It is not enough to render a conveyance fraudulent, that the parties supposed a third person would recover a judgment against the grantor, and that the conveyance was made to defeat such person's claim. It should appear that he was actually a creditor.

A conveyance of land made by a man of intemperate habits to a friend, "for safe-keeping," because of representations that the grantor's divorced wife intended to demand additional dower, will be set aside, where the grantor had no creditors, unless his divorced wife was such, and it does not appear that she was or had any claim against him or contemplated making any. The grantor's intent in making the conveyance is wholly immaterial, provided no one same, whether she acted upon her knowledge of the facts, or upon a mistaken belief in regard to them, growing out of the fraudulent representations of her vendee."

In Harris v. Harris, 23 Gratt. 737, one, believing himself about to be wrongfully sued for damages, executed bonds in large sums without any consideration therefor, in order to protect himself from wrongful judgments which he anticipated would be recovered against him. In refusing to cancel these bonds the court of appeals of Virginia said: "It is, however, urged with much ingenuity and force that this case does not come within the operation of the statute of frauds, because these bonds were not given to hinder and delay creditors, but only to protect the defendant against the assertion of unjust demands, which he apprehended might be recovered against him because of the 'unfavorable and unjust constitution of courts and juries at that time;' that there was no fraudulent intent to secure his property against the claims of creditors, but the scheme resorted to was one intended for protection against unjust claimants. Now, it must be conceded that a party claiming damages for the acts of another must be regarded in law as much the creditor of that other as one holding his bonds or other promises to pay. Every person having a legal demand against another is his creditor, whether that demand is one sounding in damages or one that comes under a contract. This is a proposition too plain for argument. And it is to my mind equally plain that the but himself is injured or has cause to complain. Day v. Lown, 51 Iowa, 364, 1 N. W. 786.

One, apprehending that a judgment might be recovered against him in a pending action, conveyed his land to another, who agreed to reconvey it to the grantor if he were successful in the suit, and if not, to convey it to the grantor's children. The litigation terminated in favor of the grantor. It was held that the party who instituted the suit against him was not a creditor, that the conveyance was not fraudulent as to him, and that the grantor was entitled to recover against the grantee upon his assumption. Brady v. Ellison, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 348.

In Gunderman v. Gunnison, 39 Mich. 313, it is intimated that the assignor of a certificate of purchase of school lands should be allowed to redeem, where the assignment was made because a third person was prosecuting a groundless action against the assignor; that the fact that there was a mental purpose to cheat did not affect the transaction when the purpose could not take effect for the want of a creditor to be injured.

In a suit to cancel a deed of property, or to reach the purchase money received upon its sale by the grantee to an innocent purchaser, and in which the question was raised whether the conveyance was fraudulent, a judgment in favor of the grantor against the purchaser for the purchase money was sustained, where no creditors of the grantor are shown to have existed, and the property, if subject to the claims of creditors, was conveyed because of phantom fears that it might be taken for some illegal debt or unjust claim. Vandever v. Freeman, 20 Tex. 334, 70 Am. Dec. 391.

A brother who conveyed property to his sister on a secret trust for his benefit, to defeat any claim for alimony which his wife, who had instituted a suit for divorce, might make against him, is entitled to enforce the trust upon which the conveyance was made, where it does not appear that any claim for alimony was ever set up by his wife, or allowed, or that facts existed entitling her to such an allowance. The court said: It does not appear that there was any creditor whose rights or interests could be prejudiced by the conveyance, and the question is whether or not the mere motive which impelled the party to make the deed will preclude him from enforcing the trust upon which it was executed. We think that where there is no creditor, there is no fraud, and therefore no policy of the law to prevent the enforcement of the trust. Rivera v. White, 94 Tex. 538, 63 S. W. 125.

So, a fraudulent intent in the execution of a conveyance can be imputed only in case the interests of some third party may be injuriously affected by it. Kervick v. Mitchell, 68 Iowa, 273, 24 N. W. 151, 26 N. W. 434.

In Baker v. Gilman, 52 Barb. 26, a conveyance was upheld as against a subsequent creditor, although made with intent to defeat any recovery that might be obtained against the grantor in pending slander suits, which, however, were terminated in his favor. The court said: The sole object of the statute declaring every conveyance void which is made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors or other persons of their lawful suits, damages, forfeitures, debts, or demands, is to protect and prevent the defeat of lawful debts, claims, or demands, and not those which are unlawful or trumped up, and which have no foundation in law or justice, and the verity of which is never established by any judgment or by the assent of the persons against whom they are made. As against claims and demands of the latter class, the statute does not forbid conveyances or assignments, nor declare them void.

III. When conveyance was wrongfully induced by grantee.

a. In general.

It is said in Pride v. Andrew, 51 Ohio St. 405, 38 N. E. 84, that there are cases in which aid was extended to grantors who were in delicto, but not in pari delicto with the grantees. Where there are different degrees of guilt as between the parties to the question whether the demand asserted is a just and legal one, and whether the courts and juries will be likely to enforce an illegal and unjust claim, is not one for the party himself to decide. Nor will another court, passing upon his transactions in transferring his property to another to protect himself against such demands made in regular legal proceedings, inquire whether his apprehensions were justified, or whether the suits pending against him were proper suits. All these must necessarily be questions which another court cannot inquire into, and which certainly the party cannot be allowed to decide for himself."

In the case of Harper v. Harper, 85 Ky. 161, 7 Am. St. Rep. 583, 3 S. W. 5, it appeared that the vendor, who was an old and rather timid and weak-minded lady, conveyed her property to a relative, Charles Harper, who had fraudulently and falsely frightened her into the belief that she was to be sued for libel. In an action to recover the property, this court clearly recognized the rule that, if one undertakes to defeat a claim asserted against him by conveying his property to another, he cannot afterwards recover that which he fraudulently conveyed. In the case cited, however, the deed was rescinded on the ground that the parties were not in pari delicto; that the timid, weak-minded vendor was the victim, rather than the accomplice, of the vendee. Judge Holt, who spoke for the court, said: "It is true that in cases of executed contracts, if the parties be in pari delicto, they will fraudulent or illegal transaction, as, when one party acts under circumstances of oppression, imposition, undue influence, or at great disadvantage with the other party concerned, so that it appears that his guilt is subordinate, the court will grant relief, as an exception to the general rule.

So in Fletcher v. Fletcher, 2 MacArth. 38, where the court refused to set aside a deed executed to prevent the satisfaction of any judgment that might be recovered against the grantor in a pending suit for slander, although the action was never brought to trial, but was dismissed by the plaintiff therein, it is said: It may be that a court of equity would assist the grantor in such a case if there were circumstances shown to exist which recognized its interposition on other grounds of settled equity jurisdiction, such as fraud in procuring the deed, imposition by the grantee, a violation of some fiduciary relation, an abuse of confidence, delusion, or the like on the part of the grantor at the time of executing the deed. In such a case the parties would not be in pari delicto, and the deed, although made for an improper purpose, yet, having been unfairly procured, through the influence of the grantee, or made under a delusion of the facts, might be set aside.

b. Imposition or overreaching.

An illiterate man, subject to epileptic fits and of weak mind, was induced by another, in whom he had great confidence, to execute to him a chattel mortgage for the purpose of preventing the satisfaction of a judgment regarded by the mortgagor as unjust, and recovered for a debt which he claimed had been paid. The mortgagor was allowed to recover on the ground that where a stronger mind takes advantage of the weaker, and, by persuasion and influence, procures the unlawful act, the principle which denies relief to a party in pari delicto is not applicable. Davidson v. Carter, 55 Iowa, 117, 7 N. W. 468.

The administrator of one who, to place his property beyond the reach of any judgment that might be recovered in a suit instituted against him upon a debt which he claimed to have paid, but which he was unable to procure testimony to prove the payment of, gave a note without consideration, and secured the same by chattel mortgage, is entitled to recover from the mortgagee sums which the intestate was compelled to pay thereon, where the intestate was a man of weak mind, and had been for years subject to epileptic fits, and was so overreached by the mortgagee that it excused his guilt, and rendered him incapable of being or becoming in pari delicto. Wiley v. Carter, 77 Iowa, 751, 42 N. W. 566.

A court of equity will cancel a conveyance of land to a relative by a timid, credulous woman, who was induced to execute the deed by representations that there was danger that she would suffer loss by reason of her suretyship on a bond given by a third person as guardian of infants. The rule that a court of equity will not aid a grantor in a fraudulent conveyance to escape from the consequences of his own fraud is not applicable where the grantor is the dupe of the grantee, and his weakness has been imposed upon to obtain an undue advantage of him. Sanford v. Reed, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 431, 85 S. W. 213.

Equity will decree the cancellation of a deed executed by an old man who could neither read nor write, and was mentally weak, to one who encouraged him to execute it while laboring under excitement, fears, and apprehensions that a third person would seek to establish a false, unauthorized, and unjust claim against him, where the grantor was not indebted to any person whatever, and the grantee took advantage of the confidence reposed in him and of the grantor's weak intellect. Rozell v. Vansyckle, 11 Wash. 79, 39 Pac. 270.

But in an action to recover property deeded without consideration by a man addicted to habits of intoxication, and who, when in that condition, made improvident bargains, a recovery was denied and the maxim In pari delicto melior est conditio defendentis applied, where the conveyance was made by be left where they have placed themselves. . . . If, however, one party is but an instrument in the hands of the other, then they are not in pari delicto."

The refusal of the chancellor to interfere where the vendor, for a fraudulent purpose, has conveyed his property on a secret trust to reconvey, is not alone to protect the creditors, although that consideration has its weight in the problem. The creditors have a remedy of their own by a proceeding to set aside the conveyance that their debts may be paid. Of course, to do this there must be creditors in existence; for, if there are no creditors, there is no injury, and the conveyance stands. But that is not the case here. In this case the appellee, according to his own statement, in order to discourage one who sought, or was contemplating seeking, to enforce a claim against him, conveyed his property to his sister, and is now, after the feared prosecution has failed and his sister dead, seeking to recover it. It is contrary to the policy of the law that one should be "discouraged" in the assertion of a legal right by his adversary conveying his property without consideration. The transaction involves moral turpitude in the intention with which it is done. What actually happens may be immaterial. Suppose, for an example, one conveys his property on secret trust for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and then should afterwards pay all his debts; would the fact that no creditor was actually injured enable him to recover from his vendee? Or suppose one having no creditors should convey his property for the purpose of becoming indebted, and then defrauding his dupes by being insolvent, but should repent before the fraud was com-the grantor while sober, because of improvident bargains entered into when drunk, and by reason of the grantee's promise to "stand his friend," and that he could and would, by means of the conveyance, protect him from the imposition which had been practised upon him. Smith v. Elliott, 1 Patton & H. (Va.) 307.

c. False representations.

1. In general.

One who executes a bill of sale at the instance of the grantee, for the purpose of putting his property beyond the reach of a third person whom the grantee represented was about to institute suit against the grantor, is entitled to recover the value of the property, where such third person had no valid claim against the grantor, but had been settled with in full, and his receipt taken. Kervick v. Mitchell, 68 Iowa, 273, 24 N. W. 151, 26 N. W. 434.

But, in Cameron v. Romele, 53 Tex. 238, where one was induced to convey real property to another without consideration by reason of his false and fraudulent representations that third persons were seeking to hold the grantor liable for a debt, and that the grantee would hold the deed without record until all danger was past, whereupon he would reconvey the premises, it is intimated that the grantor is not entitled to enforce the trust upon which it is alleged the deed was executed. The court said: If the facts were as the grantor supposed when she made the deed, however fraudulent may have been the conduct of the vendee, the court could give her no relief. Her motive in executing the deed is precisely the same whether she acted upon her knowledge of the facts or upon a mistaken belief in regard to them, growing out of the fraudulent representations of her vendee.

2. By one in confidential relations.

A conveyance made by a mother to a daughter in consequence of false representations that her property might otherwise be taken from her to satisfy a claim for alimony arising from a suit for divorce about to be brought against her son by his wife will be canceled. The court said: If the conveyance was made for the purpose of protecting the property from such claim, such representations being untrue, and such apprehensions in fact groundless, then she is entitled to have the deeds set aside. Kleeman v. Peltzer, 17 Neb. 381, 22 N. W. 793.

The administrator of one who, during his last sickness, and while generally debilitated in both body and mind, was persuaded to assign property to his brother-in-law, upon a secret trust, for the benefit of the assignor's wife and children, by reason of representations that he was liable as indorser, and that his estate would otherwise be taken to pay the demand, is entitled to recover the property, where the representations were false and the assignor had no creditors. The court says: Although the act of the assignor may appear to be fraudulent, yet he was induced by the false assertions and fraudulent conduct of the assignee to enter into the arrangement. Prewett v. Coopwood, 30 Miss. 369.

A deed executed by an aged woman to her son, who led her to believe that a suit for slander was about to be instituted against her, and that all her property would be otherwise lost, will be set aside where no such suit was contemplated, and she had no creditor to be defrauded by the conveyance. Said the court: If one party is but an instrument in the hands of the other, mitted; could it be maintained that, because he had paid his creditors in the first case, and never had any in the second, he could recover the property so conveyed? We think both these questions should be answered in the negative. The enforcement of a trust is a purely equitable remedy. The chancellor, originally, as a matter of grace,—not legal right,—seized upon the conscience of the trustee, and forced him to do justice because it was immoral that he should defraud one who had confided in his honor. But he would not so aid one whose hardship arose from his own evil intent or moral turpitude. That which was conceived in sin, as to the interest of the wrongdoer, was permitted to be brought forth in iniquity; or, as one of the older opinions has it, "He who doeth fraud may not borrow the hand of the chancellor to draw equity from a fountain his own hath polluted."

then they are not in pari delicto. She was not in debt; no creditor was to be defrauded; and under the circumstances the deed must be regarded as the creature of the false alarm of legal consequences in his mind, but of which he was the author, and is, therefore, his act rather than that of his mother. Harper v. Harper, 85 Ky. 161, 7 Am. St. Rep. 583, 3 S. W. 5.

A deed executed without consideration by one diseased in body and weak in mind to his brother, in whom he trusted and confided, and who had great influence over him, which conveyance was made because of representations that a certain woman was about to institute a breach of promise suit against the grantor, whereas there was no foundation for such a suit or intent to institute it, will be set aside and canceled. The court remarks: To countenance such an instrument would, in most cases of confidential relations, make the weaker party a victim to the rapacity of the stronger. Holliday v. Holliday, 77 Mo. 392.

So a deed will be rescinded which was procured without consideration and by fraudulent representations to the grantor, that she was liable to sustain loss from having signed, with her husband, a note given for a patent right which the grantee assured her was a fraud, and further told her she need not pay it if she would convey her property to him, and that he would reconvey it when the patent difficulty was settled. The court said: A court of equity will not usually aid anyone against a voluntary act in fraud of the law; but neither will it usually allow a person to profit by any instrument which is extorted by exciting false alarms or threats of legal consequences, when there is such a relation of confidence as gives one a special power over the other. This conveyance was not intended to defraud honest creditors. There were no creditors to defraud, and there was no debt on which complainant was liable at all. Relief will not be denied to the party least in fault against one who has led her into the act by a violation of confidence. They are not in equal wrong. Barnes v. Brown, 32 Mich. 146.

Believing it to be contrary to public policy that one should undertake to defeat a claim about to be asserted against him through the machinery of the law by conveying his property upon a secret trust, with a false statement that it was made for a valuable consideration, we think the chancellor should have dismissed the bill which sought to recover the property so conveyed by appellee.

In arriving at the conclusion we have reached in this case, we are not unmindful of the fact that there is high authority opposing it, notably § 441, Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, 4th ed., and the cases cited in the note in support of the text; but we believe that the authorities we have followed are based upon a sounder policy and a more cogent logic. Wherefore the judgment is reversed, for proceedings consistent herewith.

Where a widow who, while greatly disturbed and worried, and under acute apprehension as to a claim made by the heirs of her husband against his estate, but which had little or no foundation, made conveyance of her property to one who had been her adviser, and in whom she had great confidence, the conveyance was set aside, since the parties could not be said to be in pari delicto. Ingersoll v. Weld, 103 App. Div. 554, 93 N. Y. Supp. 291.

A court of equity will set aside a transfer of property made by a wife to her husband, without consideration, because of his statements, made under misapprehension or mistake, that she was liable for certain debts. In its opinion the court said: Nor is it an answer that the wife consented to the transaction to defraud creditors. The parties do not stand on equal terms, and the husband cannot avail himself of the plea of particeps criminis on the part of his wife. Boyd v. De La Montagnie, 73 N. Y. 498, 29 Am. Rep. 197.

But in Renfrew v. McDonald, 11 Hun, 254, the maxim in pari delicto melior est conditio possidentis was applied where one, for a nominal consideration, had conveyed property to an intimate and confidential friend, in reliance upon the latter's false representations that the grantor was liable upon certain notes fraudulently obtained from him by the holder, and the grantor was held not entitled to a reconveyance of the property.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.

LAURA STITH, Admr., etc., of Robert H. Stith, Deceased.

(.... Ky.)

1. Venue—action for negligent injuries.

The residence of the personal representative of one killed by negligence, and not that of deceased, is referred to in a statute permitting an action for negligent injuries by a railroad company to be brought in the county of the plaintiff's residence if the carrier passes into it.

2. Negligence—violation of road rules.

An engineer of a work train does not, as matter of law, cut himself off from recovery for resulting injuries by placing his engine on the main track on the time of a fast train having the right of way, where he places the proper signals to stop the expected train, and, in his judgment, his course of action is necessary to protect the property and interest of his employer.

3. Same—recovery for injuries.

A railroad engineer who places his train on the main track on the time of a fast train having the right of way, after placing the proper signals to stop the train, may recover for injuries caused by a resulting collision if those in charge of the other train see, or by the exercise of ordinary care could see, the engine in time to avert the collision.

4. Evidence—admissibility of brake tests.

Evidence of professed tests printed in a book of instructions as to the use of a patent brake is not admissible upon the question as to the distance within which a train can be stopped.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hardin County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle, Trabue, Doolan, & Cox, with Messrs. Poston & Moorman, for appellants:

The court erred in refusing peremptorily to instruct the jury to find for the defendants.

Hocker, 111 Ky. 707, 64 S. W. 638, 65 S. W. 119; Clarke v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 101 Ky. 34, Case Note.—The determination of the question, under what circumstances the venturing with train or hand car upon a track over which another train has the right of way amounts to such contributory negligence as will defeat recovery for injuries received in a collision, does not depend on any arbitrary rule. Such conduct may be justified by duty, or the existence of an emergency; or it may be, as suggested in the case of ILLINOIS C. R. Co. v. STITH, the doctrine of last clear chance may render the contributory negligence of the person injured an unavailing defense. In short, each case, like all other negligence cases, must be decided on its own peculiar facts.

While the question as to what emergency will justify the obstruction of a track over which another train has a right of way seems not to have arisen in any other than the STITH CASE, there are cases, mostly actions for injuries received in coupling cars, where the emergency was produced by the necessity of doing a piece of work with unusual promptitude, which sustain the doctrine stated in Labatt, Master & Servant, vol. 1, § 358, that "the existence of an emergency is sometimes treated as a differentiating or conformatory element, either absolutely precluding a court from declaring the servant negligent as a matter of law, or tending to support the conclusion that he was free from negligence." See Lawless v. Connecticut River R. Co. 136 Mass. 1; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Higgins, 53 Ark. 458, 14 S. W. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

653; Horan v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 89 Iowa, 329, 56 N. W. 507.

And in Labatt, Master & Servant, vol. 1, § 361, it is said: "The courts have sometimes allowed the action to be maintained upon the theory that, when a servant is suddenly confronted by an emergency in which his master's property is threatened with destruction or serious injury, the fact that he attempted to preserve that property, and in doing so exposed himself to greater risks than would have been encountered by a prudent person who was thinking only of his own safety, will not necessarily render him chargeable with contributory negligence. This doctrine, however, does not afford any protection to a servant whose conduct was essentially rash. It does not justify him in going into a place in which he will be exposed to an imminent peril which may at any moment eventuate in disaster. Nor does it serve as an excuse where the damage with which the property was threatened was comparatively slight, when considered with relation to the extremely dangerous nature of the course of action pursued with a view to saving it."

The question whether an employee on one train who obstructs the right of way of another train can recover for injuries received arose in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. McDade, 59 Ga. 73, in which such right was denied to an engineer who left the starting point without express authority from the superintendent, fifteen minutes after schedule time, colliding with a train which was overdue at such point.

But in Mills v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 87 Ga. 102, 13 S. E. 205, the question whether a brakeman on a train which was delayed on the main track by an accident, who followed the conductor's directions to put torpedoes on the track to warn a later train, and to get some sleep in the caboose, and who was killed by such train, was guilty of contributory negligence, was held to be a question for the jury.

And the engineer of a special train, required by the rules to know the position of regular trains, which had the right of way, is guilty of negligence in colliding with a regular train standing at a station, at which point he was also required to have his train under control. Merritt v. Great Northern R. Co. 81 Minn. 496, 84 N. W. 321.

A similar class of cases are those where a train collides with a hand car. In Campbell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 76, it was held that it is not necessarily negligence to run a hand car on a railroad when a train is past due, for the purpose of making an inspection and repairs.

In Woodward Iron Co. v. Herndon, 130 Ala. 364, 30 So. 370, it was held that the question of contributory negligence of employees on a hand car, who knew that a switch engine was liable to be passing at any time, and who were injured by such engine, which was running at an unusual rate of speed, was for the jury.

Iowa, 717, 29 N. W. 787, an employee who, being told by the engineer that the train would not start for fifteen minutes, went ahead upon a hand car, and was run down in seven minutes, was allowed to recover.

But the right of a repair man on a hand car, who was run into by an extra, to recover damages, was denied in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wachter, 60 Md. 395, on the ground that it was an assumed risk; and in Shepard v. Boston & M. R. Co. 158 Mass. 174, 33 N. E. 508, on the ground that employees had notice that trains might come along without warning.

The right to damages was also denied on the ground of contributory negligence, in Goodlett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 122 U. S. 391, 30 L. ed. 1230, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1254, where the plaintiff ran his hand car into a deep cut, when he knew a passenger train was approaching; in Southern P. Co. v. Ryan (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 527, where the plaintiff's decedent failed to obey an instruction to flag around all curves; in Burling v. Illinois C. R. Co. 85 Ill. 18, where an employee left for home on a hand car at a time when he knew that a train, if on time, would meet him on the road; and in Ream v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 49 Ind. 93, where one of a pleasure party on a hand car was killed by a special train.

And in Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Goss, 13 Ill. App. 619, it was held error to exclude from the consideration of the jury the conduct of the plaintiff in starting with a hand car just ahead of a regular train.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee's intestate was an engineer on a work train of appellant, and was killed on December 27, 1902, at Caneyville, Grayson county, Kentucky. The decedent at the time of his death was a resident of Louisville, Jefferson county, Kentucky, where the appellee qualified as the administratrix of his estate. She, as such administratrix, instituted this action in the Hardin circuit court, and, in substance, alleged in the petition that appellants, Illinois Central Railroad Company and one Louis Cofer, an engineer in the employ of the railroad company, by gross negligence ran its engine and train of cars on its railroad, upon which Cofer was acting as engineer, with great force and violence, against the engine in charge of her intestate, and upon which he was at the time, and against the cars attached thereto, and against her intestate, and did thereby kill him, to appellee's damage in the sum of $20,000. The appellant first filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the Hardin circuit court, stating that the accident occurred in Grayson county, Kentucky; that Stith, at the time he was killed, was a citizen and resident of Jefferson county, Kentucky; that appellee qualified as his administratrix in Jefferson county, Kentucky, and that she resided in Jefferson county at the time of filing this suit, and still resided there; that appellant had its chief officer and offices which it had in Kentucky in Jefferson county at the time of filing this suit and ever since; that its coappellant, Louis Cofer, did not reside in Hardin county at the time of the happening of the things complained of in the petition, and did not then reside in Hardin county. Upon these facts, it asked for a dismissal of the action because the Hardin circuit court did not have jurisdiction. The appellant, by answer and amended answers, traversed all the material allegations of negligence contained in the petition, and set up the separate defense of contributory negligence on the part of Stith, and also set out certain rules of the company for the government of its employees, and averred that Stith's position on the truck at the time he was killed was taken in violation of these rules. It appears that the reply of appellee was lost from the record, and, in order to avoid delay and expense, it was agreed that all pleadings should stand as if all affirmative matter in them had been controverted of record, and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) as if all affirmative pleas that could have been made had been made thereto, and the affirmative pleas controverted of record. Thus the issues were fairly made up as to the place of residence of appellee at the institution of the action and down to the time of trial, and as to negligence, contributory negligence, and the violation of rules governing the service of decedent and other employees of the appellant company. Upon these issues there was a trial, and a verdict and judgment for appellee for $5,000 against both of the appellants. Their motion for a new trial having been overruled, they have appealed.

The first ground urged for a reversal is that the lower court had no jurisdiction of the action. It appears from the record that at the time of Robert Stith's death he was a resident of Jefferson county, Kentucky, and appellee was appointed administratrix of his estate by the county court of that county. The injuries causing his death were inflicted in Grayson county. But at the time of the institution of this action the appellee was a resident of Hardin county, and the action was brought in that county and appellant's line of railroad passed through that county. These facts are virtually conceded by both sides. Appellants contend that the personal residence of the appellee in Hardin county did not confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court of that county to try the action. Section 73 of the Civil Code provides: "An action against such carrier for an injury to a passenger, or to other person or his property, must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or either of several defendants, resides; or in which the plaintiff or his property is injured; or in which he resides, if he reside in a county into which the carrier passes." This section fixes three localities where such an action may be brought, namely, the county of defendant's residence, the county where the injury was done, and the county of the plaintiff's residence, if the carrier passes into that county. Manifestly, the personal representative is the only plaintiff in this action, and the only person who could have brought it, for, by § 6 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, it is provided that the action to recover such damages shall be prosecuted by the personal representative of the deceased. Therefore, according to the letter of the statute, the residence of the personal representative is one of the places where the action may be brought. When the general assembly enacted § 73 of the Code, it evidently had the convenience of all parties in mind. Therefore it allowed the plaintiff to sue at the home of the defendant, if he so desired, or go to the county where the injury was inflicted, and where it would probably best suit the convenience of the witnesses, or to his own home county, provided the carrier passed through such county. The purpose of this last clause was to place the jurisdiction convenient to the plaintiff, and yet not inconvenient to the defendant. The fact that plaintiff resided there would make it convenient for him, and the fact that the defendant passed through the county would insure that it would not be unreasonably inconvenient to it. There is reason in this provision, if the home of the personal representative, in cases of death, is referred to, because he is the one who must look after and prosecute the suit; but it is absurd if the residence of the deceased is referred to, for his convenience can no longer be consulted. He can have no connection with the trial of the action. Therefore we are of the opinion that the spirit as well as the letter of the law requires the construction contended for by appellee to be placed on this section. See the cases of Turner v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 110 Ky. 879, 62 S. W. 1025; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilliam, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1536, 71 S. W. 863; and Sherrill v. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. 89 Ky. 302, 12 S. W. 465.

The substance of the facts as they appear in the record is as follows: Appellee's intestate was employed by the appellant company in the capacity of engineer and was placed in charge of the engine on one of its work trains. This train worked during the day at Rosine tunnel, and laid up at night at the town of Caneyville, where they had no yard master or yard hands. The crew of the work train consisted of the deceased; Eiffier, fireman; McCann, conductor; and Turner, flagman. At night a watchman named Bell was placed at the engine, but, under the rules of the company, he could not move it. The tank of this engine became leaky, and on the morning of December 27, 1902, before the usual time to arise, Stith, Eiffier, McCann, and Turner were all aroused at their boarding house by Bell, who informed them that the water had leaked out of the tank and was low in the engine, and that something had to be done at once. They all dressed and went to the engine. Stith went into the tank to repair the leak, and came out with dry feet. The engine had become hot for lack of water, and was getting hotter all the time. There was no night operator at Caneyville, and it was too early for the day operator. No. 104, a fast passenger train going north, was past due, but had been running from one-half hour to four hours late, and they had no means of knowing when that train would pass. They all considered the question whether they should flag No. 104, and take the engine out on the main track to a water tank near by, and take water, or whether they should draw the fire from the fire box and let the engine die. They realized that one of these things must be done at once, and concluded to flag No. 104 and take the engine out to the tank. Stith ordered Turner, the flagman, to proceed south and flag No. 104. Turner took his lantern and went to the curve south of Caneyville, 1,120 yards from the water tank, and, after Turner had reached this point, McCann threw the switch, and the engine was taken out on the main track to the water tank. McCann left the switch open, with the red light shining squarely down the track, and very soon thereafter No. 104 crashed into the work engine and killed Stith and Bell. The proof also shows that the distance from the water tank to the switch light, where the engine came upon the main track, was 215 yards, and the switch light was south of the tank, and the track continued straight south for 905 yards to the point where Flagman Turner was. The appellant Cofer testified that 104 was one of four fast trains which had the right of way, under the rules of the company, over all other trains on the road; that he was the engineer on 104 that morning, and was going north; that he did not see Turner at the point named by him, attempting to flag his train, nor did he notice that the switch was turned and the red light was against him until he was about 100 yards from it, nor did he discover decedent's engine and caboose on the main track until the headlight on his engine shone upon the caboose of the decedent's train; that he then immediately applied the emergency brakes, but could not stop his train, and the collision occurred with such force as to throw both engines from the track; that, when he first saw the red light of the switch, the thought occurred to him that the crew of some train leaving there had left it turned; that he could with his train pass over it without injury, as his train was going north, but the switch was so constructed that it would have been dangerous for a southbound train to have attempted to pass it.

The appellants contend, under the facts as proved, that they were entitled to a peremptory instruction, for the reason that Stith took his train from the side track, a place of safety, and placed it at the water tank on the main track, in a place of danger, when he knew that 104 was due, and had not passed, and under the rules of the company it was entitled to the right of way, as against his work train. Appellee contends that her intestate was not guilty of any negligence; that he was confronted with an emergency which required prompt action to avert injury to the engine in his charge, which by the rules of the company he was required to protect, and also to avert loss of time to the train crew of hands at Rosine tunnel, which would have resulted if he had drawn the fire from the box and permitted the engine to die—and refers to rule 106 of the company which reads, "In all cases of doubt and uncertainty, the safe course must be taken and no risks run," and claims that, being confronted with this emergency, he exercised his best judgment, and it was for the jury to say whether he exercised this judgment properly under all the circumstances. We are of the opinion that appellee's intestate erred in taking his engine upon the track under the circumstances. He knew that 104 was entitled to the right of way, and by his going upon the main track with his engine he would probably impede the progress of this fast passenger train, which had important connections to make for the benefit of passengers, and might endanger the lives of the passengers and the company's employees and its property; which unfortunately did occur by reason of his mistake and violation of the rules. He should not have taken the risk, but should have taken the safe course and remained on the side track. But, this being true, it does not necessarily follow that appellant was entitled to the peremptory instruction. The rules of the company, as shown in the record, required its engineers "to keep a constant and vigilant lookout for signals and the positions of switches while running, and not to pass red signals and red lights on the switches, but must stop and ascertain the cause." It is further provided by the rules that when a train stops or is delayed, or the main track is obstructed, the same must be protected by the flagman when necessary to prevent accident. In the case at bar, the deceased, confronted with the emergency stated, and in an endeavor to protect the property and interest of his employer, obstructed the main track by placing his engine at the water tank. But before doing so he sent out the flagman, with his red light and a torpedo, 1,120 yards in the direction from which 104 was coming, for the purpose of flagging it. The red switch light was also turned against it. The deceased knew that the rules of the company required Cofer, in charge of 104, to stop his train, and not to pass these red signals; and he had the right to assume that he would perform his duty under the rules, and would keep a constant and vigilant lookout for signals and switches, especially in a town; and, if Cofer had done so, decedent would not have been injured or killed. In view of the peculiar facts of this case, we are of the opinion that appellee's intestate violated the rules of the company in taking his engine out on the main track, and, if he had done so without sending out the flagman and turning the switch light, thereby giving notice or warning to the engineer of 104, the court should have given a peremptory instruction to find for appellant. But, conceding that he erred in judgment as to his duty, the facts show that it was an honest mistake. His purpose was to protect the property of his master. He took all the necessary steps and precautions provided by the rules to notify and warn Cofer of his situation on the main track. Under these facts and circumstances, we are not willing to say that decedent cut himself off from all right of protection.

Appellants contend that, unless the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to grant them a peremptory instruction, we will, in effect, overrule the opinions in the cases of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hiltner, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1828, 56 S. W. 654; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scanlon, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1400, 60 S. W. 643; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard, 82 Ky. 212; Newport News & M. Valley R. Co. v. Deuser, 97 Ky. 92, 29 S. W. 973; Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 97 Ky. 229, 30 S. W. 639. After an examination of the cases, we are of the opinion they do not apply to the facts of the case at bar. The last three cases were cases of ordinary trespassers, and at places where they had no right under any circumstances to be, and the company was not required to keep a lookout, and owed them no duty except to save them if discovered in time. The first two cases cited are cases where the engineers were injured by reason of the violation of rules; but they did not give, or attempt to give, the company or its agents in charge of other trains any notice or warning of their perilous positions, as required by the rules, so as to place the company or its agents under the duty of exercising care to avoid injuring them.

We are of the opinion that the principles announced in the following cases, when considered with reference to the particular facts of this case, negative the idea that appellants were entitled to a peremptory instruction: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCoy, 81 Ky. 415; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Earl, 94 Ky. 368, 22 S. W. 607; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Mahan, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1200, 34 S. W. 16; Cahill v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 92 Ky. 345, 18 S. W. 2; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coniff, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 298, 27 S. W. 865; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Adams, 106 Ky. 859, 51 S. W. 577; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lowe, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2317, 65 L.

R. A. 122, 80 S. W. 770; and Bowling Green Stone Co. v. Capshaw, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 945, 64 S. W. 507. In the last case cited, Capshaw was an employee of the stone company. His duties were those of a carpenter in the company's mill. When he was injured he was in front of a truck for the purpose of testing the stone thereon to see if it had been sawed in straight lines, and while attending to this he was injured by the engineer backing the truck over his foot. The company claimed that Capshaw was not in a place or performing labor where his duties required him to be. This court in that case, in discussing an instruction, said: "We are of opinion that this instruction is erroneous and prejudicial to appellant, in the use of the phrase 'or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known.' This placed upon appellant the duty of keeping a lookout for appellee at a place where he voluntarily placed himself, without orders, direction, or duty to be. If appellee, outside of the duties which he was employed to perform, and without direction from Douglas, the superintendent, so to do, went voluntarily into a place of danger,—in front of the truck,—he should have called attention to his position, so that the hookers or engineer would know of his peril, and would then be under the duty of exercising care to avoid injuring him. If appellee, being thus situated, without directions from Douglas, and outside of his duties, failed to give the hookers or engineer notice of his position, he would be guilty of contributory negligence, for which he could not recover." The principles enunciated in this case seem to completely cover the one at bar; i. e., if appellee's intestate, in violation of the rules, went voluntarily into a place of danger, onto the main track, on the time of 104, he should have called attention to his position, so that those in charge of 104 would have known of his peril, and would have then been under the duty of exercising care to avoid injuring him. It appears that the deceased performed this duty, and gave notice of his position in the way and manner prescribed by the rules. The only question that should have been submitted to the jury was whether those in charge of the fast train, No. 104, saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the train in charge of Stith in time to have stopped or checked his train, and saved Stith from injury and death. If so, the appellee should recover; otherwise the finding should be for the appellants.

On the trial, appellee, over the objection of appellants, introduced in evidence some professed tests of the Westinghouse air brakes, appearing in the back of a book of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

instructions with reference to the use and operation of such brakes. We are of the opinion that the court erred in permitting this to be introduced as evidence. These professed tests were nothing more than advertisements of the makers for the purpose of inducing purchasers, and they seem not to have been prepared and issued by appellants.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Petition for modification denied.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

HENRY R. PREWITT, Insurance Commissioner, Appt.,

v.

SECURITY MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY OF HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT, Appt.,

v.

HENRY R. PREWITT, Insurance Commissioner.

(.... Ky.)

Revocation of corporate license for removal of cause to Federal court.

A statute directing the revocation of the license of a foreign insurance company to do business within the state for refusing to perform its agreement not to remove suits against it to the Federal courts is not in conflict with the Federal Constitution.

(Burnam, Ch. J., and Barker, J., dissent.)

(December 15, 1904.)

APPEALS from judgments of the Chancery Branch of the Second Division of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in actions brought to enjoin the revocation of licenses to do business within the state; the insurance commissioner appealing in the first case from a judgment in plaintiff's favor; and plaintiff appealing in the second case from a judgment in defendant's favor. First case reversed. Second case affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—In PREWITT v. SECURITY MUT. L. INS. CO. an unsuccessful attempt was made to reopen the question apparently settled in Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148, where it was held that a state may revoke the license of a foreign insurance company to do business within the state, upon the ground that such corporation refuses to refrain from removing suits against it to the Federal courts, notwithstanding the fact that agreements to refrain from moving such suits, entered into by a foreign company, are void and of no effect, as decided in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse. 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365. This attempt was based upon the ground that the Supreme Court had in effect overruled the decision in the Doyle Case by its decision in Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 295, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 931, where it was held that a state statute requiring every foreign corporation to have a license before engaging in business in the state was void, where it also contained a provision providing that a license should not issue except upon a stipulation by the corporation that the permit should be void if the corporation removed suits against it to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. N. B. Hays, Attorney General, and H. R. Prewitt, with Messrs. Hazelrigg, Chénault, & Hazelrigg, for the insurance commissioner:

The statute is a valid exercise of the power of the state to exclude foreign corporations for any reason whatever. The state may withdraw a license at pleasure, as it may refuse a license in the first instance.

the Federal courts; and that the statute requiring a license being void, the defendant was not subject to arrest for doing business for a foreign corporation which had not complied with the statute.

After the decision in the TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY CASE, adverse to the contention of the insurance company, a writ of error issued from the Supreme Court of the United States to review the judgment, but this writ of error was dismissed upon the ground that the license involved, having been issued for a limited period, and having expired after the issuance of the writ of error, the question involved was a moot one and would not be passed upon. Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the first of the above cases the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company filed its petition in equity, alleging that in the year 1900 it began business in Kentucky, having complied with the requirements of the statutes of the state applicable to foreign insurance companies, the plaintiff being a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York; that the commissioner then granted it permission to transact the business of life insurance in this state, and it employed a large number of agents, established a large number of agencies throughout the state, expended large sums of money in advertising its business, and acquired a large and profitable business in the state; that in June, 1904, it removed to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Kentucky, without the consent of the other party, a suit brought against it in one of the circuit courts of the state; and that on September 29, 1904, the defendant, Prewitt, as insurance commissioner, revoked its authority to do business in the state for the sole reason that it had removed the suit referred to to the circuit court of the United States, and refused and still refuses to set aside the revocation. It prayed an injunction requiring the commissioner to annul the revocation of its license and to continue its authority to transact the business of life insurance in the state. The defendant demurred to the petition, his demurrer was overruled, and, he declining to plead further, a judgment was entered as prayed in the petition.

In the other case the petition is very similar, except that it is there averred that the commissioner has not yet revoked the plaintiff's license, but that he threatens to do so, and, unless enjoined by the court, will revoke it, to the plaintiff's irreparable injury; it being a foreign corporation created under the laws of the state of Connecticut. The defendant demurred to the petition, his demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, its petition was dismissed. Both the appeals raise the same question and will be considered together.

By § 633, Ky. Stat. 1903, license to agents of foreign companies must be renewed annually, and any person acting as the agent of such a company without procuring a license, or after the license has expired, or has been suspended or revoked, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than $50 nor more than $100 for each offense. By § 634 every foreign insurance company, before transacting any business in this state, must return to the commissioner a copy of its charter or organic law, and the commissioner, upon being satisfied that the company has complied with the laws of the state and is possessed with the legal reserve, shall furnish to such agents as the company directs a license to transact business as agents for the company, under the seal of the insurance department. By § 657 foreign life insurance companies, in addition, must file statements annually of their condition on the 31st of December of the year preceding, and certain evidences of their deposits, securities, etc. By § 694 insurance companies other than life, not incorporated under the laws of this state, upon complying with the provisions of the statute, may be authorized by the commissioner to transact business in the state. By § 761 the fees to be charged by the commissioner are regulated.

Section 631, Ky. Stat. 1903, is in these words: "Before authority is granted to any foreign insurance company to do business in this state, it must file with the commissioner a resolution adopted by its board of directors, consenting that service of process upon any agent of such company in this state, or upon the commissioner of insurance of this state, in any action brought or pending in this state, shall be a valid service upon said company; and if process is served upon the commissioner it shall be his duty to at once send it by mail, addressed to the company at its principal office; and if any company shall, without the consent of the other party to any suit or proceeding brought by or against it in any court of this state, remove said suit or proceeding to any Federal court, or shall institute any suit or proceeding against any citizen of this state in any Federal court, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to forthwith revoke all authority to such company and its agents to do business in this state, and to publish such revocation in some newspaper of general circulation published in the state."

The validity of the latter clause of the section is the only question to be determined upon the appeal. It is insisted that it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Three decisions of the United States Supreme Court are relied on.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365, the statute of the state required the foreign insurance company to sign an agreement not to remove any of its cases to the Federal courts. The company signed the agreement and afterwards filed a petition seeking the removal of a suit brought against it to the Federal court. The state court refused to remove the case, but on appeal to the United States Supreme Court the judgment of the state court was reversed, and it was held that the agreement in advance not to exercise a right guaranteed by the Constitution did not prevent the defendant from removing the case to the Federal court. The opinion was written by Judge Hunt, and goes no further than the question actually before the court.

The next case relied on is Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148; the opinion being also written by Judge Hunt. In that case there was a state statute corresponding to § 631 above quoted, and the state officer under it was about to cancel the license of the insurance company. The plaintiff made in substance the same allegations as are made in the case before us, and prayed an injunction as in these cases. The Supreme Court, reversing the court below, dismissed the bill. After distinguishing the case from the Morse Case, the court said: "The cases of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274, Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972, Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, and Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451, establish the principle that a state may impose upon a foreign corporation, as a condition of coming into or doing business within its territory, any terms, conditions, and restrictions it may think proper that are not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States. The point is elaborated at great length by Chief Justice Taney in the case first named, and by Mr. Justice Field [Curtis] in the case last named. The correlative power to revoke or recall a permission is a necessary consequence of the main power. A mere license by a state is always revocable. Christ Church v. Philadelphia County, 24 How. 300, 16 L. ed. 602; People ex rel. Cunningham v. Roper, 35 N. Y. 629; People ex rel. Davies v. Tax & A. Comrs. 47 N. Y. 501. The power to revoke can only be restrained, if at all, by an explicit contract upon good consideration to that effect. Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 244, 21 L. ed. 326; Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 21 L. ed. 204. License to a foreign corporation to enter a state does not involve a permanent right to remain. Subject to the laws and Constitution of the United States, full power and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) control over its territories, its citizens, and its business belongs to the state. If the state has the power to do an act, its intention or the reason by which it is influenced in doing it cannot be inquired into. Thus the pleading before us alleges that the permission of the Continental Insurance Company to transact its business in Wisconsin is about to be revoked for the reason that it removed the case of Drake from the state to the Federal courts. If the act of an individual is within the terms of the law, whatever may be the reason which governs him or whatever may be the result, it cannot be impeached. The acts of a state are subject to still less inquiry, either as to the act itself or as to the reason for it. The state of Wisconsin, except so far as its connection with the Constitution and laws of the United States alters its position, is a sovereign state, possessing all the powers of the most absolute government in the world. The argument that the revocation in question is made for an unconstitutional reason cannot be sustained. The suggestion confounds an act with an emotion or a mental proceeding, which is not the subject of inquiry in determining the validity of a statute. An unconstitutional reason or intention is an impracticable suggestion, which cannot be applied to the affairs of life. If the act done by the state is legal,—is not in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States,—it is quite out of the power of any court to inquire what was the intention of those who enacted the law. In all cases where the legislation of a state has been declared void, such legislation has been based upon an act or a fact which was itself illegal." After discussing certain previous decisions, the court added: "It is said that we thus indirectly sanction what we condemn when presented directly; to wit, that we enable the state of Wisconsin to enforce an agreement to abstain from the Federal courts. This is an 'inexact statement.' The effect of our decision in this respect is that the state may compel the foreign company to abstain from the Federal courts or to cease to do business in the state. It gives the company the option. This is justifiable, because the complainant has no constitutional right to do business in that state. That state has authority at any time to declare that it shall not transact business there. This is the whole point of the case, and, without reference to the injustice, the prejudice, or the wrong that is alleged to exist, must determine the question. No right of the complainant under the laws or Constitution of the United States, by its exclusion from the state, is infringed; and this is what the state now accomplishes.

There is nothing, therefore, that will justify the interference of this court."

It is conceded by counsel that, if this case is still authority, these actions must fail. But it is insisted that in Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 295, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 931, this case was, in effect, overruled. In Barron v. Burnside there was a state statute requiring every foreign corporation to have a license before engaging in business in the state. The license, by the terms of the statute, was not to be issued except upon the application of the company by a resolution of the board of directors or stockholders authorizing it, and containing a stipulation that the permit should be subject to each of the provisions of the act, one of which was that the permit should be void if the corporation removed a case to the Federal courts. Barron was arrested under the statute for doing business for a foreign corporation without complying with the statute, and obtained a writ of habeas corpus, which was sustained by the United States Supreme Court. The court, after quoting the statute and discussing it at some length, said: "This proceeding is a unit. The filing of the articles of incorporation and the provision in regard to service of process are to be authorized by the same resolution which requests the issue of the permit; and this request or application is to contain the stipulation above mentioned. These various things are not separable." Then, after some further discussion of the statute, the court concludes with these words: "In view of these considerations, the case falls directly within the decision of this court in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365." It then proceeds, after showing what was decided in the Morse Case, to discuss the Doyle Case in these words: "The case of Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148, is relied on by the defendant in error. In that case this court said that it had carefully reviewed its decision in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse and was satisfied with it. In referring to the second conclusion in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, above recited, namely, that the statute of Wisconsin was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and was illegal and void, the court said, in Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. that it referred to that portion of the statute which required a stipulation not to transfer causes to the courts of the United States. In that case, which arose under the same statute of Wisconsin, the foreign insurance company had complied with the statute, and had filed an agreement not to remove suits into the Federal courts, and had received a license to do business in the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

state. Afterwards it removed into the Federal court a suit brought against it in a state court of Wisconsin. The state authorities threatening to revoke the license, the company filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States, praying for an injunction to restrain the revoking of the license. A temporary injunction was granted. The defendant demurred to the bill, the demurrer was overruled, a decree was entered making the injunction perpetual, and the defendant appealed to this court. This court reversed the decree and dismissed the bill. The point of the decision seems to have been that, as the state had granted the license, its officers would not be restrained by injunction by a court of the United States from withdrawing it. All that there is in the case beyond this, and all that is said in the opinion which appears to be in conflict with the adjudication in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, supra, must be regarded as not in judgment."

We do not understand this to overrule the Doyle Case; for certainly, if the state cannot withdraw the license it has once granted, any court of competent jurisdiction may so decide. If the state statute withdrawing the license was unconstitutional and void, the Supreme Court of the United States had the same power to declare the statute in that case unconstitutional as it had to declare the statute unconstitutional in Barron v. Burnside. Our statute is not liable to the objections made to the statute in either the Morse Case or the Barron Case. Under our statute the foreign insurance company is at liberty to remove its cause to the Federal court whenever it sees proper. It is required to sign no stipulation or agreement interfering with that right. The regulation is reasonable that the state, for the protection of its citizens against unsafe insurance companies, should require them, before doing business in the state, to obtain a license from the insurance commissioner, and to furnish him such evidences of their solvency as will protect insurers in this state before he is authorized to grant them a license. The license which the state grants is purely a matter of grace, and, like any other license, may be revoked by the licensor at pleasure. The revocation of the license interferes with no legal right of the licensee; for, when he takes it he takes it subject to revocation. He cannot question the reason of the licensor for revoking the license, as the state may exclude foreign corporations from doing business in the state with or without reason. If I have license to cross my neighbor's lot, and he revokes it because I brought a suit against his son, I cannot enjoin him from revoking the license on the ground that I had a constitutional right to go to the courts for relief, and that my exercise of a constitutional right was no just reason for his revoking the license he had given me; for he had an absolute right to revoke the license, and the fact that he did it out of spite, or for a bad reason, is immaterial. The state, by her statutes above referred to, in effect, says to the foreign insurance companies: "I will license you to do business here on the same plane as domestic corporations, and if you come here you must stand on no more favorable ground than the domestic insurance companies. If, after you come, you refuse to so stand, I will withdraw my license." The reason for the statute is not distrust of the Federal courts, but the practical denial of justice that results, in a sparsely settled state like ours, if the case must be tried 100 or 200 miles from where the parties and witnesses reside. Domestic insurance companies enjoy no such immunity, but must try their cases in the vicinage. The state simply says to the foreign insurance companies: "I will withdraw my license if you insist on privileges not enjoyed by home companies." If the state, on the day before these suits were filed, by legislative act had withdrawn all licenses to foreign insurance companies, reciting in the preamble to the act that it was enacted inasmuch as the two cases above referred to had been removed to the United States circuit court, could these plaintiffs have complained? If not, how are they affected by the fact that the state acts by an executive officer, and not by a special statute? Certainly they cannot complain that the license of certain other companies was not revoked.

The case of Com. v. East Tennessee Coal Co. 97 Ky. 238, 30 S. W. 608, did not involve the revocation of a license granted by the state, but was in effect similar to Barron v. Burnside, above cited, being a proceeding to impose a fine on the defendant after it removed a case from the state courts. The naked question presented here is, May the state, without cause, revoke a license it has once granted? for a bad reason is no worse than none at all. The distinction is a narrow one, but none the less sound, unless the whole doctrine that the state may grant or withhold a license as it sees fit is to be abandoned. It is juggling with words to say that a state may at will prohibit foreign corporations from doing business in the state (Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 650, 39 L. ed. 297, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207), and yet that it may not at will withdraw a license which it has once granted to such corporations. It seems to us that the Doyle Case rests on sound principles, and that 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the Barron Case in no wise conflicts with it; for that case is by the court expressly put upon the ground that the statute there, when properly construed, fell within the rule laid down in the Morse Case. 6 Thomp. Corp. §§ 7466, 7467; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 867; People ex rel. Payson v. Pavey, 151 Ill. 101, 37 N. E. 691.

The judgment in the first case is therefore reversed, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

The judgment in the second case is affirmed.

Appeal dismissed by Supreme Court of United States February 19, 1906.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

JOHN TONES, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF TEXAS.

(... Tex. Crim. App.)

1. Robbery—consent—affording facilities.

Consent to a robbery, so as to absolve the robber from criminal liability, is not shown by merely providing one's self with money which may be taken, and going where the deed may be done in anticipation of the commission of the crime, for the purpose of apprehending the criminal.

2. Same—by officers.

Officers are guilty of robbery who, after having arrested a person, forcibly search him, and take from him valuables with the intention of keeping them.

3. Evidence—memorandum.

The admission in evidence of a memorandum of bills furnished a person for the detection of robbers, upon the trial of persons

Case Note.—If there had been nothing but the arrest to support the allegation of force in TONES v. STATE, it would have been difficult, under the authorities, to have upheld the conviction.

Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293, and Bussey v. State, 71 Ga. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 256, discussed in the opinion in the TONES CASE, were cited in Jackson v. State, 118 Ga. 125, 44 S. E. 833, as authority for its decision that, there being no violence beyond that of an arrest and a threat to prosecute by the defendant, who falsely pretended to be a detective, there was no robbery; and those cases were also cited in Simmons v. State, 41 Fla. 316, 25 So. 881, as authority for its decision that a case of "putting in fear," within the meaning of the statute defining robbery, was not shown by an information alleging, in effect, that the defendants falsely represented and pretended to the prosecutrix that one of them was an officer and authorized to take apprehended for that offense, is not reversible error where the identity of the bills found in possession of the accused with those taken from the person robbed is abundantly proved.

(June 7, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Grayson County convicting him of robbery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. J. Smith, F. N. Roberts, and R. H. Thompson for appellant.

Messrs. Galloway & Vowell, for the State:

If the claim of right is a mere pretext covering an intent to steal, and property is taken from a person by force or violence, it is robbery.

Mr. Howard Martin also for the State.

Henderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of robbery, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of nine years; hence this appeal.

The state's case, briefly stated, is as follows: H. S. Rich was constable of precinct No. 1, at Sherman, and Marion Nicholas was also a resident of Grayson county. Nicholas suspected that some robberies and violations of the local-option law were being committed in the city of Denison. He conferred with Rich about the matter, and, as a result of their conference, Rich agreed to get a man to see if he could not catch up with the parties committing said offenses. He selected prosecutor Joe Richards, a painter and a resident of Sherman. On the day preceding the night of the alleged offense, these three parties met in Sherman and gave Richards $40, $38 of which was furnished by Nicholas, and consisted of one $10 bill, and five $5, and three $1 bills of United States currency. The numbers of all these bills were taken on a slip of paper by the parties at the time. Besides, they were marked, and from some of the bills small portions were torn off. The remaining $2 in silver was furnished by Rich, constable. It was understood that Richards was to go to Denison that night, buy all the whisky he could with the silver money, but was not to spend the currency. These bills were placed with him to be used to detect any parties who might rob prosecutor Richards, should he be robbed. In pursuance of this agreement, Richard and Nicholas went that evening or night to Denison. After getting there, Nicholas separated from prosecutor Richards. Richards immediately proceeded to the execution of the plan, went to several joints, drank some beer and a drink of whisky, and bought two pint bottles of whisky at two different joints. Subsequently he was seen on the street by appellant, who was a policeman of Denison, and by Finley, also a policeman. He was at the time either drunk, or acting in a manner to suggest he was drunk. They accosted him and charged him with being intoxicated. He seems to have denied it, stating he could take care of himself, and had money to pay his way, and that he was from the territory. They her furniture, and threatened to arrest her if she resisted them in taking the same. In neither the Jackson nor the Simmons Case did it appear that there was any force or violence used beyond the arrest and threat; and this distinguishes them from the actual decisions in the earlier Georgia cases referred to, and also from TONES v. STATE.

In Williams v. State, 51 Neb. 711, 71 N. W. 729, cited in the opinion in TONES v. STATE, it was held that a conviction for robbery by putting in fear was sustained by evidence that the defendants conspired unlawfully to extort money from the prosecuting witness, and that one of them, falsely pretending to be an officer, took the prosecutor into custody for an alleged misdemeanor, and demanded money, at the same time taking hold of him by the collar, whereupon the latter delivered over to his assailants a sum 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of money, being at the time so frightened that he did not realize what he was doing. Here, also, actual violence was employed. The case is thus distinguishable from the Jackson Case and the Simmons Case.

Those cases are also distinguishable from Sweat v. State, 90 Ga. 315, 17 S. E. 273, where it was held that a verdict of robbery by intimidation was supported by evidence that the prosecutor was arrested without a warrant by the defendants, who pretended to believe that he was a fugitive from justice, and, by threatening to carry him to prison and hinting at mob violence, they induced him to give up money in his possession. The distinguishing feature in the last case was the implied threat of mob violence, and so the distinguishing feature in the TONES CASE was the actual violence employed in addition to the arrest.

arrested him, however, and marched him to the jail, one on either side of him. When they got there, they took him inside, stood him against the wall, held his arms up, and searched him. They took from him the roll of currency bills before mentioned, 55 cents in silver, a pocketbook, and the two pint bottles of whisky. They deposited with the jailer the two pints of whisky, the purse, and 55 cents. The balance of the money they did not deposit. The next morning, on complaint of Richards, appellant and his codefendant, Finley, were arrested and searched. On appellant's person was found four $5 bills and one $1 bill, and on Finley was found a $10 bill and a $5 bill and one $1 bill. All of these bills were thoroughly identified by witness Rich as the same currency bills that he and Nicholas had given to prosecutor Richards on the evening before. All of said currency that had been given said Richards was found, except two $1 bills not accounted for. Appellant denied that he got any money off of Richards on the night before, except the 55 cents, and claimed the money found on his person as his own property, which he had borrowed on the day before from one Carver. Finley also denied that they had taken any money from Richards, except the 55 cents, and accounted for and claimed the money on his person as his own. It was also shown on the part of appellant that when they arrested prosecutor he claimed to have been robbed of his watch and some money in a house of prostitution in Denison. This is a sufficient statement of the case to discuss the legal questions presented.

We understand appellant's defense to embrace two propositions: First, that prosecutor was willing to be robbed, prepared himself for that purpose, made no resistance; and, conceding that the money was taken from him under the circumstances by the officers, that it was with his consent, and so there could be no robbery. Second, that appellant and his companion, Finley, were police officers of the town of Denison; that they were authorized by ordinance to arrest persons found drunk in any public place in said city; that appellant was found in such condition by them, and they took him into custody and carried him to jail; that they had a right to search him; that they used no violence in said search; and that in the absence of any violence used in procuring the money, conceding that they did procure it, this would not constitute robbery. Furthermore, if it be admitted that sufficient violence was shown in taking the money, still no intent was shown to appropriate it, and, if subsequently they formed the intent and did appropriate said money, it would not constitute robbery.

On the first proposition, appellant has cited a number of authorities, from which he deduces a principle of law as follows: Where money is placed upon a person with the purpose of being taken from him, in order to detect a criminal, the owner of the money and the person from whom the money is taken consenting thereto, robbery is not committed. The authorities cited in support of this proposition are Speiden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 162, 30 Am. Rep. 126; Connor v. People, 18 Colo. 373, 25 L. R. A. 341, 36 Am. St. Rep. 295, 33 Pac. 150; State v. Hayes, 105 Mo. 76, 24 Am. St. Rep. 360, 16 S. W. 514; McGee v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 66 S. W. 564; note to Allen v. State, 91 Am. Dec. 477; note to State v. Hull, 72 Am. St. Rep. 705. Of course, if it be conceded that the evidence shows that the prosecutor was consenting to the robbery, then the application of the authorities cited may be granted. However, we gather from the authorities cited by appellant, and others, that as to the offense of burglary, larceny, robbery, and other crimes of like character, if the owner of the burglarized premises or property invites a crime or induces parties to commit an offense in order that they may be apprehended, he cannot afterwards be heard to say that he did not consent to what was done. It was so held in Allen's Case. The principle is further extended by some of the cases that, where the owner of the premises sought to be burglarized authorized his servant to act with the accused, and under the owner's direction unlocked the door of the premises said to be burglarized, and entered the premises with the accused, this was held not to be burglary, because of his consent. In Speiden's Case, which was the alleged burglary of a bank in Dallas, it appears that the owners set on foot the design to have the bank burglarized, and had detectives go in with the burglars. In that case it was held there was consent. But we do not believe it is held by any well-considered authority that where a person has learned of plans to burglarize his premises, and does not at all enter into the designs of the burglar, but does not try to prevent the burglary, on the contrary, lays plans to entrap the burglar, and does apprehend him in the act, there is no consent to the burglary, and the burglar is amenable to punishment. Robinson v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 71, 53 Am. St. Rep. 701, 29 S. W. 40; Thompson v. State, 18 Ind. 386, 81 Am. Dec. 364; State v. Sneff, 22 Neb. 481, 35 N. W. 219. And we understand the same principle is announced in Alexander v. State, 12 Tex. 540; Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 108; Johnson v. State,

3 Tex. App. 590; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 262. In Alexander's Case, Judge Wheeler cites with approval the principle laid down in 3 Chitty, Crim. Law, p. 952, as follows: "If the owner, in order to detect a number of men in the act of stealing, directs a servant to appear to encourage the design, and lead them on until the offense is complete, so long as he did not induce the original intent, but only provided for its discovery after it was formed, the criminality of the thieves will not be destroyed." In Russell on Crimes, vol. 2, p. 113, citing M'Daniel's Case, 1 Fost. C. L. p. 129, he refers to a case very much in point, and illustrative of the principle of law here involved. We quote as follows: "One Norden, having been informed that one of the early stage coaches had been frequently robbed near the town by a single highwayman, resolved to use his endeavors to apprehend the robber. For this purpose he put a little money and a pistol into his pocket, and attended the coach in a post chaise, until the highwayman came up to the company in the coach, and to him presenting a weapon, demanded their money. Norden gave him the little money he had about him, and then jumped out of the chaise with the pistol in his hand, and, with the assistance of some others, took the highwayman. This was holden to be a robbery of Norden." It occurs to us that the facts of this case come within the principle of the above case. Here there was no agreement between prosecutor Richards and appellant that he would submit to a robbery, as was the case in M'Daniel's Case, 1 Fost. C. L. 121, 128. Nor was there any invitation on his part, much less was there any device to lead appellant to the commission of the offense. While he anticipated, like Norden, that he might be robbed, he made no agreement with the robbers in that regard. Apprehending that he might be robbed, he had a perfect right to prepare himself beforehand, in order that he might detect the persons guilty of the robbery, and this we understand to be all that he did. Under the authorities, this is not consent to the robbery in such measure as to absolve appellant from criminality.

The next question is, Was the violence used such as to constitute the offense? The indictment charges that appellant committed the robbery by an assault and by violence, and by putting the said Richards in fear of life and bodily injury, etc. If either of these allegations is proved, the offense is complete. It may be conceded here that appellant was not in fact put in actual fear of life or serious bodily injury; but the authorities hold it is not necessary that actual fear should be strictly and precisely proved, as the law in odium spoliatoris will presume fear where 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

there appears to be a just ground for it. Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293; Williams v. State, 51 Neb. 711, 71 N. W. 729. We take it that the state's case depends on violence. If there be not a sufficient degree of violence proved, then the state has no case. We understand it is contended that whatever violence was used was authorized by law in making the arrest. This may be conceded, so far as the arrest is concerned. But we do not understand it to be the law that officers can make a rightful arrest, and if they subsequently use violence and commit a robbery they will be exonerated on account of the legality of the alleged arrest. The books do not cite many cases of robbery where the offense was committed by officers after the arrest of the prisoner, yet there are some which recognize the principle as above stated. Russell on Crimes, vol. 2, p. 11, cites King v. Gascoigne, 1 Leach, C. L. 280, which is illustrative of this question. There a woman was arrested upon the charge of having committed an assault upon another woman who lodged in her house. She appears to have been committed to the custody of an officer, who took her in charge, threatened to put her in jail, handcuffed her, and succeeded, by alarming her, in getting from her several shillings. Justice Nares, who tried the prisoner, said: "That in order to commit the crime of robbery it was not necessary that the violence used to obtain the property should be by the common and usual modes of putting a pistol to the head or a dagger to the breast, and that a violence, though used under a colorable and specious pretense of law or of doing justice, was sufficient, if the real intention was to rob. And he left the case to the jury with a direction that, if they thought the prisoner had originally, when he forced the prosecutrix into the coach, a felonious intent of taking her money, and that he made use of the violence of the handcuffs as a means to prevent her making resistance, and that he took the money with a felonious intent, they should find him guilty. The jury found that the prisoner had a felonious intent of getting whatever money the prosecutrix had in her pocket, and that the putting her into the state described in the evidence was only a colorable means of putting his felonious intention into execution. And, upon the case being referred to the twelve judges, they were unanimously of opinion that, as it was found by the verdict that the prisoner had an original intention to take the money, and had made use of violence, though under the sanction and pretense of law, for the purpose of obtaining it, the offense was clearly a robbery." Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293, is another case somewhat in point. There the court laid down the criterion which distinguishes robbery from larceny, as the violence, actual or constructive, which precedes the taking. There can be no robbery without violence, and no larceny with it. It is further held: "If one, against whom a crime has been committed, with or without a warrant arrest the offender, and receive money or property without violence, actual or constructive, under an agreement not to prosecute, that is not robbery. . . . Actual force in . . . robbery implies personal violence. If there is any injury done to the person, or if there is a struggle to retain possession of the property before it is taken," this is a sufficient criterion of force. It is further held: "If, however, such threats or accusations are accompanied with force, actual or constructive, and the property or money is given up in consequence of this force, the transaction is robbery. Nor is the guilt of the party accused any defense to an act of robbery. If property is extorted by violence, upon a charge of larceny or any other crime, the offense is neither justified nor mitigated by his guilt, nor aggravated by his innocence. The law will not permit property or money to be violently taken from a citizen because he happens to be a guilty man. He is liable to the law if guilty, and under the protection of the law whether innocent or guilty." It is further held that there must be some degree of force used, and "the taking must be against the will of the person robbed; yet it may seem to be with his consent when it is really delivered from fear. If it is apparently voluntary, yet from the facts and circumstances it is from fear, it is still robbery." The facts and circumstances, however, in that case as to the violence used, were stronger than in the case at bar; still the principles of law there laid down are applicable.

In Com. v. Snelling, 4 Binn. 379, there, as here, it was contended that the offense does not amount to robbery, because the watch was taken without his being in any fear of being robbed. The court lays down this rule: To constitute a robbery, there must be a felonious taking of property from another by force. This force may be either actual or constructive. Actual force is applied to the body; constructive is by threatening words or gestures, and operates on the mind. It is impossible in advance to comprehend all cases which may arise. As the different cases are presented, the question will be whether they fall substantially within the principles of the definition. The verdict of the jury did not expressly find whether the watch was taken against Harrod's consent or not, but it did find that he did not know of its being taken. It was therefore held that it was without his consent. It was also found that he was in fear, not of being robbed, but of being beaten. The court held on this point that fear is not an essential ingredient of robbery, force being sufficient. It was expressly found that the prisoner made use of force to obtain the watch; that is, he seized Harrod by the cravat with his left hand, and pressing him against the wall at the same time, taking his watch from his fob. The court further says: "It is clear that the prisoner's violence was the cause of Harrod's losing his watch. The fear of being beaten diverted his attention from his property, and this fear was produced by force, so that, in truth, the property was taken by force. The law is not to be evaded by fraudulent contrivances. . . . If it was the prisoner's intent to obtain the watch under cover of this violence, without the knowledge of the owner, it is to be construed a taking by violence." And, for other authorities on this subject, see note to State v. McCune, 70 Am. Dec. 182, 183. In Bussey v. State, 71 Ga. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 256, defendant pretended to be town marshal, and seized prosecutor, to whom another was showing a trick at cards, shoved him against the wall, and threatened to take him to jail unless he paid him money. Whereupon prosecutor paid him money, as he said, to keep him from going to jail and being bothered. (In Georgia, threats to accuse prosecutor of a crime do not afford the basis of a prosecution for robbery, except in one instance; that is, a charge of the crime against nature.) In that case the quotation above given from Long's Case is cited with approval. The court further says: "These principles will be found in 2 East, P. C., 714-736, and 2 Russell on Crimes, pp. 117 et seq. The presumption is that the court below gave them to the jury, and that the jury found that the money was extorted from the prosecutor by violence on a charge of gambling, and not by the mere fear of a criminal prosecution for that offense. If the jury so found, and there is evidence of violence sufficient to support the finding, then, under the decision in Long v. State, the verdict is not contrary to law and evidence. What violence is proved? The prosecutor was seized, shoved and held against the wall, and threatened to be taken to jail, and thus the money was extorted from him. True, he did say that he paid it to keep from going to jail, and he did not want to be bothered, but the jury might well have concluded that, whilst the fear of the jail did enter into the reason of his delivery of the money, the violence of the defendant, the seizure by the collar, and pressing him against the wall contributed largely to it, and made a considerable part of that 'bother' in which the poor country darky was involved when in the clutches of these town sharks. Whilst the mere arrest of him with the threat to take him to jail . . . would not suffice alone to make a case of robbery, yet, accompanied with this ill usage and violence of seizure, pushing, and holding, it does, according to Long v. State, make such a case." And see Williams v. State, 51 Neb. 711, 71 N. W. 729.

Now, what are the facts of this case as bearing on the question of violence? It will be taken for granted that the appellant and Finley had a right to arrest prosecutor for drunkenness on the streets of Denison, and they had a right to take him to jail. And it may be conceded they had a right to search him for weapons or instruments he might use in accomplishing an escape. It may be doubtful, however, if the prisoner objects, or without consent, an officer has any right to take from a prisoner valuables which are not weapons or may not be used in accomplishing an escape. Still, conceding that they had this right to take from the prosecutor his money for the purpose of keeping it in safe custody against the time when he might be enlarged, if they had the intent at the time they found any money or valuables on him to take it, and they used force to make the search, then we understand they cannot avail themselves of the right to search in order to defeat the prosecution. They took the prisoner in hand after they got him in jail. They did not ask him to consent to be searched. According to the testimony, they rudely backed him up against the wall and held his hands up, while one of them thrust his hand into his pocket and extracted his money. Was this sufficient force? We hold, under the authorities above cited, that it was. No consent was given to the search. In order to make the search effective, they forced him against the wall, used violence in holding his hands above his head against the wall, and then took his money. Did they have the present intent to appropriate it to their own use when they took it? The evidence shows that almost immediately they deposited the whisky and 55 cents in coin which they got from the prosecutor with the jailer, but they kept the $38 in currency. If there was violence in a case of this character, the law will not closely scrutinize the degree. Here two guardians of the public welfare, peace officers, take a prisoner in charge. He is powerless, and he knows it. The least effort to foil them, he is aware, will call for the use of greater force and violence, and undoubtedly his apparent acquiescence under the circumstances was superinduced by his surroundings. As was said in Bussey's Case, supra: "Whilst this court will rule the law as it understands it, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) it will not strain it one jot or tittle to shield the perpetrator of such an outrage."

Appellant assigns as error the action of the court in its charge to the jury, and in refusing to give a number of special requested instructions. We have examined the charge of the court, and it is in accordance with the principles hereinbefore discussed; and, in so far as the special charges asked announce the same principles, they were not called for. Special charges which contravened the principles contained in the charge, and which have been heretofore discussed in this opinion, were not the law, and the court did not err in refusing to give them.

Appellant excepted to the court receiving in evidence a written memorandum preserved by Reh at the time he gave the currency bills to prosecutor, of the numbers and denominations of said bills. The witness used this memorandum. He stated he took it at the time, and that it was correct. We do not believe there was any error in the admission of this memorandum, under the circumstances in which it was done. However, aside from this, the bills were abundantly identified as those taken from the prosecutor. The admission of the paper, if erroneous, would not constitute reversible error.

There being no errors in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled June 23, 1905.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

J. H. HARDWICK, Appt.,
v.
AMERICAN CAN COMPANY et al.

(.... Tenn.)

1. Bill of review—new matter pending action.

A supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review is the proper proceeding to bring before the court new matter discovered by Case Note.—The opinion of the court in HARDWICK v. AMERICAN CAN Co. so thoroughly presents the authorities and opinions of the text writers upon the question involved as to leave but little to be added. An examination of the authorities fails to reveal anything in conflict with the court's holding that a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review is an appropriate remedy for reviewing interlocutory decrees, while the propriety of such remedy was sustained in Putnam v. Lewis, 1 Fla. 455, and Hyman v. Smith, 10 W. Va. 298, in addition to the authorities cited by the court. See also 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 518, to the same effect.

defendant after answer, and after the passing of a decree referring the case to a master, and while such decree is in process of execution.

2. Inconsistent defenses.

A supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review cannot be filed to bring to the attention of the court, in an action for breach of contract to purchase a certain quantity of manufactured articles in which the defense had been the unmerchantable character of the articles and consequent loss and injury to business credit and reputation, in attempting to dispose of them, matter showing a breach of the contract by the seller in selling the articles to other merchants within the territory which the contract awarded exclusively to the buyer.

(November 18, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals which reversed a decree of the Chancery Court for Hamilton County denying the right to file a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review to bring a newly discovered defense to the attention of the court. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown & Spurlock and Pritchard & Sizer for appellant.

Messrs. White & Martin, for appellees:

Matter discovered after a decree has been made, although not capable of being used as evidence of anything which was previously in issue, in the case, but constituting an entirely new issue, may yet be the subject of a bill of review, or of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review.

Gibson, Suits in Equity, § 1071; Frazer v. Sybert, 5 Sneed, 100; Heiskell, Dig. 596; Story, Eq. Pl. § 416.

Whatever new fact would entitle a party to review a decree if final will entitle him to a rehearing upon an interlocutory decree.

He may file a supplemental bill, setting up the newly discovered fact, and asking for a rehearing of the interlocutory decree.

Baker v. Whiting, 1 Story, 218, Fed. Cas. No. 786; Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 299, Fed. Cas. No. 7,267; Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5th ed. 1537; Long v. Granberry, 2 Tenn. Ch. 85; Gibson, Suits in Equity, §§ 1074, 1080; Maddox v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 599; Deitch v. Staub, 53 C. C. A. 137, 115 Fed. 310; Gillette v. Bate Refrigerating Co. 12 Fed. 108.

There is nothing antagonistic in the two defenses. They could certainly both be true, and there can be no antagonistic truths.

Messrs. Wheeler & Trimble also for appellees.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This case was before us at the last term. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The opinion then delivered appears in 113 Tenn. 657, 88 S. W. 797. At the former hearing the case was remanded to the chancery court for an account and for other purposes. It is now before us again on appeal from the action of the court of chancery appeals in respect of the disposition which it made of the report of the master, and of the decree of the chancellor thereon and in respect of an application made in the chancery court for the filing of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, and for the disposition of questions related thereto.

We shall not take up these questions in the order just stated, but in what seems to us the most convenient sequence.

1. The defendant filed in the court below a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, for the purpose of putting in issue new matter discovered after the filing of the answer, and after the passing of the decree of reference, and while the latter decree was in process of execution before the master. This bill shows that due diligence was exercised on the part of the defendant, and that the matter could not reasonably have been ascertained prior to the time at which it was discovered. Assuming the evidence to have been material and determinative, the question arises as to the proper practice in such cases. We are not aware that this precise question has ever before been determined in this state. The cases are numerous wherein final decisions have been reviewed under bills of review, but we know of no case in our reports where the question has arisen in respect of an interlocutory decree.

The following authorities indicate the true conclusion:

In Laidley v. Merrifield, 7 Leigh, 346, it is said: "A bill of review, strictly speaking, is a proceeding to correct a final decree in the same court, for error apparent on the face of the decree or on account of new evidence discovered since the final decree. The decree being final, the bill of review is not regarded as a part of the cause in which the decree was rendered, but as a new suit, having for its object the correction of the decree in the former suit. But where a decree is only interlocutory, but liable to the same objections, the party injured must seek his redress, not by a bill of review, as such, but by petition or supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review. Such petition or supplemental bill is regarded as a part of the very cause, the decree in which is sought to be corrected, and any order or decree of the court on the petition or bill is only interlocutory." Story, Eq. Pl. § 425; Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5th ed. 1537.

The new matter must be brought to the attention of the court as soon as discovered. If, after discovering such matter, the party allow the case to go to a final decree, he cannot use the new matter. Story, Eq. Pl. § 423. In Baker v. Whiting it is said: "To compel the petitioner to wait until a final decree, and then to apply for a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review, would not only occasion great delay, but also great expense to the parties, which ought, if practicable, to be avoided. 1 Story, 218, Fed. Cas. No. 786. See also Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 299, Fed. Cas. No. 7,267. In the last-cited case Judge Story used this language: "The real question, therefore, for the consideration of the court is whether leave should be granted to file a supplemental bill to bring forward the new evidence. In substance, there is no difference between this case and the case of leave to file a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review, except that the latter is solely applicable to cases where there has been a final decree, whereas applications like the present may be before or after an interlocutory decree."

In his work on Equity Pleadings, Judge Story says: "It has been established that matter discovered after a decree has been made, although not capable of being used as evidence of anything which was previously in issue in the cause, but constituting an entirely new issue, may yet be the subject of a bill of review." Story, Eq. Pl. § 416.

Such a supplemental bill may be filed, not only by a complainant, but also by a defendant. In the work just referred to, it is said: "Hitherto we have chiefly considered supplemental bills on the part of the plaintiff; but they may also be brought on behalf of the defendant in the suit. Where the matter is newly discovered evidence on the part of the defendant after the cause is at issue, or after publication is passed, or even after a hearing or decree, the defendant may, by a petition to file a supplemental bill, obtain relief." Id. § 337c.

The subject was recently gone over in an opinion by Judge Lurton in the case of Deitch v. Staub, 53 C. C. A. 137, 115 Fed. 310-316. In that case it appeared that Staub, as receiver of the Knoxville Building & Loan Association, brought suit against Deitch in the Federal court for money loaned. Deitch, the defendant, raised the question of usury. On an interlocutory decree, Judge Clark, with much doubt and uncertainty expressed in his conclusions, decided that there was no usury, and referred the case to the master to report on the indebtedness. While the matter was pending before the master new evidence was discovered and offered, showing usury. The master declined to consider the new proof; and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

there was an exception for this reason. On appeal, it was held in the circuit court of appeals that the master could not consider the newly discovered evidence because of the interlocutory decree, and that the proper practice was for the defendant to bring a supplemental bill setting up the newly discovered evidence and seeking to rehear the interlocutory decree.

Such a bill, "if maintainable at all, should properly in its prayer be for leave to file a supplemental bill to bring forward the new evidence, and for rehearing of the cause at the time when the supplemental bill should also be ready for a hearing." Jenkins v. Eldredge, supra.

In Daniel, Ch. Pl. & Pr. it is said: "A bill of this description cannot be filed without leave of the court having been first granted. In order to obtain permission for this purpose, a petition must be presented supported by an affidavit to show that the new matter could not be produced or used by the party claiming the benefit of it at the time when the decree was made." Id. 5th ed. 1537. But a bill may be drawn so as to serve the purpose of both a bill and petition, and so presented to the court for leave to file. Long v. Granberry, 2 Tenn. Ch. 85; Gibson, Suits in Equity, §§ 1074, 1080.

2. From what has just been said, it is apparent that, nothing else appearing, the chancellor should have allowed the filing of the supplemental bill offered by the defendant; and likewise that the court of chancery appeals, but for a fact to be presently stated, acted correctly in granting the permission.

In order to properly understand the fact on which the question turns, it should be stated that the complainant and the defendant had mutually entered into a written contract, wherein the defendant agreed to purchase from the complainant, 5,000 stoves, and the complainant, among other things, agreed not to sell any stoves during the running of the contract in the state of Georgia. It was alleged in the supplemental bill filed by the defendant that, after the decree of reference had been awarded and the term had adjourned at which that decree was rendered, the defendant had, by the exercise of great diligence, discovered a secret arrangement between the complainant and the firm of Bondurant & Company of Athens, Georgia, whereby the complainant had sold to this firm a large number of stoves. It was alleged in the supplemental bill that the defendant had been greatly injured by this secret transaction between Hardwick and Bondurant & Company. It is insisted on the part of the complainant that this new defense ought not to be permitted, because in direct conflict with a leading defense set up in the original answer.

In the original answer, one of the defenses set up by the can company was that the stoves manufactured by the complainant were so defective that it could not handle them. The answer contained upon that subject the following:

"It is true that this defendant did order of the complainant 1,191 stoves at the prices named in the said exhibit A. and that the complainant did ship to this defendant 1,191 stoves, and at the time of shipment collected from this defendant the contract price therefor, and that the defendant has not ordered nor accepted from the complainant any more stoves than those thus shipped and paid for; but said stoves so shipped and paid for were not such stoves as were required by the terms of the contract, and were not merchantable stoves; and by reason of defective material and workmanship were totally unsuited for the purposes for which they were sold, and by reason of said defective material and workmanship and said unmerchantability, the defendant was unable to sell any more of said stoves than those shipped to it as aforesaid, although it used its best efforts so to do. The defendant was damaged to the extent of $5,000 through loss of trade and customers, and in loss of its business reputation, and in the time of its servants and employees, and otherwise, by reason of the aforesaid defective character of the stoves so delivered; and was further damaged in the sum of $5,000, by reason of its failure to sell any more than 1,191 of complainant's stoves, owing to the same aforesaid defects."

The supplemental bill is based upon the ground that the complainant therein, the defendant to the original bill, had sustained loss by reason of the fact that the complainant, pending the running of the contract, had sold between 1,000 and 1,500 stoves to Bondurant & Company.

This seems to be wholly in conflict with the defense set up in the original bill that the goods were worthless, and that the defendant had suffered loss in selling such as he had sold, and great injury to his credit and reputation in attempting to sell others.

On the ground of this incongruity between the two defenses, we do not think that the supplemental bill should have been permitted to be filed, and that the court of chancery appeals erred in giving such permission.

3. We are of opinion that the court of chancery appeals acted correctly in assessing the damages at $1,182.38, with interest from August 1, 1902. We deem it unnecessary to go into the particulars of this matter, being entirely content with the view 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

taken of that branch of the case in the opinion of the court of chancery appeals.

A decree will be entered here in favor of the complainant for $1,182.38, with interest from August 1, 1902, with the unadjudged costs of the chancery court. The costs of appeal will be divided equally between the complainant and the defendant can company.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

SEATTLE ELECTRIC COMPANY, Respt.,
v.

SNOQUALMIE FALLS POWER COMPANY
et al., Appts.

Injunction—performance of contract—public policy.

Although equity will not specifically enforce a contract to furnish a supply of electricity to a street car and electric lighting company, which creates a monopoly contrary to the terms of a franchise given the company which has contracted to furnish the power, it may enjoin the breach of the contract until such time as an adequate supply can be procured elsewhere, where such breach will result in great public inconvenience.

(October 14, 1905.)

Case Note.—The maxim, In pari delicto melior est conditio defendentis, which the court was urged to apply in SEATTLE ELECTRIC CO. v. SNOQUALMIE FALLS POWER CO., is not of universal application. On the contrary, it is well established that, when the interests of public policy will be subserved thereby, equity may grant affirmative relief, even to a party in pari delicto, with respect to a contract which is contrary to public policy or otherwise illegal. See, among other cases to this effect, Meech v. Lee, 82 Mich. 274, 46 N. W. 383; Basket v. Moss, 115 N. C. 448, 48 L. R. A. 842, 44 Am. St. Rep. 463, 20 S. E. 733. In most, if not all, of the cases of this class, however, the relief has been limited to the purpose of restoring the parties to the condition in which they were prior to the contract in question. This relief has sometimes been granted by canceling or restraining the enforcement of an executory contract, and sometimes by setting aside an executed contract and requiring the return of money paid thereunder. It will be observed that the decree affirmed in the SEATTLE CASE went considerably beyond such form of relief, and, in effect, granted the specific performance of the contract for a limited time, notwithstanding that it was apparently assumed that the plaintiff in the suit was in pari delicto, with the defendant. Certainly, very little, if any, direct authority can be found for such an application of the exception to the maxim, In pari delicto, though the principle upon which the

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas B. Hardin, for appellants:

Bennett, 140 Ill. 69,

exception rests would seem to justify its extension to such a case. Mr. Pomeroy, who recognizes and states the exception within the limits above indicated (2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 940, 941), declares that the proposition is universal that no action arises in equity or law from an illegal contract, and that no suit can be maintained for its specific performance (§ 940). In making this declaration, however, as well as in stating the exception to the maxim, he seems to have had in mind the usual case where the relief, if granted, will inure solely to the benefit of a party to the contract, and will subserve no substantial interests of the public. The vital circumstance which controlled the decision in this case, namely, that a direct and substantial interest of the public, or at least of the part of the public represented by the residents of a city, would be detrimentally affected by the continued refusal of the defendant to perform its contract, is, therefore, not comprehended by that declaration. If, as Mr. Pomeroy states (§ 941), equity may, in compliance with demands of a higher public policy, aid a party in pari delicto by canceling and ordering the surrender of an executory contract, or setting aside an executed contract and requiring a return of money paid thereunder, even when all the practical and substantial benefit of the relief will inure directly to a party to the contract, and no public interest, other than that arising from general public policy, will be subserved, it would seem that the court should, even at the instance of a party in pari delicto, have the power to enforce, for a limited time at least, the specific performance of a contract containing a provision contrary to general public policy, when a direct and substantial interest of the public, or a part of the public, will be directly subserved by such exercise of power. Story's declaration (1 Story, Eq. Jur. 298) that, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

when an agreement is repudiated because against public policy, and the public interest requires that relief should be given, it is given to the public through the party to the contract, was doubtless made with reference to cases in which the public has no direct or substantial interest, and in which the object of the suit is merely to get rid of the contract; but it seems equally pertinent as an answer to the possible objection to the decision in the SEATTLE CASE that the plaintiff was not the public, nor any representative of the public, but a party to the contract. The analogy and principle between the SEATTLE CASE and those cases where affirmative relief has been granted by canceling or restraining enforcement of the contract would doubtless have failed if the effect of the relief granted in the former case had been to violate the public policy which condemned the contract,—in other words, if the attempt in that case had been to enforce the particular provision of the contract which created a monopoly. But it will be observed that the relief actually granted had no such effect, any more than the cancelation of an executory contract has to further the violation of the public policy which the contract offends. The principle applied in the SEATTLE CASE, by which the supervening interest of the public is made to override the general principle which denies equitable relief to a party in pari delicto, is conversely applied by Conger v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 29, 23 N. E. 983, denying specific performance of a contract because public interest would be prejudiced by its specific enforcement. So Curran v. Holyoke Water Power Co. 116 Mass. 90, holds that the rights of persons not parties to a contract of which specific performance is sought are equitable considerations to be regarded by the court in determining whether or not the relief should be granted, although such rights vested after the contract was made.

Per Curiam:

The appellant, Snoqualmie Falls Power Company, was incorporated in January, 1898, for the purposes of manufacturing and selling electricity to public and private consumers, for heat, light, and power purposes. Its capital stock was fixed at $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, all of which with the exception of four were subscribed for, and have since been owned by one William T. Baker. In August, 1898, the city of Seattle granted a franchise to the said Baker, running for a period of thirty-six years, conferring upon him the right to erect poles upon the streets of that city, and string wires thereon, for the purpose of distributing therein electricity generated at the power plant of the Snoqualmie Falls Power Company. The franchise contained a number of restrictions intended for the benefit of the consumers of the product of the plant. It required the grantee to distribute the current manufactured by him at "his Snoqualmie Falls power house" to "all persons and corporations desiring the same" on equal terms and under reasonable regulations, and prohibited him from entering into any combination whatsoever, whereby the public or the city would be deprived of the benefits of competition in the purchase of electricity. Immediately on obtaining this franchise, Baker organized another corporation, called the "Seattle Cataract Company," and assigned to this company all the rights he had acquired by the grant to him of the above-mentioned franchise. The capital stock of this company was fixed at $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Of these shares Baker has likewise owned the entire issue except a mere nominal number. In January, 1900, the respondent corporation was organized. At that time the street railways and the electric lighting systems of the city of Seattle were under the control of a number of companies and corporations, operating separately and independently of each other, and the respondent was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring and consolidating these into one system. To that end it succeeded in purchasing almost the whole thereof, since which time it has been and was at the time of the commencing of this action engaged in the business of conducting street railways in the city of Seattle and its suburbs, having in operation at the last-mentioned time some 79 miles of track. It was also engaged in the business of supplying electric lights for public and private use, and electricity for power purposes to private owners as well as to the city of Seattle. On January 20, 1900, the respondent entered into a contract with the Snoqualmie Falls Power Company, by the terms of which the latter company agreed to sell to the former 3,000 continuous electrical horse power, to be delivered at such time or times and in such quantities as might be called for by the respondent for the sum of $54,000 per annum (being at the rate of $18 per horse power 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

per annum), to be paid in monthly instalments; agreeing further to allow the purchasing company a certain excess of power in case it might desire it, at the same rate per horse power per annum it paid for the 3,000. This additional power was afterwards fixed at 250 horse power per annum. The contract entered into between the parties contained numerous conditions, among which was a condition to the effect that no electric current should be sold in the city of Seattle by the Snoqualmie Falls Power Company to be used in any branch of business in which the respondent was engaged; a condition in direct violation of the ordinance under which electric current was permitted to be brought from the power plant of the Snoqualmie Falls Power Company into the city of Seattle. The parties continued to operate under the terms of this contract until the morning of May 24, 1903, when the Snoqualmie Falls Power Company, in violation of the terms of the contract, and without notice, cut the connection between its generator and the respondent's power plant; and, when inquiry was made as to cause, stated that it had decided not to continue any longer in the performance of the contract. Thereupon the respondent brought this action against it, and against the Seattle Cataract Company, to compel the performance of the contract. A temporary mandatory injunction was issued, compelling the appellants to furnish the power until a final hearing could be had on the question at issue between the parties, and on this hearing the injunction was continued in force until June 4, 1904; the court granting to the respondent that length of time in which to obtain power from other sources. The appeal is from the last-mentioned judgment.

In its complaint the respondent set out the contract above mentioned, and alleged a compliance therewith on its own part. It further alleged that it was a public service corporation, engaged in the business of operating street cars and electric-light systems in the city of Seattle by electric power; that its own generating plants were not designed for, and were insufficient to furnish, the power necessary to operate its systems; and that, unless the appellant Snoqualmie Falls Power Company should be compelled to continue in the performance of its contract, it would be unable to keep its system of railways and lights in operation, thereby causing great annoyance and injury to the public, and to those who were dependent upon it to furnish them with transportation and light; and that already great confusion had been caused by the cutting off of the power theretofore furnished it by the appellant last named. The prayer was for relief appropriate to the allegations of its complaint. The appellants answering denied that the respondent was without means of its own to generate sufficient power for its own use, and set out affirmatively the negotiations leading up to the formation of the several corporations, the execution of the contract, and averred that the contract was designed to create a monopoly, and was in direct violation of the franchise granted to Baker, in which the appellant corporations operated, and was therefore null and void, and such as a court of equity would not enforce. The reply was a denial of all of the affirmative allegations of the complaint going to show a participation by the respondent in any unlawful acts, or acts against public policy, or knowledge on its part of any violations of its franchise, or of public policy, by the appellants.

The evidence in the case is voluminous, and the arguments of counsel in this court have taken a wide range; but it seems to us that the real question presented by the record is one not difficult of solution. It will be remembered that the trial court did not undertake in its judgment to compel a specific performance of the contract between the parties; but he held that the evidence justified the conclusion that the facilities under the command of the respondent were not then sufficient to enable it to generate sufficient electric current to enable it to operate in an efficient manner the public facilities it was required by its franchise to operate; and it required the appellants to continue to furnish the power the respondent had contracted with it to furnish, and had relied upon, only until such reasonable time as the respondent could supply itself from other sources. The only questions presented, therefore, are, Did the court err in its finding that the respondent had not sufficient facilities under its own command to enable it to operate sufficiently the public conveniences operated by it? and, After finding that it did not, did it err in holding, as a matter of law, that the appellants could be compelled to furnish the power they had contracted to furnish until the respondent could with reasonable diligence acquire such facilities? Both of these questions we think should be answered negatively. It must be borne in mind that the questions are not reviewed out of any regard for the appellants. Their confessed violation of their duties to the public cannot be overlooked when they seek redress in a court of equity. Moreover, we cannot but feel that their conduct in cutting off the current they had agreed to furnish found its inspiration in the fact that they had discovered a place where they could dispose of it on more profitable terms than the contract afforded them, rather than from any compunctions of conscience because of their past misconduct. But the respondent seems from the evidence not to have been entirely free from blame in its contract with the appellants; hence it is proper to inquire whether it could have performed the public duties required of it without the aid of the power furnished it by the appellants. The evidence reasonably justifies the conclusion that it could not. While it may have had sufficient facilities for generating power to have carried the load required of it even at its most extreme point, it is made clear that this is not sufficient to constitute a safe working basis. Machinery, no matter how perfectly made, will get out of repair; and it is found that, to furnish power for continuous use, there must be a reserve force equal to the largest single unit used in generating such power. This the respondent did not have, and its claim that power from the appellants' power plant was necessary to secure an uninterrupted service seems to have been justified.

Conceding that the power was necessary, there can be no serious dispute over the question of law involved. While courts of equity will not enforce contracts entered into either in violation of positive law or a rule of public policy where the interests of the parties thereto are alone involved, yet, when the public interests are involved, it will enforce such a contract as long as such public interest requires it. It would have been greater wrong than any to which the appellants confessed to have permitted them arbitrarily and without warning to stop from operation the street car and lighting systems of the city of Seattle, especially when the only justification offered for it is a former wilful violation of their franchise privileges. Neither courts of law nor of equity will lend countenance to a plea so utterly without justification.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

JULIA L. ANDREWS et al., Respts.

1. Appeal—incorporation of exhibits.

A statement in a proposed statement of facts for appeal that certain depositions or

Case Note.—The subject of adverse possession by a mortgagor of his grantee against the mortgagee is complicated somewhat by the statutes of the various states. No settled rule of general application can be laid down in regard to the length of adverse exhibits were offered in evidence is sufficient to permit their attachment to the statement as finally settled, under a statute which provides that written evidence on file shall be appropriately referred to in the proposed statement, and "when it is certified, the same or copies thereof, if the judge so directs," shall be attached to the statement and become a part thereof.

2. Adverse possession—against mortgagee.

Where a mortgage is a mere security, a grantee, from a mortgagor, of land adjoining the mortgaged premises, who takes possession of a strip beyond the true boundary line, cannot be regarded as in adverse possession against the mortgagee until the mortgage becomes due.

3. Same—effect of failure to foreclose.

Where a mortgage is a mere security, the lien of which expires if not enforced or renewed in six years, failure to enforce the lien against the grantee, from the mort-possession necessary to establish title, nor, where there is no open act of hostility initiating the adverse claim, in regard to the time from which possession by the mortgagee or his grantee will be deemed adverse,—whether upon maturity of the mortgage, and opportunity to foreclose, or upon foreclosure, but without taking possession of the premises.

Prior to maturity of the mortgage, the general rule is that the mortgagor and his grantee with notice are presumed to hold in subjection to the mortgagee's right, and not adversely, and to establish an adverse claim the evidence must be clear.

The mortgagor's grantee is governed by the same reasons in respect to adverse possession as the mortgagor, and consequently the latter's possession being permissive and friendly under the mortgage, and not hostile to the right of the mortgagee, it will be presumed to so continue until repudiated by acts or declarations of which the mortgagee must be apprised or have such notice as would put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry. Eyermann v. Piron, 151 Mo. 107, 52 S. W. 229.

The possession must ordinarily be regarded as in subordination to the mortgage, and it cannot cease to be of that character until there is an open disclaimer of holding under it, and the assertion of a distinct title, with the knowledge of the mortgagee. Medley v. Elliott, 62 Ill. 532; Alsop v. Stewart, 194 Ill. 595, 88 Am. St. Rep. 169, 62 N. E. 795; Williams v. Kerr, 113 N. C. 306, 18 S. E. 501; Holmes v. Turner's Falls Co. 150 Mass. 535, 6 L. R. A. 283, 23 N. E. 305; Maxwell v. Hartman, 50 Wis. 660, 8 N. W. 103; Whittington v. Flint, 43 Ark. 504, 51 Am. Rep. 572; State v. Connor, 69 Ala. 212; Smith v. Gillam, 80 Ala. 301; Higginson v. Mein, 4 Cranch, 415, 3 L. ed. 664; Zeller v. Eckert, 4 How. 295, 11 L. ed. 982.

To constitute adverse possession against a mortgagee it is not sufficient that the mortgagor or those holding under him occupy, use, improve, and pay taxes on the gagor, of land adjoining the mortgaged tract, who took adverse possession of a strip of the mortgaged property along the boundary between the two tracts, until the lien of the mortgage expires as to it, places the grantee in the same situation as though no mortgage had existed, and his possession is adverse from the time it begins, and not from the maturity of the mortgage.

(November 27, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of a strip of land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ira A. Town, for appellants:

The mortgagee could become entitled to possession of the strip only by making ap-premises as their own absolute property, but the possession, even after maturity of the debt, must be in open denial of the mortgagee's title, and accompanied with such acts or declarations of the holders as are sufficient to put the mortgagee on notice that they claim and hold in hostility to his rights. Duke v. State, 56 Ark. 485, 20 S. W. 600.

Notice of adverse claim is not conveyed to the state by a payment by the mortgagor's grantee to the attorney general of a sum less than the amount due under the mortgage on a prior suit to foreclose, where the attorney general had no authority to receive the money or make any settlement, and the prior foreclosure suit was dismissed without prejudice to the state's rights. Ibid.

The statute of limitations begins to run only after the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee terminates in some one of the modes known to the law. Neither the mortgagor nor his grantee can defeat the mortgagee's security by retaining possession and paying taxes for seven years. It is the duty of each to do so. Norris v. Ile, 132 Ill. 190, 43 Am. St. Rep. 233, 38 N. E. 672.

Where, however, at maturity the mortgagee forecloses against the mortgagor only, and fails to make the latter's grantee a party, the latter's title is unaffected by the foreclosure sale, and his continued possession thereafter until the right to foreclose is barred establishes it permanently. Grether v. Clark, 75 Iowa, 383, 9 Am. St. Rep. 490, 39 N. W. 655.

The fact that the right to foreclose is asserted by the mortgagee's infant heirs is immaterial, since the debt matured during their ancestor's lifetime, the statute began running against the right then, and its continued running against such an inherited right is not affected by the infancy of the heirs. Ibid.

While recognizing and applying the general rule, the court, in Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. (Va.) 93, 14 Am. Dec. 766, suggests that a purchaser from the mortgagor with-pellants parties to a suit for foreclosure of the mortgage.

Mount, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by appellants to recover from respondents a strip of land about 2½ feet wide, along the north side of lot 8, in block 12, Catlin's addition to Tacoma. The appellants in their complaint alleged that they are the owners of said strip of land by reason of adverse possession for a period of more than ten years prior to July 15, 1903, and that on said date the respondents wrongfully, and by force, dispossessed the appellants of said strip of land, to the damage of appellants in the sum of $400. Respondents denied these allegations of the complaint, and alleged ownership in themselves. On these issues the cause was tried to the court and jury. A verdict was rendered in favor of respondents. Appellants prosecute this appeal from a judgment rendered on the verdict.

At the time the proposed statement of facts on appeal was filed and served upon respondents' attorneys it contained none of the exhibits or depositions in the case. At the time the statement of facts was settled, out notice, actual or imputed, of the existence of the mortgage, may acquire adverse title. And it is so held in Stevens v. Brooks, 24 Wis. 326.

So a purchaser on execution sale under a judgment rendered before the mortgage was given was held, in North v. Hammer, 34 Wis. 425, to acquire a title superior to that of the mortgagee, though the execution sale did not take place until after the mortgage transaction. Such a title, it is to be observed, however, is not derived from, but against, the mortgagor, as well as against the mortgagee.

After maturity, it is held, in Jordan v. Sayre, 24 Fla. 1, 3 So. 329, that during the period allowed for foreclosure, neither the mortgagor nor his grantee holds adversely to the mortgagee.

An extreme application of this rule appears in Coe v. Finlayson, 41 Fla. 160, 26 So. 704, where it is held that possession beginning several years after foreclosure proceedings were begun, and continuing for twelve years, did not establish title against the heirs of the mortgagee, who died pending the foreclosure proceeding, which, by reason thereof, was in abeyance twenty years before the appointment of an administrator. The rights of the mortgagee were enforced in this case more than twenty-two years after the maturity of the mortgage, and after twelve years of adverse possession, although the statute of limitations of Florida provides that no mortgage claim shall be 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) enforced after the expiration of twenty years from the maturity.

In Jamison v. Perry, 38 Iowa, 14, the mortgagor's grantee established actual, open, adverse possession, starting after the maturity of the mortgage debt, but before foreclosure proceedings were begun. This was held to start the statute of limitations to running and establish title against the mortgagee.

In Alabama, upon foreclosure the mortgage becomes functus, and a purchaser from the mortgagor thereafter holds possession adversely to the mortgagee or a purchaser at foreclosure sale, even though the latter be the original mortgagee. Garren v. Fields, 131 Ala. 304, 30 So. 775.

On the other hand, in Rhode Island it is held that the exercise of the power of sale in a mortgage by the mortgagee does not change the nature of the possession of the mortgagor, and this possession, not being hostile to the mortgagee during the existence of the mortgage, does not become hostile to the purchaser at the sale. Doyle v. Mellen, 15 R. I. 523, 8 Atl. 709.

Where there is still a period within which, after foreclosure sale, the mortgagor or his grantee may redeem, it is held that adverse possession does not begin until after the expiration of the time open for redemption from foreclosure. Medley v. Elliott, 62 Ill. 532.

A similar decision is found in Norris v. Ile, supra.

the court, at the request of appellants, and over the objections of respondents, attached to the statement all the exhibits and depositions in the case, and thereupon certified the statement of facts as containing all the facts. Respondents now move to strike all the exhibits and the depositions which were not attached to the proposed statement of facts at the time it was served, for the reason that respondents had no notice that appellants would ask the court to attach such exhibits or depositions to the statement of facts. An examination of the proposed statement of facts which was served upon respondents discloses that all the exhibits and depositions which were attached to the statement when it was certified were referred to therein as having been offered and received in evidence and filed in the cause. It was not necessary for the appellants to attach to the proposed statement of facts copies of the exhibits or depositions which were already a part of the record, for the statute (at § 5059, 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes) expressly provides that "Depositions and other written evidence on file shall be appropriately referred to in the proposed bill or statement, and when it is certified, the same or copies thereof, if the judge so direct, shall be attached to the bill or statement, and shall thereupon become a part thereof." It was only necessary, therefore, for the proposed statement to appropriately refer to such depositions or exhibits. A statement in a proposed statement of facts to the effect that a certain exhibit or deposition was offered and received in evidence would be an appropriate reference thereto. Suksdorf v. Humphrey, 30 Wash. 1, 77 Pac. 1071; O'Neile v. Ternes, 32 Wash. 528, 73 Pac. 692. There is no merit in the motion, and it is therefore denied.

Upon the trial of the cause it appeared that lots 7, 8, and 9 of block 12, Catlin's addition to Tacoma, are adjoining lots, lying side by side. Lot 7 is to the north of lot 8. Lot 8 is north of lot 9. In the year 1890 all of these lots were owned by R. F. Wells and wife. At that time Wells and wife built two houses upon the lots. One house was built on lots 8 and 9, and the other house was built upon lot 7. In August, 1890, Wells and wife gave a mortgage upon lot 7 to secure a promissory note due August 23, 1893. On November 11, 1890, Wells and wife sold lots 8 and 9 to appellants, who took immediate possession thereof. At the time of the sale of lots 8 and 9 by Wells to appellants the lines of the lots were pointed out as running to certain stakes then existing in the ground. Appellants took possession of all the ground pointed out to them as belonging to lots 8 and 9, which ground included the strip of lot 7 now in dispute. They 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) planted a hedge fence along the line which was pointed out as the line between lots 7 and 8, and continually thereafter until July, 1903, cultivated said strip in lawn, trees, and shrubs. On November 12, 1890, Wells and wife sold lot 7 to Henry Young and wife, subject to the mortgage above named. In 1895 the mortgage given by Wells and wife was foreclosed against the mortgagors and Young and wife. Appellants, who were at that time in the actual possession of the strip of land in dispute, were not made parties to the foreclosure. In June, 1901, respondents acquired the title obtained on foreclosure, and entered into possession of lot 7, except the strip in dispute. Up to July, 1903, the mortgagors and their grantees, Young and wife, and these respondents acquiesced in the possession held by the appellants. In that month, however, respondents had lot 7 surveyed, when it was discovered that appellants were occupying a strip thereof about 2½ feet wide along the south side of said lot. Respondents thereupon evicted appellants from said strip, and built a fence upon what they claim is the true line between lots 7 and 8. Appellants thereupon brought this action.

The pertinent question in the case is, Did the period of adverse possession begin to run in favor of appellants from the time they took possession of the strip of land in question in November, 1890, or did it begin to run only from the time the mortgage made by Wells and wife became due, in August, 1893? The trial court was of the opinion that adverse possession began to run from the latter date, and so instructed the jury. The rule seems to be well settled that, where a mortgagor conveys mortgaged real estate, his grantee takes subject to the mortgage, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the mortgage until it is due and can be foreclosed. 2 Jones, Mortg. 1st ed. § 1211; Buswell, Limitations & Adverse Possession, § 312; 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1069, ¶ 52; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 815. The reason for this rule is apparent, because the mortgagee is not entitled to possession of the mortgaged premises until the mortgage has been foreclosed. He cannot foreclose until the debt becomes due. In the meantime the mortgagor or his grantees are entitled to the possession of the mortgaged premises. The mortgagee is therefore helpless to enforce his rights against a possessor prior to the maturity of the debt secured by the mortgage. The grantee of the mortgagor, with either actual or constructive notice of the mortgage, is conclusively presumed to stand in the place of the mortgagor, and cannot therefore be said to hold adversely to the mortgagee. If this rule controls the case in hand, then there can be no doubt that the instruction given by the trial court was correct. But in this state a mortgage conveys no title to the real estate. The property mortgaged is held merely as security for the payment of the debt (Hitchcock v. Nixon, 16 Wash. 281, 47 Pac. 412; Dane v. Daniel, 23 Wash. 379, 63 Pac. 268; Fischer v. Woodruff, 25 Wash. 67, 87 Am. St. Rep. 742, 64 Pac. 923), and ceases to be a lien upon the real estate after six years from its maturity, when no payments have been made and no action to foreclose the lien had been commenced within that time (2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 4798; Damon v. Leque, 17 Wash. 573, 61 Am. St. Rep. 927, 50 Pac. 485; Dane v. Daniel, supra; Krutz v. Gardner, 25 Wash. 396, 65 Pac. 771; George v. Butler, 26 Wash. 456, 57 L. R. A. 396, 90 Am. St. Rep. 756, 67 Pac. 263; Hanna v. Kasson, 26 Wash. 568, 67 Pac. 271; De Voe v. Rundle, 33 Wash. 604, 74 Pac. 836). The mortgagee is not entitled to possession, and cannot maintain ejectment under his mortgage. 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5516. One in possession of real estate under claim of right from a mortgagor is a necessary party to a foreclosure of the mortgage, and a decree of foreclosure is not effective as to him. Section 4833, 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes; 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 305; 2 Jones, Mortg. 6th ed. § 1406; Denny v. Cole, 22 Wash. 372, 79 Am. St. Rep. 940, 61 Pac. 38. The rule also is that a "title acquired by adverse possession is a title in fee simple, and is as perfect a title as one by deed from the original owner or by patent or grant from the government." 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1135, B, and cases cited; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 883, and cases cited.

Under the rule that the grantee of a mortgagor is in permissive possession of the mortgaged premises, and does not hold adversely as to the mortgagee, but stands in the same position as the mortgagor, the appellants in this case did not hold adversely to the mortgagee until the time when the mortgage became due and could be foreclosed. The possession of the appellants was the same as the possession of the mortgagor would have been had he retained possession, and had the mortgage not been foreclosed against him. The statute of limitations began to run against the mortgage lien when the mortgage became due. If the lien had not been foreclosed against anyone until the expiration of six years after the note became due, no payments having been made thereon, the mortgage lien could not have been foreclosed at all. It would, in that event, have ceased to be a lien, assuming, of course, that the mortgagee or his assigns had remained out of possession of the mortgaged property. In that event, it could not be reasonably claimed that 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

adverse possession did not run against the legal title merely because a mortgage had existed upon the property for a term of years, and had been permitted to expire by limitation. In short, as against the mortgagor, adverse possession began immediately at the time appellants took possession. As against the mortgagee holding a mortgage made and recorded at the time of taking possession, the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the mortgage became due. When the mortgage was foreclosed against the mortgagor, Wells and wife, and Young and wife holding the record title, appellants were not made parties to the foreclosure. Their interest in the land was therefore not affected by the foreclosure, which was a nullity as to them. It was good as to all parties served or appearing in the action, and the foreclosure and sale vested all the interest of the parties, legal and equitable, in the purchaser at the sale, subject to redemption under the statute. If appellants, in possession of the strip of land in question, had been made parties to that foreclosure, their interests, acquired by purchase, by adverse possession, or in any other way, from the mortgagor or persons holding the legal title, would have become vested in the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. Whatever previous rights existed in favor of appellants would have been terminated at that time, and, whether possession was taken or not by the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, adverse possession as to such purchaser could only run from the time of the sale. But, since the appellants were not made parties to the foreclosure proceedings, such proceedings were not effective as to them, and they continued to hold possession and the right of possession the same as though the mortgage had not been foreclosed. Their interest was not foreclosed. If, instead of the foreclosure, the mortgagor and his grantees, Young and wife, in the year 1895, at the time of the foreclosure, had given a deed of the whole of lot 7 to the mortgagee, and the mortgagee and his grantors had permitted the appellants to remain in possession adversely for the period of ten years from the time they first acquired possession, it could not then be claimed that the possession of the appellants had been held adversely only from the time the mortgage became due, because, in that event, the title acquired by the deed would have been subject to all rights against Wells and wife and Young and wife, notwithstanding the mortgage lien. In order to extinguish these rights, it would have been necessary to foreclose the lien of the mortgage against all subsequent holders of the legal title and actual possessors, notwithstanding the deed. Since the appellants were not made parties to this foreclosure.

the purchaser at the foreclosure sale and their grantors held only a mortgage lien against the strip in possession of respondents, and are therefore, under the statute, not entitled to the possession until the lien is foreclosed. They cannot maintain an action for possession until they have foreclosed the lien against the possessor. At the time respondents dispossessed appellants the ten-year period of adverse possession had fully run in favor of appellants against all persons having title, and the legal title was therefore perfect in appellants. At that time, also, the statute of limitations had run against the right to foreclose the mortgage as against the appellants. Their rights were therefore unaffected by the mortgage. If Wells and wife had not given the mortgage, and appellants had been permitted to hold possession, as they have done, for thirteen years, neither Wells and wife nor their grantees could now claim that appellants had not acquired a perfect title to the land in question by adverse possession. The fact that the mortgage lien has been permitted to expire by limitations as to the appellants places them in the same position as though the mortgage had never been given. It follows that the period of adverse possession in this case began to run from the time appellants took possession of the land in question, and that the lower court erred in instructing the jury that it began from the time the mortgage became due.

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accord with this opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY et al.

(60 Kan. 1.)

1. Foreign corporation—contracts.

Contracts made with a foreign corporation before it has obtained permission, under the provisions of chap. 10, Laws of 1898, and Headnotes by BURCH, J.

Case Note.—The right of the state to exclude foreign corporations, and prohibit them from doing any business in the state except upon such conditions as the state may choose to impose, logically includes the right to deny validity to unauthorized contracts made by foreign corporations which have not the right to do business in the state. The question, therefore, of the validity of a contract made with a corporation before it chap. 125, Laws of 1901 (Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 1259 et seq.), to do business in this state, are not for that reason invalid, or subject to cancellation at the suit of one of the contracting parties.

2. Same—right of individual.

The regulation of foreign corporations under the statutes referred to devolves upon the state, and a private individual is not allowed to interfere except in the single instance of a failure by the corporation to file its annual statement, and then only to the extent of abating a suit against him until the required statement shall have been filed.

3. Same—performance of contract—injunction.

After a foreign corporation has complied with the law, and has received permission to do business in the state, it cannot be enjoined, at the suit of the state, from performing contracts made before such permission was obtained.

4. Same—doing business.

The negotiation of a foreign corporation with the state school-text-book commission, resulting in a contract and bond to supply the public schools with text-books, does not constitute the doing of business within the state by such corporation, within the meaning of the statutes cited in the first paragraph of this syllabus.

(April 9, 1904.)

ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to cancel a contract for the supply of school books. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Otis E. Hungate, G. C. Clemens, and Quinton & Quinton for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. H. Rossington, Charles Blood Smith, Clifford Histed, H. J. Bone, and Hite & Nichols, amici curiae, for defendants in error.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1897 the legislature passed an act relating to school text-books for use in the public schools of this state, providing for state uniformity and maximum charges for such books, and creating a commission to select them. This act was amended and supplemented at the sessions of 1898 and 1901. The commission thus created consists has acquired the right to do business in the state, is entirely a question of statutory construction.

There is a decided conflict of authority on the questions as to the validity of unauthorized contracts made with foreign corporations before they have complied with the statutory requirements of a right to do business in the state. This conflict has also been accompanied by some confusion in the

of eight members, and, to enable it to select and adopt uniform series of school text-books for use in the public schools, it is authorized and empowered to advertise for, receive, open, pass upon, and accept bids, and upon such acceptance to enter into definite and binding contracts with bidders for the furnishing of such text-books. In the year 1898 the legislature passed an act, which it amended in certain particulars in 1901, providing methods whereby corporations organized under the laws of other jurisdictions, seeking to do business in this state, may be permitted to do so. The procedure for the purpose of obtaining such permission is practically the same as that for obtaining a domestic charter. The foreign corporation desiring it must file an application therefor, setting forth the following information: "(1) A certified copy of its charter or articles of incorporation. (2) The place where its principal office or place of business is to be located. (3) The full nature and character of the business in which it proposes to engage. (4) The names and addresses of the officers, trustees or directors, and stockholders of the corporation. (5) A detailed statement of the assets and liabilities of said corporation, and such other information as the board may require in order to determine the solvency of the corporation." Laws 1898, interpretation of the conditions, caused by the failure to distinguish between the cases which deny the right of a corporation to enforce such a contract, and those which involve the right of the other party to enforce the contract against the corporation; but, as is shown by a careful analysis of the decisions in the note in 24 L. R. A. 315, there is a real conflict among the decisions, however carefully they may be interpreted. Some cases hold that when a statute imposes a penalty for unauthorized business by such corporation, the contracts cannot be held void, because to do this would impose an additional penalty. Cases illustrating this are Clark v. Middleton, 19 Mo. 53; Toledo Tie & Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 33 W. Va. 566, 25 Am. St. Rep. 925, 11 S. E. 37. But many decisions hold that notwithstanding such penalty the contracts of a foreign corporation which has not complied with the statutes are not valid and enforceable on behalf of the company itself. Among this class of cases are Boulden v. Estey Organ Co. 92 Ala. 182, 9 So. 283; American Ins. Co. v. Story, 41 Mich. 385, 1 N. W. 877.

Where no penalty is imposed, the same conflict exists with respect to unauthorized contracts of foreign corporations; and the right of a corporation itself to enforce such contracts is denied in the great majority of the cases, among which are Jones v. Smith, 3 Gray, 500; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 55 Vt. 526; Ford v. Buckeye State Ins. Co. 6 Bush, 133, 99 Am. Dec. 663. On the other hand, some cases are to the contrary, such 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) chap. 10, § 2, p. 27. The application must be accompanied by a fee, and, as a condition precedent to the granting of the application, the corporation must file its irrevocable written consent submitting itself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. A charter board passes upon the application, and, if it be granted, the corporation is required to pay certain additional fees, and to file with the secretary of state a certified copy of its charter. In passing upon the application the charter board is required to make special inquiry with reference to the solvency of the corporation. All corporations doing business in the state are required to file annual statements disclosing varied information regarding their composition, organization, and business. The failure to file such a statement within a given period works a forfeiture of the right to do business, which the charter board may ascertain, declare, and publish. The statute (p. 34, § 12) further provides: "No action shall be maintained or recovery had in any of the courts of this state by any corporation doing business in this state without first obtaining the certificate of the secretary of state that the statements provided for in this section have been properly made." Foreign corporations admitted to do business in this state are made subject generally to the same judicial as Wright v. Lee, 4 S. D. 237, 55 N. W. 931; King v. National Min. & Exploring Co. 4 Mont. 1, 1 Pac. 727. But in many cases the courts which deny the right to a foreign corporation to enforce such a contract also deny it the right to set up in defense of an action against it upon such a contract that the contract is invalid. This is on the ground that it is estopped to set up its own default. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 134 Ind. 215, 20 L. R. A. 405, 33 N. E. 970. There is no possibility of reconciling the conflict in the decisions; but it relates chiefly to statutory provisions more stringent than those considered in the case of STATE v. AMERICAN BOOK CO. The opinion in that case expressly says that the statute does not in terms prohibit foreign corporations from doing business in the state, or have any purpose to deny the people the benefit of commercial intercourse with them, or prescribe any penalty for failure to obtain permission to do business. The provision of the act requiring that it should not maintain an action in the state until it had obtained a certificate was held insufficient to show any purpose to prohibit making contracts; and on this point it is fully sustained by Neuchatel Asphalte Co. v. New York, 155 N. Y. 373, 49 N. E. 1043, where a similar provision was involved, and the court said that the purpose was not to avoid contracts, but to provide for an effective supervision and control of the business proposed to be carried on by foreign corporations.

control, restrictions, and penalties as those organized under the laws of this state. Prior to the 31st of May, 1902, the American Book Company, a corporation of the state of New Jersey, complied with the corporation law described, in all particulars except those relating to the payment of fees. The state authorities at that time interpreted the law in a manner exempting foreign corporations already doing business in the state from the payment of the prescribed fees, and the book company fell within that category. It filed its annual report, and received a certificate of the secretary of state to that effect. On May 31, 1902, the book company entered into three contracts with the state school-text-book commission to supply the schools of the state with certain text-books, and gave bond for the performance of the obligation it assumed, as the text-book law required. These contracts were made in consummation of accepted bids submitted to the commission on May 5, 1902, pursuant to advertisement therefor. On June 7, 1902, an action of quo warranto was commenced in this court against the book company, which upon July 21, 1902, resulted in a judgment ousting it from doing business in the state, on account of failure to comply fully with the statutes governing its admission to the state. State ex rel. Shawnee County v. American Book Co. 65 Kan. 847, 69 Pac. 563. On August 5, 1902, the book company complied with the law in all respects, and was duly admitted to do business in the state. On August 18, 1902, this action was brought in the district court of Shawnee county, in the name of the state, for the cancelation of the contracts the book company had made. At that time the book company had partially performed those contracts, and was proceeding to a full discharge of its obligations under them. On September 2, 1902, a temporary injunction against further performance of the contracts was refused, and the state, by this proceeding in error, seeks a reversal of that order.

To secure an injunction, the state relied upon the failure of the book company to comply with the law before entering into the contracts assailed, and the judgment of ouster. The decision in the case of State ex rel. Shawnee County v. American Book Company did nothing more than determine that, for a noncompliance with the law relating to its admission into the state, the book company should be ousted from its claimed right to do business in the state until it should have complied with the requirements of that law. The naked question therefore remains, Are the contracts referred to now subject to cancelation because made before the book company had been admitted to do business in this state? The question of capacity to contract is not involved on either side of the case. The book company and the text-book commission each possessed every qualification necessary to bind by contract. By the laws of their creation and organization they were each endowed with this faculty. The case is not like one in which the ability to invest an agreement with any engaging quality is altogether withheld. Nor is it like one in which the limits of some agency have been transgressed. There is here no lack of capability, no defect of power, and no deficiency of authority. The only question is whether power may be effectually displayed as against the provisions of the corporation law. The statute describes itself as an act "providing for the regulation of foreign corporations and the method by which they may be permitted to do business in this state," and it purports to cover that entire field. It prevents the exercise of corporate franchises in this state with respect to matters for which citizens of this state cannot incorporate, prevents concerns which are morally and financially irresponsible and untrustworthy from freely invading the state and imposing upon its citizens, and subjects foreign companies to the jurisdiction of local authorities. Official supervision of these affairs is committed to a state board. Such affairs, however, relate to nothing but the character and condition of the corporation itself. They are all enumerated in the statements of the application for admission and in the annual reports. There is no intimation of any purpose whatever to interfere in the relations between the corporation and the citizen. Business between them is as unregulated as it is between natural persons. Nor does the statute, in terms, prohibit foreign corporations from doing business in this state, or avow any purpose to deny the people the benefit of commercial intercourse with them. Indeed, under its title the statute could not extend beyond regulation. It prescribes no penalty whatever for failure to obtain permission to do business here. It makes no reference whatever to any effect which such failure may have upon the title to property acquired, contracts made, or other incidents to the doing of business. It does not anywhere use the terms "unlawful," "illegal," or "void," or any equivalent for them, as applied to the transaction of business without authority. It does not declare any determination whatever to reach beyond the offending company and nullify wholesome business bargains in matters of lawful trade. Foreign corporations may be supervised, but business is not proscribed. This treatment of the subject did not follow, however, from any oversight on the part of the legislature with reference to the use of penalties. In the case of failure to file annual statements, the charter board is authorized to ascertain and summarily declare and publish a forfeiture of the right to do any further business, which forfeiture becomes immediately effective; and the right of any corporation doing business in the state to sue or recover in the courts is made to depend upon the ability to obtain a certificate of the secretary of state that § 12 of the law has been observed. The noteworthy feature of the last-mentioned provision is that it creates a field for the intervention of the citizen in the matter of corporate regulation. While contracts are not invalidated, the binding force of obligations impaired, or the doing of business forbidden, the citizen is allowed to interpose a bar to any relief until the proper certificate can be produced.

From this survey of the statute, it appears that the legislature intended it to be complete; that the regulation of foreign corporations, and not the penalizing of business transactions, is its purpose; that such regulation is made the concern of the state in its special capacity as visitor, and not of any individual as a mere party to a contract; that a party to a contract is allowed to interfere in but a single instance, and then only to the extent of abating a suit against him; and that specific penalties are chosen to meet certain contingencies. The conclusion obviously and naturally follows that the legislature intended the state to rely upon the common-law remedies for the enforcement of the statute where none other was expressed; that the courts have no authority to interpolate in the law provisions concerning which the legislature, with all the resources of the English language at its command, remained silent, or to annex penalties for a violation of the law which the legislature, with a great arsenal to choose from, failed to mention. Hence contracts made with a foreign corporation before it has obtained permission to do business in the state are not for that reason invalid or subject to cancellation.

This statute was interpreted by the United States circuit court of appeals of this circuit in the case of Blodgett v. Lanyon Zinc Co. 58 C. C. A. 79, 120 Fed. 893, decided in February, 1903. A suit in equity was brought by the privies of a party to a contract to cancel it because made with a foreign corporation which had not obtained permission to do business in the state. In affirming a decree denying the relief sought, the court said: "It is also worthy of notice that there is no provision of the statutes of Kansas prohibiting a foreign corporation from doing business in that state, or declaring that any act or contract of a foreign corporation that fails to comply with the requirements to enable it to obtain permission to do business from the charter board shall avoid any of its acts or contracts. Conceding that the Lanyon Zinc Company had not complied with the corporation laws of Kansas so as to entitle it to permission from the charter board to do business in that state, no reason occurs to us why this fact should be held by the courts to avoid its contracts or the effect of its acts in performance of its agreements. In the absence of the denunciation of any such penalty for the failure to comply with its statutes by the legislature of the state which made them. On the other hand, there are two established and familiar rules of law which prohibit the complainants from availing themselves of the failure of their lessee to comply with the statutes authorizing it to do business in the state, for the purpose of escaping from the performance of their obligations under their contract. One is that the laws relative to the admission of foreign corporations to do business in the state of Kansas were not enacted for the purpose of destroying contracts or prohibiting their performance. It was not the intent or purpose of the legislature, by these laws to regulate the agreements of foreign corporations with the citizens of the state of Kansas, or to supervise or prohibit the performance of their contracts. The object of these statutes was to subject foreign corporations doing business in the state to the jurisdiction of its courts, and to the inspection and supervision of its officers, not to the end that the citizens of the state might avoid their contracts and perpetrate injustice, but to the end that justice might be administered to both the corporations and the citizens. Hence it is that the private citizen is not the party empowered to enforce these corporation laws, nor is the nullification of his contracts, or of acts done in performance thereof, the true remedy for their violation. The state alone is authorized to enforce them, and the ouster and dissolution of the corporation, or an injunction against its proceedings at the suit of the state, is the only remedy available.

. . . The second rule is that where a contract, or an act in performance of it, is not malum in se, and its invalidity is not declared as a penalty for a violation of a statute, the courts may not declare it, and thus affix a penalty not prescribed by the lawmaking power. . . . There was no provision in these statutes which inflicted the penalty of the invalidity of contracts made or business done without a compliance with them, nor was there any express prohibition of the conduct of such business before the laws were complied with. As there was nothing morally wrong in the acts of the appellee, as it was not the primary purpose of the statutes under consideration to invalidate such acts or contracts, and as the statutes contain neither express provision nor clear intimation that this was the intent of the legislators, it is not the province of the courts to do so. While the authorities on this question are variant and conflicting in the state courts, the Federal courts have steadily adhered to the rule, which is sustained by the better reason and the more persuasive opinions in the courts of the states, that, in the absence of an express provision of statute to the contrary, the innocent contracts and acts of a foreign corporation which has failed to comply with the statutes permitting it to do business in the state where the contracts are made and the acts are done are nevertheless valid and enforceable, because it is not the intent of the authors of such laws to strike down such agreements and acts when they are not evil in themselves." Authorities sustaining these views are abundant. Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 282, 33 L. ed. 317, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 93; Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. 79, 13 L. ed. 901; Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188; National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443; Smith v. Sheeley, 12 Wall. 358, 361, 20 L. ed. 430, 431; State Mut. F. Ins. Assn. v. Weed, 17 Barb. 378; Washburn Mill Co. v. Bartlett, 3 N. D. 138, 54 N. W. 544; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. McMillen, 24 Ohio St. 67; Wright v. Lee, 2 S. D. 596, 51 N. W. 706; Niemeyer v. Wright, 75 Va. 239, 40 Am. Rep. 720; Toledo Tie & Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 33 W. Va. 566, 25 Am. St. Rep. 925, 11 S. E. 37; *Dearborn Foundry Co. v. In the case of Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 289, 33 L. ed. 319, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 93, the Supreme Court of the United States dealt with the question involved as follows: "The Constitution and laws of Colorado, it should be observed, do not prohibit foreign corporations altogether from purchasing or holding real estate within its limits. They do not declare absolutely or wholly void, as to all persons, and for every purpose, a conveyance of real estate to a foreign corporation which has not previously done what is required before it can rightfully carry on business in the state. Nor do they declare that the title to such property shall remain in the grantor, despite his conveyance. So far as we are aware, the only penalty imposed by the statutes of Colorado upon a foreign corporation carrying on business in the state before acquiring the right to do so is found in § 262 of the same chapter [chap. 19, Gen. Stat. 1883], which provides: 'A failure to comply with the provisions of §§ 23 and 24 [§§ 260 and 261] of this act shall render each and every officer, agent, and stockholder of any such corporation, so failing therein, jointly and severally personally liable on any and all contracts of such company made within this state during the time that such corporation is so in default.' The fair implication is that, in the judgment of the legislature of Colorado, this penalty was ample to effect the object of the statutes prescribing the terms upon which foreign corporations might do business in that state. It is not for the judiciary, at the instance or for the benefit of private parties, claiming under deeds executed by the person who had previously conveyed to the corporation, according to the forms prescribed for passing title to real estate, to inflict the additional and harsh penalty of forfeiting, for the benefit of such parties, the estate thus conveyed to the corporation, and by it conveyed to others.

. . . If the legislature had intended to declare that no title should pass under a conveyance to a foreign corporation purchasing real estate before it acquires the right to engage in business in the state, and that such a conveyance should be an absolute nullity as between the grantor and grantee, leaving the grantor to deal with the property as if he had never sold it, that intention would have been clearly manifested. . . . The views we have expressed are supported by several adjudications in this court in cases somewhat analogous to the present one, among which are those arising under §§ 5136 and 5137 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3455-3460. The first of those sections authorizes national banking associations to loan money on personal security. The other section provides: 'A national banking association may purchase, hold, and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others: First, such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business. Second, such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted. Third, such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings. Fourth, such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts to it. But no such association shall hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years.' In Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 627, 25 L. ed. 188, 189, the question was directly presented whether a national bank was entitled to the benefit of a deed of trust upon real estate, which, with the note described in it, was taken, not as security for, or in satisfaction of, debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, but for a loan made by the bank at the time the deed of trust was assigned to it. The supreme court of Missouri held the deed of trust to be void, in the hands of the bank, because its loan was made upon real estate security in violation of the statute. But this court, after observing that the result insisted upon did not necessarily follow, said: 'The statute does not declare such a security void. It is silent upon the subject. If Congress so meant, it would have been easy to say so; and it is hardly to be believed that this would not have been done, instead of leaving the question to be settled by the uncertain result of litigation and judicial decision. Where usurious interest is contracted for, a forfeiture is prescribed and explicitly defined.' Again: 'Where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take a title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable, and the sovereign alone can object. It is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose.' In National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 103, 26 L. ed. 443, 444, which involved the validity of a mortgage to a national bank to secure future advances made to the mortgagor, the right of the bank to enforce the mortgage was sustained upon the principles announced in National Bank v. Matthews. The court said: 'Whatever objection there may be to it as security for such advances, from the prohibitory provisions of the statute, the objection can only be urged by the government.' To the same effect are Swope v. Leffingwell, 105 U. S. 3, 26 L. ed. 939, and Reynolds v. First Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 405, 412, 28 L. ed. 733, 736, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213. In Smith v. Sheeley, 12 Wall. 358, 361, 20 L. ed. 430, 431, which was an action of ejectment, the question was collaterally raised as to the validity of the title acquired by a banking institution, under a deed of the premises, in consideration of a certain sum paid by it to the grantor. The bank was created by an act of the territorial legislature of Nebraska, with power 'to issue bills, deal in exchange, and to buy and possess property of every kind.' But when that act passed, there was in force an act of Congress which provided that 'no act of the territorial legislature of any of the territories of the United States, incorporating any bank or any institution with banking powers or privileges, hereafter to be passed, shall have any force or effect whatever, until approved and confirmed by Congress.' The act of the territorial legislature incorporating the bank, above referred to, never was approved or confirmed by Congress. It was urged, as an objection to the deed made to the bank,—upon which deed one of the parties relied,—that it was not a competent grantee to receive title. This court said: 'It is not denied that the bank was duly organized in pursuance of the provisions of an act of the legislature of the territory of Nebraska; but it is said it had no right to transact business until the charter creating it was approved by Congress. This is so, and it could not legally exercise its powers until this approval was obtained, but this defect in its Constitution cannot be taken advantage of collaterally. No proposition is more thoroughly settled than this, and it is unnecessary to refer to authorities to support it.' " A leading case among those decided by the state courts is that of Washburn Mill Co. v. Bartlett, 3 N. D. 138, 54 N. W. 544. In the opinion it was said: 'The cases which we have cited from the various classes demonstrate, perhaps, the lack of uniformity with more certainty than they point to the correct rule of construction. Yet when studied, the cases are all found seeking one common object,—the legislative purpose. "The intent of the lawmaker is the law." The embarrassment is in declaring that intent. This intention may be declared in the act, or it may be inferred from its provisions in connection with the subject-matter and circumstances. Howell v. Stewart, 54 Mo. 400; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Caldwell, 54 Ind. 279, 23 Am. Rep. 641. In the statute under discussion the legislature specified reasonable terms upon which a foreign corporation could launch its business over the entire state, unquestioned by private interests or sovereign power. Whatever may have been the primary purpose of the legislature, it certainly was not to exclude foreign corporations from the state. Nor is it reasonable to presume that it was the legislative intent to declare all contracts made by foreign corporations without compliance with the statute absolutely void. It were a reflection upon legislative wisdom to presume that consequences so unusually harsh and oppressive were expected to flow from the use of language so mild and uncertain. Our statute is a simple inhibition. It declares no penalty. It does not declare the transaction of business unlawful or contracts void."

The second rule announced by the learned court of appeals in the case of Blodgett v. Lanyon Zinc Co. needs a slight modification to bring it into harmony with the views of this court. That which is within the reason of the law is a part of the law, and the matter of penalty is only one consideration in determining the scope of a legislative act. Whenever the law has made the doing of an act a crime, this court has held contracts made in contravention of it to be illegal and unenforceable. Pinney v. First Nat. Bank, 68 Kan. 223, 75 Pac. 119; Yount v. Denning, 52 Kan. 629, 35 Pac. 207; Alexander v. O'Donnell, 12 Kan. 609. But the imposition of a heavy penalty has been construed to entail no such consequence.

In construing a statute of this state relating to the filing of town-site plats, this court said in Bemis v. Becker, 1 Kan. 227, 250: "In other words, that contracts in contravention of a statute are not to be held void unless the court, from an examination of the statute, shall judge such to have been the intent of the legislature, though such intent will be presumed unless the contrary can be fairly inferred. We find, on examination of the statute in question in this case, that the manifest object of it was to protect the public and the unsuspecting purchaser against shams and devices of unscrupulous town projectors and proprietors and other persons, by the imposition of a penalty sufficient, in the judgment of the legislature, to secure conformity to its provisions. It is enacted in the 6th section [Stat. 1855, chap. 156, p. 735] that such map or plat, so acknowledged, certified, and deposited in the recorder's office shall be a sufficient conveyance to vest the fee of such lands therein named as intended for public uses, as streets, parks, etc., in the county, for the use of the public; and, to enforce such acknowledgment and deposit of the plat, the act provides a penalty or forfeiture of $300 for every lot sold previous to the deposit of such plat. Noncompliance with the requirements of the act is not made a misdemeanor punishable by fine, nor is it indictable in the courts. But the penalty is, by the 8th section, to be recovered by action of debt for the use of the county. There is certainly no rule of ethics or principle of common law against the selling of lots in a town without depositing a map thereof in the recorder's office of the county. The offense, therefore, is precisely of the nature, form, proportions, and extent which the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) legislature has declared. By that authority, and that alone, the act is made penal; and although the words of the 5th section are that 'any person' who shall sell or offer for sale such lots shall forfeit $300, yet, as it can hardly be presumed that the legislature intended to impose a penalty upon any except those upon whom it imposes the duty of acknowledging and depositing the plat, we are inclined to the opinion that the words, 'any person,' in the 5th section, are to be construed in connection with and limited by the provisions of the 1st section, which creates the duty. The same power, then, which creates the offense, provides the penalty and designates the offenders. The contrary interpretation contended for by the defendants in error would confound the innocent with the guilty, subjecting them alike to the penalties of the act, and make it, instead of a protection to the credulous and unsuspecting, a trap and a snare for the feet of the unwary."

To say that the legislature intended the statute to render void contracts made without complying with it is to say that the legislature intended that, if a foreign company should write life insurance in this state, it might take the premiums, and then, upon the death of the persons assured, refuse to pay the policies; and it is to say that a farmer of this state may purchase a machine or a herd of cattle from a nonresident corporation on credit, secure the price by a chattel mortgage, refuse to pay, and then defeat an action of replevin for the property. Such an interpretation might attract the enthusiastic admiration of the highwayman, but it has nothing to commend itself to a court of justice. At an early day this court said: "A foreign insurance company doing business in this state, when sought to be made liable for its contracts made here, is estopped from saying that they are doing business contrary to law." Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Curran, 8 Kan. 9, 16. And there can be no doubt that the estoppel bears equally upon both parties to the contract. In commenting upon certain cases indicating a contrary view, Mr. Thompson says: "Such decisions put the contracts under consideration, although perfectly innocent and meritorious in themselves, on the footing of contracts which are essentially criminal, corrupt, or fraught with moral turpitude, or otherwise opposed to the public policy of the state. In leveling such contracts to the ground, and in allowing their own citizens to repudiate them on such a plea, while keeping the consideration, the courts degrade the commercial morals of the people, encourage general dishonesty, expel capital from the state, and bring its judiciary into deserved disrepute." 6 Thomp. Corp. 6332.

If it be said that the statute is weak unless the court can aid it by laying its hand upon contracts, the reply is obvious,—that stringency is a question of policy, with which this tribunal has no concern. As Mr. Justice Brewer remarked in the Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment Cases, 24 Kan. 700, 706: "Questions of policy are not questions for the courts. They are wrought out and fought out in the legislature and before the people. . . . We make no laws. . . . We inaugurate no policy." And it is utterly illogical to compromise in a matter of interpretation; to palter with the status of such contracts, and attempt to distinguish between those which are executed and those which are unexecuted, or to say they may be voidable if they are not void, or withhold remedies for a time. Such contracts are valid or invalid, and, if valid, are not subject to cancelation, and are enforceable as other contracts are enforceable except as the law has restricted the corporation in its right to maintain an action or recover a judgment.

Thus far the case has been considered as if the contracts assailed were made between a foreign corporation and a private individual. That they were made with a state agency, and that this action is brought by the state, has become immaterial, if it ever did afford a basis for distinction. The prohibition of the statute is against the doing of business in this state. The conditions are such that a corporation may at any time, upon its own volition, qualify itself to do business. When the American Book Company complied with the law, and received permission to do business in the state, such permission was subject to no restriction, and the doing of business no longer remained improper, even though based upon a previous contract. The opinion of Judge Hammond upon this point in the case of Cæsar v. Capell, 83 Fed. 403, 424, is clear and convincing: "Whatever invalidity and infirmity there was, arose solely and entirely out of the fact that the legislature had prohibited the making of the contract, and out of the sentiment that that which the legislature chooses to prohibit is just as much unlawful as if it were within itself vicious and immoral. Concede this; yet, if we find that the prohibition itself is only provisional, and not absolute; that the infirmity only arises under prescribed conditions, which may be removed; and that by the very terms of the act itself the conditions are such that they are within the control of the foreign corporation itself; that it may, by doing or not doing a particular thing, create the conditions or remove them,—it necessarily follows, it would seem, that the act of the party itself is all-sufficient to give that validity or invalidity to the contract which depends alone upon compliance or noncompliance with the conditions, according to its choice. Where the conduct is not within itself vicious and immoral, or condemned by a public policy existing entirely outside of any mere legislative expression of it, there would seem to be no very sound reason for holding to the sentimental idea that, once a contract is prohibited, it remains always prohibited, until the legislature may choose, by subsequent enactment, to remove the prohibition. The legislature might undoubtedly in the beginning have imposed such absolute prohibition, but it did not. It imposed only conditional prohibitions, and those conditions were left within the control of the parties to the contract, or one of them. Therefore it seems to us to be correct, in principle, to hold that subsequent compliance with the conditions of the statute would remove any objection that might ever have been made to the making of the contract, in such a case as that. It is no objection to this reasoning to say that this is giving retroactive effect to the act of compliance, because there is no reason why it should not be retroactive; and, in the very nature of the subject-matter of the legislation, such retroactive effect is possible, and will be presumed, in favor of the paramount public policy of freedom of contract, to have been within the contemplation of the legislature, and within its grant of a power to remove by compliance the obstructive conditions." The same reasoning applies to the right to maintain an action and recover a judgment in litigation begun before annual statements are filed. Whether or not an injunction might be granted, at the suit of the state, in aid of a judgment of ouster to prevent the performance of contracts made, or the maintenance of suits begun, after such a judgment, is not now a question calling for decision.

Besides all this, the state must fail in this action upon another ground. The business of the American Book Company to be done in this state was that of supplying the schools of the state with text-books, and, before any books could be sold, the company was required to establish agencies throughout the state, and arrange with dealers for the purpose of carrying on such business in a particular way. The preliminary negotiations with the state text-book commission, whereby the book company became obligated to enter upon and conduct the contemplated business, was not the doing of business itself, within the meaning of the statute. Viewed from the standpoint of the state, the advertisement, the bid, the acceptance, the contract, and the bond amounted to nothing more than the employment of an agent who should within 30 days after the lidity to the contract which depends alone upon compliance or noncompliance with the conditions, according to its choice. Where the conduct is not within itself vicious and immoral, or condemned by a public policy existing entirely outside of any mere legislative expression of it, there would seem to be no very sound reason for holding to the sentimental idea that, once a contract is prohibited, it remains always prohibited, until the legislature may choose, by subsequent enactment, to remove the prohibition. The legislature might undoubtedly in the beginning have imposed such absolute prohibition, but it did not. It imposed only conditional prohibitions, and those conditions were left within the control of the parties to the contract, or one of them. Therefore it seems to us to be correct, in principle, to hold that subsequent compliance with the conditions of the statute would remove any objection that might ever have been made to the making of the contract, in such a case as that. It is no objection to this reasoning to say that this is giving retroactive effect to the act of compliance, because there is no reason why it should not be retroactive; and, in the very nature of the subject-matter of the legislation, such retroactive effect is possible, and will be presumed, in favor of the paramount public policy of freedom of contract, to have been within the contemplation of the legislature, and within its grant of a power to remove by compliance the obstructive conditions." The same reasoning applies to the right to maintain an action and recover a judgment in litigation begun before annual statements are filed. Whether or not an injunction might be granted, at the suit of the state, in aid of a judgment of ouster to prevent the performance of contracts made, or the maintenance of suits begun, after such a judgment, is not now a question calling for decision.

governor's proclamation take charge of and conduct the school text-book business of the state. If it be an essential feature of the business of a corporation to promote contracts, as a broker may do, then the making of contracts by such company may constitute the doing of business, but no such question is presented here. The case is identical in principle with that of Hogan v. St. Louis, 176 Mo. 149, 75 S. W. 604, decided by the supreme court of Missouri in June, 1903. The syllabus reads: "Our statutes do not mean that a foreign corporation must establish a public office within this state, where books are kept and processes may be served, and must have a license from the secretary of state to do business within this state, before it can enter into a contract to do business within the state; and a city which enters into a contract with such foreign corporation for the lighting of its streets cannot be enjoined from carrying out such contract on the ground that it is illegal." In the opinion it was said: "Now, when our statutes say that a foreign corporation shall not 'transact business' here until it establishes a public office in this state where books are kept and process may be served, and until it pays its quasi incorporation tax and takes out its license, do they mean that the corporation must do all those acts before it can lawfully enter into a contract to do any business here? Does our law mean that, when advertisements inviting bids on public or private works in this state are read by foreign corporations, they are to understand that they have not the right to bid, and have their bids accepted, unless they shall have already complied with the terms of our statute to enable them to transact business here? No; that is not the meaning of our statutes. No such policy of exclusion has ever been shown in any of our legislative acts; foreign corporations have always been invited and encouraged to come. The obtaining of a desirable contract is sometimes an inducement for a foreign corporation to come into the state; it is not bound to establish itself here before it can obtain such a contract. Entering into a contract like the one in question undoubtedly is 'transacting business,' within the unlimited meaning of the term, but that is not the sense in which the term is used in the statute just quoted. As there used, it means carrying on the work for which the corporation was organized, and, in its application to the facts of this case, it means performing the work called for by the contract." Although the writer fully concurs in the foregoing statement of the law, he is constrained to say that, in his opinion, a more fundamental reason exists for upholding the judgment of the district court. The Bush law has no application to the facts of this controversy.

In order better to discharge the exalted duty enjoined upon it by § 2 of article 6 of the Constitution, the legislature undertook to secure uniformity of text-books in the common schools. In doing so, it exercised a sovereign power. The matter of procuring a corporation to supply needed books is purely a state affair. No private right attaches to it. Nor is the act one of ordinary trade or commerce, in which the state may divest itself of the attributes of sovereignty, and conduct itself as an individual may do. The most distinctively sovereign prerogatives of the legislature, under the Constitution, are enlisted and concerned. Unable to attend to certain details of the work proposed, a special agent was created, and clothed with such authority as seemed necessary to accomplish the legislative design. The state text-book commission is a public agency created to aid in the assertion of a public right and the execution of a public power in the interest of the public welfare. Corporate power is withheld from it. It possesses no prerogative personal to itself or its members, and the state alone can enforce the contracts it may negotiate. It is merely the arm of the legislature, and the character of the acts done by it cannot be distinguished from the character of governmental acts performed by the legislature itself. Under the text-book law bids are protected by unconditional, certified checks, forfeitable upon failure to contract, and contracts are protected by bonds forfeitable upon failure to perform. These measures afford ample security to the state in the business it undertakes to do. One of the paramount purposes of the text-book law is to engender the widest possible competition, in order to secure to the children of the state the highest quality of text-books at the lowest possible price. Publishing houses everywhere are invited and expected to place their resources at the command of the state for the good of the common schools. Any limitation or burden other than those the text-book law itself contains would tend to thwart this purpose. In the field selected by the legislature for this exhibition of its power, it is supreme. It may adopt its own method of obtaining bids, and may contract with any one it will, whenever it pleases to do so, through whatever medium it chooses to employ. The transaction is its own, and is subject to no limitation that is not self-imposed. The statute does not in express language refer to the state. Only general terms are used. It is a rule of interpretation that "the general language of statutes will be limited to such persons and subjects as it is reasonable to presume the legislature intended it should apply." State v. Smiley, 65

Kan. 240, 87 L. R. A. 903, 69 Pac. 199. It is not reasonable to presume that the legislature intended the general language of the Bush law to be binding upon itself in respect to contracts of the character in question. To do so would be to presume that the legislature undertook to cripple and curtail its own power to discharge governmental functions, and undertook to diminish the fund of its own resources for that purpose, and would put the legislature in the attitude of deliberately compassing the defeat of its own designs. "The King is not bound by any act of Parliament unless he be named therein by special and particular words. The most general words that can be devised ('any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, etc.') affect not him in the least if they may tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights or interests. For it would be of most mischievous consequence to the public if the strength of the executive power were liable to be curtailed without its own express consent, by constructions and implications of the subject." 1 Bl. Com. 261. This rule has been adapted to the requirements of the political system prevailing in this country, and is now universally recognized. Chancellor Kent states it as follows: "It is likewise a general rule, in the interpretation of statutes limiting rights and interests, not to construe them to embrace the sovereign power or government, unless the same be expressly named therein, or intended by necessary implication." 1 Kent, Com. 460. Many pertinent authorities illustrating applications of this principle are collated in 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 644, and in cross references there indicated. However, for the reasons first given, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. C. EDWARDS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

J. A. HARTSHORN.

(.... Kan.)

1. Pleading—different counts.

A party cannot always anticipate what the testimony in a case may develop; and, to meet the possible phases of the evidence, he may sometimes state his cause of action in different counts.

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Case Note.—The rule stated in EDWARDS v. HARTSHORN, that the contractor will not be bound by the decision of an architect, engineer, or other person appointed as umpire by the contract, in case of fraud or mistake so great as to imply bad faith on his part, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2. Same—election.

Where a plaintiff set up in his petition three counts based on the same transaction, and at the close of the testimony elected to stand on one of the counts, and the case was submitted to the jury as a single cause of action, the refusal of the court to require an earlier election was not prejudicial error.

3. Contracts—estimates of umpire.

A provision in a contract between a principal contractor and a subcontractor for the grading of a railroad that the work should be done under the supervision of the chief engineer of the former, who should make estimates as a basis for the payment of the work done; and that his decision as to all matters of dispute which arise between the parties should be final and conclusive,—is valid; and the decision of such an umpire is prima facie conclusive upon all matters submitted to and fairly and honestly decided by him.

4. Same—impeachment.

If there was fraud or mistake so great and palpable as to imply bad faith, or the umpire failed to fairly and honestly perform the function assigned to him, his decision will have no binding force.

5. Same—rescission.

Nor will it bind if, by the subsequent agreement of the parties, the decision is not to be relied on, but other fuller and correct estimates are to be made.

6. Same—action for contract price.

In either case a proceeding in equity to set aside the decision of the engineer is not a condition precedent to an action at law to recover the money due under the contract, where the work had been satisfactorily completed by the plaintiff, and had been accepted by the defendant.

7. Same—good faith of umpire.

The fact that the chosen umpire was an employee of the defendant does not of itself weaken the force of his decision; but the law requires of a person so situated the utmost diligence and good faith in the performance of his duties.

seems to be universally accepted. A few of the many cases applying the rule are Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Meyer, 30 L. ed 680; Fletcher v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. 19 Fed. 731; St. Louis & P. R. Co. v. Kerr, 48 Ill. App. 496; Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v.

This is also shown to be the rule, and various applications of it are made, in Page on Contracts, vol. 3, § 1467.

The rule is equally applicable when the decision is against the owner as when it is against the contractor. Haunroth v. Peters, 50 Ill. App. 306; Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145, 10 Am. Rep. 449; Gonder v. Berlin Branch R. Co. 171 Pa. 492, 33 Atl. 61; Chandler v. Wheeler (Tenn. Ch. App.) 49 S. W. 278.

The difficult point to determine is, naturally, What constitutes fraud, or such mistake as to imply bad faith? On this point there is no such unanimity as on the preceding. The arbitrary or unreasonable refusal to issue a certificate of performance will, however, constitute such fraud as to render the production of such certificate unnecessary, though made a prerequisite to recovery by the contract. So, also, a refusal to issue a certificate on grounds known to be fictitious and without foundation may be found by the jury to constitute fraud. Rawle v. Gilmore, 76 Ill. App. 372.

A refusal of a certificate through collusion with the owner also constitutes fraud rendering the production of the certificate unnecessary. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68, 26 N. E. 384; McDonald v. Patterson, 186 Ill. 381, 57 N. E. 1027; Van Keuren v. Miller, 71 Hun, 68, 24 N. Y. Supp. 580; Mills v. Paul (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 558.

And an underestimate by the engineer through collusion with the owner will also entitle the contractor to recover for the loss resulting. Herrick v. Belknap, 27 Vt. 673.

Mere incompetency or negligence of the engineer is insufficient to indicate fraud, unless his mistakes are so gross as to imply bad faith. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 34 L. ed. 917, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290. But his decision was held not to be binding where he was partial and incompetent, wrong in his estimates, and unjust in his classification, and controlled by the president and agents of the railroad company whose road was in process of construction. Spaulding v. Coeur D'Alene R. & Nav. Co. 5 Idaho, 528, 51 Pac. 408.

Failure of an engineer to make allowances for excavations to which he believes the contractor entitled under the contract is not fraud authorizing a greater recovery, where the amount allowed was all he was entitled to under a true construction of the contract. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543, 35 N. E. 323, Affirming 65 Hun, 112, 19 N. Y. Supp. 793. But the mistake of the engineer in reducing by one half the price fixed by the contract for excavating a tunnel is so gross as to amount to fraud. Mills v. Norfolk & W.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by J. A. Hartshorn against W. C. Edwards to recover the balance alleged to be due for the grading of 2 miles of the Kansas City, Mexico, & Orient Railroad, in Oklahoma. Originally the Kaw Valley Construction Company, the Union Construction Company, and the Kansas City, Mexico, & Orient Railroad Company were made defendants; but, on the motion of plaintiff, a dismissal was entered as to these parties, and the case was tried out against Edwards alone. The petition contained three counts, all based upon Hartshorn's claim for work done for the defendant. The first was upon an account stating the charges for clearing, grubbing, and excavating for the grade of the railroad, and also the credits, and asking for recovery of the balance due, $5,439.10. The second count set up the contract between the parties, the work done in pursuance of it, and the failure to measure and estimate the work as the contract specified and to otherwise perform the contract; and the third count was like unto the second, except that express malice and intentional fraud was charged against some of the engineers in measuring the excavation and determining the amount due for the work. Hartshorn, however, elected to stand upon the second count of his petition, and the averments of the other counts became immaterial.

In the second count the contract between the parties was set forth, under which Hartshorn was to receive $15 per acre for clearing, $25 per acre for grubbing, 9 cents per cubic yard for earth excavation, 27½ cents per cubic yard for loose rock, and 55 cents per cubic yard for solid rock. The work was to be done to the satisfaction of the chief engineer of Edwards, who was to make measurements and estimates, and was to be paid for when he certified that the work was completely performed. The petition al-

R. Co. 90 Va. 523, 19 S. E. 171, 91 Va. 613, 22 S. E. 556.

Fraud is not to be presumed from the mere fact that the price on which the parties originally agree proves inadequate and unjust (Martinsburg & P. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 29 L. ed. 255, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1035); nor that the estimates for work done are less than the amount actually done (Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 133); otherwise, however, if the underestimate is in collusion with the owner (Herrick v. Belknap, supra).

The offsetting against a claim allowed for extra work, without notice or opportunity to be heard, of damages from delay in performing the work called for by the contract, which had previously been estimated and paid for in full without any suggestion of damages from the delay, is such gross mistake as to imply fraud. Marks v. Northern P. R. Co. 22 C. C. A. 630, 44 U. S. App. 714, 76 Fed. 941.

And the failure to consider some of the matters submitted for decision constitutes a fraud to that extent. Anderson v. Imhoff, 34 Neb. 335, 61 N. W. 854; Kistler v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 88 Ind. 460.

Bad faith is shown by the refusal to give a certificate because the stone furnished, which was in strict accordance with the contract, rusted to some extent (Badger v. Kerber, 61 Ill. 328); or because the contractor had not done something not required by the contract (Highton v. Dessau, 46 N. Y. S. R. 922, 19 N. Y. Supp. 395).

not shown by the fact that the work specified therein lacked a few dollars of completion (Lincoln v. Schwartz, 70 Ill. 134); nor by the mere discovery of defects in the work after the certificate was given (McAlpine v. St. Clara Female Academy, 101 Wis. 468, 78 N. W. 173); nor because of the poor quality of the work, unless the architect's real judgment was not exercised (Davis v. Gibson, 70 Ill. App. 273); nor by the sinking of the building causing great damage to it, if due to the plan of construction, although it would be otherwise if it had been due to acts or omissions of the contractor in violation of the contract (Weeks v. Little, 15 Jones & S. 1).

But bad faith is shown where the contract required the use of good sound timber and materials, and the architect accepted the work against the owner's objection, with knowledge that a large part of the materials were rotten. Tetz v. Butterfield, 54 Wis. 242, 41 Am. Rep. 29, 11 N. W. 531.

The burden of showing fraud is on the party complaining. Mundy v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 C. C. A. 583, 31 U. S. App. 606, 67 Fed. 633; McCoy v. Able, 131 Ind. 417, 30 N. E. 528; Eldridge v. Fuhr, 59 Mo. App. 44; Kilgore v. North West Texas Baptist Edu. Soc. 89 Tex. 405, 35 S. W. 145.

The umpire's decision may be impeached for fraud in an action at law as well as in equity. Williams v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. 112, Mo. 463, 34 Am. St. Rep. 403, 20 S. W. 631; Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Meyer, 30 L. ed. 680.

leged that the contract contained a provision "that the decision of the chief engineer of the defendant, W. C. Edwards, should be final and conclusive on any dispute which might arise between the parties to said agreement relative to or touching the same, and that each of said parties did thereby waive any right of action or other remedy, in law or otherwise, by virtue of the contract; so that the decision of the chief engineer should in the nature of an award be final and conclusive on the rights and claims of said parties, and no suit should be brought until the award of the said chief engineer should have been made and published, and then for the purpose only of enforcing said award." It was further alleged that Edwards was the agent of the construction and railroad companies; that he chose as chief engineer M. P. Paret, who was the chief engineer of these companies, and who was interested in estimating the work done at a lower figure than the correct amount; that Paret, pretending to act as chief engineer for Edwards, made certificates of the work done, but failed and neglected personally to measure and estimate the work done; that, instead of making estimates or measurements of the work personally, he relied upon measurements and classifications made by E. B. Coulson, who was commonly known as a resident engineer; that Coulson was wholly incompetent for the work; that the estimates made by him were erroneous, incorrect, and incomplete; and that neither Paret nor Coulson have ever made any correct estimate, but made one which placed the value of the work done at the sum of $5,439.16 less than the true amount and value under the terms of the contract. It is further alleged that two final estimates were made on the work, one for each of the miles graded; but at each time Hartshorn refused to receive the sum allowed on these pretended estimates, asserting that they were incorrect, and that a mistake had been made in the classification and measurement of the work; and that it was then agreed between him and Edwards that the chief engineer would make a personal examination, and upon this agreement the amounts of the estimates were accepted; that the plaintiff refused to accept said sums, or either of them, until Edwards agreed to make full, correct, and final estimates and classifications, and finally accepted the money only as part payment of the work under an agreement that correct estimates and classifications should be made; but that the defendant has since unreasonably and fraudulently refused and neglected to make further final and correct estimates and classifications. It was further alleged that the work done has been accepted as being in full compliance with the contract; but the defendant, on account of the mistake of the chief engineer, and the fact that Coulson was careless, negligent, and incompetent, and failed to correctly measure, estimate, and classify the work done under the contract, has failed to pay him the amount due under the terms of the contract, and that there is still due $5,439.16, for which he asks judgment. In his answer Edwards alleged that the chief engineer did make estimates and classifications of the work done, and that he had paid to Hartshorn the amount of the estimates, which were received by the plaintiff. The plaintiff, in reply, alleged that the estimates mentioned in the answer were those described in the petition as being incorrect, false, and fraudulent. The trial resulted in favor of the plaintiff; the jury awarding him the sum of $5,439.16.

Error is assigned on the ruling of the court denying the motion of Edwards to require the plaintiff to elect on which count of his petition he would rely. The Code requires that the petition shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language, and without repetition. Civ. Code, § 87. A party may, however, have demands of a different nature founded on the same transaction, and which he may state in separate counts, although only one recovery can be had. There are times when a party cannot well anticipate what the testimony will develop, and to meet any possible phase of the evidence he may state his cause of action in different counts. Bliss, Code Pl. § 120; 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 321. Whether such a practice was permissible in this instance is of little consequence. At the close of the testimony the plaintiff did elect to rely on the second count of his petition, and the case was submitted to the jury as involving but a single cause of action, and hence the defendant did not suffer any prejudice.

It is contended that the facts stated in the second count do not constitute a cause of action. In part, this is based on the ground that the contract pleaded provided that the decision of the chief engineer should be final and conclusive upon the rights and claims of the parties, and that, as an award or decision had been made by him, a resort to an action in court was precluded. It may be conceded that it was competent for the parties to agree that final estimates should be made by the chief engineer of the defendant, and that his decision should be taken as correct and binding. Such an award or decision is prima facie conclusive as to all matters submitted to and fairly and honestly determined by the chosen umpire. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Payne, 57 Kan. 291, 300, 46 Pac. 315. Of course, if there were fraud, gross mistake, or the failure to exercise an honest judgment by the umpire, his estimate or award would not be binding. Martinsburg & P. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 29 L. ed. 255, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1035; Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 34 L. ed. 917, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290; McCoy v. Able, 131 Ind. 417, 30 N. E. 528, 31 N. E. 453; Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v. Scholes, 14 Ind. App. 524, 56 Am. St. Rep. 307, 43 N. E. 156; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Mills, 91 Va. 613, 22 S. E. 556. Passing for the time being the question whether fraud, mistake, inefficiency, or bad faith is sufficiently alleged to set aside the decision of the chief engineer, there are in the petition averments that, by agreement of the parties, the decision of the chief engineer as made was put aside and treated as not of binding force; that, when Hartshorn protested that the final estimates were incorrect and unfairly made, Edwards then agreed that further, full, final, and correct estimates and classifications should be personally made by the chief engineer; but that he had unreasonably and fraudulently refused and neglected to make such estimates and classifications. Having in effect set aside the decision of the chief engineer, and agreed that another and correct one should be made, a decree of a court to cancel it was certainly unnecessary. The reasons for ignoring the discredited decision become immaterial, since the petition alleges that new and correct estimates were to be made. The petition alleged that the work was performed by Hartshorn in conformity with the contract; that it was accepted by Edwards as complete and satisfactory; the amount due for the work, when measured correctly as the contract specified, was set up; and also the failure and refusal to measure and estimate the work in accordance with the agreement. This stated a cause of action at law for the recovery of money under the contract.

It is argued that the decision of the chief engineer was in the nature of an award, binding upon the parties, and that the plaintiff could not maintain an action to recover under the contract so long as the award stood. The contention is that it could only be set aside by an equitable proceeding. Against the objection of the defendant, the court impaneled a jury, and the case was tried as an action at law. Since the award or decision made by the chief engineer was taken out of the case by subsequent agreement there is little room to claim that it was an action for equitable cognizance. But, treating the case upon 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) defendant's theory, it was practically an action at law, and the court could not safely have denied the demand of either party for a jury. By the averments of the petition, as well as the testimony offered in behalf of the plaintiff, the chief engineer did not personally classify or measure the material excavated by the plaintiff in grading the railroad. There was an attempt to do so by Coulson, the subordinate engineer. It is alleged that he was not only incompetent, but that he was careless and negligent, and therefore did not correctly measure and classify the work, so that Hartshorn was allowed but $12,691.58, when, according to the contract, he was entitled to $18,130.74,—a mistake or variance of $5,439.16. The petition did not expressly charge intentional fraud or bad faith, but it did charge inefficiency, negligence, and mistakes so great and palpable as to imply bad faith. It is true the pleading does not state in express terms that fraud was committed by the engineers; but facts as to inefficiency, negligence, and gross mistake are related, which in themselves are sufficient to constitute bad faith and invalidate the estimates of the chief engineer. Little strength would have been given the pleading by adding a conclusion that the facts stated constituted bad faith. If the estimates had been fairly made, they would have been binding; but when not fairly made, and there are mistakes so gross as to amount to fraud on the plaintiff's rights, the estimates and decision of the chief engineer may be ignored, and a recovery of the contract price had in an action at law. Although the equitable elements of mistake and fraud may be involved, the case is essentially one at law for the recovery of money under the contract; and hence a jury was properly allowed. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Meyer, 30 L. ed. 689; Williams v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. 112 Mo. 463, 34 Am. St. Rep. 403, 20 S. W. 631; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Mills, supra; Graham v. Woodall, 86 Ala. 313, 5 So. 687; Kistler v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 88 Ind. 460; Illinois & M. Canal v. Lynch, 10 Ill. 521; Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v. Scholes, supra.

A somewhat general attack is made on the instructions which the court gave to the jury, but much of the complaint in this respect is answered in the determination already made. The respective theories of the parties were fairly presented to the jury. With respect to the estimates and award of the chief engineer, the court did not minimize the mistakes necessary to invalidate it. The jury were informed that the award of the chief engineer was final and conclusive in the absence of mistake or fraud, and that, "while the final estimates of the chief engineer may be set aside on account of mistakes made by him in his final estimates and classifications of the work under the contract, yet I say to you that slight discrepancies in measurements should be disregarded; and, even where there are discrepancies of some magnitude, you should accept the estimates of the chief engineer, unless the proof clearly shows such gross mistakes as would imply bad faith, or a failure on the part of the chief engineer to exercise an honest judgment in making his final estimates and classifications." This statement of the law was exceedingly liberal to the defendant, and he, at least, has no reason to complain of the rule applied.

Complaint is made that the court referred to the contention that the chief engineer did not personally do all of the work but in the same connection the jury were instructed that he was not required to personally make the estimates and classifications, and could intrust the work in part to his subordinates and assistants. They were told, however, that, "if the chief engineer intrusted the work of making up the final estimates and classifications to his subordinates and assistants, the mistakes and errors of the subordinates and assistants became and were the mistakes and errors of the chief engineer, if he adopted them in making up his final estimates." The terms of the contract under which the classifications were to be made were fairly stated by the court, and we find nothing in any part of the charge which can be regarded as prejudicial error.

While the sufficiency of the evidence is vigorously assailed, we are unable to say that the verdict and judgment are without support. It appears that Paret, the chief engineer, gave little personal attention to the work as it progressed, and relied almost entirely on Coulson, the resident engineer. There is testimony that Coulson had only passing acquaintance with the work. He did not give it the attention during its progress necessary to a correct and complete estimate. Changes were made by him which indicated carelessness and a lack of definite information; and, indeed, the testimony tends to show that the classifications were not made with any care, and that his measurements were incomplete and little more than approximations. After a protest had been made against his estimates, and Edwards had agreed that other estimates should be made, the chief engineer sent two of his subordinates, who went over the work, and who made reports differing materially from the estimates of Coulson. Notwithstanding this, the chief engineer refused to change the estimates which Coulson had originally given him. Two 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) engineers went over the work at the instance of the plaintiff, and, after measuring it, one of them reported that there were 17,807 yards of solid rock excavated, while Coulson's estimates only credited Hartshorn with 1,392 yards. The other engineer, who was a witness on behalf of plaintiff, estimated that there were 16,704½ yards of solid rock excavated. Although these witnesses did not see the work during its progress, their testimony indicates that their measurements were made with considerable care, and the jury were warranted in accepting their estimates in preference to those made by Coulson. Enough appears in the testimony to warrant the inference that the so-called final estimates were not fairly and honestly made, and the discrepancies are such as to show palpable mistakes and utter disregard of the rights of Hartshorn. The fact that the chief engineer, who was to classify, measure, and make final estimates, was an employee of the defendant, does not of itself weaken the force of his decision; but the law does require of persons so situated the utmost diligence and good faith, and the testimony offered in behalf of the plaintiff tends rather to show inefficiency and negligence on his part, instead of fair and honest performance of duty.

I. Introduction.

This note is meant to cover only those cases in which the right to sell property cordance with the terms of a power of sale contained in his mortgage, and, subsequently to such advertisement, but prior to the sale, an execution held by a third party against the mortgagor is levied upon the mortgaged property, and the same is seized in pursuance of such levy, and while so held is sold by the mortgagee under his power of sale,—Held, that a sale of such property by the mortgagee under the power, while the same was in the custody of the sheriff by virtue of such levy, is void, and ineffectual to pass title to the purchaser.

(February 5, 1902.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Pulaski County to review a judgment sustaining the claim of defendant in error to property upon which plaintiff had levied an execution to satisfy a debt of G. R. Allison. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. L. Grice & Sons, for plaintiff in error:

The property, when sold and purchased by the claimant, was in the hands of the sheriff under two different levies, and hence there could be no valid sale by the mortgagee under the power in his mortgage.

Brown v. Warren, 57 Ga. 214; Crocker, Sheriffs, §§ 449, 472; 1 Hilliard, Mortg. p. 119; Penland v. Leatherwood, 101 N. C. 509, 9 Am. St. Rep. 38, 8 S. E. 234.

in custody of the law was asserted by persons not acting under authority of process or order of court. The question has not been up many times, probably because the chance of selling without notice of the custody is slight, and because purchasers of that sort of property are few, if they know what they are getting.

What effect the taking of property into the custody of law has upon the title, and the rights of the owner to dispose of it, has been the subject of some discussion in the courts in cases where the question of sale was not actually involved.

These dicta are conflicting, but the opinions in the more recent cases are on the side of the debtor's right to deal with his property as if nothing had happened; holding that a special property is in the sheriff, and that the general property is left in the debtor, who may convey it, subject to rights acquired by virtue of the custody of the law.

The weight of authority in cases where the question of sale was directly before the court is to the same effect; but in no case has it been held that a sale of property in custody of law by the owner is good as against such custody.

Where personal property is in actual custody of the law, the general owner cannot, of course, deliver it to a buyer; but this does not seem to make any difference, as the courts hold a symbolical delivery sufficient.

II. Title of property in custody of law.

a. Obiter dicta opinions in respect to.

The dicta in some of the early cases will shed light on the subject, and account in part for the conflict in later decisions.

In Wilbraham v. Snow, 1 Vent. 53, 1 Lev. 282, the question was whether trover could be brought by the sheriff against the execution defendant, who took the goods seized away from the officer. It was urged that trespass should have been brought, and not trover, as trover could not be maintained, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

because the title was in the debtor. The court held the action maintainable, and said defendant's property ceased by the seizure.

This case was cited in 3 Salk. 159, as authority for the proposition that the property of the first owner ceases upon seizure of his goods on execution.

Property seized on execution is out of the defendant, and in abeyance, said the court in Clerk v. Withers, 6 Mod. 293, 1 Salk. 323. To the same effect is Mountney v. Andrews, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 237.

In Ladd v. North, 2 Mass. 517, it was said by the court, that, upon seizure on execution, the special property was in the sheriff, and the general property in abeyance.

In Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. 52, 14 L. ed. 322, it was said that while an estate is in the custody of the court as a fund to abide the result of a suit pending, no sale of the property can take place either on execution or otherwise, without leave of the court for that purpose.

And in Ladd v. Blunt, 4 Mass. 403, Parsons, Ch. J., said that when goods sufficient to satisfy the judgment were seized on a feri facias, the debtor was discharged even if the sheriff wasted the goods or misapplied the money arising from the sale, or did not return his execution; for, he said, by a lawful seizure, the debtor had lost his property in the goods; but he declared that the law was different in a case of an extent on lands. This statement was referred to with approval in Chandler v. Furbish, 8 Me. 408.

But in Tuttle v. Gates, 24 Me. 395, it was said that the remark in the opinion of Parsons, Ch. J., that the debtor lost his property in the goods by their seizure by the sheriff, might be considered to be incorrect according to the case of Giles v. Grover, 6 Bligh, N. R. 279.

In the latter case Patteson, J., said that the property vested in the sheriff upon seizure of goods was merely that which resulted from his being the appointed officer of the law, and to enable him to sell the goods and raise the money; not that Messrs. J. H. Martin and Jordan & Watson also for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Eldridge Cutts, for defendant in error:

This court has repeatedly recognized the validity of powers of sale contained in mortgages and of sales thereunder when had "according to its terms, fairly and honestly pursued."

Robenson v. Vason, 37 Ga. 66; Calloway v. People's Bank, 54 Ga. 441; Palmer v. Young, 96 Ga. 246, 51 Am. St. Rep. 136, 22 S. E. 928.

A creditor who obtains his judgment subsequent to the execution of such a mortgage takes it subject to the mortgage and subject to the exercise of the power of sale.

sequent to the execution of such a mortgage takes it subject to the mortgage and subject to the exercise of the power of sale.

Mutual Loan & Bkg. Co. v. Haas, 100 Ga. 111, 62 Am. St. Rep. 317, 27 S. E. 980.

Where the power is conferred and the terms are not prescribed in the mortgage, the mortgagee may fix the time, place, and terms of sale.

Calloway v. People's Bank, supra.

A mortgagee may purchase at such a sale when so provided in the mortgage.

Mutual Loan & Bkg. Co. v. Haas, supra; Standback v. Thornton, 106 Ga. 81, 31 S. E. 805.

If a mortgagee sells fairly and openly at time and place fixed, it cannot be objected the property was thereby taken out of the debtor. He said that the goods were, in substance, in custodia legis. Seizure made by the officer of the law was for the benefit of those who were, by the law, entitled: that it was made against the will of the debtor, and that no property was transferred by any act of his to the sheriff. In this respect it differed from all cases of special property and all charges on goods created by the debtor, while he had absolute dominion over the goods.

And Lord Harwicke stated in 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 381, that neither before the statute of frauds nor since was the property of goods altered by mere seizure, but continued in the defendant until execution was executed.

In Samuel v. Duke, 3 Mees. & W. 622, it was urged that no valid transfer or sale of a debtor's property could be made after a delivery of a writ of execution to the sheriff against the debtor. But the court held that the debtor had the right to sell his property subject to the obligations which attached upon it as regarded any other person, and that the property passed to the buyer notwithstanding the delivery of the writ to the sheriff. Parke, B., said that, subject to the execution, the debtor had the right to deal with his property as he pleased, and that if he transferred it in market overt, the right of the sheriff ceased altogether. This case was decided under the English statute providing that the debtor's property shall be bound from the delivery of the writ to the sheriff.

And in Harrison v. Wilson, 2 A. K. Marsh. 551, it was held that personal property subject to execution may be sold by the debtor and the title transferred subject to the lien of the execution.

In Towar v. Barrington, Brightly (Pa.) 253, it was said that property of a judgment debtor after levy was not wholly divested, but remained in him, subject to the levy, and at his disposal, burdened with the encumbrance.

In Banker v. Caldwell, 3 Minn. 94, Gil. 46, the court, in holding that the sheriff could not make a copy of the book he had levied on, said that in the interval between the levy and sale a debtor was not divested of his ownership in the property, but the incident of title—the right to possess, use, and dispose of it—was suspended only, and that he might regain it at any moment by paying the debt.

The owner of personal property may, after it has been taken on attachment or execution, sell it subject to the attachment, so that, if the attachment turns out to be bad, the buyer will not be affected by it. Warner v. Everett, 7 B. Mon. 262.

To the same effect are, Starr v. Moore, 3 McLean, 354, Fed. Cas. No. 13,315; Churchill v. Warren, 2 N. H. 298, 9 Am. Dec. 73; Folsom v. Chesley, 2 N. H. 432; Rice v. Tower, 1 Gray, 426; Pierce v. Kingsmill, 25 Barb. 631.

b. Effect of custody upon right to alienate personal property.

As to the sale of personal property in custody of law, the weight of authority, as before stated, upholds the right of the owner to transfer it as if it had never been taken from him, and to pass title, subject to the encumbrance arising through lien and custody. He cannot, of course, make an actual delivery of the thing sold, because it is in the hands of the law; but in such a case symbolical delivery will do, and the title goes to the buyer, subject to the custody. If the lien springing from the custody is satisfied, the buyer's title becomes perfect. This rule is of much importance to owners of property taken under process, and is vital where the rights of private-sale purchasers and later attachment or execution creditors are in dispute.

In Fuller v. Loring, 42 Me. 481, the court said the doctrine that the property of a debtor in goods was changed and lost by the mere seizure on execution rested mainly upon incidental dicta of judges, that might be gathered from books, and not upon settled opinions of courts, where the point had been directly raised and considered, and that the notions that the property was altered from the owner, and given to the party that he might have obtained a greater price by waiting.

2 Jones, Mortg. § 1875.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certain personal property, to wit, a horse, ten mules, wagons, harness, etc., was, on December 8, 1900, levied on by the sheriff of Pulaski county, as the property of G. R. Allison, to satisfy an execution in favor of Fulghum, administrator. J. P. Williams Company filed a claim to the property, and, issue having been joined, evidence to the following effect was introduced: On the 30th of November, 1897, J. R. Allison & Co., J. R. Allison, and H. B. Moore executed a mortgage on the property levied on, in favor of

J. P. Williams Company to secure a number of promissory notes given by the mortgagors to the mortgagee. This mortgage contained a power giving to the mortgagee the right, in case of default in the payments of any of the notes named in the mortgage, to sell the property described, at the courthouse door in Hawkinsville, after posting a notice of sale for ten days at the courthouse door. The mortgage also recited that the mortgagee should be allowed to bid at the sale, and to purchase any or all of the property, if the same should be sold. The proceeds were directed to be applied to the indebtedness of Allison & Co., and the surplus, if any, to be turned over to them. It was also stipulated that the sale of the property, under the power in the mortgage, might take at whose suit it was seized, and that the general property, after seizure on execution, was in abeyance, were derived in the same way. The law, said the court, was manifestly otherwise; for, by the seizure of goods on execution, the officer acquired a special property in them, but the general property remained in the debtor until they were sold.

In Atwood v. Pierson, 9 Ala. 656, it was held that after a levy the debtor might transfer or sell the property, subject to the levy. It was urged that title could not be passed to personalty held adversely, because delivery was requisite, and that nothing passed without it. The court said the question presented was entirely novel, but was one of such important bearings in many respects that it deserved to be most carefully considered. It might be conceded that, when property was attached or seized under execution, it was at once within the custody of the law; but did it also follow that the rights of the true owner were so entirely divested as to render any contract invalid to pass the title to another? "It may be as well to examine the principle asserted in the first instance in connection with the debtor whose estate is thus seized," continued the court. "The right which the sheriff or other officer acquires gives a special property only, and this for the sole purpose of enabling him to perform the duty which the law enjoins. But the general property, as well as the title, remains in the debtor, clogged, it is true, with the lien created by the levy; and so it would be in like manner if, instead of actual seizure, the execution was in the sheriff's hands. It cannot be said, therefore, that the seizure creates an adverse title to the debtor, for the general property remains with him, capable of disposition in any way which does not impair the lien."

In Ware v. Russell, 70 Ala. 174, 45 Am. Rep. 82, it was said that the right or title to personal property was not changed by the levy of any attachment or execution, that the general property continued in the debtor, who might alienate it, subject only to the lien of the process. It was held that 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the debtor could not, by agreement with the plaintiff in attachment after the sale of the attached property, consent to allow judgment to be entered against him so as to impair an assignment of his property to a third person, made after the attachment; nor could he waive defects or irregularities in the process to the harm of his assignee.

In Brown v. Loesch, 3 Ind. App. 145, 29 N. E. 450, it appeared that a sheriff, armed with an execution, seized certain personal property, which he left in charge of a watchman. When part of the execution had been paid off, the watchman was let go, and the property left in the custody of the execution defendant. It was then sold, and, after the sale, was levied on under an attachment placed in the hands of the sheriff by another creditor. The purchaser from the execution defendant, without satisfying the first execution, then attempted to replevy the property, but failed. The court held that the absolute title or general property in goods levied on by virtue of an execution remained in the owner, who might sell them while so in the custody of the sheriff, such sale being subject to the lien of the creditor,—the execution plaintiff,—and subject to the officer's special title and right to keep them for the purposes of the writ.

In Nichols v. Patten, 18 Me. 231, 36 Am. Dec. 713, the court said that an attachment did not take away the debtor's right to convey his property subject to it, and that any merely formal act of delivery which did not resist or deprive the officer of the actual control of it was no violation of the latter's rights, and would not subject the purchaser to an action by the officer. It did not occasion any injury or deprive the officer of any right.

In Denny v. Willard, 11 Pick. 519, 22 Am. Dec. 389, an officer who had attached certain personal property delivered it to a receiver, who turned it over to the debtor, by whom it was then assigned. It was urged that the property was in the possession, actual or constructive, of the officer, and that it could not, therefore, have been legally assigned, inasmuch as the debtor had no such possession as would enable him to make a place and be legal without carrying the property to the place of sale. It was shown that there was a default in the payment of the notes and on November 27, 1900, the mortgagee, through his attorney, posted a notice of sale, to take place December 8, 1900, in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, and the property was, on that day, sold in pursuance of that notice, and purchased by the claimant. It further appears that prior to this sale the sheriff of Pulaski county levied the fi. fa. of the plaintiff in error upon this property, and took the same into his possession, the levy having been made on the morning of the day that the sale was made by the mortgagee, and before such sale. Several months prior to the sale, still another execution had been levied on the same property, which was arrested by an affidavit of illegality, which was pending at the time the sale was made. It was further shown in behalf of plaintiff in fi. fa. that the property was in possession of one of the defendants after the judgment on which his execution issued had been obtained. The sale by the mortgagee was regular in all respects and in accordance with the power contained in the mortgage. Under this evidence the court directed a verdict finding the property not subject, which was accordingly returned by the jury. Plaintiff in fi. fa. moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and he accepted. It was claimed in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in directing a verdict for claimant, and that the verdict delivery to the assignee. The court upheld the assignment, stating that the possession of the property remaining in or being restored to the debtor, he could make delivery in fact to any purchaser; that the possession having been given up by the officer or his servant to the debtor, the real owner, the latter might lawfully sell the property, whether it remained bound by the attachment or not. The general property, the court said, would pass, subject to the lien of the officer, but absolute as to all others.

In Whipple v. Thayer, 16 Pick. 25, 26 Am. Dec. 626, after certain cotton had been taken in execution, the debtor made a general assignment, after which a second attachment levy was made on the goods by the officer having custody of them. The assignee, who paid off the first attachment, brought replevin for the cotton and got it. The point was made that the assignment was bad because the goods could not be delivered while in the hands of the officer; but the court held that the delivery of the instrument of assignment was a sufficient delivery of the goods.

In Fettyplace v. Dutch, 13 Pick. 388, 23 Am. Dec. 688, certain property of a wood wharfinger, taken by an officer on attachment, was left on the wharf, in charge of a watchman. It was then assigned by the debtor, subject to the attachment, the delivery being made by putting a stick of wood in the hands of the assignee. After the assignment, other attachments were levied upon the property. It was held that the title passed by the assignment, so that, upon the discharge of the first attachment, the assignee took the property in preference to the other attachment creditors. The court held that an attachment constituted a lien, and that, as the general property remained in the owner, subject to such lien, if the general owner could, without a trespass, make actual delivery of the property, subject to the lien created by the attachment, a sale with such delivery was lawful, and would vest the property in the vendee, subject to such attachment, so as to give the vendee a prior title to that of a subsequent attaching creditor.

In Arnold v. Brown, 24 Pick. 89, 35 Am. Dec. 296, it appeared that after certain goods had been attached they were sold to the attaching officer, subject to the attachment. Upon the dissolution of the attachment, the officer, as buyer, was held entitled to the goods as against a creditor levying on them by virtue of a later attachment. The court said that an attachment constituted a mere lien upon the property, and that the general owner might as well sell subject to that lien as any other. The effect of the sale would be to pass the general property, encumbered by the attachment. If that were extinguished by the settlement, or the failure of the suit, or the neglect to levy the execution within the period fixed by law, the sale of the property would become absolute, and the purchaser would hold it free from the encumbrance. If a part of it were taken to satisfy the judgment, he would hold the remainder; but, if the whole were needed on the execution, he would acquire nothing by his purchase. These principles applied both to real and personal property.

In Appleton v. Bancroft, 10 Met. 231, in which the right to mortgage attached property was up, the court said that it had been repeatedly decided, and that the point could not then be called in question in that commonwealth, that property under attachment might be sold by the general owner, and a good title given to the purchaser, subject only to the lien created by the attachment. Perhaps, said the court, upon considerations of policy, it might better have been decided otherwise, but it was too late to question it; that it was founded on the great principle lying at the foundation of the right of property,—that general ownership carries with it a full power of disposition, and that when such ownership is not taken away, but only limited, as in the case of a lien, the power of disposing still remains, subject only to the lien. The same decisions which showed this right proved that it could be fully carried into effect without an actual delivery, that is, a change of cusso rendered was contrary to the evidence. An exception was also taken to the exclusion of certain evidence, which, under the view we take of the law governing the case, it is not necessary to consider.

The claimant rested his title to the property on his purchase at the sale under the power contained in the mortgage; and the naked question is presented, whether, under such a sale and purchase, the claimant derived a valid title to the property. We think not. While freely admitting that, under the proper exercise of a power of sale given in a mortgage, the title of the mortgagor is divested, and passes into the purchaser, there is one reason why the sale in the present instance did not have this effect under the circumstances which are shown to have existed at the time it took place. The effect of the mortgage was simply to create a lien on the property mentioned therein, in favor of the claimants, to secure the payment of their debt. It conveyed no title. Under an ordinary mortgage, a valid sale of the mortgaged property could only have been had by a foreclosure in the methods pointed out by law, and a sale under the levy of the execution issued thereon. The power given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee to sell the property mortgaged, in case of default by the former, is but a substitution by agreement of such method in lieu of the ordinary sale under foreclosure (Mutual Loan & Bkg. Co. v. Haas, 100 Ga. 111, 62 Am. St. Rep. 317, 27 S. E. 980), and we cannot imagine how a tody, because the custody of such property was always in the attaching officer to preserve the lien, and constructive delivery was sufficient.

In Bates v. Moore, 2 Bail. L. 614, it was held that a debtor might sell property levied on, subject to execution. In this case the agreement was that the purchaser should buy the property at sheriff's sale, and pay a certain price in cash, and a further specified sum in one year, without reference to the price at which the property was bid off by him at the sale. The court held this contract of sale a good one as between the parties.

In Alexander v. Springs, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 475, it was said by the court to be very clear that a fieri facias, although it created a lien on property which prevented the owner from selling it unless subject to the lien, yet it did not divest the property out of the debtor until seizure, and that even after a seizure the sheriff gained but a special property, such as was necessary for the satisfaction of the debt, and which left in the original owner the general property, an interest he might sell and convey at law.

In Popelston v. Skinner, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 293, it was held that personal property levied on could be sold by the debtor. In this case a slave which had been seized under execution was left with the debtor; but the court said it would have made no difference if it had been otherwise; if the property had been taken and kept by the sheriff personally, said the court, the right of the defendant in execution would not have been absolutely divested, but an interest would have been left in him, capable of being sold and legally conveyed. The court said that the interest of the sheriff was limited for the purpose for which it was created, which was the creditor's satisfaction. Beyond that the sheriff held for the original owner, whose interest was therefore obviously a valuable present property, the subject of sale and conveyance, but liable in the hands of the assignee, as it was in those of the assignor, to be defeated by a sale of the chattels for the debt, where not otherwise discharged.

In Dixon v. Barnett, 3 Wash. 645, 29 Pac. 209, it appeared that, after certain personal property had been taken under an attachment, it was sold by the debtor, who gave the buyer a bill of sale, which was placed on record. Afterwards other attachments were levied upon it while in the hands of the sheriff. The purchaser, it was held, took the property against creditors under later attachments, although he gave no notice of his claim until after the levy of the second writ. The court said that a seizure of property under a writ of attachment did not divest the owner of his title; that it only created a lien; that the attachment debtor could sell the property, subject to the lien, and that, upon the discharge of the attachment, the title became absolute.

But the mere custodian of property seized under attachment, if he sells it, can convey no title. Jetton v. Tobey, 62 Ark. 84, 34 S. W. 531. In this case a special constable, who took the property under attachment, delivered it to the creditor, without authority, in settlement of his debt. The creditor sold it to a third person, who had no notice of the equities. The court held that the purchaser got no title.

A case which seems to be out of line is Meux v. Anthony, 11 Ark. 411, 52 Am. Dec. 274, in which it was held that the sale of slaves in the hands of a receiver, pending foreclosure of a mortgage upon them, was absolutely void. The court said that this was a purchase made while the property was in suit and actually in the custody of the law. Under these circumstances the doctrine applicable to purchases pendente lite applied; that under it there could be no doubt that the purchaser took nothing by his contract, not even in a case where he paid whole value and had no actual notice of the pendency of a suit.

And in Steffin v. Steffin, 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 179, the court saw no force in the theory that the execution debtor should be restrained from selling or encumbering personal property which had been levied on, as after levy on it by the sheriff, the court held, the debtor could transfer no title to it, even to a bona fide purchaser for value resale had under a power given in the mortgage is entitled to any more consideration, or has attached to it incidents of a higher dignity, than those which attach to a sale under foreclosure. As to the relative rights of third persons, we think they stand on the same footing. The evidence does not show that at the time the sale under the power took place the property had been delivered to the mortgagee. On the contrary, it shows that at the time of such sale the mortgage was not in possession of the property, but that the same was in the possession of the sheriff, who seized it under the levy made under plaintiff's execution. This court has more than once ruled that it was necessary for the full execution of the power of sale contained in a mortgage that the mortgaged (personal) property should be in the possession of the mortgagee, so that he may fully effectuate the purposes of the sale by delivering possession to the purchaser. Here the property at the time of the attempted sale was in the possession of an officer of the court, who had seized it to satisfy by execution sale a valid judgment having a lien thereon. It was therefore in custodia legis, and, under the rule which obtains in such cases, the possession of the property by the sheriff who levied on it could not be disturbed by the levy of another process; and, had the mortgagee in this case foreclosed his mortgage and placed it in the hands of the sheriff, possession of the property would have remained in that officer by virtue of the first levy. Mr. Free-ceived, without notice. This statement was based on the authority of Butler v. Maynard, 11 Wend. 548, 27 Am. Dec. 100. But the latter case does not seem to bear out the broad proposition laid down by the court. It simply holds that the sale by the debtor of property levied on is not good as against the levy; that any levy which would justify a sale under it would operate to defeat a later purchase, though bona fide and for a valuable consideration.

A buyer from the owner does not obtain any right as against the custody of the law. In McConnell v. Kaufman, 5 Wash. 686, 32 Pac. 782, after a debtor's personal property under attachment had been taken by the sheriff, it was sold by the debtor to another creditor, who notified the sheriff of the transfer, and called upon him to set aside enough goods to satisfy his attachment, and release the rest. This he would not do, and several subsequent attachments were levied against the goods in his hands. The court then ordered the property sold on motion of one of the subsequent attaching creditors, joined in by the first attachment creditor. The purchaser from the debtor afterwards brought an action against the buyer at the sheriff's sale for the conversion of the goods claimed by him, but failed. The court said that a purchaser from the debtor bought with notice that the court was liable, in the ordinary course of proceedings, to make an order for the sale of the goods; that it could not be admitted for a moment that a debtor might defeat the power of the court to make the order by transferring his title to the property attached after a writ had been levied. If there were any irregularities in connection with the sale, it was the sheriff who was responsible, and not the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. In this case the court conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the judgment debtor might make a valid sale of property under attachment in the hands of the officer, so as to vest title in the purchaser, subject to existing attachment liens, and so as to cut off subsequent creditors' rights.

In Bevis v. Landis, 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 312, 82 Am. Dec. 418, it was held that one who had bought from the owner property which had been seized under execution could not, by giving notice at the execution sale, force the sheriff to sell other property of the debtor first, to satisfy his execution. The rule contended for, the court said, was of first impression. No case or dictum had been cited to support it, and the court was unable to see any principle upon which such an equity could be based. Such a purchaser was an intermeddling stranger, who had no business to buy any part of the debtor's property without taking care to see that the prior lien was satisfied.

In Bilby v. Hartman, 29 Mo. App. 125, the owner of standing corn, after it had been levied on, sold it to another creditor to apply on an indebtedness. The buyer then brought replevin, but failed; the court, among other reasons for its decision, stating that after seizure under the writ, the corn was in custody of the law, and that, in general, when things were in custody of the law, they could not be interfered with by a private person or by another officer, acting under the authority of a different court or jurisdiction.

Property in possession of receivers is, of course, in custody of law, but it is also in custody of the court, and any special rules applicable to receiverships are probably due to that fact. It might be a contempt of court to sell property in the hands of a receiver without leave, but whether such a sale, if made, would be void, is another question. No cases have been found on this point, except Meux v. Anthony, 11 Ark. 411, 52 Am. Dec. 274, supra.

In Moore v. Potter, 155 N. Y. 481, 63 Am. St. Rep. 692, 50 N. E. 271, it was held that, where a receiver refused to take goods under a contract of sale, the vendor could resell them without disturbing the possession of the receiver. It was urged that the seller could not sell the property without leave of the court, and thereby acquire any rights as against the receiver; but the court held that the receiver had no possession or man, in the second volume of his work on Executions (§ 268), in treating of the effect of a levy upon property, says, on authority: "The lien of an execution gives the officer intrusted with its service no general or special property in the defendant's goods. . . . But the moment that a levy is made the rights and remedies of the officer are materially changed; or, more accurately speaking, he, from that moment, is vested with rights and entitled to remedies to which he could before urge no valid claim. . . . The officer is entitled to retain such possession and control of the property as may be necessary to make it productive under the writ. The law, therefore, concedes to him as to a bailee a special property in the goods in his custody. . . . As against strangers to the title, the special property continues until the officer can redeliver the property to the defendant." The same author, in the same section, also says that another consequence of taking property under an execution is that it is put in custody of the law, and cannot be levied upon by any officer, nor can it be replevied from the officer in whose charge it is by the defendant, nor by anyone claiming title under him subsequently to the levy. For this proposition he cites Burket v. Boude, 3 Dana, 213; Rives v. Wilborne, 6 Ala. 45; Kemp v. Porter, 7 Ala. 138; Langdon v. Brumby, 7 Ala. 53; Hartwell v. Bissell, 17 Johns. 128; Bilby v. Hartman, 29 Mo. App. 125, and other cases. The title upon which the claimant stood in the present case being derived from the defendant by virtue of the sale under the power given in the mortgage after levy of the execution by the sheriff, if the proposition laid down by Mr. Freeman be true, the claimant relying on such title could not have recovered the property levied on from the sheriff. It has frequently been ruled that money or property in the hands of an officer who has collected it under legal process is not the subject of attachment or of a levy, because it is in custodia legis. Hardy v. Tilton, 68 Me. 195, 28 Am. Rep. 34; Turner v. Fendall, 1 Cranch, 117, 2 L. ed. 53. In Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. 52, 14 L. ed. 322, it was ruled that money in the hands of a receiver, being in custodia legis, is exempt from execution or attachment. Also, see Field v.

right of possession, and no title to the property in question, but only had the right to receive the property purchased upon paying the agreed price, and that no right of possession in the receiver had been disturbed.

In Re Styer, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 205, 98 Fed. 290, it was said that a referee in bankruptcy, although having power to order a sale of the bankrupt's property, could not order it sold if in the hands of a receiver.

c. Effect as to real estate.

It is not intended to make this note exhaustive on the question of the right to sell real estate under levy. A few illustrative cases are taken, because the principle seems to be the same,—the question of inability to make actual delivery in the case of personal property in custody of law, as has been seen, not affecting the right of the owner to sell it.

The question which was up in FULGHUM v. J. P. WILLIAMS Co. could not arise in all jurisdictions. The subject is largely regulated by statutes which provide for recording chattel mortgages and protection of rights of mortgagees from subsequent liens. If the mortgagor is considered to have a mere equitable interest, this cannot be taken or sold on execution unless permitted by statute. But where there is nothing to prevent mortgaged property from being taken into custody of law under later executions, such a question as that presented in FULGHUM v. WILLIAMS Co. might arise.

Nearly the same question was raised in Mutual Loan & Bkg. Co. v. Haas, 100 Ga. 111, 62 Am. St. Rep. 317, 27 S. E. 980, in which it was held that land might be sold 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under a power of sale in a mortgage after the property had been levied on under an execution on a judgment younger than the mortgage. It was contended on the part of the judgment creditor that the mortgagee, not having the legal title, and being merely an agent of the mortgagor in the sale of the land, a purchaser at the sale would take the land subject to the lien of the judgments against the mortgagor, existing at the time of the sale, just as he would if the land were sold by the mortgagor himself. The court, however, held that the power of sale was part of the security itself, and could not be cut off by seizure of the property under the execution. The court said that if a subsequent creditor could effect a revocation of the power by obtaining judgments against the mortgagor, the mortgagor himself could, at any time before the exercise of the power, effect a revocation by contracting the indebtedness to others, and permitting or procuring judgments to be taken against him; so that at last the right of the mortgagee to avail himself of the power which he had contracted for as a part of his security would be dependent on the will of the mortgagor.

And in Bancroft v. Ashhurst, 2 Grant. Cas. 520, it was stated that to permit a mortgagor of land to prevent the exercise of a power of sale by subsequent grants, or to allow his creditors to defeat it by subsequent judgments, would be, in substance, a revocation of the power, and would render the security worthless so far as its value depended on the power.

There would seem to be no reason why, if the reasoning in the last two cases is sound, the rule they lay down would not

Jones, 11 Ga. 413. The rule also embraces money in hands of certain trustees when appointed by the court (Bentley v. Shrieve, 4 Md. Ch. 412); and assignees in bankruptcy (Jones v. Gorham, 2 Mass. 375); and sheriffs (Wilder v. Bailey, 3 Mass. 289). It was ruled in Hackley v. Swigert, 5 B. Mon. 86, 41 Am. Dec. 258, that property in the custody of the law cannot be levied on, seized, or sold under execution. In Wiswall v. Sampson, supra, Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, said (on page 68, 14 How., on page 329, 14 L. ed.) "that while the estate is in the custody of the court, as a fund to abide the result of a suit pending, no sale of the property can take place, either on execution or otherwise, without the leave of the court for that purpose." In the case of Covell v. Heyman, 111 U. S. 176, 28 L. ed. 390, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355, it was ruled that, "the principle that whenever property has been seized by an officer of the court, by virtue of its process, the property is to be considered as in the custody of the court, and under its control for the time being, applies both to a taking under a writ of attachment on mesne process and to a taking under a writ of execution." Mr. Justice Matthews, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, said "that when property is taken and held under process, mesne or final, of a court of the United States, it is in the custody of the law, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the court from which the process has issued, for the purpose of the writ; that the possession of the officer cannot be disturbed by process from any state court, because to disturb that possession would be to invade the jurisdiction of the court by whose command it is held, and to violate the law which that jurisdiction is appointed to administer; that any person not a party to the suit or judgment, whose property has been wrongfully, but under color of process, taken and withheld, may prosecute, by ancillary proceedings, in the court whence the process issued, his remedy for restitution of the property or its proceeds, while remaining in the control of that court; but that all other remedies to which he may be entitled, against officers or parties, not involving the withdrawal of the property or its proceeds from the custody of the officer and the jurisdicapply with equal force to a sale under a power in a chattel mortgage.

On the general question, the court, in Addison v. Crow, 5 Dana, 271, in holding that the lien of an execution on land did not defeat the debtor of his title, nor deprive him of the power of passing it by sale to another, subject to be overreached and defeated by subsequent valid proceedings under the execution, said: "The sole purpose of the law in declaring a lien in favor of executions is to secure the object of the execution against the effect of any subsequent alienation of the land by the debtor. To do this, it holds the land subject to all regular proceedings under the execution, and ultimately to sale and conveyance, notwithstanding any such alienation. This is, in fact, the essence and extent of the lien. It is not necessary, for the effectuation or security of its objects, to say that it actually disables the debtor from alienating his land, and renders such alienation absolutely and to all purposes void. It is sufficient that such alienation is wholly inoperative as against the lien, and forms no obstruction to the regular proceedings under the execution, and that it will therefore be wholly defeated by a valid sale and conveyance."

But the sale cannot be good as against a valid levy. In Ozmore v. Hood, 53 Ga. 118, it was held that the sale of land, after the levy of an attachment upon it, was not good. The court said: "However fair the sale may be, though it be for cash and with the most innocent intentions, it cannot be that a sale of property by the defendant, after the levy of an attachment upon it, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) can be good against the levy. The property is in the hands of the law, and an attachment on land would be utterly valueless if this were the law. The attachment and the levy is in the nature of lis pendens; the officer, by his levy, has impounded the property; and whatever right the defendant has must await the disposal of the court." The sale in this case was made by the attachment defendant.

And in the course of a dissenting opinion in Tilton v. Cofield, 2 Colo. 406, as to the effect of increasing the attachment creditor's demand after sale of the attached property, Belford, J., said: "He who buys property while it is in the custody of the law, and subject to a decree or judgment that may be made or entertained by a court in the enforcement of a specific lien, is not a favored purchaser, nor is he entitled to the most benignant consideration of a court of equity. Anciently, such purchases were regarded as void; but this harsh doctrine has yielded to the softening influences of time, and the later decisions, instead of holding that a conveyance is annulled by the pendency of an action, simply affirm that the property purchased shall be held subject to the rights of the parties in litigation." The majority of the court held that the buyer took subject to the lien of the creditor for the sum stated in the affidavit or writ; but that by adding to his demand, the attachment creditor lost his preference, so that the buyer's title became absolute. This case was reversed in 93 U. S. 163, 23 L. ed. 858, which sustained the view taken in the dissenting opinion in the Colorado case.

tion of the court, he may pursue in any tribunal, state or Federal, having jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter." See also Conner v. Long, 104 U. S. 228, 20 L. ed. 723. The principle which we rule as being applicable to the facts of this case under the above authorities is that, when the sheriff of Pulaski county, in obedience to the process, seized the property in question, no valid sale thereof could afterwards, while the property was in the possession of the court under such seizure, be made, under execution or otherwise, unless by leave or order of the court. And inasmuch as the sale under which the claimant derived his title in this case was made after seizure, and while the property was in the possession of the court by its officer, the purchaser took no title. It is not, of course, to be understood that the mortgagee, if he had a prior or superior lien to that of the judgment on which the execution issued, has not the right to enforce his lien, either against the property itself or the proceeds of the same under execution, and in the manner pointed out by our statute. The fact that the mortgage contained a power of sale does not render the exercise of that power the only method of enforcing the lien. McGuire v. Barker, 61 Ga. 339. Therefore no substantial right of the mortgagee is denied by the ruling which is made. When a court having jurisdiction has, by proper process, taken property into its custody for the purpose of satisfying a judgment against the defendant in fi. fa., while any person having a lien on such property or interested in the proceeds thereof may rightfully come into the court having possession of the property and assert his rights, yet he cannot disturb that possession, nor assert as to such property a title which he has acquired subsequent to the seizure. We are not now dealing with the lien which the claimant had to the property by virtue of his mortgage, but only with the title which he insists he has by virtue of the sale made by the mortgagee after the levy. We think he took nothing by that sale, and that the trial judge erred in directing a verdict in his favor.

Judgment reversed.

GRAND LODGE ANCIENT ORDER UNITED WORKMEN OF THE STATE OF KANSAS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JANE HADDOCK.

(.... Kan.)

1. Benefit insurance — by-law excluding liquor dealers.

The adoption, by a fraternal insurance or 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

der, of a by-law declaring that no person shall be admitted or retained as a member who is engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors, does not, in the absence of a specific provision to that effect, avoid the beneficiary certificate of a member who is already engaged in that business in a state where it is not unlawful, who continues therein, and against whom no action is taken.

2. Same—suspension of member.

A by-law of such an order, which provides that any member who shall, after the date of its adoption, have entered, or who shall thereafter enter, into the business of selling intoxicating liquors, shall stand suspended from his rights to participate in the beneficiary fund; and that his certificate shall become void from the date of his so engaging in such occupation,—does not in terms apply to the case of a member who, prior to that time, was engaged in such business, and who remains in it continuously thereafter.

ERROR to the District Court for Wyandotte County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a mutual benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Farrelly & Evans and J. B. Tomlinson, for plaintiff in error:

Where members agree to obey and conform to subsequently enacted by-laws, as well as laws existing at the time, or the by-laws themselves contain provision for their alteration, a change regularly made, and not unfair in itself, will be binding, although it may seem to impair vested rights.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of the State of Kansas, an insurance association, prosecutes error from a judgment rendered against it in favor of Jane Haddock upon a beneficiary certificate issued to her husband, John Haddock. The judgment must be affirmed, unless the certificate was avoided under the rules of the order by the fact that John Haddock was a saloon keeper. He became a member of the Workmen in 1880, being Case Note.—The weight of authority holds the view that all matters relating to the conduct of members of a mutual benefit or fraternal insurance society, and laws passed after the issue of the benefit certificate, will be valid and binding on a member, providing no new condition is injected into the contract, which will materially change or affect it, and to which he does not consent. Northwestern Benev. & Mut. Aid Asso. v. Wanner, 24 Ill. App. 357; Fullenwider v. Supreme Council, R. L. 180 Ill. 621, 72 Am. St. Rep. 239, 54 N. E. 485; Langan v. Knights of Pythias, 48 La. Ann. 1203, 55 Am. St. Rep. 310, 20 So. 712.

The same doctrine is laid down in 1 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, pp. 715, 719, and in 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 188a.

By-laws of fraternal insurance associations will not be given a retroactive effect, so as to change the standing of those who became members before their adoption, in the absence of a clearly expressed intention to the contrary. Sovereign Camp W. of W. v. Thornton, 115 Ga. 798, 42 S. E. 236; Wist v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 22 Or. 271, 29 Am. St. Rep. 603, 29 Pac. 610; Carnes v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306, 76 N. W. 683; Pittinger v. Pittinger, 28 Colo. 308, 89 Am. St. Rep. 193, 64 Pac. 195.

It will be presumed that an amendment to the by-laws of a mutual benefit association was not intended to affect a contract previously issued. Modern Woodmen v. Wieland, 109 Ill. App. 340. In this case, when membership in the fraternity was acquired, the applicant was a stationary engineer, and a by-law was then in force which declared that manufacturers of liquor, saloon keepers, bartenders, etc., should not be admitted. Subsequent by-laws were enacted which increased the number of prohibitory occupations, but in each by-law it was expressly stated that it should not be construed so as to invalidate certificates issued prior to a certain date, which was after such 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) membership was acquired. After the adoption of such by-laws the member changed his occupation to that of keeping a saloon, and, subsequent to this change in occupation, a by-law was adopted which provided that "if, after a person has become a member of this fraternity, he engages in any of the employments herein enumerated [that of saloon keeper being included] his benefit certificate shall be forfeited by such act, and the same shall be null and void." This by-law omitted the proviso that it should not be construed as invalidating certificates issued prior to the aforesaid certain date. The court, in construing this by-law as applying only to those who enter the business of saloon keeper after its adoption, said that, as the member entered upon the business of saloon keeping when the by-laws permitted him to do so, and, as the order so adjusted its by-laws that he could and did continue to be a member for several years, it could not thereafter deprive him at once of his certificate and of the benefits of all payments he had made, and practically confiscate that which was to him a property right, as such a by-law would be destructive of the liability the society had assumed, and would be unreasonable.

But in Ellerbe v. Faust, 119 Mo. 653, 25 L. R. A. 149, 25 S. W. 390, which is cited in GRAND LODGE A. O. U. W. v. HADDOCK, it was held that a by-law of a masonic mutual benefit society, to the effect that, if any one of its members should become a saloon keeper, he would forfeit his membership, and his certificate would thereby become ipso facto void, would apply to those who were saloon keepers at the time of the adoption of the by-law, as well as to those who afterward became such. In this case, however, the one affected had lost his membership in the society before its enactment of the resolution against saloon keepers, because the grand lodge had already debarred him from membership in the order of masons, and, when such membership in good standing was thus lost, membership in the masonic mutual benefit society was ipso facto forfeited by virtue of the provisions of its charter, which was in existence when membership was ac-then engaged in the business of selling liquor in Kansas. At that time neither the laws of this state nor of the association forbade that occupation. After the enactment of the prohibitory law Haddock continued in the same business, but changed its location to Missouri, so that there is no claim that he was at any time a violator of the statute. He remained in the business until his death, in 1903. In 1889 a by-law of the grand lodge was adopted, providing, among other things, that, "no person shall be admitted to membership, or retained as a member, in this jurisdiction . . . who is engaged in any way in the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage." The by-law was silent as to how this requirement should be enforced, except for a further declaration that any lodge offending against any of the provisions of the section in which it was found should be deprived of its charter. On August 1, 1898, the supreme lodge of the order adopted a law reading as follows: "Any member of the order who shall, after August 1, 1898, have entered, or who shall hereafter enter, into the business or occupation of selling by retail intoxicating liquors as a beverage, shall stand suspended from any and all rights to participate in the beneficiary fund of the order, and his beneficiary certificate shall become null and void from and after the date of so engaging in said occupation, and no action of the lodge of which he is a member, or of the grand lodge or any officer thereof, shall be necessary or a condition precedent to any such suspension. In case any assessments shall be received from a member who has thus engaged in such occupation after August 1, 1898, the receipt thereof shall not continue the beneficiary certificate of such member in force, nor shall it be a waiver of his so engaging in such occupation." After the adoption of this law Haddock maintained his relations with the order, and continued to pay his assessments regularly. They were received by the officers of the local lodge with knowledge of the facts regarding his occupation, and were by them forwarded to the proper officers of the grand lodge. All payments made after that time, however, have been tendered back to Mrs. Haddock since her husband's death. The questions involved are (1) whether the terms of the by-laws referred to preclude a recovery upon the certificate, and (2) if so, whether it was competent for the order to adopt them as against Haddock, and (3) whether the grand lodge was estopped to invoke the benefit of these by-laws in this case. Owing to the conclusion we reach required, and which declared that "a requisite qualification for membership shall be that the applicant be a mason in good standing."

The adoption of a new article of incorporation by a mutual benefit association, making certificates void where the holders engage in extra hazardous occupations, does not become part of the contract with a member to whom a certificate had been previously issued, or destroy a right, which he previously had, to change his occupation without invalidating his certificate. Hobbs v. Iowa Mut. Ben. Asso. 82 Iowa, 107, 11 L. R. A. 299, 31 Am. St. Rep. 466, 47 N. W. 983.

The adoption of an amendment to the by-laws, to the effect that, if any member shall become a freight brakeman, he shall thereby forfeit his membership and certificate, is unreasonable and void as to one who became a member of the order when he had the right to follow such employment, and who was given no notice of the adoption of such an amendment. Tebo v. Supreme Council, R. A. 89 Minn. 3, 93 N. W. 513.

When a member stipulates to be governed by the laws in force when he is admitted to membership and those which may thereafter be adopted, the authorities agree that he is bound by an after-enacted by-law forfeiting a certificate in case such member continues to engage, or in the future engages, in certain prohibitory occupations. Thus, the court, in Hobbs v. Iowa Mut. Ben. Asso. supra, said, that whether members are bound by after-enacted by-laws will depend upon the terms of the contract; and, if that provides that members shall be bound by all articles and by-laws which may at any time be adopted, we know of no reason why they are not valid, because in such cases changes are not in violation of the contract, but are in harmony with it.

So, one who joined a fraternal benefit association under an express agreement that membership should be forfeited if he should engage in any employment which was then or might thereafter be considered extra hazardous, was bound by an after-enacted amendment which placed upon the prohibited list the occupation which the member entered after the adoption of the law. Gilmore v. Knights of Columbus, 77 Conn. 58, 107 Am. St. Rep. 17, 58 Atl. 223.

A by-law of a benefit society, providing that any member engaging in the saloon business shall stand suspended from that date, and forfeit all interest in the beneficiary fund, operates, without any formal suspension or notice, to forfeit the certificate of one who had engaged in such business before the passage of the by-law, where, at the time he became a member, the by-laws prohibited members from engaging in the saloon business, but provided in such case for formal suspension and notice thereof, and his application for membership contained a stipulation that he would comply with all the laws, rules, and usages of the association which were then in force, or which might thereafter be adopted; since the new by-law created no new ground for forfeiture, but operated merely to repeal the provisions of the prior by-law as to the man-garding the first question, it will be unnecessary to consider the others.

It is sufficiently clear that the by-laws adopted in 1889 did not affect Haddock's standing in the lodge or the rights of the beneficiary under the certificate. While it forbade the acceptance or retention as members of the lodge of persons engaged in the business of selling liquor, it did not profess to be self-operating. It provided no machinery by which it could be enforced, and no effort was in fact ever made under it to terminate Haddock's membership. A very similar question was discussed in Steinert v. United Brotherhood, C. & J. 91 Minn. 189, 97 N. W. 668, where it was said: "The constitution provided that 'no person who engages in the sale of intoxicating drinks can be admitted or retained as a member.'"

. . . The question is: Must charges be preferred, and an opportunity to defend given, to an accused member, before his membership ceases, or does the act of selling intoxicating drinks terminate the membership without any further proceedings? That Steinert disregarded the laws of the order stands admitted; but it does not follow that this fact of itself ended all liability of the defendant on his certificate of membership, issued when he was eligible, under which he had good standing, and in which he had acquired a property right. This depends entirely on the contract of membership, of which the constitution was a part. It was expressly provided in the certificate that a member must strictly adhere to his obligation and obey the constitution and all rules of the union based thereon. No person who engages in the sale of intoxicating drinks can be 'retained' as a member. Provisions of this kind, which may deprive one of property rights acquired when paying dues from time to time, are to be construed strictly, for forfeitures are not favored in the law. A member should not be deprived of benefits arising out of his certificate of membership, unless a construction of the constitution makes such a result absolutely necessary. We do not regard these constitutional provisions, taken as a whole, as indicating an intent to make the one above quoted self-executing or operative. It would have been very easy for the association, which undoubtedly prepared its own constitution, if such had been the intent, to have provided explicitly that in case a member engaged in the sale of intoxicating drinks his membership should forthwith and immediately cease, his certificate should stand canceled, mer of proceeding in case of a violation of rules. Moerschbaeher v. Supreme Council, F. J. 188 Ill. 9, 52 L. R. A. 281, 59 N. E. 17; People ex rel. Goett v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 32 Misc. 528, 67 N. Y. Supp. 330.

In Loeffler v. Modern Woodmen, 100 Wis. 79, 75 N. W. 1012, the court held that the contention that, after a person had once been properly admitted as a member, he was at liberty to enter upon some prohibited business, and the order was powerless to forfeit his certificate, is answered by showing that when membership was acquired the applicant agreed to comply with the "conditions, laws, and such by-laws and rules as" were then, or might thereafter "be, adopted by the head camp or local camp." The same doctrine was applied to a similar case in Schmidt v. Supreme Tent K. of M. 97 Wis. 528, 73 N. W. 22.

In Langnecker v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 111 Wis. 279, 55 L. R. A. 185, 87 Am. St. Rep. 800, 87 N. W. 293, which was cited and discussed by the court in GRAND LODGE A. O. U. W. v. HADDOCK, the application for membership contained the following stipulation: "I agree that compliance on my part with all the laws, regulations, and requirements which are, or may be hereafter, enacted by said order is the express condition upon which I am entitled to participation in the beneficiary fund, and to have and enjoy all the other benefits and privileges of said order."

no by-law existed prohibiting a saloon keeper or bartender from becoming a member of the order, nor any by-law prohibiting any member from engaging in either of these occupations; but the applicant agreed to be bound by the requirements "which are, or may be hereafter, enacted by said order." After the adoption of a by-law declaring that no person who is now, or who may hereafter become, a member of this order shall engage in the business of keeping a saloon or dramshop, or of tending bar, a member began business as a saloon keeper. The court held that, having agreed in advance to any reasonable change in the by-laws, and a by-law against the saloon business being in force when such business was entered into, the member was amenable to such by-law; and his membership was forfeited.

Niblack on Benefit Societies, § 26, says: "Whether or not a member is bound by an amendment to the by-laws adopted after his contract of insurance was made, depends upon the terms of his contract, or upon his consent to the change. If the contract provides that he shall be bound by any such amendment, and it is properly passed, there is no reason why it should not be valid against him. . . . Where there is nothing in the contract of insurance which in terms, or by implication, authorizes any change in its provisions or conditions, by-laws subsequently passed do not become a part of that contract."

1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 187, and 1 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, p. 708, lay down the same doctrine.

and that he should have no further rights under it."

A more difficult question is whether the law adopted in 1898 is to be interpreted as intended to affect the status of one who, like Haddock, having already engaged in the business of selling liquor, continued such occupation after that time without interruption. Construed literally, it has no application to such a case. Haddock did not enter into the forbidden occupation after August 1, 1898. He entered into it long before that time, and remained in it continuously. To make the expressions used apply to one in his situation, it would be necessary to give them a very liberal, if not strained, construction. No freedom of interpretation, however, should be indulged to accomplish the forfeiture of property rights. If it had been the design of the framers of the new law that it should apply to members who were already liquor sellers, it is reasonable to suppose that language would have been employed plainly indicating such purpose, and that there would have been express reference to those who remained in the business, as well as to those who entered it. In that case it seems probable, too, that some time would have been fixed within which such persons might save their rights by changing their occupation. It is hardly conceivable that there was a deliberate intention to make the amended law operate as an immediate decree of expulsion against any members who were at the time engaged in the interdicted business. Yet such would be the effect given it by the interpretation proposed by the plaintiff in error. The provision that a member's certificate should become null and void from the date of his engaging in the business also supports the theory that the operation of the enactment was intended to be wholly prospective. We conclude that the law of 1898 did not affect, and was not intended to affect, the standing of Haddock. This accords with the view taken in Deuble v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 66 App. Div. 323, 72 N. Y. Supp. 755 (Affirmed in 172 N. Y. 665, 65 N. E. 1116). The scope of the opinion, so far as affects this matter, is shown by the second paragraph of the syllabus, reading as follows: "An amendment to the laws of an insurance order, providing that any member who shall, after a specified date, have entered into the business of selling liquor, or who shall thereafter enter into such business, shall stand suspended from all rights in the beneficiary fund, and his certificate shall become void, does not in terms cover the case of a member who was previously engaged in such business and continued therein." In Langnecker v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 111 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wis. 279, 55 L. R. A. 185, 87 Am. St. Rep. 860, 87 N. W. 293, it was held that a similar amendment reached the case of a member who, having once abandoned the occupation of selling liquors, afterwards re-entered it; the discussion clearly indicating, however, that, if he had remained continuously in the business he would have been exempt from the operation of the law. In Ellerbe v. Faust, 119 Mo. 653, 25 L. R. A. 149, 25 S. W. 390, in discussing a provision similar to the one under consideration, the writer of the opinion expressed the belief that it was intended to apply to all saloon keepers who remained in that business, no matter when they entered it, upon the ground that the by-law should be interpreted "so as to meet the abuse or thing prohibited, and to correct it, if possible." The determination of that case, however, was controlled by other and unassailable reasons, and we cannot regard this dictum as seriously impairing the authority of the New York decision.

The judgment is affirmed.

Case Note.—The above case is a distinct addition to the authorities cited by the court as bearing on the question of waiver of the statutory provisions against physicians testifying to confidential disclosures made in the course of their professional employment. In all the cited cases the provisions of the policies contained express waivers, and consequently they do not go as far as the decision under discussion.

Re Coleman, 11 N. Y. 220, 19 N. if the ultimate facts constituting a cause of action or defense are alleged. If the facts thus alleged do not make the pleading sufficiently definite and certain, the remedy is by motion.

3. Evidence—disclosures to physician.

The prohibitions, in § 333 of the Code, against a physician's testifying to confidential disclosures made to him in the course of his professional employment, are for the benefit of the patient, who, by the express provisions of § 334, is permitted to waive them.

4. Same—waiver.

It is not necessary that such waiver be made at the time of the trial. It may be included in and made a part of the contract sought to be enforced in the action in which such testimony is offered.

5. Same—life-insurance contract.

A stipulation, in a contract of life insurance, to the effect that the proofs of death shall consist in part of the affidavit of the attending physician, which shall state the cause of death and such other information as may be required by the insurer, constitutes a waiver within the meaning of said sections, and renders the attending physician a competent witness as to the confidential disclosures made to him by the assured concerning his last sickness.

6. Same—declarations of bodily condition.

Statements of fact fairly indicative of a relevant bodily condition of the declarant at the time of the declaration are admissible as evidence of the existence of such condition, although made a considerable time after the injury was received.

7. Same—testimony of wife.

The admission of the testimony of the wife as to communications made to her by her husband in his last sickness, held not prejudicial error under the circumstances disclosed by the record in this case.

A case approaching very nearly, if not quite, the facts of the case under annotation, but not cited by the court, is that of Proppe v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 13 Misc. 266, 34 N. Y. Supp. 172, in which it was held that the statement made in the proof of loss, by the insured's physician, as to the cause of death, and as to his previous condition of health, is binding upon the beneficiary; and that the insured waived the privileged nature of the physician's statement by a clause in the policy making the contents of such proof of death evidence of the facts therein stated. The only apparent difference between this case and the one under annotation is that in the latter case the physician was permitted to testify as a witness on the trial, while in the Proppe Case, the question involved was as to the evidentiary effect of the proofs of loss.

78 Hun, 104, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1075, Affirmed in 150 N. Y. 167, 44 N. E. 769, it was held that the filing of a proof of loss containing a physician's certificate as to the cause of death did not constitute a waiver of the protection of the statute. This case differs from the Proppe Case in the apparent absence of any reference in the policy to the effect of the proofs of loss.

A statement in an application for insurance designating a physician as one of whom the insurer might inquire as to the health of the applicant before accepting the risk does not waive the privilege so as to permit such physician to testify, in an action upon the policy, as to the health and physical condition of the insured. W. 546.

Albert, C., filed the following opinion:

The terms "plaintiff" and "defendant" will be used herein with reference to the title of the cause in the court below. The defendant is a fraternal insurance association. Charles J. Munson, deceased, was a member thereof, and held a membership certificate therein insuring him, among other things, against death "through external, violent, and accidental means." The plaintiff is the widow of the assured, and the beneficiary named in the certificate.

The constitution of the association, which is a part of the contract of insurance, provides that no claim shall be valid unless notice in writing of the accident is received in the office of the association within fifteen days from the date thereof, and affirmative proofs in writing of said claim, as required by the executive board, are received within thirty days after the loss occurs; such proof in case of death of the assured to consist of the affidavit of the beneficiary and the attending physician, which "shall state the cause of death, giving dates of the accident and particulars thereof, and also the date of death, and such information as may be required by the association." In the petition upon which the cause was submitted to the jury, among other things, it is alleged: "That at all times subsequent to becoming a member of defendant association, as aforesaid, and up to the time of his death, as hereinafter set forth, he, the said Charles J. Munson, continued a member thereof in good standing, and while so in good standing, and within three months immediately prior to his death, was accidentally cut, wounded, bruised, and injured by external, violent and accidental means; the exact time, place, and manner of receiving said accidental cuts, wounds, bruises, and injuries as aforesaid, is unknown to the plaintiff; and that the said Charles J. Munson, after receiving said injuries, and on, to wit, August 27, 1902, and by reason thereof, and independently of all other causes, died." It is further alleged that the assured had fully kept and performed all the terms and conditions of said contract of insurance on his part to be kept and performed, and that the plaintiff has fully kept and performed her part thereof, except to furnish or file the proofs of death hereinbefore mentioned; but that the furnishing and filing of such proofs had been waived by the association within thirty days from the death of the assured. In the answer to said petition the allegations as to the cause and manner of death, notice to the defendant of the accident as required by the constitution, and a waiver of formal proofs of death, are denied. The answer also contains allegations to the effect that no such notice was given or proof made, and that the death of the deceased was due to natural, and not to accidental, causes. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and judgment according.

It is claimed by the defendant that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it fails to show that the injury was received through accidental means. In making this claim counsel do not overlook the positive averment of the petition, hereinbefore set out at length, that the assured "was accidentally cut, wounded, bruised, and injured by external, violent, and accidental means; the exact time, place, and manner of receiving said accidental cuts, wounds, bruises, and injuries, as aforesaid, is unknown to the plaintiff;" but insists that the allegation that "the exact time, place, and manner of receiving said accidental cuts, etc., are unknown to the plaintiff," negatives the allegation that such injuries were accidental, and destroys its force and effect. We do not believe that the language will bear that construction. There is a positive allegation that the injuries were received through accidental means. That plaintiff afterward disclaims knowledge of the exact time, place, and manner of receiving such accidental injuries in no wise negatives her allegation that they were accidental. For example, a man is found crushed and dying between the rails of a railroad track in the wake of a passing train. In the absence of any explanation of the circumstance, that his injuries were due to accidental means would be a reasonable inference. This inference, though slightly weakened, would not be negated, by the fact that "the exact time, place, and manner" of receiving the injuries were unknown.

It is also urged that the allegation that the injuries were received through accidental means is a mere conclusion. It is an elementary rule that a bare conclusion of law adds nothing to the value of a pleading, and should be disregarded when the sufficiency of the facts pleaded to constitute a cause of action or a defense is called in question. But this rule does not extend to conclusions of fact. Such conclusions do not render a pleading vulnerable to a demurrer. Ordinarily, it is only necessary to plead the ultimate facts upon which the pleader relies. Such facts, of necessity, are conclusions drawn from intermediate and evidential facts. If the ultimate facts are not stated with sufficient certainty, the remedy is by motion. Whether the injuries were received through accidental means is purely a question of fact, and the allegation that they were thus received is a conclusion of fact, and does not fall within the rule invoked by the defendant. The court directed the jury that the question for their determination was whether the assured died as a result of an injury received while traveling as a passenger on a freight train on the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad, near the town of Brush, Colorado; and the defendant insists that the evidence is insufficient to show that the assured received any injury by accidental means at that time. The evidence shows that on the 20th day of August, 1902, the assured left his home in Denver. Two days afterward he was seen in Akron, Colorado, where, at 11:30 P. M., he boarded the caboose of a freight train on the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad. At about 1:30 the next morning, when the train was near Brush, in that state, and while it was running about 40 miles an hour, an axle on one of the freight cars broke, one end of which was driven through the car; the other struck the track, tearing up the ties for some distance. The evidence sufficiently shows that the assured was in good health when he left home, and remained in that condition to the time of the accident to the train. He was the only passenger on the train, and there is no direct testimony that he was injured by the accident. After the accident the assured was taken on the engine to Brush, and there took passage on a train for Sterling, Colorado, where he arrived about 6 o'clock the same morning. His appearance on his arrival there indicated that he was ill, and he at once sought a hotel and retired. In the afternoon a physician called to treat him, and found him in bed, apparently suffering and complaining of pains in his back. The physician continued to treat him and some two or three days after his first visit examined his back and found bruises in close connection with the lower lobe of the left lung and at or about the place where the assured located the pain. The assured died the fourth day after his arrival at Sterling. The testimony of the attending physician is to the effect that the assured died of pneumonia or congestion of the lungs, produced by the injury indicated by the bruises, and that such injury was the primary cause of his death. From these facts it is reasonably clear, we think, that the assured up to the time of the accident was in good health, within a few hours thereafter suffering from injuries peculiarly likely to result from the accident to the train on which he was a passenger, and that within four days thereafter he died of such injuries. It is true the conductor of the freight train testified that he was in the cupola of the caboose when the accident occurred, and that the assured was lying on one of the seats, apparently asleep; that the accident caused no sudden stopping of the car, and no unusual jolt or jar, and apparently did not awaken the assured, or cause him to change his position. He also testified that as a result of the accident the engine separated from the cars, and the air brakes were immediately set. He was the only witness present with the assured on the caboose and the defendant insists that his testimony absolutely negatives the theory that the assured was injured in that accident. We do not think so. The jury were not bound to accept his testimony at its face value. He was not wholly a disinterested witness. He was conductor of the train, and, to some extent, was responsible to his employer for its proper management and the safety of his passengers. His home is in Denver and he attended as a witness at the request of his employer. As against his testimony as to the effect of the accident on the caboose is the evidence of another trainman to the effect that the caboose, under such circumstances, would stop or slacken its speed suddenly, and with a jolt or jar. Taking into account the nature of the accident, this evidence is more in accord with reason and common knowledge, and the jury had a right to accept it as true. Taking the evidence as a whole, we are satisfied that the inference drawn by the jury therefrom, that the assured died of injuries received while riding on the train at the time of the accident related, is a reasonable one. Proof amounting to a demonstration is never attainable, and never required, in cases of this kind. All that is required is to establish a reasonable probability. Western Travelers' Acci. Asso. v. Holbrook, 65 Neb. 474, 91 N. W. 276, 94 N. W. 816. That, in our opinion, was done in this case.

It is also insisted that the evidence is insufficient to show that such injuries, independently of all other causes, caused the death of the assured. Whether such injuries did thus cause his death is peculiarly a question of fact. Modern Woodman Acci. Asso. v. Shryock, 54 Neb. 250, 39 L. R. A. 826, 74 N. W. 607; United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Fetter v. Fidelity & C. Co. 174 Mo. 256, 61 L. R. A. 459, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560, 73 S. W. 592. It was submitted to the jury on conflicting evidence sufficient to sustain a finding either way, and under the settled rule of law the finding of the jury thereon under such circumstances is conclusive.

The cause was tried on an amended petition. In her original petition the plaintiff, instead of alleging, as in the amended petition, that the injuries causing the death of the assured occurred within three months preceding his death, and that the exact time, place, and manner of receiving such injuries were unknown to her, alleged that they occurred August 23, 1902, while he was traveling in the caboose of a freight train going from Akron to Brush, Colorado, and that by reason of the accident to the train hereinbefore related he "was violently thrown against the floor, roof, and walls of said caboose, and was thereby accidentally cut, wounded, bruised, and injured by external, violent, and accidental means," etc. The defendant insists that the amended petition amounts to an admission that the allegations in the original petition as to the time, place, and manner of receiving the injuries were untrue, and that such injuries were received at some other time and place, and in a different manner. Hence, it is argued that the notice of the accident which gave the time, place, and manner of receiving the injuries as alleged in the original petition was not notice of the accident relied upon in the amended petition. One answer to this is that, while the original petition states the facts with greater exactitude, it does not purport to give the exact time, place, and manner of receiving the injuries. If, in the amended petition, the plaintiff had averred that she was unable to give the time, place, and manner with greater exactitude, there would be some ground for holding that the allegations of one pleading or the other must be untrue. But in the amended petition she merely avers that she cannot state what she did not state in the original petition, namely, the exact time, place, and manner of receiving the injuries. The evidence shows that the defendant had due notice that the assured was injured in the accident on the train near Brush. The court limited the proof to that accident, and we are all of the opinion that the defendant's claim of a want of notice is unfounded.

It is also claimed that the evidence fails to show a waiver of proofs of death. This claim is based on the same line of reasoning as that of a want of notice, and what we have said with respect to that claim applies here. The question of waiver was duly submitted to the jury, and the finding of the jury thereon is abundantly sustained by the evidence.

The physician who attended the assured in his last sickness was permitted to testify, over the objection of the defendant, as to the nature of such illness, and other matters of a confidential nature relating thereto, intrusted to him in his professional capacity. The defendant now assigns the reception of this evidence as error. Section 333 of the Code provides that "no attorney, counselor, physician, surgeon, minister of the gospel, or priest of any denomination, shall be allowed, in giving testimony, to disclose any confidential communication intrusted to him in his professional capacity, necessary and proper to enable him to discharge the functions of his office, according to the usual course of practice or discipline." Section 334 provides that the prohibitions in the preceding sections do not apply where the party in whose favor they apply waives them. The secrecy enjoined upon physicians by § 333, supra, is for the protection of the patient, and from the provisions of § 334 it is quite clear that when the patient is willing to waive that protection, and to permit a disclosure of the secrets of the sickroom, he may do so. It has been held that the patient may waive the protection of the statute, even though there is no provision for such waiver. Carrington v. St. Louis, 89 Mo. 208, 58 Am. Rep. 108, 1 S. W. 240; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Martin, 41 Mich. 667, 3 N. W. 173. It is not necessary that such waiver should be made at the time the testimony is offered, but it may be made a part of a contract, and is available in an action brought to enforce such contract. Adreveno v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 34 Fed. 870, was an action to recover the amount due on a benefit certificate. In the contract of insurance the assured in express terms had waived the benefit of provisions of a statute in Missouri similar to § 333, supra. In passing on the effect of such waiver, the court said: "The statute is construed in this state as conferring a privilege, merely, that may be waived. It is not declaratory of any public policy. The public is not concerned in excluding the testimony of a physician as to the condition of a patient, if the patient himself does not object to such disclosures. In this respect the courts of this state follow the rulings in New York and Michigan under a similar statute, as appears by the cases of Cahen v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 9 Jones & S. 296; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Martin, 41 Mich. 667, 3 N. W. 173. As the patient is at liberty to waive the privilege which the law affords him, it appears to me it is immaterial whether the patient waives the privilege by calling the physician to testify in his behalf, or whether he waives it, as in this case, by a clause contained in the contract on which the suit is brought; and if the patient himself waives the privilege by a clause contained in the contract, that waiver, in my judgment, is binding on anyone who claims under the contract, whether it be the patient himself or his representative." This case was followed in Foley v. Royal Arcanum, 151 N. Y. 196, 56 Am. St. Rep. 621, 45 N. E. 456. See also Alberti v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 118 N. Y. 77, 6 L. R. A. 765, 23 N. E. 35; Rosseau v. Bleau, 131 N. Y. 177, 27 Am. St. Rep. 578, 30 N. E. 52. In Re Coleman, 111 N. Y. 220, 19 N. E. 71, an attorney of the testator, who had signed the attestation clause of the will as a witness, was called as a witness, and his testimony was objected to on the ground that it was prohibited by a statute similar to the one under consideration. The court said: "The act of the testator in requesting his attorneys to become witnesses to his will leaves no doubt as to his intention thereby to exempt them from the operation of the statute, and leave them free to perform the duties of the office assigned them, unrestrained by any objection which he had power to remove." In the present case the constitution of the association expressly requires the affidavit of the attending physician as a part of the proofs of death, and that such affidavit shall state the cause of death, and such information as may be required by the association. This provision was a part of the contract of insurance, and was assented to by the assured when he became a member of the association and accepted his certificate of membership. By assenting to those provisions, it seems to us the assured clearly and unequivocally waived the benefits of § 333, supra, and agreed that the attending physician should be permitted to disclose the cause of death and such other facts and circumstances as might be disclosed to him in his professional capacity while in attendance on the assured in his last sickness. In other words, he expressly stipulated that the secrecy enjoined by § 333 upon his attending physician should not be observed. The proper treatment of a patient often involves an intimate knowledge on the part of his physician of facts of a delicate nature, and which the patient would object to having disclosed to third persons. The common law protects the patient against the voluntary disclosure of such facts, and the statute protects him against their involuntary disclosure by his physician. But where the patient himself not only consents, but expressly stipulates, that such disclosures be made in order to give force and effect to his contract, it would be a harsh and unwarranted application of a salutary rule to hold that the plaintiff could not avail herself of such stipulation for the enforcement of the contract made for her benefit. The case in principle is much like the Coleman Case, supra, and, in our opinion, the testimony of the attending physician was properly received. See also McKinney v. Grand Street, P. P. & F. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 352, 10 N. E. 544.

It is further claimed that the plaintiff in this case was permitted to testify to communications made to her by her husband in his last sickness, contrary to the provisions of § 332 of the Code. It is conceded by both sides that the assured died of congestion of the lungs, or pneumonia; the only controversy on this point being whether it was brought on by external injuries received through accidental means or otherwise. The testimony of the plaintiff, the reception of which is now criticised, simply detailed the complaints of suffering made by the assured on his deathbed. The ground had been substantially covered by the testimony of the attending physician, whose evidence as to these particulars is uncontradicted. The complaints and symptoms described were such as would be the natural concomitants of congestion of the lungs, or pneumonia, whether the disease was brought on by the accident alleged or otherwise. The reception of this evidence, if erroneous, would seem to be error without prejudice.

Another error assigned is that the court permitted a witness to testify, over objection, that when he entered the sickroom of the assured the assured said: "I am badly shaken up. No bones broken, old fellow; and it might have been worse." The testimony was given in response to the following question, "State now the words that he used in expressing his then condition." This was objected to as incompetent, calling for hearsay, and for matter no part of the res gestæ. The court then instructed the witness as follows: "Give his words that he used at that time about the condition you found him in,—as to his condition at that time." The attorney for the defendant added, "And not what caused it. Is that correct?" The court then said, "Must give his words as to his condition." The witness then answered by giving the words of the assured as above quoted. We do not think that there was any error in the reception of this evidence. It was not offered as part 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) of the res gestæ, but as a statement of the assured of his then physical condition. This statement was made a few hours after his arrival at the hotel in Sterling. The statement was not an inapt description of his then bodily condition, although somewhat figurative. The rule is well settled that statements of fact fairly indicative of a relevant bodily condition of a declarant at the time of the declaration will be received as circumstantial evidence of the existence of that condition, although made a considerable time after the injury was received. Bacon v. Charlton, 7 Cush. 581; Bredlau v. York, 115 Wis. 554, 92 N. W. 261; Elmer v. Fessenden, 151 Mass. 359, 5 L. R. A. 724, 22 N. E. 635, 24 N. E. 208.

The defendant complains of an instruction of the court, hereinbefore referred to, relating to the time and manner of receiving the injury alleged as the cause of the death of the assured. The argument on this point proceeds on the theory heretofore noticed, that the plaintiff, by filing an amended petition, had abandoned the claim that the assured came to his death as a result of an injury received on the railroad train near Brush. We have already noticed that theory in a former part of this opinion, and what is there said we think disposes of the criticism of this instruction.

The defendant complains of another instruction of the court, given at the request of the plaintiff, wherein the question whether the assured at the time of receiving the injury alleged was free from actually existing disease and bodily infirmity which might naturally produce death, was submitted to the jury, on the ground that the evidence is conclusive that the deceased at the time of the alleged accident was affected with bodily infirmity in the form of pleural adhesions of the lungs and curvature of the spine. Whether, at the time of receiving such injuries, the assured was suffering from the bodily infirmities just enumerated, is one of the questions embodied in an instruction which the defendant itself tendered. By tendering that instruction it impliedly asked the court to submit that question to the jury, and it cannot now be heard to complain of its submission.

The defendant complains of some of the special findings, but, as the judgment was rendered on the general verdict, we do not think the discussion of the special findings at this time will be productive of any good.

The petition in error contains 212 assignments, some of which were abandoned on argument. Not all of those argued have been specifically noticed in this opinion, but we think the points involved therein are covered by what has already been said. In our opinion, the record contains no 'reversible error.

We therefore recommend that the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

YAKIMA VALLEY BANK, Appt.,
v.

CHARLES McALLISTER.

(37 Wash. 566.)

1. Negotiable paper—securing indorsement by trick.

No liability attaches to one whose indorsement is secured upon a note by the trick of inducing him to sign his name to a paper placed upon the note in such a way that the ink penetrates through to the note without his knowledge and intent.

2. Evidence—of other frauds.

Upon the question of fraud in securing an indorsement upon a note by means of a trick, evidence is admissible that the same trick was employed by the same persons to secure the signatures of other persons, the effect of which is to show a general scheme to perpetrate this particular fraud upon the people of the neighborhood at the same time, to effect a common purpose.

3. Note—action on—burden of proof.

Where the signature to a note upon which suit is brought is denied in the answer, evidence to prove its genuineness is part of the plaintiff's case in chief, and cannot be brought forward in rebuttal.

(March 23, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Yakima County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Snyder & Preble, for appellant:

The answer, in legal effect, admits the execution of the note, and, at most, only tenders issues as to its validity.

Dinsmore v. Stimbirt, 12 Neb. 433, 11 N. W. 872; Henry v. Hinman, 21 Minn. 378.

The facts upon which the charge of mala fides is based must be distinctly set forth, so that plaintiff may know the charges he is to meet.

14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 680.

Case Note.—It would seem that the securing of a signature to a paper by the trick of having the ink strike through another was little more than forgery. Although the great weight of authority, as shown by a note to Green v. Wilkie, 36 L. R. A. 434, is to the effect that fraud in the procuring of a note, or the signature of it, which secures the assent of the signer so that it is his voluntary act, will not avoid the note in the hands of a bona fide holder. On the contrary, if the signature is without the assent of the owner to the act which he actually performs, or if it is secured under circumstances which make it practically a forgery, no liability attaches. Thus, in Detwiler v. Bish, 44 Ind. 70, and Gibbs v. Linabury, 22 Mich. 479, 7 Am. Rep. 675, it was held that, where the signature was secured by representing that the paper was of a different character, no liability attached; and in Farmers' & M. Bank v. Butler, 48 Mich. 192, 12 N. W. 36, the latter case was explained by saying that the paper was no more the maker's than if his signature had been forged to it. If the paper is signed under the supposition that it is an agency contract, no liability attaches. Soper v. Peck, 51 Mich. 563, 17 N. W. 57; Kagel v. Totten, 59 Md. 447; so, if the name is placed on a blank piece of paper for some innocent purpose, no liability will attach if a promissory note is written above it. Cline 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Guthrie, 42 Ind. 227, 13 Am. Rep. 357; Caulkins v. Whisler, 29 Iowa, 495, 4 Am. Rep. 236. But the liability will not be avoided if the signature was placed upon the paper for the purpose of having some instrument written over it, since, under those circumstances, the loss should fall on the one whose agent caused it. Breckenridge v. Lewis, 84 Me. 349, 30 Am. St. Rep. 353, 24 Atl. 864.

In Nebeker v. Cutsinger, 48 Ind. 436, a special emphasis is placed upon the fact that the maker was ignorant of the character of the note, and had no intention of signing such an instrument; and the same is true of Dupuy v. Schuyler, 45 Ill. 306, and People's State Bank v. Ruxer, 31 Ind. App. 245, 67 N. W. 542. The same is true of the leading case of Foster v. Mackinnon, L. R. 4 C. P. 704, 38 L. J. C. P. N. S. 310, 20 L. T. N. S. 887, 17 Week. Rep. 1105.

There are a few cases, however, which hold that, if the signature was actually affixed by the maker with the intention of signing some kind of a paper, the mere fact that he was defrauded as to what he was actually signing would be no defense to a note in the hands of a bona fide holder. First Nat. Bank v. Johns, 22 W. Va. 520, 46 Am. Rep. 506; Phelan v. Moss, 67 Pa. 59, 5 Am. Rep. 402; Battles v. Laudenslager, 84 Pa. 446; Loomis v. Metcalf, 30 Iowa, 382.

The cases, holding that, upon an issue of fraud, other similar frauds may be proved, limit such proof to the issues of scienter, purposes, motives, intent, or other mental state of the persons accused of fraud.

McKay v. Russell, 3 Wash. 378, 28 Am. St. Rep. 44, 28 Pac. 908; Johnson v. Gulick, 46 Neb. 817, 50 Am. St. Rep. 629, 65 N. W. 883; Parker v. Armstrong, 55 Mich. 176, 20 N. The admission of the testimony as to the collateral transactions with Pugsley and Place was prejudicial to plaintiff.

Jordan v. Osgood, 109 Mass. 457, 12 Am. Rep. 731.

It is negligence per se for a man, intending to sign some paper, to sign a negotiable instrument without knowing it.

The issuing of said negotiable draft was sufficient consideration to make plaintiff a bona fide holder for value.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 187; Adams v. Soule, 33 Vt. 538; 1 Edwards, Bills & Notes, 322.

The note was fair upon its face; if defendant relied upon fraud to support his contention that he did not execute it, it was necessary for him to allege the circumstance of such fraud, and to confine his proof to his allegations.

West Coast Grocery Co. v. Stinson, 13 Wash. 255, 43 Pac. 35; Hazard v. Griswold, 21 Fed. 178; Cummings v. Thompson, 18 Minn. 246, Gil. 228.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the Yakima Valley Bank, a corporation, against the respondent, upon a promissory note for $790.20, dated November 20, 1902, signed on the face thereof by the defendant, Charles McAllister, payable to the order of said Charles McAllister, and purporting to bear his indorsement upon the back thereof. The complaint is the ordinary complaint for recovery upon a negotiable promissory note; alleges execution and delivery of the note by defendant to one J. B. Pugsley, and the transfer before maturity to plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, in the ordinary course of business. The answer denies the execution of the note, and alleges, by way of affirmative defense, that the note was without consideration, in that it was signed on the face thereof by the said defendant in the sum of $790.20, the amount of the annual premium upon a $10,000 life insurance policy upon defendant's life, which said Pugsley and one E. R. Place, associated with Pugsley in business, agreed to thereafter deliver to defendant, upon the express understanding between defendant and said Pugsley and Place that the note was not to be binding, and was to be returned to defendant, if, upon an examination of the said policy, defendant would not accept the same, and that defendant did not accept said policy; that the defendant did not intend to sign his name upon the back of said note, but that, as a part of said transaction with Pugsley and Place, he signed his name to a contract releasing the insurance company from liability in case of his death while said policy was in his custody for inspection, and before he had accepted it; and that, in signing said contract, his signature penetrated through the paper upon which said contract was written, and appeared as an indorsement on said note. This is the substance of the answer. The answer, however, also alleged that the plaintiff had notice of the infirmity of the note before he paid for the same. This was denied by the reply of the plaintiff. Upon these allegations the case went to trial. The testimony of the defendant was to the effect that Pugsley and Place solicited him to take insurance in the Home Mutual Life Insurance Society of New York city, and that he agreed to take a policy for $10,000 on the condition that, when he had examined the policy and had submitted it to his legal advisers, it corresponded with the representations made by the solicitors, and that he was to have until the 1st day of January to determine, the application being made upon the 20th of November, 1902; that the solicitors or agents of the company represented to him that it would be necessary for him to draw up a note payable to himself, and signed by himself, as an earnest of his intention to do business with the company, and that it was also necessary for him to sign a contract releasing the company from liability to him in case he should die before the final consummation of the contract, they representing to him that the note could not be collected from him without an indorsement, and that he would be safe in giving them the note; that the transaction occurred in the corral of a farm in Yakima county; that he was instructed to sign the application and the release, and that he did so; that a book with several papers upon it, placed there with the ostensible purpose of making it smooth, was handed him to write upon, and a fountain pen furnished by the agents, with the instruction to bear on hard, as the pen was stiff; that he was afterwards informed by the bank, the plaintiff, that they had purchased a note signed by him in the sum of $790.20 in favor of himself, and indorsed by him on the back thereof. This indorsement he denied having made; his theory being that, by the fraudulent manipulation of the solicitors, the ink had been transmitted through the agreement which he signed onto the back of the note which had been placed there for the purpose of receiving the signature, and that he knew nothing about the note having been indorsed until he was notified by the bank; admitting that the signature was his, or very much like his, and alleging that it was a trick and a fraud; insisting that the signature had been obtained through the perpetration upon him of a trick and a fraud, and that it was not in fact his signature. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant.

A demurrer was interposed to the affirmative answers of the defendant, which was overruled, and the action of the court in overruling the demurrer is the first error assigned; the appellant contending that the allegations of fraud do not amount to a denial that the defendant indorsed the note; that the answer, in legal effect, admits the execution of the note, and, at most, only tenders issue as to its validity; that the charges of mala fides are not distinctly set forth, so that plaintiff may know the charges he has to meet; and that, if the note was indorsed through the physical act of the defendant, he is responsible for the payment of the note, and for the results of that physical act, to an innocent purchaser. This we think is not the law under any authority. It is not the physical act which constitutes a transaction of this kind, but it is the intention of the parties to the contract. It is true that, if a party by any negligent act is the cause of an investment made by an innocent person on the strength and credit of that act, he cannot escape liability; but, if the matters set forth in the answer are true, there was no action on the part of the defendant at all, so far as indorsing the note was concerned. The indorsement was the effect of a fraudulent device and trick, which the defendant was in no way responsible for.

Several succeeding assignments are based upon the action of the court in admitting, over the objection of the appellant, the testimony of numerous witnesses to the effect that Pugsley and Place had perpetrated, in the judgment of the witnesses, the same fraud upon them, in like transactions. It was testified by witnesses O'Neil, Purdin, Kandle, and Chamberlain that, during the same month in which this transaction with respondent occurred, these solicitors had obtained their indorsement of notes in the same manner and under the same circumstances which were related on the witness stand by the respondent; and it is noticeable that there was a similarity of methods in each instance. The business was not transacted as it ordinarily is, in a house or upon a table, but the plan was to obtain these signatures out of doors, by the buggy in which these men traveled; and in each instance, with one exception, the signatures were written upon a pocketbook with documents and papers on top of it, under circumstances that would not be as liable to challenge the attention of the parties signing as would the interposition of the note under the agreement signed upon a table. In each instance these parties swore that they did not indorse the note which they had made out to themselves, and knew nothing about their having executed such a note until notice came to them to that effect from the bank, and that they had paid the notes rather than to risk a lawsuit with the company; in many instances the notes being small. It is insisted by the appellant that this testimony was inadmissible, and reliance is placed upon the case of McKay v. Russell, 3 Wash. 378, 28 Am. St. Rep. 44, 28 Pac. 908; and it might appear at first blush that that case was in point, in favor of appellant's contention. In that case, which was an action to recover money paid upon a contract for the sale of real estate on the ground that the sale was procured by fraudulent representations, it was held that it was inadmissible to show that, in a similar transaction prior thereto, defendants had made like misrepresentations to another party. But an examination of that case fails to show that there was any testimony offered that would show a general scheme connecting the transaction which it was sought to prove with the transaction which was in issue in the case. It is, no doubt, true, as a general proposition, that testimony tending to show that a person has committed another crime is not admissible for the purpose of showing the probability of his commission of the crime charged. But it is equally true that it is competent to show a general scheme to defraud, so connected with the case under consideration by time and circumstances that it will have a tendency to raise the presumption that the fraud charged was a part of the general scheme so proved. This court held in Oudin v. Crossman, 15 Wash. 519, 46 Pac. 1047, that, in an action to recover a sum of money which plaintiff had been induced to pay for the purchase of a mine in reliance upon false representations of the defendants, evidence was admissible, showing that the defendants had made representations to other parties than plaintiff, and to people in the vicinity generally, regarding the existence and character of the mine and the value of its ores; such representations being part of one continuous scheme or transaction for the purpose of selling the mine to anyone that could be induced to buy. And so, in this case, the testimony, if true, showed conclusively a general scheme to perpetrate this particular kind of a fraud upon the people of a certain neighborhood at the same time for the purpose of selling them insurance policies. The rule is thus clearly announced in 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 196, 197: "A charge of fraud in a particular transaction cannot be proved by evidence of other and independent frauds of the party charged, though in a similar transaction, unless it appears that there is such a connection between the transactions as to authorize the inference that the frauds are both parts of a general scheme or purpose to defraud. . . . If the other fraud as to which evidence is offered is similar in character to the fraud alleged, and so connected with the transaction under investigation in point of time and otherwise as to reasonably authorize the inference that both frauds were in pursuance of a general scheme or purpose to defraud in such cases, the evidence is admissible. This is well settled, as a general rule, though in its application there is not entire unanimity in the cases. The chief reason for admitting evidence of other frauds in such a case is that, where transactions of a similar character by the same party are closely connected in time, the inference is reasonable that they proceed from the same motive." The Supreme Court of the United States has spoken plainly on this proposition in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877. Suit was brought by an assignee of a policy of life insurance, obtained on the application of the assured at the instigation of the assignee, to recover of the insurers, after the death of the assured; and the defendants set up that it was plaintiff's purpose, in procuring the insurance to be obtained, to cheat and defraud defendants, and offered to show that he effected insurances upon the life of the assured in other companies at or about the same time for the like fraudulent purpose; and it was held that the testimony was admissible. In the course of the opinion, it is said: "A repetition of acts of the same character naturally indicates the same purpose in all of them; and if, when considered together, they cannot be reasonably explained without ascribing a particular motive to the perpetrator, such motive will be considered as prompting each act;" citing Butler v. Watkins, 13 Wall. 456, 20 L. ed. 629, where it was said: "In actions for fraud, large latitude is always given to the admission of evidence. If a motive exist prompting to a particular line of conduct, and it be shown that, in pursuing that line, a defendant has deceived and defrauded one person, it may justly be inferred that similar conduct towards another at or about the same time, and in relation to a like subject, was actuated by the same spirit." This case also cites many cases in support of this view of the law. We think that, while it is difficult to apply the rule to varying circumstances, the circumstances surrounding these transactions, as shown by the testimony, bring the case squarely within the rule that testimony tending to show a general scheme to perpetrate a fraud is admissible.

But even if the admission of this testimony had constituted reversible error, it was cured by the instructions of the court, which we think were more favorable to the appellant than they should have been. After the conclusion of the testimony, the court, evidently taking the view of the law that this testimony could not be admitted as against a bona fide purchaser of the note, instructed the jury as follows: "This case has been tried upon two theories, and evidence has been received here by the court in support of each theory. Part of the testimony received here, in the opinion of the court, is entirely competent in support of one of these theories, but it is incompetent in support of the other theory. These two theories are these: First, that the plaintiff in this action was a bona fide holder of the promissory note in suit; and, second, that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder of the promissory note in suit." Then the court proceeds to state what a bona fide holder is, and says: "Under the admitted facts in this case, I charge you, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff in this action is a bona fide holder of the note in suit." Continuing, the court says: "Certain testimony was received here tending to show that other notes were received by these parties by the same means. In the opinion of the court, this testimony was competent, as tending to show that the note was obtained by fraud and without consideration. But these questions of fraud and failure of consideration the court now withdraws from you, and I charge you, as a matter of law, that you cannot consider in this trial the testimony relating to the other acts, if any, committed in this case. In other words, proof tending to show other forgeries, or tending to show the obtaining of other notes under like circumstances, is not competent as to whether this note was or was not indorsed, and you cannot consider it in that light. The only question that I will submit to you, as I have stated, is the one in answer to the question as to whether this defendant indorsed his name on the back of this note." It is alleged that the court erred in that part of the instruction quoted above, viz.: "In the opinion of the court this testimony was competent as tending to show that the note was obtained by fraud and without consideration." But a glance at the instructions in the record shows that the court withdrew this testimony from the consideration of the jury by withdrawing from their consideration the question of fraud and failure of consideration as affecting a bona fide holder. We will not specially review the alleged errors in refusing to instruct, for we think the instructions of the court, as given, covered the whole case, and were favorable to appellant. Nor did the court err in refusing to admit the so-called expert testimony in relation to the genuineness of the signature. The signature had been denied by the answer, and the burden, under such circumstances, was upon the plaintiff, in his case in chief, to prove the signature; and, being offered only in rebuttal, it was not competent. Nor do we think that the somewhat heated expressions of counsel in the argument of the case would justify a reversal of the judgment.

No discernible error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

PAUL SCHAEFFI, Appt.,
v.

GEORGE BARTHOLOMAE.

(217 Ill. 105.)

1. Mortgage—foreclosure—rights of purchaser.

A purchaser at foreclosure sale under a mortgage of real estate is entitled to the Case Note.—The right of a purchaser on foreclosure to rents or income during the receivership, and before the purchaser's title is perfected, depends in each case on the particular statute involved. Under the Illinois statute the courts have consistently maintained the position taken in SCHAEFFI v. BARTHOLOMAE, that the purchaser 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

rights conferred by the decree of foreclosure, and cannot claim additional rights under the provisions of the mortgage.

2. Same—right to income.

A provision in a mortgage that, in case of foreclosure, a receiver shall be appointed to collect the income, which shall be paid to the person entitled to a deed under the certificate of sale, or in reduction of the redemption money, in case the property is redeemed, does not, even in the absence of redemption, entitle a purchaser at foreclosure sale to the income of the property before the title becomes perfect in him.

(October 24, 1905.)

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming an order of the Superior Court for Cook County, distributing the proceeds of the foreclosure sale of certain real estate among the holders of various trust deeds thereon. Reversed.

Statement by Hand, J.:

The appellant filed a bill in chancery in the superior court of Cook county to foreclose a trust deed in the nature of a mortgage upon premises situated in said county, known as Nos. 870 and 872 West North avenue, Chicago. John H. Glade filed a cross bill to foreclose a trust deed held by him upon No. 870 West North avenue, and Phillip Bartholomae filed a cross bill to foreclose a trust deed held by him upon No. 872 West North avenue. It was held by the court that the trust deeds of Glade and Bartholomae, respectively, were superior liens to that of the appellant, and a decree of foreclosure and sale was entered, directing that said premises be sold by a master, and that he first pay the Glade trust deed from the amount received from the sale of the premises covered thereby, and apply the overplus, if any, upon the trust deed of appellant, and that he first pay the Bartholomae trust deed from the amount realized upon the sale of the premises covered thereby, and that he apply the overplus, if any, upon the trust deed of appellant. On May 3, 1902, the premises covered by the Glade trust deed were sold to Glade, and the premises covered by the Bartholomae trust deed were sold to the executor of Bartholomae. On the 14th day of the same month the master reported the sales, and that there has no right, as against the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption, to any amount that may remain in the receiver's hands after payment of the deficiency, if any, due on the mortgage. Stevens v. Hadfield, 178 Ill. 532, 52 N. E. 875, in addition to cases cited in SCHAEFFI v. BARTHOLOMAE in support of its holding.

was a deficiency remaining unpaid on the Glade trust deed of $1,006.38 and on the Bartholomae trust deed of $540.92, for which amounts deficiency decrees were rendered. After the filing of the original and cross bills, a receiver was appointed, who took possession of the premises and remained in possession until the time of redemption had expired and deeds were made. On the 6th of August, 1903, the receiver filed a report, in which he showed he had collected rent to the amount of $855.14 on No. 870 West North avenue, which he had paid to Glade to apply upon the deficiency decree rendered in his favor, and had collected rent to the amount of $726.90 on No. 872 West North avenue; that he had paid to Henry Bartholomae, Jr., executor of Phillip Bartholomae, the sum of $574.07 in full of the deficiency decree, including interest, rendered upon the Bartholomae trust deed, and that he had paid to the appellant, to apply upon the decree in his favor, the sum of $152.23. The certificate of purchase upon the Bartholomae trust deed had been assigned by the executor to George Bartholomae, and he had received a master's deed conveying to him No. 872 West North avenue. George Bartholomae filed objections to the approval of the receiver's report, and took the position that he, as the owner of No. 872 West North avenue, was entitled to be paid by the receiver said sum of $726.90, by virtue of the following provision found in the Bartholomae trust deed: "The grantors waive all rights to the possession of and income from the said premises pending such foreclosure proceedings and until the period of redemption from any sale thereunder expires, and agree that a receiver shall be appointed to take possession or charge of said

And the fact that the owner of the mortgage becomes the purchaser does not entitle the mortgagor, as against the owner of the equity of redemption, to have the receiver continued during the period allowed for redemption, to enable him to collect out of the rents and profits the overdue interest and costs which he had agreed to pay to the mortgagee, in consideration of which she had bid the full amount of the mortgage, interest, and costs. Bogardus v. Moses, 181 Ill. 554, 54 N. E. 984.

The Indiana statute of 1861 provided that the judgment debtor should be entitled to the possession of the premises for one year after the sale, and that in case they were not redeemed at the end of the year he should be liable to the purchaser for their reasonable rents and profits. Under this statute the court held that where the mortgage and the foreclosure decree both provided that the mortgagee might apply the rents and profits to payment of costs and insurance, such mortgagee, who became the purchaser on foreclosure, was entitled to have a receiver appointed to collect the rents during the year of redemption, and apply them on such costs and insurance until they were paid. Chase v. Ball, 79 Ind. 311. And the purchaser on foreclosure was held entitled to have a receiver appointed to collect the rents and hold them until the end of the period of redemption, and then pay them to him if the premises had not been redeemed, where it was shown that the tenant had contracted to pay the rents to the mortgagor, and that the latter was insolvent and could not redeem. Connelly v. Dickson, 76 Ind. 443. But notwithstanding the insolvency of the mortgagor, one to whom he assigned the rents during the year of redemption, in payment of a just debt, was not liable therefor to the purchaser on foreclosure, where no receiver for such rents had been asked for or appointed. Ridgeway v. First Nat. Bank, 78 Ind. 119.

In 1881 the statute was changed so as to provide that the owner of the real estate should be entitled to the possession of the same for one year from the date of the sale. Under this statute a mortgagee to whom the premises were sold on foreclosure for the full amount of the judgment, interest, and costs was not entitled to the rents and profits during the year for redemption, although a receiver had been appointed on his application without objection by the mortgagor. World Bldg. Loan, & Invest. Co. v. Marlin, 151 Ind. 630, 52 N. E. 198. But where the mortgaged lands are inadequate to secure the debt, and the debtor is insolvent, the mortgagee, who becomes the purchaser on foreclosure, may have a receiver appointed to receive the rents and profits during the period for redemption, to be paid to him if the mortgagor does not redeem, and to the latter if he does. Merritt v. Gibson, 129 Ind. 155, 15 L. R. A. 277, 27 N. E. 136. And the fact that the mortgagee, who purchased on foreclosure for less than the amount of the judgment, did not obtain a personal judgment against the owner of the land, who had purchased it from the mortgagor, did not affect the mortgagee's right to the rent of the land during the redemption period.

The assignee of a mortgage on an interest in a mining claim, who becomes the purchaser on foreclosure, is entitled, under the law of California, to have a receiver appointed to receive his share of the profits from the working of the mine during the period for redemption, where it is shown that the mortgagor is insolvent, and that the claim will be worked out and become useless before the expiration of such period. Hill v. Taylor, 22 Cal. 191.

But in Cowen v. Arnold, 58 Hun. 437, 12 N. Y. Supp. 601, the purchaser on foreclosure made no claim to rent in a receiver's hands accruing between the time of purchase and the delivery of the deed, his only claim being that he was entitled to that portion of the month's rent, paid in advance, accruing after the delivery of the deed.

premises and collect such income, and the same, less receivership expenses, pay to the person entitled to a deed under the certificate of sale, or in reduction of the redemption money, if said premises be redeemed," which provision was set out in full in the decree of foreclosure and sale; and Henry Bartholomae, Jr., upon the hearing of objections to the master's report, by his solicitor in open court waived any right to the said sum of $726.90, or any part thereof, as executor of Phillip Bartholomae, deceased, and averred the same belonged to the said George Bartholomae, as the owner of No. 872 West North avenue, under the provisions of the Bartholomae trust deed. It also appeared that, although the report recited payment to said executor of said sum of $574.87, the executor had not received said sum, but that the same had been tendered to him by the receiver. The superior court sustained the objections of George Bartholomae to the receiver's report, and ordered the receiver to pay said sum of $726.90 to George Bartholomae as the person entitled to receive the same under and by virtue of the provisions with reference to rent contained in the Bartholomae trust deed. Paul Schaeppi prosecuted an appeal from the order of the superior court sustaining exceptions to said receiver's report to the appellate court for the first district, where the order of the superior court was affirmed; and, a certificate of importance having been granted, he has prosecuted a further appeal to this court.

Messrs. Fred H. Atwood, Frank B. Pease, William S. Corbin, Charles O. Loucks, and Edward C. Nichols, for appellant:

When the entire indebtedness secured by the first trust deed was paid in full, the receiver had no further relation with its owner, and the money on hand belonged to the holder of the second trust deed.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Paul Schaeppi, has assigned as error, and Emil R. Haase, the receiver, has assigned as cross error, the action of the superior and appellate courts in refusing to approve said receiver's report, and the only question discussed in this court is the legality of the order of the superior court directing the receiver to pay said sum of $152.23 to George Bartholomae, instead of to appellant, Schaeppi.

The sole objects of the several trust deeds sought to be foreclosed in this proceeding were to secure the payment of the several sums of money mentioned therein, and, in case of foreclosure and sale, during the time of redemption the grantor in the trust deeds was entitled to the possession of the premises and to receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof. If, however, the premises were inadequate security, the person liable to pay the indebtedness insolvent, the person in possession of the premises committing waste, or other equitable grounds were shown, and any part of the decree of foreclosure was not satisfied by the sale, the court in which the foreclosure suit was pending might, through a receiver, and not otherwise, appropriate the rents, issues, and profits arising from the premises during the period of redemption for the purpose of paying the portion of the indebtedness which was not satisfied by a sale of the premises. The result of the foreclosure proceedings was to merge said trust deeds into the decree, and the purchaser at the foreclosure sale held under the decree, and not under the trust deeds, and after a sale such purchaser was entitled only to such rights as were conferred upon him by the statute, which were (1) a right to a certificate of purchase; (2) a right to a deed of the premises at the expiration of fifteen months from the date of sale, in case no redemption of the premises was made; and (3) in case of redemption, to receive back the purchase money, with interest, and any taxes he had paid upon the property during the period of redemption.

It is urged, however, that by virtue of the provision found in the Bartholomae trust deed the person entitled to a deed under the foreclosure sale, in case no redemption took place, was expressly granted the rents during the period of redemption, and that, no redemption having taken place and a deed having been made to George Bartholomae, he was entitled to the rents arising from said premises during the period of redemption. We cannot accede to this contention. The provision with reference to rent, found in the trust deed, was a covenant between the grantor in the deed and the cestui que trust, and prior to the foreclosure sale was merged in the decree of foreclosure (Davis v. Dale, 150 Ill. 239, 37 N. E. 215; Lightcap v. Bradley, 186 Ill. 510, 58 N. E. 221; Haigh v. Carroll, 209 Ill. 576, 71 N. E. 317); and the purchaser at said sale took title under the decree, and he can claim no right by virtue of said provision found in the trust deed with reference to rent. In Davis v. Dale, supra, the trust deed provided that the grantors should pay the taxes and assessments levied upon the property described in the trust deed, and should not suffer the premises, or any part thereof, to be sold or forfeited for any tax or assessment, and that, upon default in the performance of any of the covenants of the trust deed, the trustee, or any person appointed by the court, might take possession of the premises, collect the rents, issues, and profits, and apply the same toward the payment of taxes, etc. A bill was filed to foreclose the trust deed, and a decree of foreclosure and sale was made, and the premises were sold by the master to the complainant for the full amount of the decree. A receiver had been appointed upon the filing of the bill, who remained in possession of the premises during the period of redemption, and, upon his final report coming in, he was ordered by the court to pay the taxes upon said premises which had accrued during the period of redemption, under the provisions of said trust deed, out of the rent in his hands which had been earned during that period. That decree, upon appeal to the appellate court for the first district, was reversed and upon a further appeal to this court the judgment of the appellate court was affirmed; and it was held that the only object of the appointment of the receiver was to preserve the security and to collect and apply the rents and profits to the payment of the indebtedness secured by the trust deed, and that, the indebtedness having been satisfied by a sale of the premises, there was no occasion for the continuance of the receivership; but, as the grantor was entitled to the rents and profits arising from the premises during the period of redemption, the receiver would be treated as having been in possession of the premises for his benefit. It was, however, urged that the complainant, who was the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, was entitled to have the taxes which had accrued during the period of redemption paid out of the rents earned during that period by virtue of the provisions of the trust deed. In reply to that contention the court (on page 243 of 150 Ill., page 216 of 37 N. E.) said: "The contention of counsel for appellant that in some way the purchaser at the master's sale acquired equities, under the clauses and covenants of the trust deed, for the payment of taxes by the grantor, is equally untenable. By virtue of the lien created the mortgagee or cestui que trust had the right to have the security foreclosed, and the property sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of the secured debt. But when this has been done, and the lien enforced by a sale of the property, and the proceeds applied, the mortgage or trust deed has expended its force and the property is no longer subject to its provisions. Ogle v. Koerner, 140 Ill. 170, 29 N. E. 563; Seligman v. Laubheimer, 58 Ill. 124. Nor does it in any way affect the result that the holder of the secured indebtedness becomes the purchaser at the sale, whether he be the mortgagee or cestui que trust or not. By becoming the purchaser a new relation created by the statute exists, in no wise dependent upon any privity of contract between the purchaser and mortgagor." In Lightcap v. Bradley, supra, the court held that, upon the foreclosure of a trust deed in the nature of a mortgage, all the rights and liabilities growing out of the trust deed are merged in the decree, and that upon a sale of the premises under the decree the only interests of the purchaser at the sale are those rights which are evidenced by the certificate of purchase. In Haigh v. Carroll, supra, a trust deed was foreclosed upon a leasehold interest. One of the complainants purchased the premises at the foreclosure sale for the entire amount of the decree. A receiver had been appointed, who remained in possession of the premises during the period of redemption. He paid out of the rents collected by him from the property something like $7,000 for ground rent, taxes, insurance, etc. The trust deed provided that any rents that might be collected, less a commission of 5 per cent for collecting, after the foreclosure sale and before the time of redemption had expired, should be paid to the purchaser of the premises at the foreclosure sale. On a contest over the approval of the master's report it was held that, notwithstanding said provisions in the trust deed, the rents did not pass to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, but that they belonged to the owner of the equity of redemption; that all the complainants were entitled to was to have their debt paid; and that all the purchaser was entitled to were such rights as he acquired by the certificate issued to him upon the sale.

It could there have been urged, as it is urged here, that by virtue of the provisions of the trust deed the purchaser should receive the rents during the period of redemption, as he must be held to have bid more for the premises than he would have bid but for such provision, and that he should be protected in his bid by being decreed the rents collected during the period of redemption. It is, however, clear that whatever rights the purchaser obtained at the foreclosure sale were represented by the certificate of purchase, and that the rents did not pass to him by virtue of said certificate; that his rights as such purchaser were created by the statute, and were in no wise affected by the provisions of the trust deed, which were merged in the decree of foreclosure. In the Haigh Case (on page 581 of 209 Ill., page 319 of 71 N. E.) it was said: "Reliance is placed upon that provision of the trust deed to the effect that during the period of redemption the rents of the mortgaged premises shall be paid to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. So far as that provision is concerned, the sale satisfies the mortgage and renders all its provisions inoperative. They were effective only for the purpose of securing satisfaction of the mortgage debt. When that purpose was accomplished, their force was entirely spent." And again: "The rights of the complainants under the trust deed were at an end; and, as the purchasers had no right to the possession or rents until the certificate of purchase had ripened into a deed, it is apparent that no right existed by which either the complainants or the purchasers could control the money arising from rent during the redemption period."

The debt secured by the Bartholomae trust deed, with the exception of $540.92, was satisfied by a sale of the premises. That amount, with interest, out of the rents in his hands arising from the premises, was tendered to the executor of Phillip Bartholomae by the receiver, which paid the Bartholomae foreclosure decree and was a satisfaction of that indebtedness. The holder of such indebtedness, having received payment 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

thereof, must be satisfied, and the purchaser of the premises covered by the Bartholomae trust deed, no redemption having taken place, having received a deed for the premises, has received all that, under the statute, he is entitled to, and must also be satisfied. The balance remaining in the hands of the receiver, to wit, $152.23, under the decree, is overplus and should be paid to the appellant as the holder of the junior encumbrance.

The judgment of the Appellate Court and the order of the Superior Court will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the Superior Court for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

CORDELIA NUTTER

v.

BEESON H. BROWN et al., Appts.

(.... W. Va.)

1. Appeal—from decree for costs.

Ordinarily an appeal does not lie from a decree for costs only in a chancery suit; but there are exceptions to the rule, turning on the question of the discretionary power of

Headnotes by POFFENBARGER, J.

Case Note.—In addition to the many cases cited in the opinion countenancing the general statement that an appeal does not lie from a decree for costs only in a chancery suit, see also DuBois v. Kirk, 158 U. S. 58, 39 L. ed. 895, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, and City Nat. Bank v. Hunter, 152 U. S. 512, 38 L. ed. 534, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675. But the strong reasoning of the court in favor of an exception where the right to costs is determinable, as a matter of right, under a statute or under a settled rule of law, is supported by a few cases not cited in the opinion.

While recognizing the attitude of the Federal Supreme Court as expressed in the cases cited above, and in NUTTER v. BROWN, the circuit court, in The City of Augusta, 25 C. C. A. 430, 50 U. S. App. 39, 80 Fed. 297, an admiralty case, traces the position of the Supreme Court to the decision in Canter v. American Ins. Co. 3 Pet. 307, 7 L. ed. 688, and distinguishes that case upon the ground that at the time of its rendition there was no statutory regulation of the question of costs, that, consequently, their allowance was in every case a matter of discretion, and therefore not subject to review; whereas now, by statute, costs are made a matter of right under certain conditions and to disallow them is an infringement of legal right which should be redressed upon appeal. "We therefore hold," the trial court respecting costs. A decree for such costs as are discretionary is not appealable; but one for costs not in the discretion of the court is appealable, provided the amount thereof is more than $100.

2. Costs—discretionary.

Extraordinary costs, such as allowances of expenses and compensation of receivers, either as between the receiver and the fund in court and parties, or as between party and party, are not discretionary, and a decree respecting such costs is appealable.

3. Same—decree appealable.

Such costs may, in a proper case, be provisionally allowed to the officer out of the fund, and ultimately decreed to be paid to the party entitled to the fund by his adversary; but in either case a decree of such character is appealable.

4. Receiver — compensation — irregular appointment.

Mere irregularities in the appointment of a special receiver, acquiesced in by the parties, will neither deprive such receiver of his compensation, nor the successful party of a decree over against his adversary for the amount thereof, when it has been allowed out of a fund belonging to the party so prevailing.

5. Same—when appointed.

When, in a suit in equity, the title to personal property of such character as renders sale thereof necessary for the adequate protection of the rights of the parties interested is involved, the court in which such suit is pending may properly appoint a receiver to take charge of it, and make sale thereof.

6. Decree for costs—disturbance on appeal.

When, in such case, one defendant claimed five sixths of the property in dispute, and two others jointly claimed the remaining interest, and the court adjudged the property to belong to the plaintiff, and gave the ordinary costs against all the defendants.

says the court, "that while, perhaps, there may be no appeal from the ordinary questions within the common jurisdiction of taxing masters, there may be when the force of a statute or some positive rule of law is involved, although it concerns only costs."

This decision is followed in Primrose v. Fenno, 113 Fed. 375, where the lower court, upon its determination solely as to the manner of taxing costs for witness fees, a matter governed by statute, holds that the party considering himself aggrieved is entitled to a writ of error on exceptions taken to the court's rulings upon the question of costs alone.

It is again upheld in Re Michigan C. R. Co. 59 C. C. A. 643, 124 Fed. 727, where mandamus was granted by the circuit court of appeals, directing the district court to allow an appeal upon the question of allowance of costs only, where such allowance was based upon a construction, alleged to be erroneous, of a statute establishing the right to a given item as costs. The court states: "We see nothing in any of the decided cases to justify us in holding that an appeal will not lie when the decree complained of involves the construction and application of a positive statute involving the allowance of any costs at all. If the provision of § 828 applied, the court had no discretion as to the compensation to be allowed. If it did not apply, when properly construed, to the facts of the case, it was error of law to hold that it did control, and to allow compensation according to its terms. That the decree was final and appealable, we entertain no doubt."

After noting the recognized exception in favor of an appeal where the costs are payable out of a particular fund in court (Citing Internal Improvement Fund v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 26 L. ed. 1157; Williams v. Morgan, 111 U. S. 684, 28 L. ed. 559, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638, and Mason v. Pewabic Min. Co. 153 U. S. 361, 38 L. ed. 745, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 847), the court further says: "Nor is 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) it essential to the right of appeal that the allowance shall be made from a fund in court. If there is no fund, and the court undertakes to provide one by pronouncing a decree against one of the parties to the proceeding, and directs execution to issue, every reason exists for allowing a review which could possibly exist when an allowance is made out of a fund in which the appealing party has only an interest."

An appeal solely upon the question as to the allowance of costs was heard in State v. Lewis, 10 Lea, 168, and, although the action of the lower court was affirmed, the matter being discretionary, and not governed by any statute or settled rule of law, the court does not deny the right to bring this question alone before the court by appeal, but inferentially asserts its jurisdiction to revise where the allowance has been made in abuse of the discretion possessed.

Similarly, on dismissal without cost of a bill to set aside a judgment, an appeal was taken in Biddle's Appeal, 5 Sadler (Pa.) 288, 19 W. N. C. 219, 8 Atl. 640, upon which the only question raised was as to the disallowance of costs to the defendant. While the right to entertain such an appeal was not questioned or discussed, jurisdiction was exercised, and the decree reversed, on the ground that the disallowance was an abuse of discretion.

See also Spengler v. Hahn, 95 Wis. 472, 70 N. W. 466, where, a case coming up on various exceptions, all were overruled except that as to the allowance of costs, upon which subject the action of the trial court was reversed for manifest abuse of discretion in failing to allow them to a successful plaintiff.

So, in Haire v. McCardle, 107 Ga. 775, 33 S. E. 683, a judgment appealed from was affirmed as to all points except in regard to the allowance of costs, upon which point it was reversed as contrary to statutory provisions governing the situation.

reserving its judgment as to the extraordinary costs, and afterwards decreed that the defendant who had claimed the five-sixths interest pay the same, the decree as to the extraordinary costs will not be disturbed on appeal, unless the court can see that such defendant has been required to pay more than his due proportion of the entire cost.

(November 7, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harrison County in plaintiff's favor in a suit brought to reform a deed and to compel an accounting for oil and gas taken from the property involved. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. Scott and William T. George for appellants.

Messrs. E. G. Smith, E. A. Brannon, and Millard F. Snyder for appellee.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a third appeal in the case of Nutter v. Brown, the history of which may be obtained by reference to 51 W. Va. 598, 42 S. E. 661, and 54 W. Va. 82, 46 S. E. 375, where the dispositions made of the first and second appeals are reported. The decree from which the second appeal was taken directed the special receiver to pay over and deliver the proceeds of the property in controversy to the plaintiff, Cordelia Nutter, and the defendants C. T. Arnett and J. M. Garrett, in the proportions in which they were entitled, one half to Cordelia Nutter, and one fourth to each of the other two parties, and required the defendants Beeson H. Brown, Henry R. Smith, and Gertrude Duncan to pay to the plaintiff, Cordelia Nutter, her costs. But that decree reserved for future adjudication all questions relating to the compensation of the receiver and his costs and expenses, and also the question whether such costs and expenses should be taxed against the defendants as part of the costs in the cause. After the affirmation of said decree by this court, the receiver filed his report in the court below, showing that he had received on account of the oil 14,052.42, had paid out on account of taxes $404.04, had paid a fee of $25 to the attorney of the receiver, and had retained his commission of 5 per cent, amounting to $702.62, making a total of $1,127.66, which, deducted from the total receipts, left $12,924.76, which he had distributed to the parties entitled under the decree aforesaid; and the court confirmed his report and discharged him. Later, May 28, 1904, Cordelia Nutter, James M. Garrett, and C. T. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Arnett, out of whose funds said attorney's fee and receiver's compensation had been retained, applied to the court for a decree against Beeson H. Brown, one of the defendants, for said sums as part of their costs in the prosecution of their suit, and such decree was entered for the sum of $723.62. From it Brown has obtained the present appeal.

The appeal is resisted on the ground that the decree is for costs only, as to which no appeal lies. The appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases pecuniary in their nature is limited by the Constitution to those in which the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is of greater value or amount than $100. Const. art. 8, § 3. This expressly excludes the addition of costs to the value or amount in controversy for the purpose of making it more than $100. It does not prevent costs, when a subject of independent adjudication, from reaching the appellate court. Taney v. Woodmansee, 23 W. Va. 709, in which an appeal was entertained from a decree overruling a motion to quash an execution, although the amount in controversy was composed wholly of costs. It only inhibits addition of costs to the matter in controversy on the merits, in order to bring the amount up to the jurisdictional point, a sum in excess of $100, and has nothing to do with the question whether an appeal from a decree for costs only may be entertained. In this view of the constitutional limitation my associates do not concur. However, the general rule is, and always has been, both in England and in this country, that, independently of any constitutional limitation, a decree for costs only is not ordinarily appealable. Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. 461; Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. 611; Graham v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 45 W. Va. 702, 32 S. E. 245; Cowles v. Whitman, 10 Conn. 121, 25 Am. Dec. 60; Smith v. Shaffer, 50 Md. 132; Lake v. Shumate, 20 S. C. 23; Temple v. Lawson, 19 Ark. 148; Howe v. Hutchison, 105 Ill. 501; Shields v. Bogliolo, 7 Mo. 136; Sanborn v. Kittredge, 20 Vt. 632, 50 Am. Dec. 58; Glendale Elastic Fabrics Co. v. Smith, 100 U. S. 110, 25 L. ed. 547; Wood v. Weimar, 104 U. S. 786, 26 L. ed. 779; Russell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 433, 26 L. ed. 1060; Paper-Bag Cases, 105 U. S. 766, 26 L. ed. 959; Internal Improvement Fund v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 26 L. ed. 1157; Burns v. Rosenstein, 135 U. S. 449, 34 L. ed. 193, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817; Du Bois v. Kirk, 158 U. S. 58, 39 L. ed. 895, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729; City Nat. Bank v. Hunter, 162 U. S. 512, 38 L. ed. 534, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675; Citizens' Bank v. Cannon, 164 U. S. 319, 41 L. ed. 451, 17 Sup.

Ct. Rep. 89; Kittredge v. Race, 92 U. S. 116, 23 L. ed. 488; Canter v. American Ins. Co. 3 Pet. 307, 7 L. ed. 688; 3 English Ruling Cases, 243; 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 319. This is true, however, of those cases only in which the awarding of costs is in the discretion of the court below. In refusing to take jurisdiction, the courts all say the reason for declining is that the case is one in which the trial court has discretion to award or refuse costs. In 3 English Ruling Cases, 243, the rule on the subject is stated as follows: "It was the general rule of the court of chancery—which is now confirmed and made absolute by the judicature act 1873, § 49, so far as relates to costs which are in the discretion of the court—that no appeal can be entertained upon a mere question of costs." This is the old rule of equity practice, simply declared or confirmed by statute. The reason given by the authorities in this country, where the judiciary act governing the present English practice has no application, is the discretionary power of the court below. "Whether costs shall be decreed by a court of equity is a question always addressing itself to the sound discretion of the chancellor, and the authority of an appellate court to correct his decrees is not without doubt." 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 218 (Cowles v. Whitman, Sanborn v. Kittredge, Howe v. Hutchison, Lake v. Shumate, Smith v. Shaffer, and Temple v. Lawson, all cited); Joslyn v. Parlin, 54 Vt. 670; Bixby v. La Moille Valley R. Co. 57 Vt. 548; Hastings v. Perry, 20 Vt. 272. The opinion in Temple v. Lawson, supra, seems to have been very carefully prepared, and makes the clearest and most exhaustive presentation of the authorities to be found among the American decisions; and the conclusion announced is that costs are not always in the discretion of the chancellor, but that such costs as are in his discretion cannot be the subject of appeal. His conclusion is expressed in the following language: "The discretion which we have said resides in the court to award or give costs must be understood to relate only to those costs in a suit which are denominated 'general,' or properly 'costs in the cause,' and not such as may be said to be extraordinary, such as directing the costs of the suit to be paid out of a particular fund, or where the court, under special circumstances and a particular state of facts, developed by a proper course of pleading and demanded at the proper time, will direct counsel fees to be paid by a party either generally or out of a particular fund." The principle thus laid down is fully sustained by the English decisions from which the rule in this country was originally deduced, but in the specification of instances it stops short of many of the precedents. The tendency by the courts of this country is to limit, rather than extend, the exception to the general rule; in other words, it is to allow but one exception, namely, a decree for payment of costs out of the fund, on the theory that it is the only exception recognized in the old English practice. Thus, Mr. Justice Bradley, in Internal Improvement Fund v. Greenough, supra, said: "But it was held by Lord Cottenham in Angell v. Davis, 4 Myl. & C. 360, that when the case is not one of personal costs, in which the court has ordered one party to pay them, but a case in which the court has directed them to be paid out of a particular fund, an appeal lies on the part of those interested in the fund." Lord Cottenham, indeed, suggested other cases in which an appeal might lie from a decree for costs, as where the costs are part of the specific relief prayed, and where the whole of the facts distinctly appear upon the face of the proceedings themselves, so that it is not necessary, in determining the question, to enter into any investigation of the merits. But these suggestions have not met with subsequent approval, and in the case of Taylor v. Dowlen, L. R. 4 Ch. 697, the court declared that they were not disposed to extend the case of Angell v. Davis, and dismissed an appeal brought by parties ordered to pay costs, which they claimed should be payable out of a fund." In Taylor v. Dowlen, referred to by Mr. Justice Bradley as repudiating the suggestion made by Lord Cottenham in Angell v. Davis, the court said: "As to another exception, namely, where the facts distinctly appear upon the face of the proceedings, so that the question can be decided without going into the merits, it must be taken to refer to cases where there is some inconsistency in the decree, as there was in Angell v. Davis, where the costs of a trustee who had committed a breach of trust were given out of the trust fund." Hence, that decision seems to depend, not alone upon the fact that the costs were decreed out of the trust fund, but also upon the lack of discretion in the court to allow costs to a trustee who had committed a breach of trust; such allowance being contrary to a well-settled principle of equity, not a mere rule relating to costs. In Taylor v. Dowlen the appeal was sought by a trustee from a decree requiring him to pay the costs of the suit, and the court refused to entertain it, because the act of the chancellor was discretionary. But a number of illustrations of want of such discretion is found in the English decisions. In Taylor v. Southgate, 4 Myl. & C. 203, a decree which involved principles of equity relating to the payment of costs was appealed from on the sole question of costs. Chappell v. Gregory, 2 De G. J. & S. 111, states the general rule to be that there cannot be a rehearing for costs alone, unless some principle is involved in the mode of dealing with them. Rochester v. Lee, 2 De G. M. & G. 427, is a case in which the appeal was for costs alone, arising upon two or more trials of an issue out of chancery, and the court entertained it, and reversed the decree, because the error of the chancellor appeared upon the face of the record. In Chitty's Equity Index, 4th ed. 4481, the rule is stated as follows: "The court of appeal refuses to inquire into the various causes which may have influenced the decision of the court below in awarding costs, and therefore an appeal for costs will not generally be entertained; but, where the judge of the court below placed on record on the face of the decree the reason why he ordered the party to pay the costs, and such reason was founded on the determination of a question of law, the court of appeal allowed the question of law to be argued on the appeal, that it might determine whether the reason embodied in the decree by the judge below was well founded. Walker v. French, 21 Week. Rep. 493." The case cited as authority is not found in our library. Where a tenant by elegit had received rents and profits beyond the debt, and he was required to account for the excess and costs decreed against him, he was allowed to appeal as to the costs only. Owen v. Griffith, 1 Ves. Sr. 249. A decree for costs against an officer of the Crown is against law, and an appeal from such a decree was allowed in Lord Advocate v. Dunglas, 9 Clark & F. 173. The right of a trustee to his costs, like that of a mortgagee, is a matter of contract, and is not in the discretion of the judge, although he may be deprived of them for misconduct. Therefore, the costs of a trustee are not within § 49 of the judicature act of 1873, and an appeal lies from a decision respecting them. Cotterell v. Stratton, L. R. 8 Ch. 295; Farrow v. Austin, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 58; Turner v. Hancock, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 303; Hill v. Spurgeon, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 348. Whether trustees have been guilty of such unreasonable conduct as to deprive them of costs is a question which the court of appeal will entertain. Re Knight, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 82. Where the jurisdiction of the judge to order costs depends on the existence of a breach of an injunction or misconduct, an appeal lies against his finding that there has been such breach, although he inflicts costs only. Stevens v. Metropolitan District R. Co. L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 60; Witt v. Corcoran, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 69.

For the most part, cases in this country illustrating the principle upon which appeals from decrees for costs are entertained are those in which there has been a decree of payment out of a fund in court. Thus, in Temple v. Lawson the plaintiff, in an interpleader suit, had obtained a decree for $200 as counsel fees to be taxed as part of his costs, and the court, on appeal from that part of the decree alone, reversed the action of the lower court. In Internal Improvement Fund v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 528, 26 L. ed. 1158, the appeal was from an allowance of more than $60,000 to an agent out of a trust fund, which had been secured and preserved for the benefit of the parties who were entitled to it by his labor and expenditures. In Stuart v. Boulware, 133 U. S. 78, 33 L. ed. 568, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242, an appeal was entertained from a decree allowing a receiver, for his services and counsel fees paid by him, $6,500. In Grant v. Los Angeles & P. R. Co. 116 Cal. 71, 47 Pac. 872, an order fixing the compensation of a receiver, and taxing it as costs in the action against all the parties, and directing him to apply toward its payment the balance of the fund remaining in his hands as such receiver, was held to be appealable; the court saying it was, in legal effect, a final judgment upon a collateral matter, arising out of the action, and appealable by any party interested in the fund. The same principle had been declared in the case of Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 39 Pac. 604. In People ex rel. Port Huron & G. R. Co. v. Jones, 33 Mich. 303, an appeal from a decree refusing compensation was allowed to a receiver. The decree from which the appeal was taken was affirmed, but the case nevertheless shows an assertion of jurisdiction by the appellate court. It entertained the case, and affirmed the order of the lower court, refusing compensation.

It is perfectly apparent that cases of this class involve something more than discretion. What is awarded consists not of fees and ordinary court expenses, easily ascertainable by reference to mere rules concerning costs; it involves judicial investigation and determination. The allowance to a receiver for his services, or to an attorney or agent who has a lien upon a fund in court, is to be determined by the value of his services and the amount of his expenses. His right is a strong equity, analogous to an obligation founded upon an implied contract, and is not dependent upon the mere arbitrary discretion of the court, if his appointment was regular, and his conduct has been free from exception; and the ascertainment of the value of his services and the amount of expenses is the exercise of judicial power. To deny him compensation and expenses from some source, would be as unjust and indefensible on principle as to refuse to enforce a contract or to give damages for its breach. There may be discretion as to the mode of compensation, as to how it shall be paid, and as to the amount, but clearly none as to whether any shall be paid. Here another apt English rule, not stated by our courts, but invariably observed by them, sustains this view. When the conduct of the trustee is brought in question in determining whether any compensation shall be allowed him, and the doubt is resolved in his favor and an allowance made, no appeal can be allowed; for if there was no misconduct, the decree is right, and if there was, the court has discretion to allow him costs. Charles v. Jones, L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 80. The import of this is that, when there is no fault in the trustee, he cannot be deprived of his compensation. This is illustrative of the view that, where the appellate court can see that some principle has been violated in the allowance of costs, the decree is held to be not within the discretion of the court. Where an action is dismissed for total want of jurisdiction, the decisions say there is no power in the court to decree costs to the defendant. "When a circuit court dismisses a bill for want of jurisdiction it is without power to decree the payment of costs and penalties." Citizens' Bank v. Cannon, 164 U. S. 319, 41 L. ed. 451, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 89. "If there were no jurisdiction, there was no power to do anything but to strike the case from the docket. In that view of the subject, the matter was as much coram non jure as anything else could be, and the award of costs and execution was consequently void." Nashville v. Cooper, 6 Wall. 247, 18 L. ed. 851. While no case has been found in which an appeal from a decree for costs under such circumstances was taken, it is apprehended that in such case the court would have to say such award was not in the discretion of the court below, because violative of law; and, if in any other case the record should disclose an error in legal principle in the awarding of costs, an appeal ought to lie. Just at this point Hamilton v. Du Pre, 103 Ga. 795, 30 S. E. 248, is applicable. The plaintiff in certain proceedings in which a receiver had been appointed had utterly failed on the merits, but the trial court had decreed payment of all her costs, including the receiver's expenses and compensation, out of the proceeds of the plaintiff's property in the hands of the receiver, and the supreme court held the decree appealable, and reversed it, on the ground of an abuse of discretion on the part of the court below, which can only mean that the decree rendered was not a discretionary one. As the reason for immunity from appellate review and control is the discretion vested in the trial court, such immunity must cease when the reason ceases. When costs are not discretionary, an appeal lies. Therefore, it seems clear that, in the statement of the general rule on the subject by practically all of our authorities, the exception is ignored, though observed in the exercise of the jurisdiction. Accurately stated, it is that no appeal lies from a decree for such costs as are in the discretion of the chancellor. Ordinarily, the costs in equity are in his discretion.

What is here said respecting the want of discretion to disallow compensation to a receiver or trustee when his title is free from infirmity and his conduct from reproach, and he has performed his duties and accounted for the fund, is not to be taken to mean that the chancellor acts wholly without discretion in such cases. As to the amount of such compensation, he is not bound by the strict rules governing contract obligations. It is to be determined upon equitable, not legal, principles. Much latitude is allowed him in the adoption of the rule by which it shall be fixed. It may be by a commission on the amount of the fund, a lump sum, or a salary. Many cases say compensation to a receiver is in the sound discretion of the court, and therefore subject to review. Among them is a decision of this court in the case of Crumlish v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. 40 W. Va. 627, 22 S. E. 90, holding as follows: "There is no fixed rule in this state as to the mode of allowing compensation to a special receiver, whether by way of commission or a fixed sum. Usually when the fund is large, a lump sum is proper. The amount and mode of allowance are within the sound discretion of the court, under the circumstances of the particular case, subject to review on appeal." In the same case the court comes to the same conclusion as to the allowance to a receiver of counsel fees. The principle adopted and applied in that case fully sustains the position here taken as to the discretionary power of the court in such cases. It denies to the trial court the arbitrary discretion allowed in the case of ordinary costs, by saying the allowance is in all such cases subject to review. In that case the parties obtained in this court, upon other grounds than a decree for costs, a locus standi, and so much of the decree as related to costs and allowances came up incidentally; in other words, it was not an appeal from a decree for costs only, but the principles applied in the disposition of the questions relating to costs clearly deny to the trial court that broad discretion, from the exercise of which there is no appeal, and make it clear that in such cases an appeal may be entertained. The uniform practice of giving the parties a hearing in fixing the amount of compensation and expenses sustains the view that it is a collateral, rather than an incidental, exercise of judicial power; and the freedom with which appeals respecting such allowances are allowed speaks louder as to the nature of the function than the casual observations made by the courts in disposing of the questions raised.

As to the power of the court to decree the extraordinary costs in favor of one party against another (not the ordinary costs usually incident to litigation and the basis of its exercise), but little authority has been found. Practically all the cases reported deal with the propriety of the allowance to the receiver, trustee, or agent out of the fund. As to these parties, as has been indicated, there is little room for the exercise of discretion, such as to prevent appellate review. The appellate courts deal with them freely. Some observations made in Cutter v. Pollock, 4 N. D. 205, 25 L. R. A. 377, 50 Am. St. Rep. 644, 59 N. W. 1062, are to the effect that a decree of such costs from one party to another may be made; but it may be doubted whether what is said there is to be considered as an adjudication, since the decree was reversed because the court failed to adjudicate anything in respect to such costs. The language referred to is as follows: "If the receiver is allowed to pay and reimburse himself out of the moneys in his hands, the decree should provide whether the owner of such moneys shall be indemnified by the recovery of judgment against some other party to the case for this invasion of his property. Ordinarily, it would seem to us (but we do not decide the point) that the receiver should be protected by being permitted to look to the funds in his hands to save him against loss. This appears to have been done in this case. Such rule may, however, work great hardship in particular cases; and in some instances the receiver has, on this account, been compelled to look for indemnity to the party at whose instance he was appointed. See Weston v. Watts, 45 Hun, 219; French v. Gifford, 31 Iowa, 428; Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 2 Paige, 438. Certainly, if the court, in such a case, allows him to pay himself out of the funds, it should compel the other party to the action to make good the loss thus occasioned to the successful litigant. It is impossible for a court to make an intelligent decree when property is in the hands of a receiver, and is to be disposed of by the decree, without settling in advance the rights of the receiver with respect to compensation and expenditures, and whether he shall be allowed to pay himself out of the funds in his hands."

Concerning provisional allowance out of the fund, 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. p. 1410, says: "Where a party is entitled to his costs, but it has not been decided who ought ultimately to bear them, payment is often directed to be made out of a fund in court, or by one of the parties, to the proceedings, 'without prejudice to the question how the same are ultimately to be borne.' The absence, however, of these words, or words of a like meaning, from an order directing payment of costs out of a fund in court, does not necessarily imply that the court has decided that the fund out of which the costs are paid is that which must ultimately bear them; and costs paid out of a fund, under an order from which those words are omitted, may be directed to be recouped out of another fund, which is primarily liable for that purpose." The substance of this is that the court may make a provisional allowance out of the fund, without losing its power to place the burden ultimately upon the party who ought to bear it. It affords no certain indication as to whether the power to award costs between parties or between one fund and another (which is substantially the same thing as between party and party) is so far within the discretion of the chancellor as to preclude review, and, if so, whether such discretion extends to all costs.

Abundant authority sustains the position that, under circumstances making it just and equitable to do so, the compensation of the receiver may be decreed against the plaintiff. In French v. Gifford, supra, the appellate court, modifying the decree of the lower court, gave the receiver by way of compensation, $1,000 out of the fund and a decree against the plaintiff for $2,000, the balance of his compensation. In Radford v. Folsom, 55 Iowa, 276, 7 N. W. 604, the defendants demanded that two thirds of the receiver's compensation be charged to the plaintiff, and the court, admitting the power to do so under proper circumstances, upon an examination of the record, held that the circumstances were not such as to make it equitable to do so. In Cutter v. Pollock, 7 N. D. 631, 76 N. W. 235, on the second appeal, the court affirmed a decree in favor of the defendants against the plaintiffs for three fifths of the amount which the receiver had retained out of the funds which had been adjudged to belong to the defendants; the receiver having been appointed at the instance of the plaintiffs, who had failed at the hearing on the merits. In Cassidy v. Harrelson, 1 Colo. App. 438, 29 Pac. 525, the court held as follows: "A receiver having been appointed by the court, on application of the interveners in a cause wherein they were not entitled to intervene, the costs incident to the appointment were properly adjudged against them." In Highley v. Deane, 64 Ill. App. 389, the court held that "where a party, without probable cause, obtains the appointment of a receiver, he should be made to pay the entire expense thus by him created;" and the decision was affirmed in 168 Ill. 266, 48 N. E. 50. In Kerr v. Hill, 27 W. Va. 576, 616, the receiver's compensation and expenses were allowed out of the fund, to the prejudice of the defendants, who were subsequent lienors, entitled to the surplus, although the appointment was illegal, because without notice, and made at the instance of the plaintiff. In French v. Gifford, cited, the court said: "In cases like the one under consideration, we may adjudge the costs to one or either of the parties, or apportion them."

What principle, respecting the nature of the power to decree such costs as between parties, is deducible from these or other precedents cited? Has the chancellor irrevocable discretion? The many instances in which appeals have been entertained from decrees for such costs, turning on the sole question of who should pay them, answer the question in the negative. Although costs, when ascertained and fixed as to amount, they are not costs in the discretion of the chancellor. The title to such costs, as between parties, must be determined judicially upon equitable principles; else there is, in the language of the American authorities, an abuse of discretion, or, in the language of the English authorities, a lack of discretion to award them. In such cases, therefore, an appeal lies.

The decree appealed from gives costs to the prevailing party, in the absence of any attempt on the part of the defendant to show any reason why the general rule should be varied or departed from. The litigation was occasioned by an act of fraud on his part in the procurement of the deed, which made it necessary for the plaintiff to bring this suit in order to obtain what belonged to her. The case is not one involving the administration of a fund, such as a trust estate, a decedent's estate, an estate of an insolvent person or corporation, in which both plaintiff and defendant have an interest, and out of which the costs must be taken, for the reason that they cannot be obtained from any other source. The controversy was one over the title to property. There was no middle ground,—no community of interest. The whole fund belonged to one or the other. Upon obtaining it, the prevailing party was entitled to have along with it the necessary costs of the prosecution of the suit. No reason is perceived why, under such circumstances, any necessary costs of the litigation should be paid 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

out of the property or funds of the successful party. The appointment of the receiver was without notice, it is true, but the defendants acquiesced in it by their failure to move for his discharge; and, had they procured his discharge on such ground, he would have been immediately reappointed, if the case was such, in its nature and circumstances, as to warrant the appointment of a receiver. The property he was to receive was not real estate, or the rents, issues, and profits thereof, but personal property; and in such case the statute does not forbid the appointment of a receiver in vacation without notice, and such appointment is voidable only, not void. High, Receivers, §§ 111 et seq. The defendants recognized the authority of the receiver, moved for an increased bond, acquiesced in his appointment by not asking for his discharge. Failure to give notice cannot afford any ground for withholding costs, for it was a mere irregularity, which has been waived. "No one, whether a party to the suit or not, who has recognized the authority of a receiver in any way, can attack the validity of the order appointing him for mere irregularities." 17 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 757, citing many authorities.

The ability of the defendants to make restitution of the value of the property is advanced as a substantial reason why no receiver should have been appointed. In many cases insolvency of the defendant must be alleged, but they are usually cases in which questions of title are not involved. Here, title alone is the bone of contention. It was not a claim for money, but to the title to oil,—the royalty oil, and the bill alleged that the defendants' claim thereto was founded upon an act of fraud. It further appeared that, for the full and adequate protection of plaintiff's interest, the oil should be sold at such times during the pendency of the suit as the market might be favorable; and the discretion to say when such sales should be made should not be left to her adversaries. Our statutes and our decisions import that the title and rightful control of property must be adequately protected, and discountenance the view that no injury results if the owner may obtain its value in damages. The courts should protect his property from misappropriation, and preserve his title to it, so that he may use, retain, or sell it, and determine the time of sale, purchaser, terms, and the price; and when legal remedies are inadequate for such protection, equity supplies the defect. Peterson v. Hall (W. Va.) 50 S. E. 603; dissenting opinion in Zinn v. Zinn, 54 W. Va. 483, 46 S. E. 202. An injunction may be awarded to protect any plaintiff in a suit for specific property, pending either at law or in equity, against injury from the sale, removal or concealment of such property. Code 1899, chap. 133, § 1. The same chapter, at § 28, provides for the appointment of a receiver in any proper case pending in a court of equity in which the property of a corporation, firm, or person is involved, and there is danger of the loss or misappropriation of the same, or a material part thereof. Both remedies are extraordinary, and seem to be given for substantially the same purposes. Our opinion, therefore, is that there was not such want of cause as made the appointment useless and unjustifiable.

One other contention must be disposed of. Henry R. Smith and Gertrude Duncan were codefendants of Brown, and resisted the demand of the plaintiff by their joint answer, and by uniting in the second appeal. They claimed a one-fifth interest in the royalty oil. Though they were not parties to the original transaction under which Brown claimed, and subsequently obtained their interest from or through him, they claimed the benefit of his act. But the former decree gave general costs against all three, whereby these claimants of a one-fifth interest were made to pay two thirds of said costs. The undue proportion thereof may, for aught that can be ascertained from the record, amount to one fifth of the extraordinary costs. We have no taxation of it. In view of this, we see no reason for disturbing the decree, and it will therefore be affirmed.

Brannon, P., dissenting:

I cannot see that Brown should pay the receiver's compensation. The general rule is that such compensation is paid out of the fund. Elk Fork Oil & Gas Co. v. Foster, 39 C. C. A. 615, 99 Fed. 495; Kerr v. Hill, 27 W. Va. 616. There is no need of this large extra expenditure, because there is no danger of loss or suggestion of insolvency. It was only a conflict of title to oil. Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 37, 94 Am. St. Rep. 910, 43 S. E. 172. If the plaintiff, having no legal ground for a receiver, chose to ask one, she should pay for his services. There was no emergency calling for the appointment of a receiver without notice. Notice is required before a receiver can be appointed in vacation. Batson v. Findley, 52 W. Va. 343, 43 S. E. 142; Ruffner v. Mairs, 33 W. Va. 655, 11 S. E. 5; Smith, Receiver-ships, 14. But that was error only, and did not make the appointment void, so as to refuse commission. Alderson, Receivers, 157, 168. But can we not consider the fact that notice was not given, and that there was no need of a receiver, in exercising discretion as to piling the costs on Brown? Though the appointment was reversible for 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) want of notice and good ground, we cannot reverse it, because appeal from that order is barred. I do not think there can be an appeal or writ of error resting alone on error as to costs. The Constitution (article 8, § 3) excludes costs, both as to sole ground of appeal, or as going to make up the sum for appeal. But what are costs under that clause? I think it means general costs, taxable under the statute, not special or extraordinary allowances, such as pay of a receiver. I think appeal lies as to such allowances. Crawford v. Fickey, 41 W. Va. 544, 23 S. E. 662. My reason is that they are not "costs" under said clause. Therefore, an appeal lies in this case.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

WILLIAM B. BONBRIGHT, Trustee for Sarah Long et al., Plff., in Err.,
v.

AUGUST A. SCHOETTLER.

(127 Fed. 320.)

1. Fire escape—certificate of approval.

Under a provision in a statute requiring the placing of fire escapes on buildings, that it shall be the duty of certain officers to test escapes, and, if they prove satisfactory, to give a certificate of approval, such certificate, when properly issued, must be taken as conclusive evidence of compliance with the law.

2. Same—statutory relief from liability.

The provision of a statute requiring fire escapes on buildings, that a certificate by the proper official approving a particular fire escape shall relieve the owner of the building from liability for the penalty provided for noncompliance with the statute, without Case Note.—The conclusiveness of an official certificate approving fire escapes is, in the last analysis, a question of statutory construction. That the determination of the officer or board having authority to pass on the sufficiency of the compliance with statutory requirements, when regularly made and within the scope of such delegated authority, is valid, and cannot be questioned collaterally, needs no further citation of authorities than may be found in BONBRIGHT v. SCHOETTLER. It remains to ascertain the extent of the authority delegated, the solution of the question depending upon the construction of the statute.

In the case in hand the district court took the view that the only effect of the certificate of approval was to protect against the penalty, basing its decision on the ground that, since the act of 1879, under which the certificate was issued, did not provide in terms what its effect should be, such act any mention of civil liability, does not prevent it also relieving him from the latter.

3. Same—certificate—successors in title.

A certificate of approval of a fire escape granted to the owner of a building operates in favor of his successor in title.

4. Same—exception of approved escapes.

A provision in an act amending a statute requiring the placing of fire escapes on buildings, that nothing in the act shall interfere with fire escapes now in use, approved by the proper authorities, saves from the operation of the statute fire escapes which had been officially approved under the former statute.

(December 30, 1903.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's neglect to comply with the statute requiring the construction of fire escapes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Acheson, Dallas, and Gray, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. W. B. Bodine, Jr., and George Wharton Pepper, for plaintiff in error:

The act is in derogation of the common law, and it should be strictly construed.

Keely v. O'Conner, 106 Pa. 321.

The certificate was a complete defense.

Com. v. Emsley, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 476.

Messrs. Walter T. Fahy and Thomas A. Fahy, for defendant in error:

The statute does not say the certificate is conclusive, and the court has no power to add that provision.

Smith v. State, 66 Md. 215, 7 Atl. 49; Woodbury v. Berry, 18 Ohio St. 456; Bradbury v. Wagenhorst, 54 Pa. 180; Pittsburgh v. Kalchthaler, 114 Pa. 547, 19 W. N. C. 17, 7 Atl. 921.

A certificate issued to James Long in 1883 could not relieve the present owner in 1902.

The question whether or not appellant had erected two safe, permanent, external, efficient fire escapes, he having no certificate of approval issued under the act of 1885, was for the jury.

Sewell v. Moore, 166 Pa. 570, 31 Atl. 370. Mr. D. Webster Dougherty also for defendant in error.

Acheson, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

August A. Schoettler brought suit in the court below to recover damages, under the Pennsylvania fire escape legislation, for personal injuries which he sustained in a fire which destroyed a factory building which the defendant below, William P. Bonbright, owned in his capacity of trustee for Sarah Long and Jane Nelson Bonbright. The factory building was occupied at the time of the fire by a tenant for whom the plaintiff worked. The fire occurred on June 13, 1902. Upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict in the sum of $2,600 for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon a question of law reserved. Subsequently the court entered judgment upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant took this writ of error. As the case comes to us, it involves no disputed matter of fact, but solely a question of law.

On June 11, 1879, the legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act (P. L. 128), the 1st section of which, inter alia, enacts that every building used as a factory in which operatives are usually employed in the third or any higher story "shall be provided with a permanent, safe, external means of escape therefrom in case of fire;" and it shall be the duty of the owner "to provide and cause to be affixed to every such building such permanent fire escape." By the 2d section of the act it is enacted that "it shall be the duty of the board of fire commissioners, in conjunction with the fire marshal of the district where such commissioners and fire marshal are elected or appointed, to first examine and test such fire escape or escapes, and after, upon trial, said fire escape or escapes should prove . . . [satisfactory], then the said fire marshal, in con-should not be regarded as impliedly making the certificate conclusive evidence of compliance; and the more so because the later act of 1885 expressly prescribed the effect of the certificate. 123 Fed. 817.

It was also said, obiter, in Com. v. Emsley, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 476, that apparently the only effect of the certificate of approval, under the act of 1879, was to protect against the statutory penalty.

Where the statute provides that the certificate of approval "shall relieve from the liabilities of fines, damages, and imprisonment imposed by this act," such certificate is conclusive evidence of nonliability. Sewell v. Moore, 166 Pa. 570, 31 Atl. 370. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Pauley v. Steam Gauge & Lantern Co. 131 N. Y. 90, 15 L. R. A. 194, 29 N. E. 999, an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate because of the alleged failure of defendant to maintain proper fire escapes, it was held that the approval of the public officer appointed for that purpose shows a performance of the duty created and measured by the statute.

An analogous question is presented with respect to the effect of approval of building plans and specifications by a board of public works, which, it has been held, is conclusive as to third persons. See Hawke v. Brown, 28 App. Div. 37, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1032.

nection with the fire commissioners, or a majority of them, shall grant a certificate approving said fire escape." The 3d section enacts that every person whose duty it is by the 1st section of the act to provide and cause to be affixed to any building such external fire escape shall "be liable in an action for damages in case of death or personal injury sustained in consequence of fire breaking out in any such building," and of the absence of such efficient fire escape; and that all persons failing to comply with the provisions of this act shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ($300.00) three hundred dollars, to be collected as fines and forfeitures are now by law collectible.

On December 11, 1883, the board of fire commissioners, in conjunction with the fire marshal of the district, having first examined and tested, and upon trial having found to be satisfactory, an external fire escape which James Long, the then owner of the factory building here in question, had provided and caused to be affixed to said factory building, issued to Mr. Long the following certificate of approval:

No. 588. Fire Escape Inspection.

Certificate of Approval.

This certifies that the undersigned have examined and tested the Fire Escape erected on the five-stories building, now standing upon the lot of ground situate S. E. cor. Second and Oxford Streets, that the said Fire Escape proves satisfactory, and that they therefore approve the same.

Witness their hands hereto set this 11th day of December, A. D. 1883.

Board of Fire Escapes.

Jacob Laudenslager, Fire Commissioner.

Wm. Judge, Fire Commissioner.

Sam'l Gilpin, Fire Commissioner.

Edward Furlong, Fire Commissioner.

W. F. McCully, Fire Commissioner.

Joseph S. Robinson, Fire Commissioner.

Charles W. Wood, Fire Marshal.

Thereafter this external fire escape was maintained on the building in the same condition as when approved, and it was there at the time of the fire. The defendant, William P. Bonbright, acquired title to this property as trustee under foreclosure of a mortgage given by James Long to Mr. Bonbright as trustee for Mr. Long's two daughters, named above. After he thus acquired title, Mr. Bonbright leased the property to a tenant, who was in possession at the time of the fire.

The jury specifically found that the defendant had discharged his duty with regard to ropes and chains required by the supplementary act approved June 1, 1883 (P. L. 50). By an act approved June 3, 1885 (P. L. 68), the above-recited act of June 11, 1879, was amended in several particulars. The 1st section of the amended act directs "such escape to consist of outside, open, iron stairway, of not more than 45° slant, with steps not less than 6 inches in width and 24 inches in length," and that "all of said buildings capable of accommodating from 100 to 500 or more persons as operatives, guests, or inmates, shall be provided with two such stairways, and more than two stairways, if such be necessary to secure the speedy and safe escape of said inmates;" but it is provided in and by this section "that nothing herein contained shall prohibit any person whose duty it is under this act to erect fire escapes from selecting and erecting any other and different device, design, or instrument, being a permanent, safe, external means of escape, subject to the inspection and approval of the constituted authorities for that purpose." The 2d section of the act of 1885 declares that the certificate of approval granted by the fire commissioners and fire marshal shall relieve the party or parties to whom such certificate is issued "from the liabilities of fines, damages, and imprisonment imposed by this act." The 3d and last section of the act of 1885, after prescribing punishment by fine and imprisonment for neglect or refusal to comply with the requirements of the 1st section of the act, further enacts that "in case of fire occurring in any of said buildings in the absence of such fire escape or escapes, approved by certificate of said officials, the said person or corporations shall be liable in an action for damages in case of death or personal injuries sustained in consequence of such fire breaking out in said building, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment for not less than six months, nor more than twelve months." This amended act of 1885, however, contains at the end thereof the following proviso: "Provided, that nothing in this act shall interfere with fire escapes now in use, approved by the proper authorities."

The defendant's fire escape did not conform to the particular specifications mentioned in the 1st section of the act of 1885, and no certificate approving his fire escape had issued under that act. The defendant relied upon the certificate of approval above set forth, issued to his predecessor in title, James Long.

The controlling question in the case is whether the official certificate approving the fire escape which was granted under the act of 1879 protected the defendant against the plaintiff's demand. In considering this question, we note at the outset that the plaintiff's demand is founded on a statute which is of a penal nature. Upon the facts appearing, the defendant was under no common-law liability to the plaintiff. Schott v. Harvey, 105 Pa. 222, 227, 51 Am. Rep. 201; Keely v. O'Conner, 106 Pa. 321. Speaking of the act of 1879, the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Schott v. Harvey, said: "It is certainly a highly penal statute. It imposes a duty unknown to the common law, and punishes a neglect of that duty in the manner above stated." Bearing in mind the character of this legislation as thus defined by the supreme court of the state, let us first examine the primary act of June 11, 1879. What effect is to be given to a certificate approving an external fire escape, granted by the fire marshal and fire commissioners under the provisions of that act? The act does not in express terms declare the effect of the certificate, but it seems to us that, upon well-settled principles, such certificate, when properly issued in accordance with the terms of the act, must be taken as conclusive evidence of compliance with the law. It is an indisputable proposition that where power or jurisdiction over a subject-matter, involving the exercise of discretion and judgment, is vested by law in a public officer or a special tribunal, the determination of such officer or tribunal as to such matter, when regularly made and within the scope of the delegated authority, is valid and binding, and cannot be questioned collaterally. United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 691, 729, 8 L. ed. 547, 561; Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. 508, 522, 16 L. ed. 754, 757. The Supreme Court of the United States in the former of the last-cited cases said: "It is an universal principle that where power or jurisdiction is delegated to any public officer or tribunal over a subject-matter, and its exercise is confided to his or their discretion, the acts so done are binding and valid as to the subject-matter; and individual rights will not be disturbed collaterally for anything done in the exercise of that discretion within the authority and power conferred. The only questions which can arise between an individual claiming a right under the acts done, and the public, or any person denying its validity, are power in the officer and fraud in the party. All other questions are settled by the decision made or the act done by the tribunal or officer, whether executive (Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 170, 171, 2 L. ed. 71), legislative (M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 423, 4 L. ed. 605; Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. 412, 7 L. ed. 469; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 503, 7 L. ed. 956), judicial (Perkins v. Fairfield, 11 Mass. 227; M'Pherson v. Cunniff, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) liff, 11 Serg. & R. 429, 14 Am. Dec. 642, adopted in Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. 167, 168, 7 L. ed. 385), or special (Rogers v. Bradshaw, 20 Johns. 739, 740; 2 Dow, P. C. 521, etc.), unless an appeal is provided for, or other revision by some appellate or supervisory tribunal is prescribed by law."

The manifest intent of the act of 1879, we think, was to give security to one to whom an official certificate approving his fire escape had been duly granted. If the statutory certificate is not conclusive evidence of compliance with the law, there is no certain criterion available, for a verdict of approval by one jury is not binding upon another jury. It is not to be believed that the legislature intended to expose to the risk of suits for damages and of criminal prosecutions one who in good faith has affixed to his building a fire escape approved by the proper officials, and to whom these officials have duly granted a certificate of approval. We are of opinion that the action of the constituted board of experts, within their jurisdiction, in the absence of any fraud, cannot be set aside by the verdict of a jury. The fact that the act of 1885 expressly provides that the certificate of approval shall relieve the party to whom it is issued from the liabilities of fines, damages, and imprisonment imposed by that act does not militate against the view that a certificate of approval granted under the act of 1879 is conclusive. The act of 1885 only expresses what is clearly implied in the act of 1879.

The suggestion that a certificate of approval granted under the act of 1879 was available only to the then owner of the building, and is not available to a succeeding owner, does not strike us with favor. The fire escape is a permanent fixture. The approval is based upon an official examination and test of the structure itself. The certificate is not of a personal nature, but concerns the res. To hold that the official certificate of the sufficiency of the affixed fire escape is annulled or its effect impaired by a mere transfer or devolution of the title to the property would be most unreasonable. Both the letter and the spirit of the statute are against such view.

We are now to inquire whether the certificate upon which the defendant below relied was vitiated or affected by the act of June 3, 1885. The final proviso of that act, we think, furnishes a negative answer to that inquiry. That proviso broadly declares "that nothing in this act shall interfere with fire escapes now in use approved by the proper authorities." This language, it seems to us, was intended to conserve and did save from the operation of the new act then existing fire escapes which had been officially approved under the act of 1879. If this was not the purpose of the proviso, it was very misleading. As the act of 1885 is highly penal, it is not, in view of its proviso, to be construed as embracing persons who had complied with, or were under the protection of, the previous act. It will be perceived that even a departure from the particular construction specified in the act of 1885 is permissible, if approved by the constituted authorities. Evidently the legislature considered the approving judgment of these authorities as worthy of all acceptance. Hence the emphatic declaration of the final proviso "that nothing in this act shall interfere with fire escapes now in use, approved by the proper authorities." Under this sweeping language, existing and duly approved fire escapes were in no wise interfered with by anything contained in the act. The defendant's fire escape came squarely within the terms of this proviso. It therefore continued to be a legally sufficient structure, and the official certificate of its approval protected the defendant from the plaintiff's demand. We are of opinion that the court below should have entered judgment for the defendant on the reserved question.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court, with direction to enter a judgment in favor of the defendant below non obstante veredicto.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

STANDARD MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, of Liverpool, England, Plff. in Err.,

v.

NOME BEACH LIGHTERAGE & TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

(67 C. C. A. 602, 133 Fed. 636.)

x. Marine insurance—constructive total loss.

The owner of property covered by a marine insurance policy cannot claim a recovery as for a constructive total loss, although the property was in a situation where it might have been lawfully abandoned to the underwriter, if no attempt was made to abandon it, but it was sold as the property of the insured.

Subject Note.—Effect of voluntary exposure to peril upon liability on marine insurance policy.

- I. Scope, 1095.
 - II. Omission to employ pilot, 1095.
 - III. Voluntary stranding, 1097.
 - IV. Running into danger of capture, 1097.
 - V. When peril incurred is prohibited by statute, 1098.
 - VI. When peril is incurred in obeying governmental command, 1098.

ery as for a constructive total loss, although the property was in a situation where it might have been lawfully abandoned to the underwriter, if no attempt was made to abandon it, but it was sold as the property of the insured.

2. Same—forced sale as peril.

To recover under a marine policy covering partial loss if it amounts to 50 per cent of the property covered, such loss must be shown to have resulted from a peril of the sea, and cannot be created by a forced sale.

3. Revenue cutter—judicial powers of captain.

The captain of a United States revenue cutter has no authority, even in a port where no court is sitting, to determine a question of salvage, unless the matter is submitted to him, by the parties, as arbitrator.

4. Marine insurance—salvage claims.

Rightful consumption of property covered by a marine insurance policy in salvage claims constitutes a total loss for which the insurer is liable.

5. Same—duty to minimize loss—jury.

Whether or not insured has made the effort required by a marine insurance policy to minimize the loss is a question for the jury.

6. Same—"sum at risk."

The "sum at risk," in a marine insurance policy, is the valuation placed upon the property by the policy itself.

7. Same—salvage of boats.

The cost of getting boats which are part of a vessel's cargo from the point where she is wrecked to a place of safety may be recovered under a marine insurance policy upon them, although they are not injured by the disaster, where the policy requires insured to labor to secure the property insured, and binds the insurer to contribute to the expense thereof in proportion as the sum insured is to the whole sum at risk, while the policy covers the whole value of the property.

8. Same—assumption of risk by insured.

A marine underwriter is not liable for a loss occurring through the deliberate act of the master of the vessel, who represents the insured, in pushing through dangerous ice

I. Scope.

This note does not include decisions as to the duty of an owner or master to make repairs, since they form a branch of the law as to the duty to maintain the ship in a seaworthy condition.

II. Omission to employ pilot.

It may be stated as a general rule that the failure to employ a pilot upon entering a port where pilots may be had, and where it is the custom to employ them, precludes a recovery upon a marine insurance policy for a loss resulting from such an omission.

for the purpose of reaching his destination quickly, and thus realizing the object of his principal's undertaking.

(November 7, 1904.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a marine insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Gilbert and Ross, Circuit Judges, and Hawley, District Judge.

Messrs. Van Ness & Redman, for plaintiff in error:

A loss resulting from a sale by salvors,

Thus, the underwriters are discharged from liability for a loss by striking on breakers, resulting from the failure of a master to employ a competent pilot in entering a river where it is the custom to employ pilots. Whitney v. Ocean Ins. Co. 14 La. 485, 33 Am. Dec. 595.

So, if a master attempts to enter port without a pilot, where pilots are to be had, or steers negligently or rashly on approaching ground where it is unsafe to navigate without a pilot, and damages ensue, the underwriters are not responsible. Bolton v. American Ins. Co. (N. Y. Super. Ct.; 1835) reported in 3 Kent, Com. 176, note.

And so, the neglect of the master to take a pilot upon entering the mouth of a river wherein there was a shifting bar precludes recovery upon the policy for loss caused by stranding upon the bar. McDowell v. General Mut. Ins. Co. 7 La. Ann. 684, 56 Am. Dec. 619.

A captain took on a pilot in going up the River Thames, but dropped him at a point up the river, and afterwards, and before reaching her moorings, the vessel received an injury from which she subsequently sank. The underwriters were held relieved from liability because there was no pilot on board at the time the accident happened, which was held gross negligence upon the part of the captain. Law v. Hollingsworth, 7 T. R. 160.

If, however, the master uses due diligence to secure a pilot, and none respond, the underwriters are not discharged from liability for a loss resulting from his attempt to go in without one.

Thus, a ship arrived off Sierra Leone, where there was a regular establishment of pilots, about 3 o'clock, and signaled for a pilot, but none responded, and, after waiting until 10, the captain attempted to enter the river, and in so doing the vessel struck the ground and was lost. The underwriters were held liable. It is said in one opinion: "It seems to me that, if the master of a vessel arriving off a port use due diligence to obtain a pilot, he does all that can be required by law. . . . It seems to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

either at the port of destination or an intermediate port, is not one resulting from a peril of the sea.

De Mattos v. Saunders, L. R. 7 C. P. 570; Barber, Ins. 328.

Where "the insurance is against total loss only, a claim for expenses incurred under the suing and laboring clause will be disallowed where it is evident from the facts of the case that no danger of a total loss existed."

Barber, Ins. p. 370; Great Indian Peninsula R. Co. v. Saunders, 1 Best & S. 41, 2 Best & S. 266; Booth v. Gair, 15 C. B. N. S. 291; Kidston v. Empire Marine Ins. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 535, L. R. 2 C. P. 357.

The failure of insured to arrange with the salvors for a proper salvage payment violat-me that, upon the evidence, the master did use due diligence to obtain a pilot, and, having so done, it was competent to him to exercise his discretion, whether it were better to run the risk of entering the harbor without one, or to wait till the following day for a pilot. Here, acting to the best of his judgment, he attempted to enter the harbor without one, and in so doing the vessel was lost; and I think that the underwriters are liable for a loss happening under these circumstances." Phillips v. Headlam, 2 Barn. & Ad. 380, 9 L. J. K. R. 238.

Especially, when the need of the ship to enter port is imperative on account of weather or other conditions, is the insured protected, if the master, after using due diligence to obtain a pilot, goes in without one, thereby sustaining a loss.

Thus, where a schooner arrived at the mouth of Mobile bay in threatening weather, and the master, being unable to secure a pilot, followed a pilot boat up the bay, upon being advised by the master of that boat that he might do so in safety, but in so doing the schooner grounded, it was held that the master adopted the most safe and judicious course in his power, under all the circumstances in which he was placed, and that any accident or loss which occurred in the execution of his attempt to enter the port could not be imputed to his fault or misconduct. Van Syckel v. The Thomas Ewing, Crabbe, 405, Fed. Cas. No. 16,877.

It not appearing to the satisfaction of the court from the evidence that the weather conditions and other causes were sufficient to have justified the master of a vessel in adventuring over a bar without waiting a reasonable time for a pilot, it was held that the insured was not entitled to a contribution in general average, in De Pau v. Jones, 1 Brev. 437.

The doctrine is advanced in one instance that the duty to employ a pilot upon leaving port is even stronger than upon entering, as in Phillips v. Headlam, 2 Barn. & Ad. 380, 9 L. J. K. B. 238, where it is said: "It may be conceded that a vessel coming ed a material condition of the contract of insurance, and avoided the policy.

Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 188.

The injury was the result of a risk voluntarily assumed; and for loss from such a risk plaintiff in error is not liable.

Williams v. New England Mut. M. Ins. Co. 3 Cliff. 250, Fed. Cas. No. 17,731; Thompson v. Hopper, 6 El. & Bl. 944; Marsh, Ins. 376; American Ins. Co. v. Ogden, 20 Wend. 305; Bell v. Carstairs, 14 East, 374; Cleveland v. Union Ins. Co. 8 Mass. 308; Chandler v. Worcester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Cush. 328; 1 Parsons, Marine Ins. p. 532; 1 Phillips, Ins. § 1046; Grim v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 13 Johns. 451.

Mr. Nathan H. Frank, for defendant in error:

out of a harbor must have a pilot, because the captain has it in his power always to procure one."

In M'Millan v. Union Ins. Co. Rice, L. 248, 33 Am. Dec. 112, the court conceded that, if a vessel without a pilot, sustains injury in leaving a harbor where it is customary to have a pilot, such injury does not come within the perils insured against, since it is not a peril of the sea but a loss from the bad navigation of the vessel, and is to be set down to the fault of the master; and consequently the owner would be liable for it.

But, if the reasons for departure are sufficiently imperative, it may be that failure to employ a pilot, even upon leaving port, will not preclude a recovery for a loss ensuing.

Thus, where a consul advised a master who was waiting for his clearance to make his way out without further delay, because the place was threatened with an embargo, and the master immediately ran out without taking a pilot, but struck on a rock and was lost; and where it appeared that the vessels remaining were put under an embargo soon after the wrecked ship sailed,—it was held that, the act of the master being bona fide to avoid threatened danger, the insurers must respond for the loss. Pillans v. Dalgarno, Faculty Dec. 1808 to 1810, p. 1. (1 Sansum & Berryman Ins. Dig. p. 947.)

III. Voluntary stranding.

After the stranding of a steamboat by inevitable accident, resulting in opening her seams and causing her to leak dangerously, the act of the master and pilot, done in good faith, in voluntarily beaching her upon a sand bar to prevent her sinking, is justifiable, and not a negligent act on the part of the master. The Natchez, 42 Fed. 169.

The underwriters were held liable on the policy in Redman v. Wilson, 14 Mees. & W. 476, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 333, 9 Jur. 714, as for a peril of the sea, where the ship was voluntarily stranded to avoid sinking.

It appears from the facts that there was 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The policy being an insurance against constructive total loss, a 50 per cent damage, with abandonment, creates a total loss.

London Assur. Co. v. Companhia de Moagens do Barreiro, 187 U. S. 165, 42 L. ed. 122, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 785; La Fonciere Compagnie D'Assurances v. Koons, 21 C. C. A. 249, 44 U. S. App. 550, 75 Fed. 111.

If the property passes into the possession of captors or salvors, and the owners are thus in fact dispossessed, the loss becomes total, provided the owners cannot recover the possession except by disproportionate exertions, expense, or hazard.

Monroe v. British & F. Marine Ins. Co. 3 C. C. A. 280, 5 U. S. App. 179, 52 Fed. 789.

The action of the salvors was a peril of the sea within the meaning of the policy.

a voluntary stranding of a steamer on the shore of an island on account of peril from a severe storm, in Northwestern Transp. Co. v. Thames & M. Ins. Co. 59 Mich. 214, 26 N. W. 336, which does not seem to have been advanced as a reason for nonrecovery under the marine policy. The question at issue was whether an acceptance of abandonment as a constructive total loss was shown.

In Northwestern Transp. Co. v. Continental Ins. Co. 24 Fed. 171, where there was a voluntary stranding to save a vessel from certain destruction, the underwriters were held to have accepted an abandonment of the ship, and were compelled to make complete repairs.

But in Bowring v. Elmslie, 7 T. R. 216, note, an action to recover a partial average loss upon fish which formed part of the cargo, a verdict was rendered for the insurance company upon the ground that the ship was fraudulently stranded.

IV. Running into danger of capture.

The illegal threat of a foreign government to seize a vessel bound for certain islands on a sailing voyage, if the voyage was persisted in, is not a sufficient reason to compel the master to abandon the voyage or forfeit his rights under a policy on the ground of gross misconduct. Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co. 3 Sumn. 270, Fed. Cas. No. 17,738. The court declared that, if the loss was occasioned by the illegal act of a foreign government, it was a loss within the perils of the policy, even though it might have been avoided by the master by a different course of conduct, if his actual conduct was bona fide in furtherance of the objects of the voyage, and in pursuance of his duty to his owners.

But the assured cannot claim from the underwriter an indemnity for a loss caused by capture on account of failure to have the ship properly documented. Bell v. Carstairs, 14 East, 374. Lord Ellenborough, who wrote the opinion, says that the indemnity stipulated, on the part of the Bondrett v. Hentigg, Holt, N. P. 149; Arnould, Ins. 7th ed. p. 1184; 1 Phillips, Ins. § 1107.

This salvor's lien was a direct loss under the term "perils of the sea" as used in the policy.

Where vessel or property is justifiably sold after damage by perils insured against and condemnation, it is a total loss without abandonment.

assured, is only against the perils described in the policy, as far as they operate upon the property insured adversely, and not through the medium of any act or neglect on the part of the assured himself, producing the loss of the property insured.

V. When peril incurred is prohibited by statute.

Where it appeared that a master, who was the insured, was running a race with another steamboat, and, for the purpose of securing more steam, had a barrel of turpentine brought out of the hold and used to feed the furnace, with the result that the vessel caught fire and was destroyed, it was held that he could not recover under the policy, since his act in using the turpentine was in direct disobedience of a statute providing that turpentine, etc. must be kept in metal-lined compartments at a secure distance from any fire on board ship. The court intimated that the fact that the master was running a race would have precluded any recovery by him under the policy; but the decision was placed upon the ground first above stated. Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Marsh, 41 Pa. 386.

VI. When peril is incurred in obeying governmental command.

A steamship chartered to the service of the United States was ordered by a general in command of an expedition in which it was employed, to cross a bar upon which the draught of water was not deep enough for the steamer, which fact was well known to the master of the tug delivering the command and directed to pilot the steamer in, and also to the steamer's master. The result of the attempt to obey the command was the complete destruction of the steamer. Under these facts, a recovery upon the owner's marine policy was held precluded on the ground that such an attempt, if made by the owner, would have been an unjustifiable, rash, and hazardous act of navigation. L.R.A. (N.S.)

International Nav. Co. v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 100 Fed. 317; London Assur. Co. v. Companhia de Moagens do Barreiro, 167 U. S. 171, 42 L. ed. 124, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 785.

This is a valued policy, and the valuation is conclusive between the parties for all purposes.

tion, such as no prudent or skilful navigator would have undertaken, and such as to prevent him from recovering insurance for any resulting loss; and that the United States were the charterers of the steamship, and, viewed in that light, must be regarded as the agents of the owners; and, therefore, that the question is, whether the owners, if they had given the order to cross the bar, and the steamship had been lost, would have been entitled to recover. Williams v. New England Mut. M. Ins. Co. 3 Cliff. 250, Fed. Cas. No. 17,731.

A vessel was chartered to the government under the agreement that the war risks were to be borne by the United States and the marine risks by the owner. Upon a quartermaster's order to convey men and horses at a specified time from Washington to a point stated, the master, considering the order a military one, undertook to execute it, although the Potomac river at the time was frozen over, and he considered it unsafe to leave the wharf, but said nothing to that effect, and, in the course of the undertaking, the hull of the vessel was crushed by heavy pieces of ice, and she filled and sank. Admitting that the ship's master was subject to the orders of the quartermaster, the court said that this nevertheless did not require him to sail out of port under such conditions as would necessarily jeopardize the safety of his boat,—that he should have explained the danger,—and that the loss was not a war, but a marine, risk. The liability of the marine underwriters, however, was not in issue. Reybold v. United States, 15 Wall. 202, 21 L. ed. 57. Affirming 5 Ct. Cl. 277.

VII. When peril incurred was not proximate cause.

In Thompson v. Hopper, 6 El. & Bl. 944, after a vessel had been loaded with a cargo of coal, during which it was necessary to cast loose some of the rigging, she was, with the owners' knowledge, and before the rigging was made fast, passed over a bar

On petition for rehearing.

Marine policies usually cover fraudulent or dishonest acts of the master.

into an open roadstead, exposed to the east, and there anchored in order that her equipment might be made complete, in doing which men were immediately put to work. It was not unusual for vessels to do this in order to take advantage of high water in crossing the bar. Soon after being thus stationed an east gale arose, and, by reason of the anchor chains being entangled, the vessel was driven upon the rocks and wrecked. It was held that, although the proximate cause of the loss was the condition of the chains, the loss would not have occurred if the boat had been seaworthy when she was sent to sea, since, when the gale was observed coming up, she could have set sail and proceeded upon her voyage, and if she had done so the accident from the dragging of the cable never would have occurred. A new trial was granted on the ground that the misconduct of the owners occasioned the loss, although it was not the immediate cause of it.

But in M'Millan v. Union Ins. Co. Rice, L. 248, 33 Am. Dec. 112, where a master engaged a pilot to take his ship to sea, but on the day of sailing the weather was so threatening that the pilot refused to go, whereupon the master, believing that the force of the storm had become exhausted, and anxious to profit by the direction of the wind then blowing, sailed without the pilot, with the result that the vessel was wrecked, the evidence tended to prove that the ship was not injured while crossing the bar, but was capsized in the gale, at a point beyond which the services of a pilot were deemed necessary. In view of this fact, it was held that, since the injury was not the direct consequence of the failure to employ a pilot, the underwriters were not discharged.

VIII. Barratrous conduct.

If barratry of the master and crew is insured against in the policy, then the voluntary exposure of the ship to peril by the master in such a way as amounts to barratry of course compels the underwriters to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

respond for the loss ensuing. The liability depends upon the determination whether the act in question amounts to barratry.

Fraudulently running a vessel on shore, causing survey, condemnation, and sale, constitutes a barratry of the master which furnishes a ground for abandonment of the vessel as a total loss, when barratry of the master was one of the things insured against. Clark v. Washington Ins. Co. 100 Mass. 509, 1 Am. Rep. 135.

But the act of a master, who was temporarily insane from want of sleep and nourishment and from the effects of medicine, in sailing his vessel straight for a dangerous shore and onto a bar of sand in full view, resulting in the stranding of the brig, was held not barratrous; and a verdict in favor of the insured in an action upon the policy was sustained. Hutchins v. Ford, 82 Me. 363, 19 Atl. 832.

Lord Ellenborough, in Heyman v. Parish, 2 Campb. 149, stated that, notwithstanding Justice Buller had once held that, if an insured declared upon a loss by peril of the seas, and the defense was misconduct of those on board amounting to barratry, there could be no recovery, he could see no reason for that doctrine, and was of the opinion that, while a plaintiff declaring for a loss by peril of the seas could not recover upon a fraudulent sale, he could recover for a loss proved as laid, although it was caused by barratrous conduct.

The statement is made in 1 Parsons, Marine Ins. 568, that, "if a master undergoes any extraordinary and evitable peril, from no necessity whatever, but in the belief that it may be advantageous to his owner, a loss arising from this risk will be a loss by barratry." No cases are cited in support of this statement.

IX. Miscellaneous cases.

Where a policy of insurance upon a wharf-boat "lying at the wharf of the city of Evansville," insured it against perils of "seas, lakes, rivers, canals, fires," etc., the

Ross, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings up for review a judgment against the Standard Marine Insurance Company, Limited, based upon a policy covering certain articles laden on the barkentine Catherine Sudden for a voyage from the port of San Francisco to Nome, Alaska, whereby the insurance company insured certain merchandise of the defendant in error, laden below deck, in the sum of $5,250, and a lighterage plant, also belonging to the defendant in error, laden on deck, in the sum of $3,000, against "perils of the seas, pirates, assailing thieves, jettisons, barratry of the master or mariners, and all other losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, damage, or detriment of the said property, or to which insurers are liable by the rules and customs of insurance in San Francisco, excepting such losses and misfortunes as are excluded by this policy."

The policy provided that the risk there-owner was under no obligation to have the boat towed into an ice harbor during the season of danger from floating ice, notwithstanding a more or less prevailing custom to that effect; and his action in permitting the wharf-boat to remain at the place at which it was insured, although he knew of the danger from floating ice, was not wrongful or negligent upon his part so as to preclude him from recovering upon the policy. Evidence as to the custom above referred to is inadmissible in an action to recover upon the policy. Franklin Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, 65 Ind. 549, 32 Am. Rep. 78.

Where a master, being apprehensive that the pilot had been drinking, and that the ship was being run too close to shore, nevertheless did not come to anchor or resist the pilot openly, it was held an error of judgment upon his part, rather than misconduct, in Earnmoor S. S. Co. v. Union Ins. Co. 44 Fed. 374. The court says: "Even if it appeared that the circumstances were such that the most prudent course was to come to anchor, and that the master should be held to some extent negligent in going on, the case is certainly not one of wilful misconduct, nor of such gross negligence as alone would absolve the insurers from their contract."

It appearing that fire was expressly mentioned in the policy of insurance on a ship as one of the perils insured against, the underwriters were held liable although the ship was fired by the master himself in order to prevent her from falling into the hands of a French privateer of greatly superior strength, which was rapidly gaining on her. The court says: "If the ship is destroyed by fire, it is of no consequence whether this is occasioned by a common accident, or by lightning, or by an act done in duty to the state. Nor can it make any difference whether the ship is thus destroyed by third persons, subjects of the King, or by the captain and crew acting with loyalty and good faith. Fire is still the causa causans, and the loss is covered by the policy." Gordon v. Rimmington. 1 Campb. 123.

The question in Sadler v. Dixon, 8 Mees. & W. 895, 11 L. J. Exch. N. S. 435, was whether throwing the ballast overboard, by the master and crew (which the court conceded was a voluntary act, as well as an improper and negligent act), whereby the ship became unseaworthy, excused the underwriter. In deciding that it did not, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court said that it was obvious that such an act, all unlawful motive concededly being absent, might be attributable to an error or defect in judgment; and that, where the loss can be laid to mistake of judgment, or an act of carelessness or negligence in the ordinary navigation of the vessel, the loss falls within the meaning of perils of the sea.

The decision most similar to STANDARD MARINE INS. CO. v. NOME BEACH LIGHTERAGE & TRANSP. CO., and the one which supports it most nearly, is one where the complaint was dismissed in an action to recover upon a marine policy insuring the master of a steam tug against loss resulting from "any accident caused by collision" to vessels for which the steam-tug owners might be legally liable, when the evidence showed that the injury occurred to a canal boat while being towed at night by the steam tug through the midst of a floe of ice in New York harbor, a fragment thereof striking the canal boat in such a manner as to make a hole in her bow causing her to sink. It was held that the contact causing the injury was not a collision within the meaning of the term as employed in the insurance policy. The court declares that, when the master of a vessel insured designedly takes the chance of running into a perfectly apparent obstruction, although with the hope and expectation that the vessel will successfully meet the encounter, the contact is not a collision within the meaning of the insurance contract; and illustrates further by saying that "if, after the river had been closed for months by ice, the owner of the boat should conclude that the ice had been so far weakened by the rays of the sun that the boat could break its way through, and the result of the attempt should be an injury to the boat, no adjudication can be found holding that contact between the ice and boat under such circumstances would constitute a collision within the meaning of the term as it is employed in this contract. The injury in such case would be due, not to an unintended contact with a floating, foreign substance but to a deliberate attempt to break through a known barrier, the resisting power of which had been miscalculated." Newtown Creek Towing Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co. 163 N. Y. 114, 57 N. E. 302, Reversing 23 App. Div. 152, 48 N. Y. Supp. 927. M. M. M.

under should "cease at ship's tackle or thirty days after arrival at destination;" and, in accepting it, the defendant in error engaged for itself, its factors, servants, and assigns; "to sue, labor, and travel, and use all reasonable and proper means for the security, preservation, relief, and recovery of the property insured, or any part thereof, and also to use all proper and legal means to recover, through general average or otherwise, from the parties interested in vessel, freight, or cargo, either or all, any sums due the property insured or its owners, on account of sacrifices, losses, or expenses incurred for the general safety or the common good, to the charges whereof this company will contribute in proportion as the sum insured is to the whole sum at risk."

None of the articles in question were covered by the memorandum clause of the policy, which provided that all articles not excepted under that clause were "warranted by the insured free from particular average and partial loss unless occasioned by stranding, sinking, fire, collision, or other extraordinary peril hereby insured against, and amounting to 50 per cent or more on the sound value of the whole shipment at the port of delivery; and all such loss shall be settled on the principles of salvage loss, with benefit of salvage to the insurers."

The policy contained the further stipulation "that the provisions of the Civil Code of California shall be conclusive and binding, as regarding the warranty of seaworthiness, liability of insurers in case of prior, subsequent, or simultaneous insurance, and such other questions as are therein legislated upon and not otherwise provided for in this policy."

The complaint alleges that, while the vessel was proceeding upon her voyage, the whole of the insured merchandise and lighterage plant were lost by perils of the sea, to the damage of the defendant in error in the full sum insured. Among the defenses interposed by the insurance company were the following: That The Sudden, with its cargo, including the articles here involved, sailed from San Francisco for Nome April 28, 1900, and on or about the 28th day of May, 1900, in passing through and out of Unimak pass into Bering sea, met drift ice, and within twenty-four hours thereafter met with large fields of ice; and within forty-eight hours thereafter ran into and was surrounded with heavy ice, and thereafter, and on or about the 3d day of June, 1900, was struck by ice on her port bow, which was thereby stove in; that by reason of the injury the vessel was so crippled that she was compelled to seek and obtain assistance from other vessels then in the vicinity. That the property insured by the defendant to the action, and then on board The Sudden, consisted of miscellaneous merchandise stowed below deck, and a lighterage plant, consisting of a launch, scow, and surf boat or boats, loaded upon her deck. That in the vicinity of The Sudden at the time were the sailing vessels Pitcairn and Rube Richardson and the steamer Corwin. That considerable portions of the merchandise so insured by the defendant to the action were taken from The Sudden by the Pitcairn, Rube Richardson, and Corwin. That the plaintiff to the action then and there arranged with the captain of The Corwin to tow The Sudden and the launch, scow, and surf boat or boats to Nome, Alaska, agreeing to pay as salvage for towing the launch, scow, and surf boat or boats the sum of $2,500; and that in pursuance of that agreement The Corwin did tow the launch, scow, and surf boat or boats and The Sudden, with so much of the insured cargo thereon as had not been taken from her by The Corwin, Pitcairn, and Rube Richardson, to Nome. That the plaintiff to the action sailed The Sudden into the ice, knowing full well that so to do endangered the safety of that vessel, and that so to do was not consistent with good seamanship, or with due and proper care; but that plaintiff, when ice was encountered, in the exercise of due and proper care, should have changed the course of the vessel, and have sought open water or a port of safety until the danger from ice had passed. That upon the arrival of The Sudden and the launch, scow, and surf boat or boats at Nome in tow of The Corwin, the launch, scow, and surf boat or boats were delivered to the plaintiff to the action, and upon the suggestion of its agent at Nome a survey was held upon the vessel and cargo, resulting in the condemnation of both vessel and cargo, and a recommendation that they be sold; whereupon the vessel and cargo were sold at public auction. That the sale of the cargo was by manifest lots, without inspection or opportunity to inspect by the purchasers thereof. That at the sale the merchandise here in question was sold for $530, which was at the time of a value greatly in excess of that amount. That with the lighterage plant the insured merchandise could have been landed at Nome. That the plaintiff to the action did not in any way seek to arrange with The Corwin, or with any of its officers, agents, or servants, for the landing or delivery to the plaintiff of the insured merchandise, or any part thereof, nor to secure from The Corwin, or any of its officers, agents, or servants, nor from The Pitcairn or Rube Richardson, the return or delivery to the plaintiff of any of the merchandise taken from The Sudden, nor any compensation therefor, and did not in any way seek, and has not in any way sought, to arrange or agree with The Corwin, or with any of its officers, agents, or servants, for the amount to be allowed or paid to it by way of salvage for the insured merchandise in question, and did not in any way seek, by the purchase of such merchandise at such sale or otherwise, or at all, to recover the insured merchandise, or otherwise to reduce the loss to the plaintiff or to the defendant to the action. That, had the plaintiff sought to secure the delivery to it of the insured merchandise, or bid in the same at the auction sale, it could and would have greatly lessened the loss to plaintiff on such merchandise. That upon the arrival of The Sudden at Nome the weather was calm, and that the insured merchandise could have been safely landed and delivered to the plaintiff, and would have been so delivered if plaintiff had sought to secure the delivery thereof.

It appears from the record that The Sudden left San Francisco in command of Captain John L. Panno, on the 28th day of April, 1900, and proceeded on her voyage, sailing through the Unimak pass into Bering sea about the 1st of June. We extract from the testimony of Captain Panno:

"We sailed from San Francisco on the 28th day of April. The vessel was not down in the water more than usual. She was properly loaded. As a mariner I considered it a late date to start for Nome beach. Vessels had gone ahead of us; The Thrasher and The Pitcairn, and several others. I cannot remember the names. Most all the steam vessels had gone ahead of us. The Thrasher was a steamer, and The Pitcairn was a sailing vessel. The Rube Richardson was a sailing vessel. The Pitcairn left some time in January or February. We overtook her on the way up. She had two or three months the start of us. I found her in the ice. The Unimak pass is located at the entrance to the Bering sea. We passed through Unimak pass into Bering sea. We went through the pass about the 1st of June. We did not come in sight of ice until after we got to Unimak island. I think that was about two and a half or three days from Unimak pass. The ice was about 5 miles away when I first sighted it. It was about 5 o'clock in the afternoon then. It was on the lee beam. It was to the left of us. The ice was in small pieces, as big as this room and bigger. They were floating pieces, broken ice. Some of them were about level with the water, and some of them 8 or 10 feet high. It is generally understood that 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the largest part of a chunk of ice is that below the surface of the water. I had no idea how far below it extended. Some of these small chunks that I noticed floating about were $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile, a mile, and 5 miles apart. They were not very numerous. I sailed right on, and did not turn around and go back. My object was to get through it. When I got to the ice itself I found leads once in a while. Perhaps to-night I would be all inclosed with ice,—ice all round us, so we could not move any way; but during the night that ice would move, and perhaps in the morning at 8 or 9 o'clock we would have a lead of 4 or 5 miles that we could sail through. But around these leads, on each side and forward, it was full of ice. The ice got thicker as I proceeded. I sighted a lot of vessels at about the time I first struck this ice in Bering sea. They were all in the same position that I was; some steamers and some sailing vessels. The Pitcairn and The Rube Richardson were sailing vessels, both bound for Nome, with the same kind of cargo that I had. We were all trying to get there as soon as we could, as early as we could get there. We wanted to market our goods. The next morning after sighting the ice it was broken, but rather larger; larger in proportion. I do not know whether it was any thicker. It was about the same height out of the water. It was thicker as to the pieces being closer together. I kept on sailing through it all that day and all the next night. On the third day we could not get through it. We got in a lead, and we could not get through. I tacked ship and stood back again, and found a lead, I suppose 10 or 15 miles. I went right into it, still fighting to get up to Nome. I did not get through that lead. I got up about 10 miles and fell in with The Portland and another steamer. I fell in with two steamers and stopped in the ice with them; made fast to the ice and lay there two days. They were stuck in the ice. We lay there until we got a lead, and kept working up through it. We continued four or five hours after we got out of the last pack before we were stopped again. In the next lead I was in the company of two steamers, and the steamers left about 4 o'clock in the morning ahead of me through that lead and went on through out of sight. I got under way about 8 o'clock in the morning and started after them, and at about 11 o'clock, or 10 o'clock I hit a piece of ice. The ice did not hit me. I hit it. My vessel ran into the ice. She hit it, and knocked her bow in, something like that desk there [indicating]. There was a piece of ice which I supposed I would go clear of, and down under water it stuck out like that desk, and hit her bow down under water. The ice was a great deal harder underneath than it would have been on top. It looked like fresh-water ice. The moment I struck the ice there was a hole in my bow. As soon as I felt her hit it, I put her bow on a cake of ice, so as to catch her there, so as she would not go down. I put my colors down, put the Union down in distress. When they sighted me they came down and stopped; that is The Richardson and The Pitcairn. They were coming down the lead astern of me, and they came up and made fast with me; one a little further off than the other. I signaled them for help. Some of the people from The Richardson and The Pitcairn got off their vessels and got on mine. They lay by me until I got towed away by the steamer. The people from The Rube Richardson and The Pitcairn took some of the goods off The Sudden. They were out stores from between decks, mostly flour and lard, and such things as that, and I gave them leave to take them. I found the vessel was filling full of water, and it would be spoiled, and I gave them leave to take them. These stores were put away on The Sudden in the between-decks. The Sudden had two decks. Below that was the hold of the vessel. These stores and provisions were on the second deck. There was nothing on the upper deck in the way of provisions. I made no distinction, as between the provisions or stores belonging to the Nome Beach Lighterage & Transportation Company and those that belonged to other shippers, in giving them permission to go on board and take provisions. The men that had the other stores, their goods were all marked. They took perhaps altogether 10 tons. Most of these belonged to the Nome Beach Lighterage & Transportation Company. I told The Rube Richardson people to take these goods, after they had taken them, to Cape Nome, and what salvage there was on them we would pay it. The Pitcairn people—all of our crew and everybody was board The Pitcairn. I did not say anything to him, because I thought they would eat them all up, as we would be there four or five days. The Corwin came in sight next day, and pumped the water out of my ship, and took it in tow, and carried us to Nome. I made an arrangement at that time with The Corwin people with regard to the lighterage plant that was on board. There was a written agreement signed at that time, as between myself and the captain of The Corwin, or the agent, or whoever he was. I think Captain West was captain. This was signed on board of The Corwin before they started. It was drawn up and written after I had talked with The Corwin about the terms on which the lighterage plant was to be taken to Nome. I made no arrangement with the captain of The Corwin as to what he would charge for taking the hull of The Sudden to Nome. I made no arrangement with him at that time as to what he would charge for taking the cargo belonging to the Nome Beach Lighterage & Transportation Company to Nome. I did not enter into any arrangement with the captain of The Corwin at that time, or with anybody else on board of The Corwin at that time, as to what should be charged for saving anything, except the lighterage plant. I did not expect, and they did not expect, to save anything when they commenced on it. So I could not make any arrangement. I made no arrangement with them as to what the salvage service should be, or what the payment for it should be. The written agreement was signed before the water was pumped out of The Sudden and they started to Nome. After they got her up so that she could be towed, between that time and the time that we got to Nome. I did not enter into any arrangement with anybody on board of The Corwin looking to an arrangement of the charge they should make for salvage services for saving the goods on board of that ship."

At Nome the only anchorage is the open roadstead, and there The Sudden was anchored. It appears from the evidence that the weather was at the time good, and as a matter of fact continued good for a good many weeks; but it also appears that storms are liable to occur there at almost any time. The cargo had been wet with salt water for seven or eight days, and, so far as it consisted of groceries and canned goods, was greatly damaged. But the 150 tons of coal belonging to the defendant in error, and included within the property covered by the policy in question, was not much, if at all, damaged.

The defendant in error had sent to Nome as its agent one Morine, and given in his charge $3,000 of its money. Previous to the arrival of The Sudden, Morine had disposed of most of that money and had become seriously ill. Because of his illness and his consequent inability to look after the interests of the defendant in error, he appointed Captain Omar J. Humphrey in his stead to take charge of The Sudden and her cargo, and to represent the defendant in error in respect thereto. Morine had no express authority to make such appointment, but it appears that his action in that regard was ratified by the company by letter of date July 2, 1900. Humphrey accepted the appointment, and, upon the arrival of The Sudden, in tow of The Corwin, assumed the responsibility of the defendant in error in respect to the business in question. He arranged for the payment of the $2,500 stipulated to be paid for the salvage of the lighterage plant, and took possession of the same, which was first used—in accordance with the salvage agreement between the masters of The Sudden and The Corwin—in discharging the cargo of the latter. There is testimony to the effect that the reasonable value of the services of the lighter was $400 for ten hours' work, and for the launch $50 a round trip of not exceeding one hour for each tow of the lighter.

It appears that at the time in question there were from 20,000 to 25,000 people at Nome, attracted there by the wonderful discoveries of gold. There were no courts nor regularly established government of any kind at the place; but the United States revenue cutter Bear, with its officers and men, was there. With the consent and approval of Humphrey a survey, composed of the ship carpenter of The Bear, the president of the chamber of commerce, of Nome, and an experienced shipmaster, was held upon The Sudden, and she and her cargo condemned. It was by them recommended that the vessel be sold, which was done. Upon the demand of the captain of The Corwin, and with the consent of Humphrey, the miscellaneous cargo of The Sudden was put up and sold. The auction was held in Nome, and the sale was made by manifest lots, the goods remaining in the hold of the vessel anchored off the beach, without examination by any buyer as to quantity, quality, or condition, and without any opportunity of such examination. The portion of the cargo owned by the defendant in error and covered by the policy in suit, sold at such sale, consisted of 150 tons of coal and 6,000 feet of lumber sawed, fitted, and ready to be put together as a house, and all of the insured merchandise, except the small lots taken by The Pitcairn, Rube Richardson, and Corwin, and was sold for the aggregate sum of $530, which amount was turned over to The Corwin. The evidence tends to show that neither Humphrey, nor Captain Panno, nor any other person connected with the defendant in error, took any step, or made any effort, to secure an agreement with the salvors fixing a proper salvage charge, or to secure the unloading or delivery of the goods of the defendant in error subject to a salvage lien in favor of the salvors, or the unloading of those goods prior to the sale in order that the most advantageous prices might be obtained therefor at the sale, or with the view to the buying in of the goods in the event that there should not be buyers thereof at fair prices; in short, that no steps were taken, and nothing whatever was done by the defendant in error, nor by anyone for or on its behalf, to minimize the loss. On the contrary, there is much evidence in the record tending to show that the sale was not made in good faith, but in furtherance of a design to dispose of the property in question at prices far below its real value. One pregnant circumstance tending to show this is testimony to the effect that of the 150 tons of coal belonging to the defendant in error 100 tons were bought by Humphrey for $4 a ton, the cost of lightering which from ship to shore was at the time only $18 a ton; whereas, it appears in the testimony that coal was at the time worth at Nome from $30 to $90 a ton, and that as a matter of fact Humphrey shortly thereafter sold a part of the same coal for $60 a ton. It is true that the sale was advertised in a paper published at Nome, and that during its progress it was interrupted by one Gollin, who announced himself as the agent of the San Francisco Board of Marine Underwriters (of which board the plaintiff in error is a member), and that at Gollin's request the sale was adjourned to enable him to make an investigation, and that he thereafter consented, as agent of the San Francisco Board of Underwriters, that the sale should continue. It is also true that Gollin testified on the trial of this case that the sale was "fair and square," and also that the general manager of the plaintiff in error testified that he thought the company should pay the loss as claimed by the insured. But it further appears that his company is reinsured for all but $1,000 of such loss, and that those reinsurers seriously object to such payment.

It will be thus seen that all of the insured articles in question, with the exception of such portions thereof as were taken on board The Corwin, Pitcairn, and Rube Richardson, arrived in specie at destination, and that the loss for which defendant in error sues (except as respects the lighterage plant) arose out of their sale at Nome under the circumstances indicated. The terms of the policy have been stated, under which it is clear that, in a case where the facts warrant it, a recovery may be had for a total loss, either actual or constructive, and for a partial loss, provided such loss be occasioned by stranding, sinking, fire, collision, or from any extraordinary peril insured against, and amounting to 50 per cent on the sound value of the whole shipment at the port of delivery. A constructive total loss is one upon the happening of which the insured may abandon the subject-matter of the insurance. Unless there remains something of value to pass to the underwriter, there is, as a matter of course, nothing to abandon, and no case for the operation of the doctrine of abandonment. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 5-13, and authorities there cited; Cal. Civ. Code, §§ 2705, 2717.

It is said for the defendant in error that the merchandise cargo was a constructive total loss, for the reason that when it reached the roadstead at Nome it was still in peril, because of the constant danger of The Sudden going ashore. "Hence," argues counsel, "the cargo was, at the time of the sale, by reason of a peril insured against, in danger of absolute destruction, and then and there the subject of abandonment." Undoubtedly so; but the trouble with counsel's point is that, so far as the evidence shows, the insured did not then, nor at any other time when the property was the subject of abandonment, undertake to abandon it. It is plain, therefore, that, in so far as concerns the merchandise portion of the cargo in question, there could, under the evidence, be no such thing as a constructive total loss; for long prior to the attempted abandonment all that portion of the cargo had absolutely passed from the insured. It had nothing to abandon, and there was, therefore, in respect to it, an absolute total loss, or there was no such loss at all. Whether the case showed a loss amounting to 50 per cent or more caused by sinking, and recoverable under the provision of the policy relating to that matter, is another question.

It is further contended for the defendant in error that there was a constructive total loss, for the reason that the danger of The Sudden going ashore at Nome rendered a sale of both vessel and cargo justifiable, and that, "where vessel or property is justifiably sold after damage by peril insured against and condemnation, it is a total loss without abandonment," within the rule declared in Gordon v. Massachusetts F. & M. Ins. Co. 2 Pick. 249. In that case the vessel insured, having received damage from the perils insured against, put into the harbor of St. Domingo. A survey was called, and the surveyors reported that she could not be repaired there, by reason of the want of materials and the extraordinary expense of making repairs at the place, without incurring an expense exceeding her value, and they therefore condemned her to be sold for the interest of whom it might concern, which was done. The purchaser afterwards refitted her for sea. It was held that the survey was not conclusive evidence of the necessity of the sale; that, if the sale were necessary, it would constitute a total loss without an abandonment, and in such a case the plaintiff could recover for a total loss; but that in case of a constructive total loss he could recover only as for a partial loss, inasmuch as by 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the transfer he had put it out of his power to make an abandonment. The facts of that case were quite unlike those of the present one. Here the vessel, with her cargo, was anchored at Nome, in good weather, which continued for weeks, and with a lighterage plant owned by the insured capable of discharging the cargo. There was no sale by the master of vessel or cargo for the benefit of whom it might concern, but a sale by the salvors to satisfy their lien. It is not doubted that a salvage service is a loss by a peril of the sea, and that, when it is found to equal or exceed half the value of the insured property, the insured may, under such a policy as that in suit, prior to a sale ordered to satisfy the lien of the salvors, abandon and claim as for a total loss. But in the present case there is neither a showing as to the amount of the damage to the cargo, nor that the value of the salvage services was ever ascertained. Unless the loss was at least equal to 50 per cent of the sound value of the cargo at the port of delivery, there was, under the terms of the policy, no liability of the insured, and, as a matter of course, no forced sale of any kind could create one.

It is further contended on the part of the defendant in error, and was so contended in the court below, that the retention by The Piteairn, Rube Richardson, and Corwin of such portions of the cargo in question as were taken on board those vessels (in quantity, according to the testimony, about 10 tons; value not stated), and the sale by The Corwin of the balance of the merchandise cargo, constituted a total loss from a peril of the sea. The correctness of that proposition was and is controverted by the plaintiff in error. Upon the point the court below instructed the jury: "The accident to the vessel, by which a hole was stove in her bow and she was almost submerged, was a peril of the sea from which the cargo under deck would have been lost, but for the intervention of the salvors who applied themselves to the rescue. In this way the vessel and cargo came rightfully into the possession of the salvors, who thereupon, after arriving at Nome with the vessel and cargo, claimed the whole of such cargo under deck for salvage service, and so claiming, permanently deprived the owners of said property. There were no tribunals at Nome authorized to determine the question of salvage, and no recognized authority in that behalf, other than the captain of the revenue cutter then at that place, and who acting as arbiter in the matter, gave such cargo to the salvors, by whom it was sold, and thereby became and was a total loss to plaintiff within the meaning of the law, and for this loss the defendant is liable, unless the plaintiff might, with reasonable effort on its part, have arranged with the salvors for an adjustment of the salvage claim and the delivery to it of the said cargo."

We are of opinion that that instruction of the court was substantially correct (Monroe v. British & F. Marine Ins. Co. 3 C. C. A. 280, 5 U. S. App. 179, 52 Fed. 787, 789), except so far as it stated that the captain of the revenue cutter then at Nome was a recognized authority for the determination of the question of salvage. The evidence did not justify the statement that the question of salvage was submitted to the captain of The Bear by the parties in interest as arbitrator; and it is perfectly clear that, otherwise, he had no power in the premises; the question of salvage being a judicial one, of which a court of admiralty only has jurisdiction. There is a good deal of force in the claim on the part of the plaintiff in error that it was entitled to the peremptory instruction requested by it, on the ground that there was no evidence tending to show any effort on the part of the insured to adjust the salvage or otherwise minimize the loss; but, in view of all of the circumstances of the case, we conclude that that question of fact was properly one for the determination of the jury.

In respect to the lighterage plant, the plaintiff in error requested the court below to instruct the jury that the plaintiff to the action could not recover any of the consideration paid by it to the salvors for the salvage of that plant, or any portion of the value of such services, if in fact the plant or any material portion of it was not at the time of the salvage agreement in danger of being lost by reason of the injury to The Sudden. That request was refused, and, instead, the court instructed the jury as follows: "It does not appear that any injury or damage resulted to the lighterage plant from the accident to The Catherine Sudden, or that the plaintiff suffered any loss or damage, as to said plant, within the protection of the policy, except in so far as plaintiff was compelled to pay salvage for the towing of said lighterage plant from the place of the accident to Nome. As to such loss, the stipulation of the policy is to the effect that, in case of loss or misfortune resulting from any peril insured against, the insured is to sue, labor, and travel, and use all reasonable and proper means for the security, preservation, and recovery of the property insured, for the expense of which the insurer will contribute in proportion as the sum insured is to the whole sum at risk. The extent of the defendant's liability under this clause, as to the lighterage plant, is such proportion of the cost of saving the plant as the amount for which the plant was insured bore to its valuation, as stated in the policy, which valuation is $3,000. And with respect to said plant if you find that The Catherine Sudden was seaworthy for the voyage, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the $2,500 paid for its salvage, plus the reasonable value of the services rendered by the launch and barge in the discharge of The Corwin at Nome."

The claim of the plaintiff in error that the court was in error in refusing the peremptory instruction requested is based upon the rule laid down by Mr. Barber: "Where the insurance is against total loss only, a claim for expenses incurred under the suing and laboring clause will be disallowed, where it is evident from the facts of the case that no danger of a total loss existed." Barber, Ins. p. 370.

The reason for the rule, as stated by Barber and in the cases cited by him, is that the insurer, being liable only for a total loss, is not interested in the prevention of anything less than a total loss, and cannot properly be called upon to contribute to an expense incurred to prevent a loss in which it is not concerned. But in the present case, as has been seen, the insurance was not against total loss only, but against actual and constructive total loss, and against partial loss, if occasioned by stranding, sinking, fire, collision, or other extraordinary peril insured against and amounting to 50 per cent or more on the sound value of the whole shipment at the port of delivery. The valuation fixed in the policy is conclusive between the parties.

In Arnould on Insurance, 7th ed. p. 411, it is said: "There is by English law no exception to the rule under discussion. As long as the contract of insurance remains unimpeached, the valuation in the policy can under no circumstances be opened; or, to use the words of Cockburn, Ch. J., 'where the value is stated in the policy in a manner to be conclusive between the two parties, the insurer and the insured, as regards the value, then in respect of all rights and obligations which arise upon the policy of insurance the parties are estopped' from disputing the value stated."

In The Potomac (The Potomac v. Cannon) 105 U. S. 630, 26 L. ed. 1194, the Supreme Court said, concerning such valuation: "That valuation is conclusive in respect of all rights and obligations arising upon the policy of insurance."

In § 2736 of the Civil Code of California the law is thus declared: "A valuation in a policy of marine insurance is conclusive between the parties thereto in the adjustment of either a partial or a total loss, if the insured has some interest at risk."

We think the court below rightly held the "sum at risk" to be fixed by the terms of the policy. The circumstance that that sum happens, in the case in hand, to equal the sum insured, thereby obligating the insurer to pay the whole, instead of a part, of the expenses incurred under the "sue and labor" clause of the policy, does not change the binding character of the valuation. We are of opinion that the instruction under discussion was correct.

It appears, however, from the testimony of the master himself, that he well knew of the existence of the ice and of the risk incurred in endeavoring to push through it; and that he well knew all of this in ample time to have avoided it. Can it be properly held that it was not his duty to have avoided the danger,—that he did not commit a wrongful act when he deliberately, wilfully, undertook to "fight" his way, as he himself expressed it, through the ice, for the purpose of arriving quickly at Nome, and thus secure for his principals a better price for the merchandise, and that they might the sooner realize the profits expected to accrue from the lighterage plant that he carried? We think this must be answered in the negative. Taking the captain's testimony to be true, it is not, in our opinion, a case of negligence at all, whether simple or gross, but one of a deliberate and reckless assumption of a well-known danger, which the law made it the master's duty to have avoided. It was both a wilful omission to perform his legal duty, and an intentional commission of a wrongful act, resulting in the loss in question, for which, both upon principle and authority, the insurer, in our opinion, is not liable. In the first place, we think the liability asserted does not exist because of that provision of the Civil Code of California expressly made a part of the policy in suit, declaring that "an insurer is not liable for a loss caused by the wilful act of the insured; but he is not exonerated by the negligence of the insured, or of his agents, or others." Civil Code, § 2629.

Speaking of that statutory provision, the supreme court of the state said, in the case of McKenzie v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. 112 Cal. 548, 557, 44 Pac. 922: "The ordinary negligence of the insured and his agents has long been held as a part of the risk which the insurer takes upon himself, and the existence of which, where it is the proximate cause of the loss, does not absolve the insurer from liability. But wilful exposure, gross negligence, negligence amounting to misconduct, etc., have often been held to release the insurer from such liability. To set at rest questions involving the different degrees of negligence, and the results following therefrom, we may reasonably suppose was the object of the framers of our Civil Code. Under § 2629 of the Civil Code, the nice distinctions often made necessary are dispensed with, and the general proposition is established that no form of negligence on the part of the insured, or his agents or others, leading to a loss, avoids the policy, unless it amounts to a wilful act on the part of the insured. The Code thereby sets at rest a fruitful cause of litigation. This section was not intended, however, to absolve the insured from the performance of those acts which he has expressly covenanted to perform. To do this would be, not to measure his conduct and obligations under the contract, but to abrogate it. When the insured in the present case warranted, in case the mill was idle and not in use, to have a watchman on duty constantly day and night, in and immediately about the buildings or works, he bound himself to the performance of specific acts, from the performance of which no negligence could exonerate him."

But while, under the statute cited, negligence on the part of the insured, whatever the degree, does not exonerate the insurer, he is relieved of responsibility for loss occasioned by "the wilful act of the assured." The court below instructed the jury that by this latter provision "is not meant an act intentionally or negligently done, resulting in the loss of the insured property, even though the negligence be gross; but the act must be one concurred [in] by the insured with the corrupt design of destroying the property."

It is, in our opinion, impossible to sustain that construction of the California statute. "Negligence and wilfulness are the opposites of each other. They indicate radically different mental states. . . . Negligence is also to be carefully distinguished from fraud; the distinction arising in this case, as before, upon the element of inadvertence. Fraud is invariably intentional, either actually or constructively; negligence is never so." 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 395, 396, and cases there cited. In negligence, as said by Beardsley, J., in Gardner v. Heartt, 3 Denio, 232, "whatever may be its grade, there is no purpose to do a wrongful act, or to omit the performance of a duty." But an intent to do a wrongful act or to omit the performance of a duty is necessarily wilful. Such wilfulness may fall short of fraud, against which, on the part of the assured, the policy in suit insured; for it covered barratry of the master and mariners. The distinction was very clearly pointed out by Chief Justice Shaw in the case of Chandler v. Worcester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Cush. 328. That was an action upon a fire insurance policy, in which the defendants admitted the making of the contract, the loss within the time, and all the facts necessary to constitute a prima facie case for the plaintiff. They also admitted that there was no fraudulent design to set fire to the building insured, and declared that no evidence of that sort would be offered. The defendants proposed to show, and as matter of defense rely on proof of, the gross negligence and carelessness and the gross misconduct of the plaintiff as the cause of the loss. On the offer of this evidence the trial judge ruled that proof of the gross negligence and carelessness and of the gross misconduct of the assured, as the cause of the destruction of the building by fire, would constitute no defense to the action, and thereupon rejected the evidence. The court, speaking through Chief Justice Shaw, said: "The general rule unquestionably is, in case of insurance against fire, that the carelessness and negligence of the agents and servants of the assured constitute no defense. Whether the same rule will apply equally to a case where a loss has occurred by means which the assured by ordinary care could have prevented is a different question. Some of the cases countenance this distinction. Lyon v. Mella, 5 East, 428; Pipon v. Cope, 1 Campb. 434. But it is not necessary to decide this question. The defendants offered to prove gross misconduct on the part of the assured. How this misconduct was to be shown, and in what acts it consisted, is not stated. The question, then, is whether there can be any misconduct, however gross, not amounting to a fraudulent intent to burn the building, which will deprive the assured of his right to recover. We think there may be. By an intent to burn the building we understand a purpose manifested and followed by some act done tending to carry that purpose into effect, but not including a mere nonfeasance. Suppose the assured, in his own house, sees the burning coals in the fireplace roll down onto the wooden floor, and does not brush them up. This would be mere nonfeasance. It would not prove an intent to burn the building; but it would show a culpable recklessness and indifference to the rights of others. Suppose the premises insured should take fire, and the flame begin to kindle in a small spot, which a cup of water would put out, and the assured has the water at hand, but neglects to put it on. This is mere nonfeasance; yet no one would doubt that it is culpable negligence, in violation of the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lœdas. To what extent such negligence must go, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in order to amount to gross misconduct, it is difficult, by any definitive or abstract rule of law, independently of circumstances, to designate. The doctrine of the civil law, that crassa negligentia was of itself proof of fraud, or equivalent to fraudulent purpose or design, was no doubt founded in the consideration that, although such negligence consists in doing nothing, and is therefore a nonfeasance, yet the doing of nothing, when the slightest care or attention would prevent a great injury, manifests a willingness, differing little in character from a fraudulent and criminal purpose, to commit such injury. Whether the facts relied on to show gross negligence and gross misconduct, of which evidence was offered, would have proved any one of these supposed cases, or any like case, we have no means of knowing; but, as they might have done so, the court are of opinion that the proof should have been admitted, and proper instructions given in reference to it. The terms 'slight negligence,' 'want of ordinary care,' and 'gross negligence' are useful in their way; but they are not precise and exact enough, without a statement of the facts designated by them, to enable a court to judge of the rights of parties thereby affected. The proper business of jurisprudence seems to be to take a series of facts and circumstances, conceded or proved, and to declare what are the rights of the parties arising out of them."

In the case of Williams v. New England Mut. M. Ins. Co. 3 Cliff. 244, Fed. Cas. No. 17,731, the owners of an insured vessel attempted to put her across the bar at Hatteras inlet. She struck on the bar and was wrecked. The master knew that the depth of water on the bar was such as to make the attempted passage dangerous. Judge Clifford held that, under the circumstances, the loss was not within the protection of the policy, saying: "Authorities to prove that persons insured cannot recover for a loss occasioned by their own wrongful acts are hardly necessary, as the proposition involves an elementary principle of universal application. Losses may be recovered by the insured, though remotely occasioned by the negligence or misconduct of the master or crew, if proximately caused by the perils insured against, because such mistakes and negligence are incident to navigation and constitute a part of the perils which those who engage in such adventures are obliged to incur; but it was never supposed that the insured could recover indemnity for a loss occasioned by his own wrongful act or by that of any agent for whose conduct he was responsible," citing Thompson v. Hopper, 6 El. & Bl. 944; Marsh, Ins. 376; American Ins. Co. v. Og- den, 20 Wend. 305; Bell v. Carstairs, 14 East, 374; Cleveland v. Union Ins. Co. 8 Mass. 308.

The case of Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Adams, 123 U. S. 67, 31 L. ed. 63, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 68, was, like the present, an action to recover on a policy of marine insurance. The insured sued as for a total loss arising from one of the perils specified in the policy. The insurance company pleaded non assumpsit and payment, with leave to give in evidence the matters set forth in its affidavit of defense, which was adopted as a special plea. According to the bill of exceptions in the case, there was evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs tending to show that, without wilfulness or design on the part of her captain, the vessel was carried, April 28, 1880, before the expiration of the policy, over the falls of the Ohio river, at Louisville, Kentucky, and sunk, receiving damage in a sum equal to 50 per cent of her agreed value, and that on the 18th of May, 1880, it being apparently impracticable to float her off and repair her, the vessel was abandoned as a total loss, and the sum due under the policy demanded. The evidence introduced by the company tended to establish, among other things, these facts: The master of The Alice (the vessel in question) was C. F. Adams, one of the assured, and a son of the other plaintiff. Before the sailing of the vessel he had the reputation of being a "drinking" man, and of that fact his father was informed. On her arrival at Louisville, on the morning of April 28, 1880, the master gave the usual signal (which was transmitted to the engineer) that he had no present need of the engines. The joint of the mud valve was out of order, threatening damage to the freight, and making repairs necessary. The steam was thereupon blown off in order to make repairs. The captain, coming on board, saw that repairs were going on, and knew that the mud valve connected with the boiler needed repairs. The work of repairing made it necessary to blow off steam. The captain subsequently went on deck, and, without making inquiry of the engineer as to the condition of the steam, or receiving any notice from him that steam was ready, tapped his bell at about 8:30 A. M. as a signal to let go the boat. At that time there was not sufficient steam to propel the vessel. It is the custom of the river for the master, before giving the order to let go, to inquire of the engineer as to the condition of the steam, and await his reply that the steam is ready before giving the order to let go. Upon being let go she was carried by the current down the river and over the falls, and, striking a pier, was badly damaged, in consequence of which she sunk soon thereafter below the bridge in about 18 feet of water. The plaintiffs thereafter offered, among other things, evidence tending to show that "it was the custom of the river that the engineer should give notice to the captain before exhausting steam, and that it was not the custom for the captain to have notice from the engineer that steam was ready before giving the order to let go." The court, at the request of the plaintiffs and against the objections of the company, instructed the jury that "where a loss under a policy of insurance, such as the one in suit, happens from the perils of the river, it is not a defense to the insurance company that the remote cause of loss was the negligence of the insured or his agents," and that "the mere fault or negligence of the captain of the vessel, by which The Alice was drifted into the current and drawn over the falls, will not constitute a defense for the company, unless the jury should be satisfied that the captain acted fraudulently or wilfully, with design in so doing." The theory of the defense was disclosed by the request to instruct the jury that, if they "are satisfied from the evidence that the accident and loss was caused by the misconduct of Captain Charles F. Adams, then the plaintiff cannot recover." This request was denied, but the court said to the jury: "This is true, if the jury is satisfied that the conduct of the captain is properly characterized. If he designedly or recklessly exposed the vessel to the dangers of navigation at the falls, knowing that she was not in a condition to encounter them, he was guilty of misconduct such as would relieve the defendant from liability; but, if the proximate cause of the loss was the stranding of the vessel, this was covered by the policy, and the defendant is not relieved from liability by showing that the loss was remotely ascribable to the negligence of the captain or the other officers or employees." The Supreme Court said: "We do not perceive anything in these instructions of which the insurance company can rightfully complain. The court proceeded upon the ground that, if the efficient, and therefore proximate, cause of the loss was a peril of the river, the company could not escape liability by showing that the loss was remotely caused by mere negligence in not ascertaining, before giving the signal to let the vessel go, that she had steam enough for her proper management. The court committed no error in so ruling." And, after referring to various cases, the Supreme Court further said: "But it is insisted that the court should have granted the request of the company to the effect that it was not liable if the accident and loss were caused by the 'misconduct' of the master. Had that request been granted in the form asked, the jury might have supposed that the company was relieved from liability if the master was chargeable with what is sometimes described as gross negligence, as distinguished from simple negligence. Hence the court properly said, in effect, that the misconduct of the master, unless affected by fraud or design, would not defeat a recovery on the policy."

Thereby was recognized the distinction above pointed out between negligence, fraud, and a wilful exposure to known dangers.

The doctrine of respondet superior being applicable to the case (1 Phillips, Ins. § 1056; Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Adams, supra; American Ins. Co. v. Insley, 7 Pa. 223, 47 Am. Dec. 500), it follows that, if Captain Panno did, with knowledge of the dangers to be encountered and with ample time to have avoided them, designedly undertake to force The Sudden through the ice in order to reach Nome quickly, that his principals might gain pecuniary advantage, he was guilty of the wilfulness which the California statute declares relieves the insurer of liability, and the jury should have been so instructed by the court below. This construction of the California statute is, as shown above, in accord with the general law upon the subject.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Petition for rehearing denied.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

THOMAS BOYLE et al., Respts.,
v.

NORTHWESTERN NATIONAL BANK OF SUPERIOR, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(.... Wis.)

1. Bank deposit—trust fund—application.

Money received by a commission merchant for produce sent him for sale, and deposited by him in his general account in bank, belongs to the owners of the produce, and cannot be applied by the bank to the obligations of the merchant.

2. Same—suit to reach fund.

Persons who have shipped grain to a commission merchant for sale, the proceeds of which he has deposited in his bank account, cannot, as equitable owners, reach the proceeds of property belonging to other consignors, which the merchant had transferred to the bank in payment of his own obligation prior to the receipt of the property of the complaining consignors.

On Rehearing.

3. Same—rights between beneficiaries.

A consignor, the proceeds of whose property have been deposited by a broker in his general bank account and checked against, can hold the bank liable only for the lowest amount remaining in the account at any time when he was the sole equitable owner of the account, as against the rights of other consignors, the proceeds of whose property subsequently swelled the account.

4. Same.

Where funds belonging to several consignors are deposited by the broker in his general bank account, which is checked against, and thereby reduced below the aggregate amount of the claims, the claim represented by the last deposit which remains intact, except as to charges properly made against it at the time the fund is brought into court for distribution, is entitled to payment of its net balance in full.

5. Same—ratable distribution.

Funds in a bank account belonging to several beneficiaries, which were deposited by a trustee who reduced the account below the aggregate of the claims, will, except as to such deposits as remain intact, be distributed ratably.

(June 23, 1905.)

APPPEAL by defendant Northwestern National Bank from a judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff and interveners in an action brought to impose a trust on a bank deposit. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Cassoday, Ch. J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiff and the five interveners to recover from the defendant banks, or one of them, moneys realized as the proceeds of grain and flax

Case Note.—On the general question of the right of a bank to apply to its own debt a deposit made by a fiduciary or representative, the cases are treated at length in a note in 52 L. R. A. 790. On the specific question involved in the above case, of the rights of a bank in respect to moneys deposited by a commission merchant in the course of his business, the cases directly in point are but few. The most important one is that of Union Stock Yards Nat. Bank v. Gillespie, 137 U. S. 411, 34 L. ed. 724, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118, from which the opinion of the court in the above case makes a pertinent quotation, to the effect that the bank, under the circumstances of the case, must have known that the moneys were the proceeds of property of the factors' principal. The court in that case says that the factors were known to the bank to be in sold for them, or some of them, on commission by E. Schwedler, between September 6, 1901, and February 10, 1902, and by him deposited in the Northwestern National Bank of Superior, and which bank sold and transferred all its assets to the First National Bank of Superior, which assumed all liabilities September 22, 1902. The facts are undisputed, or found by the court, and are to the effect that the Schwedler Grain Company was incorporated and commenced doing the business of buying and selling grain and flax on commission in Superior in 1898, and continued doing such business until 1901; that during that time it did its banking business with the Northwestern National Bank, and became largely indebted to that bank, and at all times since 1900 such indebtedness was and now is $4,000, evidenced by the three notes in the record; that in the spring of 1901, on account of such indebtedness and other things, the Schwedler Grain Company became embarrassed, and passed into the hands of one F. R. Crumpton, trustee, who conducted the business for two or three months with the aid of Mr. Schwedler, who had been president of the corporation, but ceased to do such business in August, 1901, with such indebtedness still unpaid, and the same continued; that thereafter, and on or about September 1, 1901, Mr. Schwedler furnished the necessary capital and opened and continued such commission business on his own account, but in the name of the Schwedler Grain Company, and in that name opened an account with the Northwestern National Bank, and all moneys received by him as proceeds of sales of grain and flax in such business, either individually or in the name of the Schwedler Grain Company, were deposited in that bank in that account, but that the Schwedler Grain Company had no interest in said business so carried on, on and after September 6, 1901; that the money deposited in that bank in the name of the Schwedler Grain Company was all of it received as the proceeds of the sale of grain and flax by Mr. Schwedler, and belonged to the customers or persons for whom he sold the grain and flax, except one half of 1 per cent by way of commission earned by him, which was deposited with such other proceeds; that between September 6, 1901, and February 10, 1902, Mr. Schwedler received from various and divers persons shipments of grain and flax, and sold the same on commission, and deposited the proceeds of the sales from day to day in that bank in that account,—in many cases the freight being the commission business; "they were not buyers and sellers, but factors,—agents to sell. Presumably, therefore, moneys deposited by them were the proceeds of cattle consigned to them for sale. Their business being known to the bank, such presumption goes with their deposits; and, while not of itself notice, is a circumstance to compel inquiry on the part of the bank in respect to any particular deposit." The court proceeds to say that it does not mean to be understood to imply that the bank receiving deposits from one whom it knows to be in the commission business receives every deposit in trust for some unknown principal; but says: "It is only when there gather around any deposit or line of deposits circumstances of a peculiar nature, which individualize that deposit or line of deposits, and inform the bank of peculiar facts of equitable cognizance, that it is debarred from treating the deposit as that of moneys belonging absolutely to the depositor." The court goes on to say that the bank knew that the factors were failing, and also knew from a draft received that a shipment had been made to them. Under all the circumstances, the court concludes that the bank had notice that the deposits made were the proceeds of property sent on commission.

Another case closely similar was that of Clemmer v. Drovers' Nat. Bank, 157 Ill. 206, 41 N. E. 728. The decision there was also that the bank knew that the moneys collected and deposited by a factor, though in his own name, were the proceeds of sales of stock consigned on commission, and that the bank was bound to know that it had no right to apply these moneys in payment of its own demands against the commission merchants.

Still another case of the same kind is that of Union Stock Yards Nat. Bank v. Moore, 25 C. C. A. 150, 49 U. S. App. 153, 79 Fed. 705. This also was a case of deposits in a bank, made by a live-stock commission agent and factor when it was indebted to the bank, and the court held that the action depended upon the litigated questions of fact, whether the consignors who claimed the funds were, in equity, the owners of the money when it was deposited in the bank, "and whether the officers of said bank, when it received such deposit, knew, or had reason to believe, that the deposit consisted of, or contained, moneys not belonging to said company [the factor], but to the appellees or to others for whom the company was but the agent or factor." The court found that the money belonged to the consignors, and that the bank knew, or had reason to believe, that this was the case. It therefore denied the right of the bank to apply the money on the factor's indebtedness to it.

These cases by no means establish a rule that a bank is in all cases bound to take notice that deposits by a factor or commission merchant belong to an undisclosed consignor; but leave it to be established by the circumstances of each case, that the bank knew, or ought to have known, that such was the fact.

paid by the purchasers, and in other cases the gross proceeds of the sales were so deposited, and then the freight bills, the inspection, and other charges not paid by the purchasers, were promptly paid by Mr. Schwedler's checks upon such account in that bank; that the credit in such bank account did not at any time after September 6, 1901, exceed the amount actually due to such customers as the proceeds of such sales; that Mr. Schwedler from time to time drew out from such account, for his own use, his commissions, and all moneys due him personally, and at no time was there in said account more than from $100 to $200 belonging to him, and that none of the money received in said account at the time of the trial belonged to or is claimed by Mr. Schwedler personally, or to anyone else other than the parties to this action; that October 8, 1901, Mr. Schwedler, upon the demand and urgent request of that bank, through its president, drew and delivered to such president his check for $500, to be applied on the old indebtedness of the old company to said bank, at the same time notifying said president that the moneys so on deposit in said bank account did not belong to Mr. Schwedler nor to the old company, but did belong to such consignors of Mr. Schwedler; that the bank accepted the check with full knowledge of the facts stated, and charged it to said account under date of October 9, 1901, and issued a cashier's check in favor of itself, but did not indorse or in any way apply any money or said check upon such indebtedness, but, on the contrary, credited the amount of the said check to its cashier's account, which was only, in effect, a method of bookkeeping; that December 1, 1901, the plaintiff Boyle shipped a car load of flax to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and the proceeds were deposited by him in the account in that bank,—$500 December 14, 1901, and $661.43 December 18, 1901,—and that said moneys belonged to the said Boyle; that the intervener Anderson shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and the proceeds of such sale were deposited in such bank to the credit of said account January 24, 1902, and that the net amount of such proceeds after deducting commission, freight, inspection, and other charges was $430.38, and the same belonged to said Anderson; that the intervener McNeil shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and the proceeds of such sale, after taking out moneys advanced and commissions to the amount of $147.35, belonged to McNeil, and the same was deposited to the credit of said account in said bank January 30, 1902; that the intervener Brown shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and, after deducting advancements made thereon, the net proceeds thereof belonging to Brown, to the amount of $165.20, were deposited to the credit of said account January 31, 1902; that the intervener Wibe shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and in January, 1902, the proceeds thereof, amounting to $520.11, were deposited in said bank to the credit of said account, and, after paying commissions, freight, inspection, and other charges, the balance of $426.92 belonged to Wibe; that the intervener Larson shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and the proceeds thereof, amounting to $527.78, were deposited in said bank February 4 and 8, 1902, to the credit of said account, and, after paying commissions, freight, inspection, and other charges, the balance of $439.08 belonged to said Larson; that neither the plaintiff nor any of the interveners were informed of, or knew or consented to, the deposit of such proceeds of sales, or any part thereof, in said account or said bank, and each of them was entitled to have the net proceeds of his car load at once transmitted to him in the regular course of business; that the officers of that bank, and particularly the president, had notice and knowledge that the moneys so deposited were the proceeds of sales of grain shipped to and sold by Mr. Schwedler on commission, and belonged to such shippers, although the names were not disclosed to the bank; that Mr. Schwedler had no authority to make any of such deposits; that the plaintiff and the said five interveners were all the trust creditors of Mr. Schwedler, and all the unpaid persons whose moneys were deposited in said account; that the moneys so deposited in said account were mixed with the other moneys of the bank, and checks of Mr. Schwedler drawn thereon as usual, and none were special deposits during any of the time from September 6, 1901, to February 10, 1902; that after the deposits of the proceeds of Larson's grain, as mentioned, the only checks drawn upon or paid from said account were three, to wit, one for $4.20, one for $30, and the other for $75, making in all $109.20; that February 10, 1902, that bank, without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Schwedler, or the plaintiff, or any of said interveners, charged said account with $648, and credited the same to its cashier's account, claiming the right to apply it, as it had the $500, on the old indebtedness of the grain company, but did not in fact apply or indorse the same thereon; that such moneys of the plaintiff and each uary 30, 1902; that the intervener Brown shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and, after deducting advancements made thereon, the net proceeds thereof belonging to Brown, to the amount of $165.20, were deposited to the credit of said account January 31, 1902; that the intervener Wibe shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and in January, 1902, the proceeds thereof, amounting to $520.11, were deposited in said bank to the credit of said account, and, after paying commissions, freight, inspection, and other charges, the balance of $426.92 belonged to Wibe; that the intervener Larson shipped a car load of grain to Mr. Schwedler, which he sold on commission, and the proceeds thereof, amounting to $527.78, were deposited in said bank February 4 and 8, 1902, to the credit of said account, and, after paying commissions, freight, inspection, and other charges, the balance of $439.08 belonged to said Larson; that neither the plaintiff nor any of the interveners were informed of, or knew or consented to, the deposit of such proceeds of sales, or any part thereof, in said account or said bank, and each of them was entitled to have the net proceeds of his car load at once transmitted to him in the regular course of business; that the officers of that bank, and particularly the president, had notice and knowledge that the moneys so deposited were the proceeds of sales of grain shipped to and sold by Mr. Schwedler on commission, and belonged to such shippers, although the names were not disclosed to the bank; that Mr. Schwedler had no authority to make any of such deposits; that the plaintiff and the said five interveners were all the trust creditors of Mr. Schwedler, and all the unpaid persons whose moneys were deposited in said account; that the moneys so deposited in said account were mixed with the other moneys of the bank, and checks of Mr. Schwedler drawn thereon as usual, and none were special deposits during any of the time from September 6, 1901, to February 10, 1902; that after the deposits of the proceeds of Larson's grain, as mentioned, the only checks drawn upon or paid from said account were three, to wit, one for $4.20, one for $30, and the other for $75, making in all $109.20; that February 10, 1902, that bank, without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Schwedler, or the plaintiff, or any of said interveners, charged said account with $648, and credited the same to its cashier's account, claiming the right to apply it, as it had the $500, on the old indebtedness of the grain company, but did not in fact apply or indorse the same thereon; that such moneys of the plaintiff and each and all of the several interveners so deposited were placed in the general funds of the bank, and there kept, except as so drawn out on the checks of Mr. Schwedler, until September 22, 1902, and during that time such general fund never ran below $2,000; that on the day and year last mentioned such general fund and all the assets of that bank, including not less than $40,000 in cash, were turned over and transferred to the First National Bank of Superior, pursuant to a contract of purchase thereof, and the last-named bank then assumed and agreed to pay to each and all of the depositors the money due them out of the funds and assets so received, and the same were sufficient to meet all liabilities so assumed, including the amount standing to the credit of said account and the amount represented or charged by reason of such cashier's checks; that the funds of said banks, respectively, during the times named, were increased and enriched to the extent of such deposits, less the amounts so drawn out on checks of Mr. Schwedler, and that each of said banks has been at all times entirely solvent; that from September 6, 1901, to September 22, 1902, the account so kept in the Northwestern National Bank showed the following balances: On February 16, 1902, and from that time to September 22, 1902, to the credit thereof, 13 cents; that whether such balance should be increased by adding thereto the $648 so charged to the account, February 10, 1902, and the $500 so charged to the account October 9, 1901, or either of them, depended upon the determination of the court to be made therein; that, if the charge of $500 should be allowed to stand, the lowest balance between December 9, 1901, and February 10, 1902, was $153.50, January 2, 1902, and, if the $500 should be canceled, then the lowest balance would be $653.50, January 2, 1902.

As conclusions of law the court found, in effect, that the issuing of the cashier's check of $500 and the crediting the same to the cashier's account October 9, 1901, was improper and ineffectual, and did not in any wise affect the fund in the bank to the credit of said account; that the charge of $648 against said account and the crediting the same to the cashier's account and issuing a cashier's unsigned check therefor, February 10, 1902, was improper, illegal, and in no way affected the funds to the credit of said account; that the Northwestern National Bank had no right to appropriate the money so deposited in said account to apply upon its old claim against the grain company, and had no right to offset the same; that Mr. Schwedler's checks upon said account, so far as drawn in favor of his respective customers, must be presumed to have been drawn against funds of such customer, so far as he had any to meet the same; that checks drawn by him for his own use must be presumed to have been drawn out of his own funds, so far as he had any in the bank, and when he had none, or when the customers in whose favor a check was drawn had none, or an insufficient amount, then the moneys paid out thereon, so far as there was a deficiency, should be deducted pro rata from the moneys of all other customers in said fund; that after annulling the two charges, $500 and $648, as mentioned, there was in the Northwestern National Bank to the credit of the account kept as aforesaid until September 22, 1902, $1,148.13, which funds were at that time transferred by that bank to the First National Bank, and are now held by it; that the plaintiff and the intervening creditors were entitled to recover said moneys in the following amounts: Boyle $258.72, Wibe $169.01, Anderson $170.38, McNeil $58.35, Brown $65.40, Larson $426.27; that the First National Bank pay into the court the $1,148.13 and take the clerk's receipt therefor; that the cashier's check of October 9, 1901, and the unsigned check of February 10, 1902, be canceled, and that such payment, being made, would be a full discharge; that out of the moneys so paid in the clerk shall pay over to the plaintiff and the intervening creditors, respectively, the sums mentioned in the above conclusion of law; that the plaintiff and interveners recover from the Northwestern National Bank costs and disbursements as therein mentioned; and that the plaintiff Boyle is entitled to recover as damages of the Northwestern National Bank interest upon his share of the sum mentioned from February 5, 1903, amounting to $21.99. The interveners do not claim interest, and so none is allowed to them. And the court thereupon ordered judgment to be entered according to such findings. From the judgment so entered the Northwestern National Bank brings this appeal.

Mr. Solon L. Perrin, for appellant:

The whole theory of constructive trusts rests on equitable ownership of the beneficiary seeking to enforce the trusts, either as the prior holder of the legal title of the thing sought to be impressed with the trust, or one standing in the shoes of such prior holder of such legal title.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the findings of the court and the evidence, the commission business in which Mr. Schwedler was engaged from September 6, 1901, to February 10, 1902, must be regarded as his personal business, and not a continuation of the business of the old grain corporation of which he had previously been the president, and which corporation was indebted to the bank during the time mentioned in the sum of $4,000. It appears from the findings, and is undisputed, that the moneys received from time to time by Mr. Schwedler on the sale of grain and flax on commission during the period mentioned were deposited by him in the bank, and that he drew checks thereon, as stated. It also appears, and is undisputed, that the last deposit so made by him was on February 8, 1902, the same being proceeds of the sale of Larson's grain; that, after making that deposit, Mr. Schwedler only gave three checks drawn on that account, amounting in the aggregate to $109.20; and that after deducting that amount from the amount standing to his credit on the books of the bank there remained a balance to his credit on the morning of February 10, 1902, of only $648.13, notwithstanding Mr. Schwedler had deposited in the bank to the credit of that account between December 1, 1901, and February 10, 1902, $2,770.38, being the proceeds of sales of grain and flax belonging to the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

plaintiff and the five interveners, respectively, and none of which had been paid to them or any of them. On February 10, 1902, the bank, without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Schwedler, or the plaintiff, or any of the interveners, and upon an unsigned check or memorandum drawn by itself, as found, charged said account with $648, and credited the same amount to its cashier's account; and by virtue of such charge and credit so made the bank claims the right to withhold said $648 from the plaintiff and the five interveners, and any of them, and apply the same upon the debt which the grain corporation owed the bank. The trial court held that such claim was without foundation, and that such charge and credit so made were improper, illegal, and in no way affected or diminished the amount of $648.13 so standing to the credit of Mr. Schwedler on the morning of February 10, 1902. One of the important questions in the case is whether such ruling of the trial court is correct. It is to be observed that Mr. Schwedler makes no claim to any part of the money so on deposit. It is also found that the plaintiff and the five interveners are the only persons whose moneys were so deposited in said account, and who have not been paid.

The question recurs whether, in equity, the money so on deposit should be paid to the owners of the produce from which it was realized, or to the bank, to be applied on its old claim against the grain corporation. It is very evident that whenever Mr. Schwedler sold a car load of grain or flax on commission, and received pay for the same, such proceeds, after deducting commissions, freight, inspection, and other charges, were held by him for the owner of the grain or flax so sold. The contention seems to be that by depositing such proceeds in the bank to the credit of such account the same became mixed with the funds of the bank generally, and that by reason of such mixture it became impossible to trace and identify the particular money so deposited as entering into any specific fund or property so sought to be charged. In support of such contention counsel cite Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Flanders, 87 Wis. 237, 241, 242, 58 N. W. 383; Burnham v. Barth, 89 Wis. 362, 366-370, 62 N. W. 96; Dowie v. Humphrey, 91 Wis. 98, 102-104, 64 N. W. 315; Bromley v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 103 Wis. 562, 568, 569, 79 N. W. 741; Hyland v. Roe, 111 Wis. 361, 366, 367, 87 Am. St. Rep. 873, 87 N. W. 252. These cases do not, in our judgment, go to the extent claimed. On the contrary, "the more recent rule in England," followed in these cases, is that, "If money held by a person in a fiduciary character, though not as trustee, has been paid by him to his account at his bankers, the person for whom he held the money can follow it, and has a charge on the balance in the bankers' hands." Re Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696. The reasons for the rule are so fully stated by the learned master of the rolls in that case as to render it unnecessary to add to such reasoning here. At least two of the cases cited by counsel for the defendant expressly sanction the rule thus quoted, and the others, in a general way, approve of the decision from which they are quoted. There is no purpose here of renewing a discussion which is so fully covered upon reason and authority by our own cases. Nevertheless we venture to quote from two decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States what seems to be peculiarly applicable to the case at bar: "Although the relation between the bank and its depositor is that merely of debtor and creditor, the money which he deposits, if held by him in a fiduciary capacity, does not change its character by being placed to his credit in his bank account. The bank contracts that it will pay the money on his checks, and when they are drawn in proper form it is bound to presume, in case the account is kept with him as a trustee, or as acting in some other fiduciary character, that he is in the course of lawfully performing his duty, and to honor them accordingly; but when against such an account it seeks to assert its lien for an obligation which it knows was incurred for his private benefit, it must be held as having notice that the fund is not his individual property, if it is shown to consist, in whole or in part, of money which he held in a trust relation." Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693. "A bank receiving on deposit from a factor, under the circumstances set forth in this case, moneys which it must have known were the proceeds of property of the factor's principal, consigned to him by the principal for sale on the principal's account, of which moneys the principal was the beneficial owner, cannot, as against the latter, appropriate the deposits to the payment of a general balance due to the bank from the factor; and if it attempts to do so the remedy of the principal against the bank is in equity, and not at law." Union Stock Yards Nat. Bank v. Gillespie, 137 U. S. 411, 34 L. ed. 724, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118. Upon the strength of these authorities, and many others which might be cited, it is manifest that the $648.13 standing to the credit of Mr. Schwedler on the books of the bank on the morning of February 10, 1902, was, in equity, the property of the owners of the net produce from which the same was realized, and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) should be paid to such owners according to their proportionate shares thereof in equity.

2. The right to the $500 mentioned is governed by a different principle. The trial court held, in effect, that the check given by Mr. Schwedler on said account to the president of the bank October 8, 1901, for $500, and charging of the same to said account, and issuing the cashier's check therefor, and crediting the amount of the check to the cashier's account, was only, in effect, a method of bookkeeping, and was improper and ineffectual, and did not in any wise affect the fund in the bank to the credit of said account. Assuming such findings and ruling to be correct, the question recurs whether the trial court properly held that the $500 thereafter remained to the credit of Mr. Schwedler's account, and was, in equity, the property of the plaintiff and the interveners and subject to be charged as such in this action. The nature of the action seems to have been lost sight of. This is not a proceeding by attachment or garnishment. The question is not whether the bank wrongfully induced Mr. Schwedler to give the check on the fund in the bank, which, in equity, belonged to his consignors; but whether such fund belonged to the plaintiff and the interveners, or some of them, at the time the check was so given. As stated in some of the adjudications cited, the right of action to trace the moneys and charge the fund has its basis in the right of property, but never upon the theory of perference by reason of an unlawful conversion. Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Flanders, 87 Wis. 242, 58 N. W. 383. So, as stated by Mr. Justice Pinney, in one of the cases cited, and reiterated in others: "When the trust fund cannot be identified or traced into some specific estate or substituted property, and the means of ascertainment fail, the trust wholly fails, and the party can only prove as a general creditor. . . . As the right to trace his trust fund is founded on the right of property, and not on the ground of compensation for its loss, he must be able to point out the particular property into which the fund has been converted. When he is unable to do this, the trust fails and his claim becomes one for compensation only, for the loss of the fund, and stands on the same basis as the claims of general creditors. . . . Where the trust fund . . . cannot be traced, and the substituted property into which it has entered specifically identified, the trust fund must be regarded as dissipated, within the meaning of the authorities,—scattered, dispersed, and, as such, destroyed." Burnham v. Barth, 89 Wis. 367, 369, 370, 62 N. W. 96; Dowie v. Humphrey, 91 Wis. 103, 64 N. W. 315. Mr. Schwedler's check for $500 was given to the bank nearly two months prior to the time when the plaintiff or any of the interveners shipped any grain to Mr. Schwedler, and more than two months prior to the time when any money belonging to the plaintiff or any of the interveners was so deposited in the bank. This being so, it is very obvious that such check was not drawn upon any fund in which the plaintiff or any of the interveners had any interest. If, as found by the court, Mr. Schwedler, at the time of giving that check, notified the president of the bank that the money then in the bank to his credit in said account did not belong to him, nor to the grain corporation, but did belong to those who had previously made consignments to him, still that could give no right of action in favor of the plaintiff or any of the interveners, in equity, to charge the fund then in the bank. In other words, the plaintiff and the interveners can only recover in this form of action by showing that they, or some of them, are the equitable owners of the fund sought to be charged, and not by showing that some stranger to the action had such right of action. We must hold that the trial court improperly held the bank liable for the fund of $500, covered by Mr. Schwedler's check of October 8, 1901.

The judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County is hereby modified by reducing the amount of the recovery from the First National Bank to $648.13, and that the same be divided between the parties equitably entitled, as indicated in this opinion, and that, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, with costs in favor of the appellant.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Cassoday, Ch. J., on October 3, 1905, handed down the following response:

The motion for a rehearing presents no ground for holding the bank liable in this action for the $500 for which Mr. Schwedler gave his check more than a month prior to the time when any money belonging to the plaintiff or to any of the interveners was deposited in the bank. The reason for this ruling is sufficiently stated in the opinion filed. Boyle v. North Western Nat. Bank (Wis.) 103 N. W. 1123, 1127, 1128. So, for the reasons there given (pp. 1126, 1127), we adhere to the ruling there made "that the $648.13 standing to the credit of Mr. Schwedler on the books of the bank on the morning of February 10, 1902, was, in equity, the property of the owners of the net produce from which the same was realized, and should be paid to such owners according to their proportionate shares thereof in equity." We are now asked to fully determine the rights of the parties

upon the facts here presented. While the principles upon which those rights are to be determined are stated in the opinion on file, yet the rights of the respective parties are not there stated in detail.

The question is as to the proper distribution to be made of the $648.13 to the credit of Schwedler in the bank on the morning of February 10, 1902. As stated in that opinion, $1,161.43, belonging to the plaintiff, Boyle, was deposited in the bank to the credit of Schwedler December 14 and 18, 1901. Upon the theory that there was only $648.13 to be distributed, it was found by the trial court, and is undisputed, that the lowest balance to the credit of Schwedler between December 9, 1901, and February 10, 1902, was $153.50, on January 2, 1902. Since no money belonging to any of the interveners went into the bank prior to the day and year last mentioned, it is manifest that the $153.50 so to the credit of Schwedler January 2, 1902, was in equity the property of Boyle. It is also manifest, upon the principles stated, that the moneys belonging to Boyle which had been drawn from the bank on the checks of Schwedler prior to January 2, 1902, cannot be reached by him in this action. It appears from the findings, and is undisputed, that after January 2, 1902, and during that month, there were deposited in the bank to the credit of Schwedler moneys belonging to the following interveners, respectively, in the amounts stated, to wit: Wibe, $426.92; Anderson, $430.38; McNeil, $147.35; and Brown, $165.20,—making in the aggregate, with the amount so belonging to Boyle, $1,323.35. It also appears from the findings, and is undisputed, that the intervener Larson shipped to Schwedler a car load of grain, which he sold on commission, and the proceeds thereof, amounting to $527.78, were deposited in the bank to the credit of Schwedler February 4 and 8, 1902, and that after paying therefrom the freight, inspection, and other charges, including commissions, the balance thereof, amounting to $439.08, belonged to Larson, and that after such deposit of the proceeds of Larson's grain "the only checks drawn or paid upon said account were three in number, . . . amounting in the aggregate to $109.20." Assuming that this amount was all paid from the proceeds of Larson's grain, then, by deducting this amount from the $527.78, the proceeds of Larson's grain so deposited, there remains a balance of at least $418.58 as belonging to Larson, and which must have been in the bank to the credit of Schwedler on the morning of February 10, 1902. We perceive no reason why Larson is not entitled to that amount in the judgment to be entered in this action. Deducting the $418.58 from the $648.13 standing to the credit of Schwedler on the morning of February 10, 1902, and it leaves a balance of $229.55 to be distributed to Boyle and the four interveners whose moneys went into the bank to the credit of Schwedler in the month of January, 1902, as stated, according to their proportionate shares thereof in equity; that is to say, to Boyle $26.63, to Wibe $74.05, to Anderson $74.65, to McNeil $25.56, and to Brown $28.66, making a total of $229.55. This gives to each a little over 17½ per cent on the amount of his claim for his money so on deposit in January, 1902. The division thus to be made is in accordance with the principles stated in the opinion on file.

The judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County is hereby modified by reducing the amount of the recovery from the First National Bank to $648.13, and that the same be divided between the parties equitably entitled, as indicated in the opinion on file, and as stated in this opinion, and that, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, with costs in this court in favor of the appellant.

Denied without costs.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

JOHN F. McNEAL, Exr., etc., of William P. Hazen, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.

C. M. PIERCE, Admr., etc., of Mary Pierce, Deceased.

(.... Ohio)

1. Legacy—acknowledgment of outlawed debt.

A legacy reciting that it is "in consideration of her care for my invalid mother many years preceding her death, and also her care of my infant son," does not imply a debt, but a bounty. It is not an acknowledgment of a legal obligation, and, when pleaded in an action barred by the statute of limitations to recover for such services, does not remove the bar of the statute.

Headnotes by the COURT.

Case Note.—Whether a devise or legacy reciting a consideration will constitute such an acknowledgment of a legal obligation therefor as to remove the bar of the statute of limitations seems to depend, as in cases of acknowledgments in other ways, upon the peculiar wording of the acknowledgment. In Stewart v. McFarland, 84 Iowa, 55, 50 N. W. 221, the court says that an admission in a will, though designed to become operative after the testator's death instead of during his lifetime, will, if otherwise sufficient, be effectual to revive the cause of action to which it refers.

In order to have such effect, however, the will must be so executed as to be valid; for a direction in a writing in a private account book purporting to be a will, that the writer's wife shall pay all his just debts, including a debt of a specified amount due his 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

edgment of a legal obligation, and, when pleaded in an action barred by the statute of limitations to recover for such services, does not remove the bar of the statute.

2. Same—in payment of debt—lapse.

A legacy given in payment of a debt by the express terms of the will does not lapse by the death of the legatee before the testator; but when, by the terms of the will, it appears that the intention of the testator was to confer a bounty, it is not competent to show a different intent, and to prevent a lapse by proof that the legacy was given in payment of a debt.

(October 31, 1905.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Marion County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas which sustained a demurrer to a petition filed to compel payment of a legacy. Reversed.

Statement by Summers, J.:

The tenth item of the will of William P. Hazen, executed in 1896, is as follows: "Tenth. I give and bequeath to my niece, Miss Mary Pierce, daughter of my sister, Emily Pierce, of Middlefield, Geauga county, Ohio, $5,000, the same being in consideration of her care of my invalid mother many years preceding her death and also her care of my infant son, Martin L. Hazen, after the death of his mother." The legatee died without issue in the lifetime of the testator. Suit was brought by the administrator of the legatee against the executor to recover the amount of the legacy. It is averred in the petition that in 1858 the testator was indebted to the legatee for services then and theretofore rendered by her at his request in the care of his invalid mother and of his infant son, which were of the value of $5,000. The tenth item of the will is then set out as an acknowledgment of the debt in writing, and signed by the party to be mother, will not have any such effect where it is not attested, and is retained by him among his papers until after his death. Allen v. Collier, 70 Mo. 138, 35 Am. Rep. 416.

A case in which, as in McNEAL v. PIERCE, the recital was held insufficient to remove the bar, is Stansbury v. Stansbury, 20 W. Va. 23, which holds that a devise to the testator's son of certain land valued at $8,800, being "$3,000 for his services rendered, leaving a balance of $5,800," with a provision, after several other specific legacies, that the above-specified legacies are to be in proportion, does not contain such an acknowledgment as will remove the bar of the statute of limitations from the claim for services, where the devisee renounces the satisfaction of the claim provided by the testator.

And a bequest to a physician, as a mark charged, to remove the bar of the statute of limitations. The court of common pleas sustained a general demurrer to the petition. The circuit court reversed.

Messrs. J. F. McNeal and L. B. McNeal, for plaintiff in error:

The language used is insufficient to constitute an acknowledgment.

Webster v. Newbold, 41 Pa. 482, 82 Am. Dec. 487; McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 95 Am. Dec. 170; Harlan v. Bernie, 22 Ark. 219, 76 Am. Dec. 428; Manchester v. Braedner, 107 N. Y. 346, 1 Am. St. Rep. 829, 14 N. E. 405; Macrum v. Marshall, 129 Pa. 506, 15 Am. St. Rep. 730, 18 Atl. 640; Ward v. Jack, 172 Pa. 416, 51 Am. St. Rep. 744, 33 Atl. 577.

No recovery of the legacy as a legacy can be had because it lapsed.

Messrs. Crissinger & Guthery, for defendant in error:

The fact of rendition of services raises the implied obligation to pay.

The acknowledgment was sufficient.

A legacy given in payment of a debt will not lapse because of the death of the legatee before the testator.

Page, Wills, § 739; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 749 note; Ward v. Bush, 59 N. J. Eq. 144, 45 Atl. 534.

Mr. N. H. Bostwick also for defendant in error.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions are presented: First, whether the will removed the bar of the statute of limitations, and, second, whether the legacy lapsed.

The claim for services is barred, unless the will is an acknowledgment. The natural and ordinary meaning of the words "in consideration of," in the connection used, is not compensation, but a mark or token of affection or appreciation. The testator does not acknowledge that there ever was any liability, debt, or claim. He acknowledges merely the fact that his niece did care for his invalid mother and for his infant son, and, feeling grateful therefor, in recognition or consideration of the fact he gives her $5,000. The services may have been paid for or ren-of the testatrix's esteem and appreciation of his fidelity to her as a physician, of a specified amount which is to be in addition to his fees against her for services, refers only to services rendered during the two or three years previous to the execution of the will, for which the physician had not been paid, and does not remove the bar of the statute as to services for which no bills had ever been presented, extending through a period of nearly twenty years and ending nearly nine years before the execution of the will, for several years after which annual bills were rendered and paid. Coles v. Martin, 99 Va. 223, 37 S. E. 907.

And Stewart v. McFarland, supra, holds that a bequest to the testator's wife of "$1,000 in full payment of her note of $600" against him did not remove the bar of the statute, so as to enable her to recover, on renouncing the will, a sum exceeding $1,300, to which the note would have amounted at the time of the testator's death.

But Perkins v. Seigfried, 97 Va. 444, 34 S. E. 64, holds that a codicil stating that the testator mentions a debt of a specified amount which he owes a designated church and wishes paid without interest after the death of a specified sister, and that he did not mention such debt in his will because he had hoped to pay it during his life, is such a direct acknowledgment of the debt as to prevent the running of the statute of limitations thereon until after the sister's death, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

although there is no proof of the existence of such debt outside of the codicil.

And a statement, after a direction to pay the just debts of the testatrix, that at the date of the will she owes specified amounts to designated persons, followed by small pecuniary legacies, and a provision for purchase of a burial lot, with a specified disposition of the residuary estate "after paying debts, legacies, expenses, and charges as above set forth," prevents the running of the statute of limitations as to such debts until the death of the testatrix. Re Pillion, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 8, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 383.

And a devise of one fifth of the testator's estate after payment of specific debts to be divided ratably among specified creditors named in the schedule to his will, all of whose claims were barred by limitation before the execution of the will, removes the bar of the statute as to all of them, the devise being to the creditors strictly as such, instead of to them as legatees. Williamson v. Naylor, 3 Younge & C. Exch. 208.

And a bequest of a specified amount in full satisfaction of all money due from the testator to a specified person, whose claim, the remedy on which was barred by the statute of limitations, amounted to twice the amount of such bequest, removes the bar of the statute, and entitles the legatee to payment of the entire debt, where, by another provision of the will, the real estate is subjected to the payment of debts. Goffon v. Mill, 2 Vern. 141.

dered gratuitously. He acknowledges a debt of gratitude,—not a legal obligation; and he does not direct the payment of a debt, but confers a bounty. In Duncan v. Franklin Twp. 43 N. J. Eq. 143, 10 Atl. 546, where the item of the will under consideration read as follows: "I give and bequeath to Henry Benson Duncan, for his services in assisting me at different times, the sum of $2,000,"—it is said in the opinion (p. 145 of 43 N. J. Eq., p. 547 of 10 Atl.): "The expression 'for his services in assisting me at different times' does not, standing alone, import an indebtedness from her to the legatee for which payment may be exacted by process of law. For aught that appears to the contrary, the services may have been rendered gratuitously, and the legacy may have been given in grateful recognition of them."

The second question is whether the facts set out in the petition state a cause of action for the recovery of the legacy. It is conceded that the general rule is that a legacy lapses when the legatee dies before the testator, and that § 5971, Rev. Stat. 1892, enacted to prevent mischief from the operation of the rule, does not apply; but it is contended that a legacy does not lapse when it is given to pay a debt; citing Ward v. Bush, 59 N. J. Eq. 144, 45 Atl. 534. The cases that hold that a legacy given in payment of a debt does not lapse do so for the reason that such is the manifest intention of the testator. That is the ground of the decision in Williamson v. Naylor, 3 Younge & C. Exch. 208. There it is held that certain creditors, whose claims were barred, but who were named in the will, which provided that a certain part of the estate should be divided among them, should not be considered as legatees, but rather as creditors, and consequently that the representatives of such as died in the testator's lifetime were entitled to the benefit of the will. In the note to that case it appears that Lord Lyndhurst, C. B., in disposing of the matter when it was before him, said: "I cannot consider this as a mere voluntary bounty on the part of the testator, but I must consider that the testator meant this money to be applied in satisfaction, or part satisfaction, of an obligation in reduction of those debts, which, though they could not be enforced against him at law, were, nevertheless, subsisting debts. . . . In this case the testator has manifested an anxious desire to fulfil his just obligations; and it was plainly his intention, not to make a gift to the persons named in the schedule, but to waive the legal bar to the recovery of his debts." In Philips v. Philips, 3 Hare, 281, where the testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees, upon trust, to divide the same among certain creditors, it is 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

held that "the shares attributed to the debts of creditors who died in the lifetime of the testator did not lapse by their death." Again, "that the trust must be considered as proceeding upon a mixed principle of bounty and obligation; and that the will must be read as, to some extent, directing payment of debts." The vice chancellor says (p. 292): "In coming to the conclusion that the representatives of the creditors who died in the testator's lifetime are entitled to claim, I consider that I follow the case of Williamson v. Naylor, that I am giving effect to the trusts of the will, and that I am doing that which the conscience of the testator led him to do,—discharging pro tanto his obligations to his creditors, notwithstanding the bar of the statute. If that were his intention, which, on the face of the will and on the authority of Williamson v. Naylor, I will assume, I cannot suppose that the testator contemplated depriving of the benefit given by the will those creditors who might happen to die between the date of his will and his death." Again (p. 300): "Another observation strongly in favor of Williamson v. Naylor is this: If the claimants had been treated as legatees, and not as creditors, the rights of a creditor to the benefit of the trust might have lapsed by his death in the lifetime of the testator. This could not have been in accordance with the intention of the debtor." In Turner v. Martin, 7 De G. M. & G. 429, 432, the lord chancellor says: "The object of the testator was to do that which was honest and just, namely, to pay those creditors in full who had proved against the joint estate of his father and himself. That object could not have been attained if his intended bounty was to be limited to those creditors only who might happen to survive him; he having lived twenty-nine years after the debts were proved."

In the present case the claim is barred. The testator does not acknowledge it. In law it is no debt, and it cannot be said that the intention of the testator was to discharge an obligation, and not to confer a bounty. The intention of the testator must be given effect according to what appears upon the face of the will. There is no ambiguity, and evidence to prove an intention different than that implied in the terms of the will would be incompetent. Comfort v. Mather, 2 Watts & S. 450, 37 Am. Dec. 523.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and that of the Common Pleas is affirmed.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

ANTHONY JOSEPH, Plff. in Err.,

v.

THOMAS B. CATRON.

(.... N. M.)

1. Confirmation of land grant.

On November 22, 1873, J. signed a written agreement as follows: "Upon the confirmation by the Congress of the United States of a certain land grant known as the Cañon de Chama, otherwise called San Joaquin del Rio de Chama grant, I promise to pay E. or order the sum of five hundred dollars in current funds of the United States." Held, first, that a confirmation by the court of private land claims created by act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, chap. 539 (26 Stat. at L. 854, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 765), was a "confirmation by the Congress of the United States," within the terms of said agreement; second, that a confirmation of the grant for the allotments merely (the claims as to the outlying pasture lands being rejected) was none the less a "confirmation," within the meaning of said agreement.

2. Note—maturity.

To constitute a negotiable instrument the fact of the maturity of the instrument at some time must be morally certain.

3. Same—certainty of event.

Tested by this rule, the instrument above Headnotes by POPE, J.

Case Note.—This is but another, though unusual, illustration of the well-settled rule that commercial paper, to be negotiable, must be payable at a fixed time, or upon an event which must at all events happen. There must be certainty that the paper will mature sometime, though the exact date of maturity is not determinable. Under the negotiable instruments laws, specific provision is made that the instrument must be payable on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time. Selover, Neg. Inst. § 70.

Illustrations of this rule are many, and the decisions upon practically the same facts conflicting. Non-negotiability has been asserted where payment is made contingent upon the arrival of a ship and the discharge of cargo (Grant v. Wood, 12 Gray, 220; The Lykus, 36 Fed. 919; Tucker v. Maxwell, 11 Mass. 143); termination of litigation (Burgess v. Fairbanks, 83 Cal. 215, 17 Am. St. Rep. 230, 23 Pac. 292; Shelton v. Bruce, 9 Yerg. 24); dissolution of partnership and settlement of accounts (Sackett v. Palmer, 25 Barb. 179); settlement of an estate (Husband v. Epling, 81 Ill. 172, 25 Am. Rep. 273); the return of a paper other than the negotiable instrument itself (Smilie v. Stevens, 39 Vt. 315); marriage (Beardsley v. Baldwin, 2 Strange, 1151; Pearson v. Garrett, 4 Mod. 242); "when in funds" (Gillespie v. Mather, 10 Pa. 28); when the money can be raised from any source (Nunez v. Dautel, 19 Wall. 560, 22 L. ed. 161); "as soon as my circumstances will permit" (Salinas v. Wright, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.)

quoted is not a negotiable instrument, since it was not certainly and at all events payable; it not being morally certain that the Cañon de Chama grant would ever be confirmed by Congress, or through its instrumentalities.

4. Same—actual happening.

The fact that the grant may, as a matter of fact, have been confirmed many years after the making of said instrument, does not alter the rule, since the certainty of maturity must be of the date of the instrument, and cannot derive support from any subsequent event.

5. Contract—not under seal—consideration.

A non-negotiable instrument not under seal, and containing no recital of a consideration, does not import such; and, to justify a recovery thereon, there must be the proper allegation and proof of a consideration.

6. Same—evidence.

An examination of the record fails to show any proof of a consideration for the instrument sued on. The judgment for the plaintiff was without proof to sustain it, and is accordingly reversed.

(June 28, 1905.)

ERROR to the District Court for Santa Fé County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of an alleged promissory note. Reversed.

Tex. 572); "when my circumstances will admit without detriment to myself or family" (Ex parte Tootell, 4 Ves. Jr. 372); where a note secured by collateral contained a provision by which, in case of depreciation, the collateral could be sold, and action immediately brought for the deficiency, though the note was not yet due (Continental Nat. Bank v. McGeech, 73 Wis. 332, 41 N. W. 409).

On the other hand, a provision to pay "when convenient" has been construed to mean within a reasonable time, which is definite under the rule, and the instrument is therefore negotiable. Works v. Hershey, 35 Iowa, 340. So, "as soon as I possibly can," has been construed as equivalent to "on demand." Kincaid v. Higgins, 1 Bibb, 396. So, provision for payment as soon as specific funds are collected does not render the note so uncertain as to time of payment as to prevent negotiation. Ubsdell v. Cunningham, 22 Mo. 124; Vaughan v. Dean, 32 Ga. 502. And an instrument payable upon completion of the construction of a railroad or building under contract is negotiable. Rose v. San Antonio & M. G. R. Co. 31 Tex. 49; Stevens v. Blunt, 7 Mass. 240; Bristol v. Warner, 19 Conn. 7; Goodloe v. Taylor, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 458; Levally v. Harmon, 20 Iowa. 533. Contra, Van Zandt v. Hopkins, 151 Ill. 248, 37 N. E. 845. See, for further illustrations and citations, Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. §§ 41 et seq.; Story, Promissory Notes, 7th ed § 27; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 25.

Statement by Pope, J.:

This is a suit instituted in the district court of Santa Fé county by defendant in error to recover the sum of $500, with interest. The second amended complaint, upon which the cause went to trial, alleges the facts practically as follows: Some time prior to November 22, 1873 (being during the years 1870, 1871, or 1872), the defendant contracted, hired, and employed one Samuel Ellison, an attorney at law, to present before the surveyor general of New Mexico for approval a certain land grant known as the "Cañon de Chama," otherwise called "San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Grant," and under said employment to take proofs in behalf of said claim, and in general to initiate the proceedings requisite for the ultimate recognition of the said grant and its validity by the government of the United States of America; that thereupon said Ellison performed each and all of the things by him engaged to be done and performed in the premises; and that on November 22, 1873, in pursuance of said employment and contract, and in recognition of said services rendered, defendant did agree and promise to pay to said Ellison the sum of $500, in current funds of the United States, upon the confirmation by the Congress of the United States of said land grant, said agreement being in writing, and being as follows, to wit:

Fernando de Taos, New Mexico,
November 22, 1873.

Upon the confirmation by the Congress of the United States of the certain land grant known as the Cañon de Chama, otherwise called San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Grant, I promise to pay Mr. Samuel Ellison or order the sum of Five Hundred Dollars in current funds of the United States.

Anthony Joseph.
Frederick Muller.

It is further alleged that the said Ellison did as aforesaid earn and become entitled to receive from the defendant the said sum of $500 when it might thereafter result and happen that the said grant so by him advocated as aforesaid should be confirmed, and its validity established and recognized; that thereafter the said Ellison, before the maturity of said obligation and promise to pay, indorsed, assigned, transferred, and conveyed the said promise to pay, obligation, and note of said defendant to plaintiff or his order, and the plaintiff thereupon became and is the owner and holder thereof; that, after the making and delivery of said agreement by said defendant to said Ellison, the Congress of the United States enacted a statute of the United States creating and establishing a court known as the "United States Court of Private Land Claims," and conferred upon said court full power and authority to investigate and determine the validity of all grants in the territory of New Mexico, including the said Cañon de Chama grant; that after the creation of said court, upon petition duly presented thereto, the said court on September 29, 1894, entered its decree confirming said grant; that thereupon petitioner prayed an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that upon the hearing of said appeal, at the October term, A. D. 1896, the said Supreme Court rendered a decision and judgment affirming the decree of confirmation previously entered by the court below; that thereafter, to wit, on December 11, 1900, a decree correcting and amending the original decree by defining the boundaries of said grant was entered by the court of private land claims, by which court it was ordered that said grant be surveyed with the boundaries as set forth and described, by means whereof the said grant became definitely confirmed by the decision of the said court of private land claims; and that thereby said written agreement and promise to pay became due and payable to plaintiff, as the assignee of said Ellison, with interest thereon from May 24, 1897, the date of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States affirming the decision of the said court of private land claims, from which said last-named date plaintiff alleges that said agreement and promise to pay became due and payable. Plaintiff thereupon prays judgment upon the first count in the sum of $500, with interest thereon at 6 per cent from May 24, 1897, making a total of $695, and for damages in the sum of $800 suffered and sustained by reason of the premises, and for interest and costs.

The defendant answered, admitting the execution and delivery of the instrument in question to Samuel Ellison, but denied that the said Ellison was an attorney at law, or was authorized to practise law in the courts of the territory, and in terms denied that the defendant at any time contracted with, hired, or employed, or engaged the services of said Ellison in and about said Cañon de Chama grant, either to present the same before the surveyor general for New Mexico for approval, or for any other purpose, or to take proofs or initiate proceedings as to the said grant. The answer further denies that, in pursuance of said alleged agreement, defendant agreed or promised to pay to said Ellison the sum of $500, or any other sum whatsoever, for his services touching the presentation or taking of proofs concerning said grant before said surveyor general, and denies that said Ellison ever performed any services for him or on his behalf before said surveyor general, or otherwise, in regard to the said Cañon de Chama grant, but alleges that any employment of said Ellison in and about that matter was some time prior to said November 22, 1873, by one Frank Pope and one John Ross and others, who, it is alleged, paid Ellison $333 in cash in full for his services in all matters before the said surveyor general, for which said services said Ellison gave his receipt in full, which, however, has been lost. The answer further denies the assignment and indorsement of said note over to the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint. It admits the allegation of the complaint as to the creation and organization of the court of private land claims, but denies that said grant was confirmed as a whole or in part as a grant, but that only the allotments in said grant, aggregating about 1,480 acres, were confirmed by the court of private land claims, and subsequently, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of the United States. The answer further denies that, by reason of said alleged confirmation of said allotments, said alleged promissory note or agreement in writing became due and payable either on May 24, 1897, or on December 11, 1900, or at any other time, and alleges that neither the terms nor conditions mentioned in the face of said note, nor those agreed upon at or prior to the time of making the same, were ever fulfilled by said Ellison, or by plaintiff as assignee of said Ellison, or by any other person whomsoever, as to all of which said plaintiff had knowledge at and prior to the time said Ellison is alleged to have sold, assigned, and transferred said note to plaintiff. By way of new matter, defendant alleges in his defense that said promissory note was delivered by him and said Muller on or about November 22, 1873, to said Samuel Ellison, under the following circumstances, conditions, and considerations, to wit: That at said date last named, or a short time prior thereto, plaintiff had become interested in, and was the holder of certain interests in, said Cañon de Chama grant, both personally and as representing others, and was negotiating for the sale of said grant with one William Blackmore; that said Blackmore and others required as a condition precedent to the sale that the said grant should be confirmed by the Congress of the United States, and, to secure such confirmation of said grant, defendant and Frederick Muller, who signed said contract, with others who were interested in said grant, conferred with said Ellison as to the probabilities of securing its confirmation by Congress, and that said Ellison represented that he could secure such confirmation in a very short time through the efforts and influence of the then delegate in Congress from New Mexico, and thereupon, on or about said November 22, 1873, the said Ellison, this defendant, and the said Frederick Muller entered into a contract whereby said Ellison agreed to secure a confirmation of said grant as an entirety, and according to the exterior boundaries, which included 472,736.95 acres, and said Ellison thereupon agreed that he would secure the confirmation of said grant as aforesaid, during the term of office of said delegate in Congress, and within not to exceed two years from said November 22, 1873, upon the condition that the said defendant and said Muller would give him a note for $500, payable to him or his order on the confirmation of the said grant within the two years aforesaid, and that it was distinctly understood and agreed between the said Ellison, the defendant, and the said Muller, prior to and at the time of the signing of the said note, and as a part of the same transaction and consideration thereof, that if said grant should not be confirmed according to the exterior boundaries aforesaid, and within two years from and after the said 22d day of November, 1873, the said Ellison should receive nothing on said supposed note, and that the same should become null and void and of no effect at the end of the said two years; and that, relying on said undertaking of the said Ellison, defendant and the said Muller signed said alleged note. It further alleges that said grant has never been confirmed in compliance with the said agreement, and that, by reason of the failure on the part of the said Ellison to do and perform his duties and agreements promised and undertaken by him in the manner above stated, the consideration for said note has wholly failed, and said alleged note has been ever since the expiration of the said two years null and void and of no force and effect.

By way of reply, plaintiff, while excepting to the legal sufficiency of any of the new matter set up in the answer as constituting a defense, alleges want of knowledge as to the truth of said allegations, and in terms denies the same, and demands strict proof thereof, if upon the hearing the court should deem such proof admissible.

The case coming on for hearing, the plaintiff, over objection, introduced in evidence the agreement set out in the pleadings. It was admitted that the signature of the defendant on said contract was genuine. The plaintiff testified that the signature of Samuel Ellison on the indorsement was genuine, having been written by said Ellison in the plaintiff's presence. Plaintiff testified that the document in question was originally, about the year 1880, turned over to him as collateral security for the sum of $100.

and that thereafter plaintiff made said Ellison further advances, in consideration of which the said Ellison sold, and plaintiff purchased, said note in cancelation of the indebtedness, at which time plaintiff made the indorsement on said note over Ellison's signature, and in Ellison's presence, and said Ellison handed the note to plaintiff as his property, and that no part of said note has been paid. Testimony was further offered establishing the presentation of the Cañon de Chama grant to the court of private land claims, and its confirmation by that court, substantially as alleged in the complaint. Plaintiff also tendered in evidence the following letter by the defendant to plaintiff, and referring to the instrument sued on:

Ojo Caliente, New Mexico,
July 18, 1895.

Hon. T. B. Catron,
Santa Fé, N. M.

Dear Sir:—

Your favor of the 12th instant, in reply to mine of previous date, is at hand and its contents have been duly noted. I have consulted with the parties that were jointly interested with me in the confirmation of the Cañon de Chama grant, and who would have paid their due proportion of the note given to secure such confirmation, if the grant had been confirmed by Congress, before we sold it or within a reasonable time thereafter, and they concur with me in the opinion that the said note is not now valid, as the express condition on its face has never been fulfilled, so that we will be compelled to have litigation over it.

With regards, I am,

Yours, etc.,

Anthony Joseph.

Plaintiff, being recalled, testified that his impression at the time of his transaction with Ellison relating to the instrument in question was that the grant in question had not been confirmed by Congress, although plaintiff at that time understood that it had been approved by the surveyor general. With this testimony, plaintiff rested his case, and defendant thereupon moved the court for judgment in his favor upon the grounds, first, that plaintiff had failed to show any valid contract under which the defendant could be held liable; second, that the plaintiff had failed to show that any consideration was paid or delivered to the defendant, or moved in any way from the plaintiff or his alleged assignor, for the making of the alleged contract introduced in evidence; third, that plaintiff had failed to show that the contingency, to wit, the confirmation by Congress of the Cañon de Chama grant, has ever occurred. This motion being denied, defendant proceeded to his proof. Plaintiff, being called as a witness on behalf of the defendant, testified that the original petition for the approval of the Cañon de Chama grant by the surveyor general of New Mexico had been written by plaintiff, and the name of Ellison signed thereto by plaintiff upon Mr. Ellison's request, but not under any employment; and that the petition was drawn between the years 1869 and 1871. Defendant further tendered in evidence the decision of the surveyor general approving this grant, dated December 17, 1872, and transmitted to Congress January 29, 1873, and the supplemental report of the surveyor general dated June 28, 1886, and transmitted to Congress June 30, 1886, which documents were, upon objection of plaintiff, held to be immaterial and irrelevant. The defendant called as a witness testified that the document in question was given to Ellison in consideration of his securing the confirmation of the Cañon de Chama grant, as approved by the surveyor general, within the term of office of Mr. Elkins in Congress; that said Ellison represented that he could secure the confirmation of said grant, as thus approved, through Mr. Elkins, and within the term of the latter as delegate in Congress; and that, defendant having in the meantime entered into an agreement with one Henry Blackmore to secure the confirmation of this grant for a consideration, and being influenced by the representation of Ellison that he could secure the confirmation of this grant through Mr. Elkins, defendant gave Ellison this note or document, it being understood between them that the note was a conditional one upon the confirmation by Congress of this grant within the time stipulated; and, if not confirmed within that time, then this document was to be null and void. Defendant denies ever having employed Ellison at any time to appear on his behalf before the surveyor general for the approval of said grant, or that he ever had any conversation with Ellison to that effect, but that, on the contrary, defendant never had any interest whatever in said grant until the 16th day of December, 1873, up to which time Ellison had already rendered services in that matter, but for other parties, to wit, one Georgus Pope, commonly called Frank Pope; that said Frank Pope paid said Ellison for such services before the surveyor general in the approval of said grant the sum of $333, said amount having been paid upon the sale of the property by defendant himself to Ellison pursuant to defendant's arrangement with said Georgus Pope, this payment being made about the year 1873 or 1874. Defendant further testified that he never at any time, either prior or subsequent to November 22, 1873, agreed to pay Ellison anything or any sum of money for any services to be performed by him before the surveyor general with reference to the Cañon de Chama grant, except the sum of $333, which was paid him out of money in the possession of the defendant received by him from William Blackmore for the interest in the grant that he transferred at that time, which money was due Georgus Pope, and was paid to Ellison on Pope's account. Defendant admitted on cross-examination having written the following letter to the widow of Samuel Ellison:

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., Dec. 15, 1891.

Mrs. F. S. Ellison,
Santa Fé, N. M.

Dear Madam:—

I acknowledge the receipt of your very esteemed letter dated the 10th inst., and, advised of its contents, proceed to inform you: That, if you have the obligation mentioned, I will pay you the sum of two hundred dollars for it; but a receipt does not annul the original obligation; there has already happened to me one difficulty of this nature in the courts, and I do not wish to have it occur again. Get the obligation and it will be paid.

With great respect, I am your friend and servant,
A. Joseph.

Defendant explained that this letter was written, however, by way of compromise, although denying the liability, in order that he might secure and destroy the paper that was out against him, but that the amount mentioned in that letter was never paid for the reason that plaintiff, who had possession of the note, declined to give it up. Defendant also presented testimony showing that the area included in the Cañon de Chama grant, as finally confirmed by the court of private land claims, was 1,422.62 acres, and that said grant, so confirmed, was, about the year 1900, sold for $625. There was also offered in evidence the complaint, answer, and decree in a certain proceeding in the district court affecting this grant, a recital of the contents of which does not seem here material. Defendant also tendered in evidence, in connection with his testimony, a receipt signed by Georgus Pope, dated September, 1873, in which it is stipulated that the defendant is "to pay to Mr. S. Ellison $333.00;" also a statement of account relating to the sale of this grant about 1873, made by or in the presence of the defendant, whereon is an indorsement, "$333.00 S. E. Fees," and which, it was explained, referred to the amount defendant was to pay, being the amount due him by Pope, and which defendant assumed under the receipt last referred to. Defendant also presented a letter written by said Blackmore, dated November 25, 1873, in which there is a direction to defendant to "obtain the release of Mr. Ellison's claim," and also an agreement of June 14, 1873, between defendant and William Blackmore, relating to the terms of the sale of said grant, which last, however, contains no reference to the Ellison matter. This was all the testimony presented on behalf of the defendant.

At the conclusion of the testimony, plaintiff moved to strike out all of the documentary evidence introduced by the defendant, as being immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and as being res inter alios acta and hearsay, and also moved to strike out all the testimony of the defendant, as being irrelevant, incompetent, and improper, and as incapable of varying, modifying, or affecting the instrument sued on, and because the same is not corroborated, and because the same is offered against the assignee of a deceased person, and because the same seeks to vary the written instrument herein sued on; and plaintiff further moved to strike out all of the testimony presented on behalf of the defendant, as being likewise immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent; which motions and objections were sustained. The effect of this holding of the court was to leave the case for determination upon the testimony presented by the plaintiff, as above outlined, and the court thereupon entered its findings in favor of the plaintiff, holding the instrument sued on to be a negotiable instrument in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of any defense which might have existed thereto in the hands of the said Ellison; that the same imported a consideration upon its face, and was made for a valuable consideration; that the period of maturity mentioned therein was morally certain to happen, and that said instrument was certain to mature; that the confirmation by the Congress of the United States of said grant was, within the meaning of said contract, a confirmation of the same by the court of private land claims created by Congress as its agency in the premises; and that by the confirmation of said grant on December 11, 1900, said obligation matured, the same being a confirmation, in law, by the Congress of the United States. A motion for new trial was made and overruled, and judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $615, whereupon defendant sued out a writ of error from this court.

Mr. N. B. Laughlin, for plaintiff in error:

A promissory note is a written promise for the payment of money absolutely and at all events.

Pope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The assignments of error filed by the defendant set forth that the court erred in finding for the plaintiff on the testimony presented, and in sustaining the objection to the testimony presented for the defense, and also in its rulings upon the admissibility of the testimony presented on the hearing.

The first question which it becomes necessary to determine is whether, upon the testimony presented, plaintiff was entitled to recover; and this, in turn, involves a number of subsidiary questions,—among others, the construction of the contract here sued on. This contract is as follows:

Fernando de Taos, New Mexico,
November 22, 1873.

Upon the confirmation by the Congress of the United States of that certain land grant known as the Cañon de Chama, otherwise called San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Grant, I promise to pay Mr. Samuel Ellison or order the sum of Five Hundred Dollars in current funds of the United States.

Anthony Joseph.
Frederick Muller.

It is alleged on behalf of the defendant that the time of maturity upon which this contract is based has never arrived, for the reason, first, that that grant has never been confirmed by the court of private land claims, but that only certain allotments therein contained have been confirmed; and second, that, even if confirmed by the court of private land claims, such a confirmation was not a confirmation by the Congress of the United States, as provided in the instrument sued on. We are of the opinion that neither of these positions is well taken. As to the first, while it is true that the confirmation by the court of private land claims restricted the area of the grant to about 1,420 acres, composed of agricultural allotments, as against almost a half million acres claimed, composed of these allotments and a vast outlying tract suitable only for pasture and similar purposes, still the action of the court of private land claims, as embodied in its decree, was no less for that reason a confirmation of the grant. The grant as confirmed by the court of private land claims must be assumed to be the grant as it always existed, and, even if confirmed by the court with an extremely reduced area, was none the less confirmed. We are of the opinion further that a confirmation by that court was within the terms of this contract, as being a confirmation by Congress. The United States has adopted at various times different methods of dealing with private land claims; in some instances, as in California, confiding the determination of such matters to a commission vested with more or less restricted powers; in other cases, as in the grant here under consideration, confiding the matter to a court vested, as was the court of private land claims with power to hear and determine cases upon the principles of equity; and in still other cases Congress dealt direct with the matter, confirming a claim by direct congressional act upon the report of its own committees, instead of by delegating that power to courts specially designated for that purpose. But, whether the one method or the other was adopted, the confirmation, after all, was by Congress, in that the power to deal with the subject-matter came directly by act of Congress, and without such act no power would have existed. The adjustment of these claims upon the national conscience was essentially a political act; and that Congress, in the performance of such act, may have enlisted the assistance of a judicial tribunal especially created by it for that purpose, cannot be taken as detracting to any extent from the fact that such a confirmation was due to the act of Congress, and directly flowed from such congressional action. The determination of such matters by the court of private land claims was simply a determination of the issues of law and fact which would otherwise have been dealt with and reported upon by proper committees of Congress; and after the determination of the matter by the court of private land claims the patent evidencing the quitclaim of the government was issued under the direction of the Land Department, just as in cases of congressional confirmation. We are of opinion that the fact that Congress may have been in some instances more liberal in dealing with these private land claims than commissions or courts created by it cannot be considered as a circumstance affecting the construction of this contract. It cannot be assumed that, in making this contract, the parties were stipulating to secure from Congress more than they were justly entitled to. It must be assumed that the decree of confirmation rendered by the court of private land claims, and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, gave the owners all they were justly entitled to. As presumably all the claimants sought was what was due them, and as presumably that is all they would have obtained, whether the matter was dealt with by Congress or by one of its courts, the difference in tribunal cannot be assumed to have entered into the making of the contract. We accordingly hold that the purpose of this contract was the payment of the amount named upon the confirmation of the grant, whether by act of Congress specially applicable to this grant, or by act of Congress providing for the submission of this and other grants to a competent tribunal, which after due investigation might grant a confirmation.

We come now to consider the third proposition, to which the briefs of counsel and the oral argument have been mainly directed. Is the instrument here sued on a negotiable instrument? If it is such an instrument, then it is presumed to have been given upon valuable consideration, and, having been acquired before maturity by a bona fide purchaser for value, could not be subject to any defenses existing between the original parties of which plaintiff had no notice. If, on the other hand, the instrument was not negotiable, very different questions supervene.

The rule is recognized by each of the parties that, in order to constitute a negotiable instrument, the fact of the maturity of the instrument at some time must be morally assured; it must be certain to accrue. It is contended by the defendant, on the one hand, that the wording of the instrument ("upon the confirmation by the Congress of the United States" of the grant in question) was plainly a condition which might or might not be attained, and that thus the maturity of the instrument in question was based upon a condition which might or might not finally accrue, and that thus, whatever may be the dignity of this instrument as a contract, it lacks an essential element of negotiability, to wit, certainty of maturity. On the other hand, it is contended by the plaintiff that the confirmation of this grant by Congress was morally certain, in that it depended upon the performance of a governmental duty, and that, while the time of such confirmation was indefinite, there was at the time of the making of this contract, and at every moment subsequent, a moral certainty that Congress would at some time perform this duty of confirming to one of its citizens the title to this grant. The cases bearing upon this precise point are not numerous, and those cited by the parties in their briefs are, as a rule, not in point. Thus the line of cases holding that notes payable "at the maker's death" are negotiable are not in point, for the obvious reason that death is an absolute certainty, and a note contingent upon death is thus contingent upon something which is bound to occur. Equally as apart from this proposition are the cases relied upon by plaintiff known as the "Southern War Cases," involving questions as to the negotiability of notes payable within a certain time after the cessation of war between the Confederate states and the United States of America, or the establishment of peace between those then contending portions of our reunited nation. Such obligations were likewise contingent upon an event which was morally certain to happen. In human experience, no war has ever existed which has not come to an end, and none can be conceived of that will not have at some time a termination. The limitations of human endurance, physical and financial, absolutely negative the idea that there can be any war which shall not cease. In each of these two classes of cases cited by counsel there existed, therefore, a moral certainty of the maturity of notes. But does the confirmation of a land grant by Congress stand upon the same basis? It is urged by the plaintiff that it does, for the reason pointed out in one or two English cases of great antiquity. The first of these is the case of Andrews v. Franklin, 1 Strange, 24, wherein the condition of the note was "payable two months after a certain ship of His Majesty's service should be paid off." This note was objected to as depending upon a contingency which might never happen, but the court held otherwise upon the ground that the "paying off of a ship" is a thing of public nature. Also there is cited the case of Evans v. Underwood, Wils. 262, wherein a note was held negotiable, the terms of which were, "I promise to pay to George Pratt or order eight pounds, upon the receipt of his, the said George Pratt's, wages due from his Majesty's ship, the Suffolk." In that case the court contented itself with citing and following the case of Andrews v. Franklin. We have been referred to no American cases in which the doctrine of Andrews v. Franklin has been followed, or, indeed, countenanced. The case of Chicago R. Equipment Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 136 U. S. 268, 34 L. ed. 349, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 199, it is true, cites this case, but the question there involved was a very different one from that ruled in Andrews v. Franklin. On the other hand, wherever these two cases have been cited by the text writers or the Reports, it has been to question their soundness. Indeed, doubts have even been expressed as to whether Andrews v. Franklin was ever actually decided, and Evans v. Underwood has been particularly criticized upon the ground that, while the paying off of a public ship may be a moral certainty, it is by no means to be considered equally certain that a particular person will receive wages therefor. For reference to these cases, see 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 46; Story, Promissory Notes, § 27; Chitty, Bills, p. 137; Bayley, Bills, p. 26; Weidler v. Kauffman, 14 Ohio, 456.

We need not here discuss the fact that the English cases were decided under a system of government, one of whose fundamental principles is that the King can do no wrong; and we would be slow to hold that republics, however proverbially ungrateful, are less mindful of the fulfilment of their obligations than monarchies. We do not understand, however, that the two cases cited turn upon the presumption that every nation performs its duty because it should do so, for that presumption, in a certain sense, exists as well in the case of the individual as the nation, and, if considered as explanatory of the holding in these cases, would make all obligations contingent upon the performance by anyone of a just obligation a negotiable instrument. We conceive these cases, however, to be founded upon the fact that the very operation of government leads automatically to the payment of its ships from time to time. This is a custom which, if not as fixed as the recurrence of the seasons, is at least as stable as the existence of the government itself. The payment of its sailors is a matter of such national and imperative concern, and so invariable in the past, that a promise contingent upon such a payment in the future may well be considered based upon a moral certainty. This at least is explanatory of Andrews v. Franklin. We find ourselves amply justified by the authorities above cited in saying that Evans v. Underwood does not follow from Andrews v. Franklin, in that the latter refers to a general and universal custom, and the other to the payment of an individual, which for various reasons might never occur. But indulging to these two cases the high respect which must be accorded them, both because of their age and the high character of the English tribunal enunciating them, we are of opinion that they do not lead to the conclusion that the confirmation of a land grant by Congress is a moral certainty. The United States has never become bound by treaty nor by international law to the confirmation of all private land claims in the territory of New Mexico, nor for the confirmation of all claims which may be asserted by interested parties to be land grants. The extent to which the nation went in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was to pledge itself that, in the territories conveyed by the treaty, property of every kind should be invariably respected. This was simply a declaration of international morals. But the manner of that recognition in the case of an imperfect grant—and plaintiff, in his brief, concedes and contends that this was such—was exclusively for Congress to determine. In Territory v. Delinquent Tax List (N. M.) 76 Pac. 316, this court has heretofore had occasion to consider the subject of imperfect grants, and to point out, upon a full citation of authorities, that an imperfect grant is one, "the title to which was at the date of the treaty vested in the United States;" it is one "which does not convey full and absolute dominion;" it is one which requires "a further exercise of the granting power to pass the fee in the land;" it is one "which may be confirmed or disallowed by the political or granting powers;" it is one "depending for its completion and sanction upon the sovereign power; and to this course claimant had no just cause to object, as their condition was the same under the Spanish government." An imperfect grant thus depends for its recognition solely upon the grace of the new sovereign, and the manner of its recognition by the sovereign is purely conjectural. Congress is not bound, either by treaty or by morals, to confirm it. Other methods of satisfying the national obligation may be employed. The freedom of Congress to deal with imperfect grants as it pleases is illustrated in the act of March 3, 1891, chap. 539 (26 Stat. at L. 854, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 765), establishing the court of private land claims, wherein it provided that no imperfect grant, no matter what may be its area by natural boundaries, shall be confirmed for more than 11 square leagues; and wherein it is further provided (§ 12, 26 Stat. at L. 859, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 772) that any imperfect grant not presented within two years shall be taken and deemed in all courts and elsewhere to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred. The power thus given to restrict the area of the grant—indeed, to declare the grant of no effect unless presented within a given time—is illustrative of the power to deny confirmation entirely; of the power to provide by other means for the satisfaction of the claim upon the national conscience. And that is exactly what was done in the case of the well-known Luis Maria Cabeza de Baca grant, in this territory, which was satisfied by Congress, not by giving the claimants the land covered by the grant, but by providing (act June 21, 1860, chap. 167, 12 Stat. at L. 71; act June 11, 1864, chap. 123, 13 Stat. at L. 125) for an equivalent amount of land located in other sections of the West, and now familiarly known as the "Baca floats." It is entirely conceivable that Congress might in other instances satisfy—might, indeed, in the case of this very grant have satisfied—the claim upon the national conscience by the retention of the land by the government, and the payment of an adequate amount of money to satisfy what Congress might deem to be the equities of the case. This likewise is illustrated by the land court act, wherein it is provided that, where portions of the grant have been taken up under the public land laws, claimants shall have no confirmation for the particular land, but must accept in lieu thereof $1.25 an acre. It follows from the foregoing, therefore, that at the time the contract was made it was not morally certain that this grant would ever be confirmed. Indulging in its behalf all that has been said by plaintiff as to its merits as a private land claim (contentions to a limited extent recognized by the court of private land claims), it was within the right of the nation—it was entirely possible for Congress—to decline to confirm; it was entirely possible that it would settle the claim by the assignment of lieu lands or the appropriation of a stated sum. The presence of these possibilities establishes that at the time this obligation was made a confirmation was not bound to occur; it was not a moral certainty; the instrument was not payable at a time fixed, beyond peradventure; the instrument was not negotiable.

The conclusion here reached is readily vindicated by another line of reasoning. Assuming, as we must, a readiness upon the part of the government to satisfy its obligations when known, there are a certain class of these that it cannot know or provide for unless they be presented by those who hold them. To this class belong what are known as private land claims, Indian depredation claims, pension claims, customs refunds, and a score of other classes of obligations, which, unless presented, would never be known to the governmental authorities. For these, unlike the payment of English sailors, or our own sailors, for that matter, there is no monthly or quarterly pay day. Theoretically the government has in mind and intent the ultimate settlement of all its obligations, liquidated and unliquidated, contractual and noncontractual. Practically, until those of the description above enumerated are presented and prosecuted, there is no possibility of payment; and, in a machinery as vast as a government, this must necessarily be so. In matters such as private land claims, it cannot undertake to hunt out the claimants. It simply helps those who help themselves. As to the confirmation in recognition of these, there is, from a human standpoint, no element of predestination. The principle of free agency on the part of the claimant has full sway. If we proceed on the assumption that what is to be will be, whether we assiat to that end or not, we will soon find that little headway is made. Applying this statement of truisms to the case at bar, if at the making of the instrument of November 22, 1873, the condition therein expressed was morally certain to accrue, it was morally certain for all purposes and as to all persons. Suppose, now, the claimants of the Cañon de Chama grant, relying upon this "moral certainty," and refusing to take any steps in the matter, had simply allowed the matter of the confirmation to await the function of that certainty,—the outcome of that predestined fate,—what would have been the status of this obligation at the present time; what its status when sued on in 1903? The answer is that the grant, not having been presented to the court of private land claims on or before March 3, 1893, would, under the provisions of § 12 of the land court act, already referred to, be "deemed and taken in all courts and elsewhere to be abandoned and . . . forever barred," and the condition named in the note would thus have become forever impossible of fulfilment, and the note itself forever incapable of maturity. But, if this condition could result from a default by the owners of the grant, what becomes of the moral certainty of maturity which inheres in and constitutes a negotiable instrument? If maturity may, as in this case, be rendered impossible of fulfilment, the fundamental idea of a negotiable instrument—that its time of payment must be fixed and beyond the control of the parties or any third party—fails. When it is reflected further that, even if the grant owners had waived the alleged moral certainty which attached to the confirmation of his claim, and had filed it seasonably before the land court, its confirmation still depended upon the presentation of proper proofs, the vigilance of counsel, and the other elements always entering into the success of matters in litigation, it will be seen that the instrument, when made, in 1873, depending upon a confirmation by Congress, was confronted by a number of contingencies, any one of which might have prevented the realization of the condition upon which maturity was predicated, and was accordingly not negotiable. It is no answer to these positions to show that the grant in question has, as a matter of fact, been confirmed by the court of private land claims. The fact that Congress may have decided to confirm the grant through the instrumentality of the land court, instead of to satisfy its equities in some other way, does not detract by relation from the fact that when the instrument was signed it was possible that Congress might provide otherwise. The fact that the claim may, when presented to the land court, have successfully run the gauntlet, and emerged clothed in a three-hundredth of its claimed area, does not detract from the fact that in 1873 it was entirely possible that it might never have been presented to and prosecuted in that or any other court, and might thus, within the discretion of Congress, have become "abandoned and forever barred." The question is, What were the conditions when the contract was made? Negotiability is to be judged by the front sight, not by the back sight. The moral certainty must be present at the time of its execution, and not be a matter of relation accruing by reason of subsequent events. If it be not a bill or note ab initio, no subsequent event can make it so. Bayling, Bills, 5th ed. chap. 1, § 6, p. 16. The character of an instrument as a promissory note cannot depend upon future events, but solely upon its character when created. Ernst v. Stockman, 74 Pa. 15, 15 Am. Rep. 542; Eldred v. Malloy, 2 Colo. 320, 20 Am. Rep. 752; Story, Promissory Notes, § 22.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the instrument sued on was not a negotiable instrument, but was simply a contract to pay upon a contingency which might or might not happen.

It follows from this conclusion that the burden was upon the plaintiff, especially in view of the pleadings which make an issue upon the subject of consideration, to prove a consideration for the contract made by defendant and Muller with Ellison. A written agreement such as this does not import a consideration. A valid consideration must be alleged and proved. Chitty, Bills, pp. 8, 9; Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 160 et seq.; Shelton v. Bruce, 9 Yerg. 24; Jerome v. Whitney, 7 Johns. 322; Edgerton v. Edgerton, 8 Conn. 6. We have carefully examined the record upon this point, and fail to find any testimony to sustain the finding of the court that there was a sufficient consideration for the note in question. Plaintiff, in his brief, argues that the letter of June 18, 1895, from defendant to plaintiff, above quoted, admits the giving of the note, and that the same was for a sufficient consideration. We do not so construe that letter. It, in terms, denies the validity of the instrument upon the ground that the express condition, to wit, confirmation by Congress, has never been fulfilled, and asserts that there will have to be litigation over it. We do not think that the denial of liability on this one ground is in effect an admission of a valuable consideration for the instrument in question. It is further urged by plaintiff that the letter heretofore referred to, from the defendant to Mrs. Ellison, offering to pay $200, is likewise an admission of a sufficient consideration. That letter was, in terms, admitted as a part of defendant's case, and was, under the objection of counsel for plaintiff, to go out, should the rest of defendant's testimony be stricken out. This having been done, the letter is not evidence before us. If this letter, however, is to be considered a part of the record, the explanation accompanying it must likewise be considered; and defendant testified explicitly that the letter was an offer by way of compromise, in order to secure and retire an outstanding paper bearing his name.

It is finally contended by plaintiff that defendant's answer admits a valid consideration, to wit, the retainer of the services of said Ellison. Even if this allegation of the answer can, for this purpose, be segregated from the remaining allegations, which are designed to establish an entire failure of the consideration alleged, the consideration which it avers cannot avail plaintiff, for the reason that it does not accord with the allegations of his complaint, which are to the effect that the document in question was given in consideration of past services rendered by Ellison before the surveyor general, whereas defendant's allegation is that it was in consideration of services thereafter to be rendered, presumably before Congress, since the surveyor general had in the January preceding disposed of the grant by a favorable report to the Department of the Interior. In addition, these very averments of the answer upon which plaintiff now relies to establish consideration are put in issue by his reply. He cannot recover upon a theory which is entirely different from that which he alleges, and which is denied by his own pleadings. We therefore conclude that there is no proof in the record establishing a consideration for this contract; that in this respect plaintiff failed to make out his case, and the court erred in giving judgment in his favor upon the proofs.

Holding, as we do, that the plaintiff is not entitled to a recovery upon his testimony, and reversing the case upon that ground, we do not find it necessary to determine to what extent the testimony presented on behalf of the defendant was admissible. The case having been tried by the court below upon the theory that the instrument sued on was a negotiable instrument, it naturally resulted that the same weight was not given to the testimony for the defense that would have been given otherwise. Holding, as we do, that the instrument sued on was not negotiable, the case is open for all defenses that would have been available between the original parties, and we deem it fairer to remand the case for the purpose of admitting such proof as may be offered by either side. Of course, no testimony can be received upon the new trial as to oral agreements contemporaneous with or prior to the instrument here sued on contradictory of the terms thereof; and, of course, in the further trial of this case, no testimony of the defendant "in respect of any matter occurring before the death of the deceased person" can justify a decision in his favor, "unless such evidence is corroborated by some other material evidence." Comp. Laws, § 3021. And of course, further, such corroboration must be upon the point or points in issue in the case necessary to a recovery. Gillett v. Chavez (N. M.) 78 Pac. 68, and cases cited.

The case will be reversed and remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN A. ELLIOTT, Admr., etc., of I. C. Penrose, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

CAPITAL CITY STATE BANK.

(... Iowa ...)

1. Bank—deposit—loan.

A general deposit of money in a bank is not a loan.

2. Same—certificate of deposit—statute of limitations.

A demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank is not a demand promissory note, within the rule that the statute of limita-

Case Note.—There is a conflict of authority upon the question whether a demand is necessary to mature a demand certificate of deposit. In some jurisdictions it is held that in this respect such a certificate is upon the same basis as a promissory note,—is mature at the date of issuance, and needs no demand to effect this situation. In these states the question as to the time within which demand must be made cannot arise. See note on "Maturity of certificate of deposit," in 15 L. R. A. 386. This was the view taken by the Iowa supreme court in Mereness v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Iowa, 11, 51 L. R. A. 410. 84 Am. St. Rep. 318, 83 N. W. 711; but that case is overruled by the present decision in ELLIOTT v. CAPITAL CITY STATE BANK.

In other states, however, a different view is taken, and it is held that the deposit not only creates a debt, but has also the nature of a bailment, and, hence, necessitates a del-tions begins to run upon it as soon as issued.

3. Same—demand.

Demand for payment of the amount due under a demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank is necessary to set in motion the statute of limitations,—at least where, by its terms, it is payable on its return properly indorsed.

4. Same.

There is no obligation to demand payment of a demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank, within the period of the statute of limitations.

(June 7, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of defendant in an action brought to mand to entitle the bailor or his assignee to a return of his money.

Within what time must the demand be made in jurisdictions taking this view? The argument in favor of limiting the period is that, a demand being necessary to mature the obligation, it must be made within a reasonable time after the issuance of the certificate. What shall be considered a reasonable time is uncertain, but in no case should it be permitted to extend beyond the length of time within which it is prescribed that, after its maturing, action upon the certificate must be brought.

In Iowa it is settled by ELLIOTT v. CAPITAL CITY STATE BANK, to the contrary, that there is no limitation to the period within which the demand may be made. Elsewhere, except in Pennsylvania, there appears to have been no explicit expression of opinion upon the point, although in several cases the courts, by necessary implication, adopted the same theory as they have held, that the demands in question were sufficient though not made until after the period of the statute of limitations had expired.

Direct authority is found in McGough v. Jamison, 107 Pa. 336. The court there holds that action upon a certificate of deposit is sustainable although no demand of payment was made within the statutory period of limitation after its issue. The certificate was payable to the order of the depositor "on return of this certificate." "It was not due," says the court, "until demanded and a return of the certificate. No action could be maintained thereon until that time. It follows, that is the time the statute began to run, for then the right of an action accrued. . . . The demand may be made after the expiration of six years from the date of the certificate."

In support of its conclusion, the court cites Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. 39 Pa. 92, 80 Am. Dec. 507. In this case a check presented to the bank and marked "Good" is deemed to place its holder in the same position as the original depositor, whose deposit is held by the bank payable on demand. The check so certified was not presented until after the expiration of six years from 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dale & Harvison, for appellant:

A certificate of deposit is distinguishable from a promissory note payable on demand.

its date and certification, that being the period of the statute of limitation. Nevertheless the right of action against the bank was not deemed to have become barred.

In Finkbone's Appeal, 86 Pa. 368, upon which this decision is based, the court held that the failure of a depositor to call for a sum deposited with another party until after the period of the statute of limitations, when he had a receipt acknowledging the deposit and readiness to return the same in such amount "as she may want," did not bar an action to recover the same.

In Smiley v. Fry, 100 N. Y. 262, 3 N. E. 186, the court regards as a certificate of deposit a special deposit with a mercantile firm, evidenced by the writing, "Due S. K. Ashton, Trustee, $4,000, returnable on demand. It is understood this sum is especially deposited with us, and is distinct from the other transactions with said Ashton." Demand for payment of the debt so evidenced was not made within the statutory period, and counsel for the defense argued that, even if demand were necessary, which he denied, it should have been made within such time. The court, however, held the contrary. "As the instrument in question was not a promissory note, but a certificate of deposit, the defense of the statute of limitations, interposed by the defendant, was not available, for the reason that a demand of the money deposited was not made prior to six years before the commencement of the action."

Whether regarded as a certificate of deposit or as a promissory note due upon demand, it is held, in Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146, that a deposit with a mercantile firm, evidenced by a dated certificate, "Received from Capt. William H. Payne, $1,000, which is to his credit on our books at six per cent. Slate, Gardiner, & Howell,"—was not barred by the lapse of the statutory period after date, where demand was not made until within such period before bringing action. "The rights and liabilities of the parties are precisely the same," says the court. "as if the money had been in a bank; and hence, there was no right of action against the depositaries until actual del-mand made; and the statute of limitations began to run from the same time." Demand made within the statutory period before suit, though thirteen years after the date of the obligation, is held sufficient to support the action.

Although the point is not expressly raised in Tobin v. McKinney, 14 S. D. 52, 91 Am. St. Rep. 688, 84 N. W. 228, the inference is clear, again, that the court does not regard the time within which, after issuance of the certificate, demand may be made, as limited, so long as it is made within the statutory period before action brought. Recovery was allowed on a demand certificate which had been outstanding for nine years, where the evidence shows that demand thereon was made only a short time before suit.

In Campbell v. Whoriskey, 170 Mass. 63, 48 N. E. 1070, it appears that one party put in the hands of another party, not a banker, a sum of money for safe-keeping "until she should want it," for which the recipient issued a paper reciting the amount of money which is stated to be "with me, belonging to" the depositor. Defense to an action to recover the sum was based upon the plaintiff's failure to demand it within the statutory period after its deposit. But the court held that in such cases the time within which the demand must be made is to be determined by the construction to be put upon the contract in each case. Says the court: "If the contract requires a demand, without language referring to the time when the demand is to be made, it is as if the words 'within a reasonable time' were found in it. What is a reasonable time is a question of law, to be determined in reference to the nature of the contract and the probable intention of the parties as indicated by it. Where there is nothing to indicate an expectation that a demand is to be made quickly, or that there is to be delay in making it, we are of opinion that the time limited for bringing such an action after the cause of action accrues should ordinarily be treated as the time within which a demand must be made." The court holds, however, that, under the circumstances, failure to demand within this period was excused, it appearing that the defendant was to hold the money for an indefinite time in the future, as much for the safety and convenience of the plaintiff as for the pecuniary benefit of either of them. "In some respects he was to stand in the place of a savings bank in receiving and keeping the money. A depositor in a savings bank need not call for his money within six years."

The rule laid down by the Massachusetts court seems reasonable, but the general rule which it lays down has been more often declared without stating the exception. In a variety of cases in which demand was held necessary to found a cause of action, it has been held that the action was barred by failure to make the demand within the statutory period for bringing the action where matured by demand. Sherwin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The certificate sued on is as follows:

$1,500.00.

Des Moines, Iowa, March 23, 1885.
Capital City Bank.

Mary J. Penrose has deposited in this bank Fifteen Hundred Dollars, payable to the order of herself on the return of this certificate properly indorsed with 4 per cent interest, per annum.

No. 15108.

A. W. Naylor,
President.

The demurrer was sustained on the ground that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and the correctness of the ruling is the only question for determination.

The trial court evidently sustained the demurrer on the authority of Mereness v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Iowa, 11, 51 L. R. A. 410, 84 Am. St. Rep. 318, 83 N. W. 711, and, under the rule there announced, its decision was right. The decision in the Mereness Case, however, was planted on the ground that a general deposit of money in a bank is a loan of the money to the bank, and that an ordinary certificate of deposit is nothing more nor less than a promissory note, to be governed, with certain exceptions, by the rules governing such notes. If it be true that a deposit in the usual course of business is a loan to the bank of the money deposited, then it may consistently be said that a certificate representing such a loan is a promissory note; but the fundamental error in the Mereness Case, and in the cases on which it was based, was the holding that an ordinary deposit of money in a bank is a loan thereof to the bank. See Lowry v. Polk County, 51 Iowa, 50, 33 Am. Rep. 114, 49 N. W. 1049; Long v. Emsley, 57 Iowa, 11, 10 N. W. 280. In the later cases of Officer v. Officer, 120 Iowa, 389, 98 Am. St. Rep. 365, 94 N. W. 947, and Hunt v. Hopley, 120 Iowa, 695, 95 N. W. 205, we distinctly held that an ordinary deposit is not a loan to the bank, and in the latter case we expressly overruled Lowry v. Polk County, in so far as it so held. With this conclusion, and the arguments on which it is based in these cases, we are content, believing it to be sound and in accord with the great weight of authority. The conclusion in the Mereness Case having been predicated on false premises, it follows that it must fall with its foundation, unless there be some other sufficient reason for holding that a demand certificate of deposit should be treated as a demand promissory note, so far as the statute of limitations is involved. We do not believe that any sound reason for so holding exists. It is undoubtedly true that such certificates have many of the incidents of promissory notes, and that they are often classed as such, but it is equally as true that a certificate of deposit represents a transaction entirely different from that represented by a note. A promissory note ordinarily represents a loan or its equivalent, and it is generally the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor and pay him, and it was for the protection of the debtor that demand notes were originally held to be due at once. Deposits are made in a bank in accordance with the universal commercial usage, which becomes a part of the law of the transaction. They are neither loans, nor bailments in the strict sense of the term. A deposit is a transaction peculiar to the banking business, and one that the courts should recognize and deal with according to commercial usage and understanding. The primary purpose of a general deposit is to protect the fund, and some of the incidental purposes thereof are the conveniences of checking and transacting large business interests without keeping and handling large sums of money. The transaction is in reality for the benefit and convenience of the depositor; and, while the relation of debtor and creditor exists, and the bank has the use of the money for commercial gain, it assumes no further obligation than to pay the amount received when it shall be demanded at its banking house. Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. 39 Pa. 92, 80 Am. Dec. 507.

A bank may receive or decline deposits, and do business with whom it pleases. It may receive a general deposit to-day, and to-morrow, for reasons of its own, it may return the amount deposited, and refuse absolutely to transact business further with such depositor. See 5 Cyc. and cases cited. But, unless the banker desires to return the deposit, he is under no obligation to seek his creditor for the purpose of making payment. If no actual demand be necessary to mature the debt created by a deposit, then depositors may sue at once upon leaving the bank, and a transaction intended to be for the mutual benefit of both may become one of oppression and wrong to the bank, and this the law should not tolerate. That a certificate of deposit is distinguishable from a demand promissory note, we think clear. Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 298; Smiley v. Fry, 100 N. Y. 262, 3 N. E. 186; Re Hunt, 141 Mass. 515, 6 N. E. 554; Murphy v. Pacific Bank, 130 Cal. 542, 62 Pac. 1059; Bellows Falls Bank v. Rutland County Bank, 40 Vt. 377; Officer v. Officer, and Hunt v. Hopley, supra. And that it is not due and payable until actual demand is made, we think is held by the overwhelming weight of authority. Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 301; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008, followed by the same court in later cases; Cottle v. Marine Bank, 166 N. Y. 53, 59 N. E. 736, and New York cases therein cited; Dickinson v. Leominster Sav. Bank, 152 Mass. 49, 25 N. E. 12; Miller v. Western Nat. Bank, 172 Pa. 197, 33 Atl. 684; McGough v. Jamison, 107 Pa. 336; Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. supra; Brahm v. Adkins, 77 Ill. 263; Long v. Straus, 107 Ind. 94, 57 Am. Rep. 87, 6 N. E. 123; Bellows Falls Bank v. Rutland County Bank, supra; Tobin v. McKinney, 15 S. D. 257, 91 Am. St. Rep. 694, 88 N. W. 572; Citizens' Bank v. Fromholz, 64 Neb. 284, 89 N. W. 775.

The decisions of many of the other states are to the same effect, but we need cite no further authority on the proposition. Furthermore, the certificate in issue provides that it is payable on presentation properly indorsed, and its express language repels the thought that it is payable otherwise than on actual demand. Morse, Banks & Banking, § 302; McGough v. Jamison, Cottle v. Marine Bank, and Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Twp. supra. And the principle is also analogous to that of a bill 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) payable on or after sight, which is not due until it is presented and payment demanded. 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, 1608.

We think there is no merit in the appellee's contention that, if an actual demand is necessary to mature the certificate, such demand must be made within the period of the statute of limitations. The parties may contract as they will. The depositor having the right to demand the amount due him at any time, and the bank having the right to pay at any time, there can be no extension of the statute of limitations by either party, nor any laches on the part of either.

The demurrer should be overruled, and the case is reversed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

a. Source of the power.

The power of a justice of the peace to punish a witness for contempt on account of failure to respond to a summons, or to be papers which he has been directed to produce by a subpoena duces tecum.

2. Right to face witness—evidence before magistrate.

The constitutional rights of one accused of crime to meet the witnesses face to face is not infringed by refusal to compel the production of evidence before a committing magistrate.

3. Magistrate—power to punish for contempt.

A committing magistrate has no jurisdiction to punish for contempt a witness who refused to obey a subpoena duces tecum.

4. Same—statutory authority.

A statute permitting a magistrate to punish a witness for refusal to testify does not authorize him to punish for failure to obey a subpoena duces tecum.

(April 25, 1905.)

sworn and to testify, has its source in 1 & 2 Philip & Mary, chap. 13. That statute, in terms, gave justices of the peace the power to bind material witnesses by recognizance to appear at the next general gaol delivery. This express authority was regarded by the early English law writers as necessarily including power to commit as for a contempt upon a failure or refusal of a witness to enter into a recognizance as required by the statute. Thus, in Hawkins' and Hale's works, the power of justices of the peace to commit witnesses for contempt is first advocated, founded, so far as appears, upon their construction of the statute above referred to; but possibly an earlier practice of this nature had been creeping in, which does not appear in the early English reports.

Thus, Lord Hale says: "If A brings B before a justice of the peace for suspicion of felony, if he can testify materially against him, he may bind him over to prosecute; and, if he refuses, the justice may commit him." 2 Hale, P. C. 52.

He again says expressly in regard to the statute under discussion: "The justices or coroner that take the examination of the person accused, and the information of the witnesses, may at that time, or at any time after, and before the trial, bind over the witnesses to appear at the sessions, and in case of their refusal either to come or to be bound over, may commit them for their contempt in such refusal, and this is virtually included within their commission and by necessary consequences upon the statute of 1 & 2 Philip & Mary, chap. 13." Id. 282.

And in 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 16, § 2, is the following: "And it is said, that whosoever a justice of peace is empowered by any statute to bind a person over, or to cause him to do a certain thing, and such person, being in his presence, shall refuse to be bound, or to do such thing, the justice may commit him to the jail, to remain there till he shall comply."

The foundations of this power under discussion, as above outlined, are very clearly 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County quashing an alternative writ of mandamus to compel defendant to enforce an order requiring a witness to produce certain papers. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chambers Kellar, James G. Stanley, Polley & Stewart, and Ivan W. Goodner, for appellants:

The writ lies to compel the performance of any act of the lower tribunal to which, by the Constitution of the state or the laws thereof, a party is absolutely entitled.

Defendants' right to the compulsory production of evidence in their behalf is one which cannot be invaded or denied by the mere declaration on the part of the justice of the peace that he has no jurisdiction or recapitulated in the early case of Bennet v. Watson, 3 Maule & S. 1, where a wife refused to obtain her husband's recognizance for her appearance as witness at a trial, and afterwards, upon being sent for, refused to attend. A warrant was then issued by the justice of the peace before whom the trial was, against her, she being a material witness necessary to the prisoner's conviction. The decision of the court, upholding the commitment, was based largely upon the ground that such was the prior practice, as shown by 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 16, § 2, which practice was implied from the early statute of 1 & 2 Philip & Mary, chap. 13, allowing justices of the peace to bind witnesses by recognizance to appear at the next general gaol delivery. One judge says: "The power of commitment is absolutely necessary to the existence of the statute of Philip & Mary; for unless there were such a power, every person would of course refuse to enter into a recognizance, and the magistrate could not compel him; and then if he could further avoid being served with a subpoena, the party delinquent might escape unpunished. This consideration, coupled with Lord Hale's judgment founded on the practice, seems to me sufficient to establish the power. The question here is respecting a person who is under a legal disability; but she not only refuses to give recognizance, but she refuses to go, doing as much as in her lay to elude the justice of the case. The magistrate, therefore, has done nothing more than was proper to secure her appearance at the sessions; upon her refusing to go, or to find any recognizance, he commits. It seems to me he was right in so doing; the practice has been so, and it follows both from the practice and the opinion of Lord Hale that the law is so."

This, then, is the nature of the power,—it is not an inherent authority, but one expressly given by statute, or deemed so bestowed by necessary implication from some existent legislation.

power to compel the enforcement of his writ.

Defendants have a remedy by mandamus.

They are entitled to the writ to compel the performance by the justice of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from his office.

b. Power inferred from other legislation.

A few decisions in the United States have implied the right from other legislation, similarly as was done in England (supra, I. a).

Thus, the power given by statute to a magistrate to issue a subpoena means the legal, and not the mere physical, power. It means the power to issue a subpoena which the party is bound to obey, and therefore includes the right to enforce his attendance in case of disobedience. People v. Hicks, 15 Barb. 153.

And a justice of the peace having power to issue a subpoena requiring a person to come before him and make an affidavit has the power, when the witness disregards the subpoena, to punish him for contempt. Robb v. McDonald, 29 Iowa, 330, 4 Am. Rep. 211.

In the absence of any statute specifically applicable, a justice of the peace holding special sessions has jurisdiction to fine, as for a criminal contempt, one who, after being duly subpoenaed as a witness, wilfully and contemptuously refused to be sworn. Bowen v. Hunter, 45 How. Pr. 193.

And, the statute giving a justice of the peace power to summon witnesses in the examination of any matter or pending proceeding to be inquired into by the court, also gives the justice power to fine as for contempt in case of their failure to appear or refusal to be sworn or testify, the same as in civil proceedings in justice's court. State ex rel. Long v. Keyes, 75 Wis. 288, 44 N. W. 13.

The power will not, however, be allowed under a statute unless it is very clearly inferable therefrom. Thus, under a city ordinance providing that, upon application and in the absence of any person who would make a complaint of the violation of an ordinance prohibiting the sale of liquor, the police justice might issue a subpoena to any person to appear before him and answer such questions as might be asked by the city attorney considering the violation of such ordinance, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the police justice issued such a subpoena to an individual, who failed to appear in response to it, whereupon, under another provision of the city ordinance making the disobedience of such subpoena a contempt, and authorizing the police justice to impose a fine or imprisonment as a punishment therefor, the police justice adjudged the individual guilty of contempt, and committed him to the city prison. The case turned on the validity of the city ordinance. The statute conferred power on the police justice to punish for contempt offered to him while holding court or to process issued by him; but in this instance it was pointed out that the police justice was not acting in the capacity of a court, nor was the subpoena issued in a pending prosecution. The authority for the inquiry undertaken in the present instance was not otherwise expressly conferred by the statute, the only authority being the city ordinance, which it was contended was properly passed under the general-welfare clause of the statute, providing for the passage of such ordinance as might be deemed expedient for maintaining the peace, good government, and the welfare of the city. But this contention was not upheld by the courts, on the ground that when the power to imprison for contempt rests upon statute, it must be clearly expressed; and the general-welfare clause, above referred to, could not be extended to cover what is generally held to be the highest exercise of judicial power. Re Palmeter, 58 Kan. 809, 51 Pac. 288.

FARNHAM v. COLMAN, is also a strong illustration of this point. This decision seems almost out of harmony with some of those previously noted, unless it can be distinguished by the fact that herein there was some legislation upon the power of justices to punish a witness for contempt, and therefore, that in the presence of some pertinent legislation upon the subject, the legislature must not be presumed to have intended to bestow greater authority than that specifically granted.

c. Specific statutory authority.

1. In general.

In many of the states specific legislation regulating a justice's power to commit for contempt has been enacted. These statutes will not be herein set out except when necessary on account of decisions rendered under them.

The authority of justices of the peace to punish for contempts, especially commitments for refusal of witnesses, after due summons and payment of their fees, to appear and testify before them, has been generally admitted in Massachusetts, and has been regulated by statute from the earliest time of the commonwealth. Whitcomb's Case, 120 Mass. 118, 21 Am. Rep. 502.

By statute, in the District of Columbia a justice of the peace has power to compel the attendance of witnesses by attachment, and to punish them for contempt by a fine not exceeding $10, or imprisonment not exceeding ten days, in refusing to obey a summons to appear as a witness. Re Carson, 26 Wash. L. Rep. 152.

The right of an examining magistrate to compel a complaining witness to enter into a recognizance for his appearance at the next term of the court, and, in the event of his refusal so to do, to commit him to jail until he should comply with such order, was upheld in Re Petrie, 1 Kan. App. 184, 40 Pac. 118. An existing statute authorizing the magistrate so to do was held constitutional.

A witness who had been duly summoned by subpoena, failing to appear upon the day fixed for the trial, the justice of the peace before whom the cause was pending issued a writ of attachment against the witness for contempt in refusing to obey the subpoena, and the witness filing no answer, the justice of the peace fined him $3 for his contempt. His power to do so was upheld by the court in view of a statute providing that justices shall have power to subpoena witnesses and enforce their attendance by attachment and fine. State v. Newton, 62 Ind. 517.

A statute providing that on the trial of any person prosecuted for intoxication, if he be found guilty, he shall, under oath, disclose when, where, how, and from whom he procured the liquor by which his intoxication was produced; and that if he refuse to make such disclosure, it shall be the duty of the magistrate before whom he is tried to commit him for contempt of court, for not less than ten days or more than thirty, was held constitutional, and a commitment made by a justice of a city police court, in conformity therewith, was upheld in Re Clayton, 59 Conn. 510, 13 L. R. A. 66, 21 Am. St. Rep. 128, 21 Atl. 1005.

The statutory power given justices of the peace to punish a defaulting witness for contempt is also given to mayors in criminal proceedings before them in city courts. State v. Aiken, 113 N. C. 651, 18 S. E. 690.

2. Miscellaneous instances not within scope of statutes.

In one instance, after a complainant had made a charge before a magistrate, she changed her mind as to its prosecution, whereupon the magistrate summoned her to appear and proceed with the prosecution, and upon her failure so to do, he issued a warrant for her arrest, and detained her before him until a bystander paid the amount specified as costs by the justice, whereupon she was discharged. These acts on the part of the justice were held entirely unjustified and outside of his jurisdiction, and rendered him liable in trespass. The statute 32 & 33 Vict. chap. 31, D. §§ 16, 17, providing for the issuance of a warrant by a justice against a material witness refusing to respond to a summons, was held no justification, since it does not apply to a prosecutor unwilling to proceed with a charge. Cross v. Wilcox, 39 U. C. Q. B. 187.

A commitment of a witness for contempt by a justice of the peace is unauthorized and void where it appears that the witness was the attorney for the defendant in the pending cause, and that the alleged contempt was his refusal to produce a bill of sale which had been intrusted to him by his

Fuller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from an order of the circuit court quashing an alternative writ of mandamus issued therefrom against a justice of the peace engaged in conducting a preliminary examination under an information charging appellants with the crime of murder. In the alternative form the writ commanded the respondent magistrate to compel the state's attorney, William H. Parker by punishment for contempt, to produce at the hearing certain statements or client by reason of the confidence reposed in him as attorney. People ex rel. Mallory v. Benjamin, 9 How. Pr. 419. This was a decision under § 279 of the Revised Statutes, providing that a justice of the peace may commit a witness for contempt for a refusal to answer any pertinent and proper questions, when the party desiring his testimony shall make oath that it is so far material that without it he cannot safely proceed in the trial of the cause.

2. Defective proceedings.

In a number of instances the right of a justice to punish a witness for contempt has not been questioned, but the proceedings have been held defective on account of the omission of some act or allegation deemed requisite.

Thus, under a section of the prohibitory liquor law providing that whenever a complainant is required to state facts and circumstances for the information of the court to whom the complaint is made, and the complainant is unable, of his own knowledge, to state sufficient facts and circumstances to authorize the issuing of a warrant, the court may issue subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses to testify concerning such facts and circumstances,—a justice of the peace may not commit a witness for contempt for a refusal to testify upon being subpoenaed in conformity with the above statute, when the complaint does not set forth any specific facts or circumstances, but merely states a belief in facts which are suspected to be within the knowledge of the witness. Re Morton, 10 Mich. 208; Re Hall, 10 Mich. 210.

A warrant of commitment by a justice of the peace was held no justification to him in an action of trespass brought against him by the person committed, when the commitment was simply for refusing to give evidence touching a certain riot and disturbance, without its appearing that the person was apprised of the specific charge upon which he was desired as a witness. The judges distinguished this case from Bennet 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Watson, 3 Maule & S. 1 (supra, I. a); Cropper v. Horton, 8 Dowl. & R. 166.

In Evans v. Rees, 4 Perry & D. 32, 12 Ad. & El. 55, 4 Jur. 1032, the judges expressly stated that they wished to give no opinion upon the general power of justices to compel the attendance of witnesses, but they merely decided that a warrant issued by a justice of the peace upon the refusal of a witness to appear, to bring that witness before him "to find sufficient bail" to appear and give his evidence at the next assizes, was illegal on the ground that the justice took too much for granted, he having assumed that the witness was a material one and would refuse to enter into the usual recognition.

Section 279 of N. Y. Stat. at L. (1867) vol. 2 (Rev. Stat.), *274, now amended by § 3001, Code Civ. Proc., provided that a justice of the peace might commit a witness for contempt for a refusal to answer any pertinent and proper questions, when the party desiring his testimony should make oath that it was so far material that without it he could not safely proceed with the trial of the cause.

In an early case (1853) it was held that the statute which made provision respecting criminal proceedings gave express power to any magistrate to punish for contempt in like manner as might justices of the peace in civil actions. Therefore, there being in criminal proceedings no cause pending and no party to the cause to make an affidavit of the materiality of the witness, as is required in civil actions, the certification of the magistrate to that effect was sufficient, since that was a compliance with the spirit and object of the provision, which was that the magistrate must be convinced of the materiality of the testimony, and that the judgment of a magistrate was certainly of as much weight as the opinion of a party, although given upon oath. People v. Hicks, 15 Barb. 153.

But, a few years later (1857) it was held that the above section did not authorize a justice of the peace to commit for contempt for a refusal to be sworn as to the cause of dying declarations pursuant to a previously served subpœna duces tecum which the witness, though called, sworn, and examined, had refused to obey. It appears from the petition that the cross-examination of one of the witnesses for the state disclosed that Richard Galvin, the victim of the homicide, after all hope of life was abandoned, and with the realization of immediately impending death, had made a dying declaration which was taken in shorthand by two competent persons, one of whom was the state's attorney's stenographer, and the same, after being typewritten, was signed by such declarant, whose death occurred soon afterward. It is conceded that the state's attorney, when called as a witness, was, and now is, in actual possession of, and wholly able to produce, both the signed statement of Richard Galvin, since deceased, and the shorthand notes taken by the stenographers; that counsel for appellants urgently requested respondent to compel their production by punishing the witness for contempt, and that such magistrate refused to resort to such procedure. If there are any other essential facts, they may be stated as well in connection with the principles and usages of law applicable to a case of this character. Nor need anything be said concerning the propriety of resorting to the extraordinary remedy of mandamus to require a public prosecutor to produce before a committing magistrate evidence on behalf of the accused after all the witnesses for the state have been sworn and examined. Were his intoxication, when found intoxicated on the street, on the ground that the power of the justice to commit under the above statute did not vest until the party at whose instance the witness was subpoenaed made an oath that the testimony desired was so far material that he could not safely proceed without it in the trial of the cause, and that under facts shown by the case at bar there was no one to make the oath required by the statute, neither was there any trial of a cause, and that it was a case in every respect dissimilar to the one contemplated by the statute referred to. People v. Webster, 14 How. Pr. 242.

Still later (1873) it was declared in Bowen v. Hunter, 45 How. Pr. 193, that the section above set out applied only to civil suits by a justice of the peace, and not to a criminal case before such a justice holding a court of special sessions.

And in 1876 a still narrower view was taken, the court holding that, in the absence of such an oath as is required by the section under consideration, a justice of the peace has no judicial authority to adjudge a witness refusing to testify guilty of a contempt, and that this is true notwithstanding that the making of the oath was impossible by reason of the fact that the witness was the defendant in the pending action, and was put upon the stand in her own behalf, and her refusal to testify occurred while she was under cross-examination by her opponent. The court stated that the right of a party to be a witness in his own behalf has been given by statute since the enactment of the statute in regard to the punishment of contempts, which therefore did not cover the situation in the case at bar, but that its provisions nevertheless could not, on that account, be disregarded; that a remedy probably existed for the protection of the plaintiff's rights in the pending cause by striking out the direct examination upon the refusal of the witness to testify upon cross-examination. Rutherford v. Holmes, 66 N. Y. 368. Affirming 5 Hun, 317. Two judges dissented.

The oath required by statute to be made regarding the nonattendance of a witness in 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

response to a subpoena, of the materiality of his testimony and his refusal to be sworn, in order to obtain his commitment for contempt, may be merely oral, and not in writing. Baker v. Williams, 12 Barb. 527.

In one instance, it was urged that the absence of a statement to the effect that the justice was not in any way interested in the pending cause rendered a commitment defective; but the court held that, without such a statement, it was a complete justification to the justice issuing it when it recited all the facts necessary to show that the witness was guilty of a contempt in refusing to make a deposition before the justice. Call v. Pike, 68 Me. 217.

A justice of the peace has no power to commit a witness for contempt for a refusal to obey a subpoena when the attachment was served by the marshal of a village, since process from a justice of the peace to a marshal of a village is without warrant of law,—a constable is the ministerial officer of a justice's court. Re Heister, 5 Ohio L. J. 286.

4. Necessity of pendency of action.

The right of a justice to punish a witness for contempt has turned, in a few cases, on whether there was an action pending in which the testimony was desired, at the time it was refused.

Thus, an individual committed for refusing to make a deposition in perpetuam before two justices of the peace was released upon habeas corpus, it appearing that there was at the time no action pending in which the deposition desired was to be used. Pierce's Case, 16 Me. 255.

And so, habeas corpus will lie to review a commitment for contempt by a justice of the peace on account of the persons committed having refused to appear and make an affidavit in response to a subpoena issued by the justice, as allowed by statute, when the affidavits were not sought for use in any pending action, but were desired merely for the purposes of information. Robb v. McDonald, 29 Iowa, 330, 4 Am. Rep. 211, and State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Seaton, 61 Iowa, it to be assumed that the respondent had the same authority to fine or imprison the state's attorney for contempt that is given him to discharge from custody or hold appellants to answer for the crime of murder, it would, of necessity, follow that his power to refuse to impose the penalty for contempt is equally ample, and, having thus decided in this instance, there could be no interference on the part of the circuit court by means of mandamus. In other words, had the magistrate power to punish the witness, he had power to refuse to do so, and mandamus from a court having no supervisory jurisdiction does not lie to review the action of such inferior tribunal. Territory ex rel. Gramburg v. Nowlin, 3 Dak. 349, 20 N. W. 430; Ex parte Burtis, 103 U. S. 238, 563, 16 N. W. 736, were distinguished on the ground that in these cases actions were pending in which the affidavits were desired. Dudley v. McCord, 65 Iowa, 671, 22 N. W. 920. To the same effect is Chambers v. Oehler, 107 Iowa, 155, 77 N. W. 853.

According to one case, it seems that the action must be pending at the time of the commitment in order to render it valid. Thus, power was given to justices of the peace in Massachusetts by the statute of 1838 to compel witnesses to attend and testify, and to punish them as for a contempt of court by fine upon their failure to so appear and testify when duly summoned. But this power was held to be merely incidental and dependent upon the pending of a cause; so that, it appearing that the cause had been finally determined before the proceeding for contempt was commenced by the justice, the witness would be discharged from imprisonment upon habeas corpus. Clarke's Case, 12 Cush. 320.

The witness in the above case was allowed to recover in an action of tort for false imprisonment, afterwards brought by him against the justice of the peace. Clarke v. May, 2 Gray, 410, 61 Am. Dec. 470.

And it appearing that the action before the justice in which the testimony refused was desired had been discontinued, one of the judges in Re Hall, 10 Mich. 210, was of the opinion that a witness committed should be discharged, on the ground that he should not have been committed when he could not have an opportunity to purge his contempt.

But, according to another decision, summary proceedings for the punishment of a defaulting witness in justice court may as well be had after the close of the suit in which the contempt of the witness occurred as before, and at any time before the penalty is barred by the statute of limitations. Robbins v. Gorham, 25 N. Y. 588, Affirming 26 Barb. 586. This decision was made under an existing statute giving justices of the peace the authority to fine recalcitrant witnesses.

1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

26 L. ed. 392; Matlock v. Smith, 96 Tex. 211, 71 S. W. 956; Montgomery v. Palmer, 100 Mich. 436, 59 N. W. 148; High, Extra. Legal Rem. §§ 153-158, inclusive. In derogation of the common law, § 141 of the Revised Code of Criminal Procedure provides that "when the examination of the witnesses on the part of the state is closed, any witnesses the defendant may produce must be sworn and examined," and counsel for appellants contend that under the statute and the Constitution their clients were deprived of an absolute and unqualified right to the production of the evidence demanded. Formerly all inquiry at preliminary examinations might be confined to the prosecution, and, as a matter of strict legal right, the accused was not entitled to offer evidence in his own

d. Contempt of witness in justice's court punishable by higher court.

The early practice in some jurisdictions, in accordance with statutory provisions, seems to have been to refer the punishment of the recalcitrant witness to a higher court.

The legislature of South Carolina by the act of 1794 enacted that witnesses who refuse to attend a justice's court, or who, when attending, refuse to testify, may be attached, not by the justice, but by a superior court, upon proper application. State v. Applegate, 2 M'Cord, L. 110.

A witness summoned in a suit for a small debt before a justice of the peace, failing to respond, an attachment for contempt was issued by the justice, returnable to the circuit court, which imposed a fine of 20s., that being the maximum limit of the punishment allowed by statute. Ex parte Gorman, 4 Cranch, C. C. 572. The statute referred to provided as follows: "Where witnesses do not attend according to summons, the justice before whom such witness ought to have attended shall enforce obedience to his process by attachment of contempt, to be returnable before the justices of the next county court, who shall take cognizance thereof, and shall, at their discretion, fine the offender any sum not exceeding 20s. current money for every such offense, to be applied towards the county charge." Act 1791, chap. 68, § 8.

An attachment for contempt was issued by a justice of the peace, returnable before the circuit court, against a witness who failed to appear before him in response to a summons, in Washington v. Dawson, 1 Hayw. & H. 236, Fed. Cas. No. 17,227. Counsel said that it was exceedingly desirable that the court should make a decision with reference to the case at bar that would settle the question as to the right of a justice of the peace to punish a witness for contempt, as many witnesses summoned to give testimony before the justices had refused to attend, under the idea that they were not legally bound to obey the summons. The court fined the witness one dollar, and concurred in the opinion that the practice should be established, and that witnesses behalf; but, in some jurisdictions, it seems to have been considered entirely proper to permit him to make an unsworn statement and have his witnesses examined under oath. Consistent with the theory that the constitutional right of the accused "to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to have compulsory process served for obtaining witnesses in his behalf" does not apply to a preliminary examination, Mr. Justice White makes the following observation: "The contention at bar that, because there had been no preliminary examination of the accused, he was thereby deprived of his constitutional guaranty to be confronted by the witnesses, by mere statement, demonstrates its error." Goldsbey v. United States, 160 U. S. 70, 40 L. ed. 343, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 216. In the recent case of State v. Belding, 43 Or. 95, 71 Pac. 330, Chief Justice Moore, in delivering the opinion of that court, by which a judgment inflicting the death penalty is affirmed, employs the following language: "When a defendant in a criminal action is examined before a magistrate, the state is expected to produce sufficient testimony to prove that a crime has been committed, and also to make a prima facie showing that the person accused thereof is apparently guilty. . . . By this means the defendant, without offering any testimony in exculpation is generally enabled to ascertain the nature of the indictment likely to be returned against him, and also to anticipate the extent and character of the testimony that will probably be produced in support of the charge; thus enabling him intelligently to prepare for his defense. . . . The guaranty of the organic law of the state that the accused in a criminal prosecution shall have the right to meet the witnesses face to face . . . is satisfied when, at some stage of the trial, the defendant is confronted with the witnesses, and given an opportunity to cross-examine them."

While it is clear that the refusal of the magistrate to compel obedience to the subpoena duces tecum did violence to no constitutional guaranty, and that mandamus from the circuit court will never lie to reverse the judicial action of such officers, we prefer to rest this decision upon the well-grounded principle that inferior tribunals should know that it was their duty to yield obedience to the summons of the constituted authorities.

II. Want of jurisdiction.

Of course, a justice acting outside the limits of his jurisdiction cannot make a valid commitment.

A justice of the peace for a certain county, who commits a witness to prison for contempt when the offense to be tried was committed in a city wherein a police court had exclusive jurisdiction, acts without authority, and the commitment is unauthorized and void. Piper v. Pearson, 2 Gray, 120, 61 Am. Dec. 438.

And a justice of the peace, holding a preliminary examination for an offense which he has no jurisdiction to try, has no power to commit a witness for refusing to testify, in the absence of an express statutory authority. Re Farnham, 8 Mich. 89.

After a review of the relevant statutes it was held in Re Rich, 10 Kan. App. 280, 62 Pac. 715, that a police judge having no authority to impanel a jury to try cases pending before him, and there being no appeal from his decision to the district court in a proceeding against the witness for an indirect contempt in refusing to obey a subpoena to appear and testify, he has no jurisdiction to punish therefor.

The right of a justice of the peace to arrest recalcitrant witnesses was not attacked in Humphrey v. Knapp, 41 Conn. 313, but upon the witnesses appearing before the justice in response to the capias one of them, who was a man, the other two being women was told that he should be held a prisoner until a certain sum was paid, that sum being made part of the taxable costs attending the arrest of the three delinquent witnesses upon the capias. This was held error, on the ground that the witnesses had committed no joint offense, and that the justice should therefore have held each for his own share of the costs only.

III. Depositions to be used in another state.

The right of a justice of the peace to commit a witness for a refusal to give testimony under a commission to take his deposition, in pursuance of an order made by a court of another state, is recognized in State v. Ingersoll, 62 N. H. 437.

Under an existing statute it was held that justices of the peace might fine any person who, upon being duly summoned to appear before them and make a deposition to be used in another state, did, without reasonable excuse, neglect or refuse to appear and give the deposition required. Burnham v. Stevens, 33 N. H. 247.

IV. Review of commitment by habeas corpus.

A writ of habeas corpus will not lie in another court to review a commitment for contempt, made by a justice of the peace against a recalcitrant witness, unless the proceedings leading thereto were so grossly defective as to render them void. Robb v. McDonald, 29 Iowa, 330, 4 Am. Rep. 211. One judge dissents, on the ground that the justice of the peace was without jurisdiction to take the affidavits in question.

are without inherent power to punish for contempt, and that the extraordinary jurisdiction which the writ of mandamus commanded respondent to exercise is not given by statute. In holding that a United States court commissioner, sitting as a committing magistrate, has no power, under the laws of Minnesota, to punish a witness for contempt, Judge Nelson says: "It is then claimed by counsel that the power to examine gives the right to subpoena witnesses, and, as an incident to it, the power to enforce obedience to the subpoena by arrest and punishment for contempt. To arrest and punish for a contempt is the highest exercise of judicial power, and belongs to judges of courts of record or superior courts. Where jurisdiction exists there can be no review. A pardon by the executive is, in most cases, the mode of release. This power is not, and never has been, an incident to the mere exercise of judicial function, and such power cannot be upheld upon inferences and implications; but must be expressly conferred by law. . . . But there is authority of the courts of the United States directly upon this question. In Ex parte

Perkins, 29 Fed. 900, on habeas corpus before Circuit Court Judge Gresham, the particular question raised here was decided. Judge Gresham said: 'It is a stretch of language to say that the punishment of a witness for contempt, and by a commissioner, is a necessary part of the usual mode of process against offenders or essential to the exercise of any power expressly conferred on him by the Federal law.' So, in Ex parte Doll (1869) 7 Phila. 595, Fed. Cas. No. 3,968, before the late United States Judge Cadwalader,—Doll had been arrested on a complaint made by an officer of the internal revenue for failing to appear and testify in relation to his income. At the examination before the commissioner, an order was made that 'Doll produce his books before the commissioner, or be committed for contempt.' On refusal to comply, he was committed. Upon the hearing the power of the commissioner to arrest and punish for contempt was raised. The judge, in discharging the prisoner for the irregular proceeding of the commissioner, inter alia, said that 'he very much doubted even the power of Congress to invest a commissioner with Robb v. McDonald, supra, was followed in State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Seaton, 61 Iowa, 563, 16 N. W. 736,—a decision in which the facts were somewhat similar. It was held that habeas corpus would not lie to review a commitment by a justice of the peace for contempt against one subpoenaed to appear before him and make an affidavit, notwithstanding the affidavit was, as a matter of fact, unnecessary.

These two decisions were distinguished in Dudley v. McCord, 65 Iowa, 671, 22 N. W. 920, where it was held that habeas corpus would lie to review a commitment when it appeared that the affidavits sought were not for use in any pending action, but were desired merely for purposes of information.

If the justice acted outside the scope of his jurisdiction, the proceedings are, of course, void, and the prisoner is entitled to be discharged upon habeas corpus.

A justice of the peace who commits a witness for contempt for a refusal to answer questions in regard to a crime which was committed outside of the county, and when the offender does not reside therein, does so without jurisdiction, and the witness is entitled to be discharged upon habeas corpus. People v. Cassels, 5 Hill, 164.

Therefore, it is proper, upon habeas corpus proceedings, to inquire into the commitment proceedings sufficiently to determine whether or not the justice acted within his jurisdiction.

If a justice of the peace had jurisdiction to punish a witness for contempt, the commitment will not be reviewed on habeas corpus; and therefore the proceedings will be inquired into only so far as it is necessary to determine whether the justice had jurisdiction or not. State ex rel. Welsh v. Towle, 42 N. H. 540. Neither is there any right of appeal under such circumstances.

Upon the return to a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the validity of a commitment for contempt by a justice of the peace for a refusal to answer a question asked by him in an action instituted in justice court, the court may inquire into the proceedings sufficiently to determine whether the justice had jurisdiction in the premises, and if the record shows a state of facts insufficient to confer jurisdiction, the witness is immediately entitled to his discharge. People ex rel. Laird v. Hannah, 92 Hun, 476, 37 N. Y. Supp. 702.

V. Collateral attack of commitment proceedings.

An action for false imprisonment will not lie against a justice of the peace for the arrest of a witness who neglected to appear before him at the time to which an adjournment was had, since the arrest complained of was a judicial act within his jurisdiction, in view of the statute which gives a justice of the peace power to issue writs of summons to witnesses to appear before him to give their depositions, and, upon their neglect or refusal to answer such summons, to bring them before him for punishment. Whether the witness was properly summoned, and whether the adjournment was properly made, are mere irregularities, which cannot be inquired into collaterally when it appears that the justice was acting within the limit of his jurisdiction. Robertson v. Hale, 68 N. H. 538, 44 Atl. 695.

M. M. M.

the authority in a proceeding originally instituted before him to summarily commit a citizen for an alleged contempt. This was an exercise of the judicial power of the United States, which, under the Constitution, could not be intrusted to an officer appointed and holding his office in the manner in which these commissioners were appointed, and held their offices.' In the celebrated case of Kilbourn v. Thompson involving the question of the power of the Congress to arrest and punish a witness for contempt (103 U. S. 182, 26 L. ed. 384) in refusing to answer questions before a committee of the House, Justice Miller, speaking for the court, among other things, said: 'The Constitution declares that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and it has been repeatedly held by the United States Supreme Court that this means a trial in which the rights of the party shall be decided by a court of justice appointed by law, and governed by the rules of law previously established.' Re Mason, 43 Fed. 510. Although the recorder of the city of Hoboken, N. J., had all the powers that justices of the peace throughout the state possessed as committing magistrates, the court, in discharging on habeas corpus a prisoner found guilty of contempt, employs the following language: "To punish by a commitment for contempt is a power belonging only to judges of certain courts, and does not arise from the mere exercise of judicial functions. The power is great, and its exercise without review, where there is jurisdiction, and hence our duty to be careful not to extend it beyond the recognized bounds of the common law. The recorder did not commit in default of sureties to keep the peace, or to answer before the oyer or sessions, but his commitment was in execution by way of punishment. That power, so far as it may be exercised by judicial officers, is an incident to a court, belonging alike to courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction, but not extending, at the common law, below such as are courts of record recognized in the common law. The general doctrine of the English law is that all courts of record may fine or imprison for contempts in the face of the court. . . . And as early as Griesley's Case, 8 Coke, 38, . . . it was resolved, in the common pleas, that courts which are not of record cannot impose a fine or commit any to prison for contempts. A power to fine or imprison in such cases, although necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of a court not of an inferior jurisdiction, and for the maintenance of its independence and dignity, should not belong to all persons, bodies, or tribunals who may have a judicial duty to perform. The common law wisely did not recognize it in courts below those of record; and we would be doing violence to the liberty of the citizen to encourage its existence in any of our own courts, except those, that, in their very nature, or from analogy to their English models, or in their constitution, are courts of record, with jurisdictions not beneath the character of those so treated in the common law." Re Kerrigan, 33 N. J. L. 344. The headnote, fully supported by the opinion, in Re Farnham, 8 Mich. 89, is as follows: "A magistrate having jurisdiction, under chapter 194 of the Compiled Laws, to examine and commit for trial, or hold to bail, persons charged with crimes not cognizable before a justice of the peace, has no power to commit a witness for refusing to testify on such examination. He has no powers except such as are expressly conferred by this chapter."

Sections 140 and 512 of the Revised Code of Criminal Procedure make it obligatory on the part of the magistrate to issue a subpoena for any witness required by the defendant, and, if any books, papers, or documents are needed, such subpoena must direct the witness to produce them at the preliminary hearing. Section 518 is as follows: "Disobedience to a subpoena, or a refusal to be sworn or to testify, may be punished by the court or magistrate, as for a criminal contempt, in the manner provided in the Code of Civil Procedure." Section 495 of such Code, which provides the means of producing witnesses, is the provision of the Civil Code fixing the penalty for contempt, and reads as follows: "The punishment for the said contempt shall be as follows: When the witness fails to attend, in obedience to the subpoena, except in case of a demand and failure to pay his fees, the court or officer may fine the witness in a sum not exceeding fifty dollars. In other cases the court or officer may fine a witness in a sum not exceeding fifty nor less than five dollars, or may imprison him in the county jail, there to remain until he shall submit to be sworn, testify, or give his deposition." Now, the writ granted, and subsequently quashed by the circuit court was not a mandamus to compel the witness to "submit to be sworn, testify, or give his deposition." but, according to its recitals, to "compel the said witness, William H. Parker, by punishment for contempt, to produce at said hearing all of said statements, dying declarations, and stenographic notes," and the statute has provided no penalty for disobedience that can be exercised by the examining magistrate.

It follows that the alternative writ of mandamus was properly quashed and the order appealed from is affirmed.

Corson, P. J., concurring specially:

I concur in the conclusion that the order of the circuit court should be affirmed on the last ground stated in the opinion, namely, that our statute providing for the punishment of contempts has not provided for punishing, as for a contempt, a refusal of a witness to produce documents called for under a subpoena duces tecum issued by a committing magistrate. The respondent, therefore, in denying plaintiffs' motion to punish the witness for his refusal to produce the statement described in the alternative writ of mandamus by proceedings for contempt, did not violate any duty imposed upon him by the statute or the common law.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

J. D. RODGERS, Appt.,
v.

CHOCTAW, OKLAHOMA, & GULF RAIL-ROAD COMPANY.

(.... Ark.)

Carrier—passenger in dangerous position—care required.

A railroad company is liable for injury to a passenger on a freight train, who, to the knowledge of the conductor, has, in the absence of a closet, gone to the platform to answer a call of nature during the stopping of the train upon a trestle, where the conductor neither warns him of the danger, nor takes any measures to prevent the starting of the train with a jerk while he is in a dangerous position, in consequence of which he is thrown to the ground and injured.

(October 7, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries Case Note.—The decision in the above case, so far as it recognizes any liability of the railroad company, does so on the ground of negligence toward a person of whose perilous position it had knowledge, even if the latter had come into such position through his own negligence. Cases of various kinds illustrating this doctrine are to be found in a note in 69 L. R. A. 523 et seq. But, on the question of the application of this doctrine to a person riding on the platform of a railroad car, there are not many precedents.

An intoxicated passenger, who insisted on riding upon the platform of a car although there was standing room inside, and, after 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. F. Greenlee, for appellant:

If injury resulted from the passenger's acting on the advice of those in charge of the train, the company will be liable.

In this case, however, the conductor did not know that the passenger had gone down upon the steps of the car, and the question of negligence toward him after knowing of his peril related solely to the conductor's acquiescence in letting him remain on the platform. A dissenting judge in that case contended that the conductor was negligent in this particular.

McCulloch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question before us for determination is whether the evidence introduced by the plaintiff was legally sufficient to support a verdict in his favor, and in testing that question we must give the testimony its strongest probative force, and accept that view of the facts which it will warrant most favorable to plaintiff's cause of action. Catlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 57 Ark. 461, 38 Am. St. Rep. 254, 21 S. W. 1062; Ford v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 66 Ark. 363, 50 S. W. 864; Burns v. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. (Ark.) 88 S. W. 824.

Appellant lived at Brinkley, a station on defendant's railroad, but was engaged in business at a switch known as the "G. & C. siding," $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Brinkley, on defendant's road. Passenger trains did not stop at this switch, and appellant was accustomed to ride out there two or three times a week on freight trains which stopped there. On the occasion in question he boarded a freight train at Brinkley to go to the switch, and also shipped a lot of merchandise to be put off there. En route he became sick, and his bowels wanted to move; the call being too urgent to await the arrival at his destination. The caboose was not provided with a closet, and he asked the conductor to slow the train down so that he could get off, attend to the call of nature, and walk the remainder of the distance to the switch. The conductor declined to do that. Shortly afterwards the train reached the switch, and was brought to a stop, but the caboose was stopped over a trestle 85 feet long and 20 feet above the surface of the ground. Appellant testified that he did not know that the caboose was over the trestle, and walked out on the rear step expecting to get off; that as he walked out on the step he met the conductor going into the caboose, and the latter said to him, "You are in a hurry?" to which appellant replied, "Yes, I am;" that a brakeman on the front platform of the caboose called to him, saying, "Just squat on the steps." Appellant describes the incident as follows: "This man I was speaking about [the brakeman] said, 'Just squat down there,' and I said, 'I can't get off on the dump, for they have stopped over a trestle,' and he said, 'Squat on the steps,' and I loosed my pants and had the rail by my left hand, and the train gave a jerk, and I fell to the trestle, and from there to the ground, and that's all there is to it." He testified also to material injury resulting from the fall. His col-

A case more nearly like that of RODGERS v. CHOCTAW, O. & G. R. Co. is one in which a boy fifteen years old, riding in a somewhat crowded car though it had standing room for him, went out on the platform of the car because of becoming sick. Believing that he would be compelled to vomit, he went down on the lower step of the car for that purpose, and while there was thrown off the train by a sudden jerk because the engineer suddenly, unnecessarily, and without warning, applied steam to the train. The court held that the injury was due to the contributory negligence of the passenger. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Moneyhun, 146 Ind. 147, 34 L. R. A. 141, 44 N. E. 1106. But this case also lacks the element of the conductor's knowledge of the passenger's peril, which was deemed sufficient to control the case of RODGERS v. CHOCTAW, O. & G. R. Co.

The rule that a railroad company cannot excuse itself for injuries caused by its negligence to a passenger on the ground that he was riding on the car platform if, by overcrowding the car, it had made it necessary for the passenger to ride there, is laid down in Benedict v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 86 Minn. 224, 57 L. R. A. 639, 91 Am. St. Rep. 345, 90 N. W. 360. But in this case the injury was caused by the passenger's recklessness extending his head beyond the side of the car in order to look ahead, and for this negligence of his it was held that the conditions causing him to ride on the platform made no excuse. There was no negligence of the carrier subsequent to the reckless negligence of the passenger in putting his head beyond the side of the car, which could defeat the rule as to contributory negligence.

Other cases in which passengers have been injured by being thrown from a car platform are those in which the train suddenly starts while a passenger is entering or leaving the car; but these usually involve the question of the carrier's negligence only because the injury occurs while the passenger is rightfully on the platform.

lar bone and one rib were broken, and his arm was severely hurt.

Appellant contends that the railroad company was guilty of negligence in failing to provide a closet for the use of passengers, and that he should recover damages on that account. Freight trains are not equipped for the carriage of passengers, and public carriers are not required to equip them for that purpose. Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Canman, 52 Ark. 517, 13 S. W. 280; Krumm v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 71 Ark. 590, 76 S. W. 1075; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Arnol, 144 Ill. 261, 19 L. R. A. 313, 33 N. W. 204. "A passenger riding on a freight train, or a mixed train, must be deemed to assume all the inconveniences and risks usually and reasonably incident to transportation or travel upon such trains, and is not entitled to insist upon having the same care and attention that he might justly demand upon a regular passenger train." 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1629; Hutchinson, Carr. p. 616; 1 Fetter, Carr. Pass. pp. 33, 34; Olds v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 172 Mass. 73, 51 N. E. 450. But where the railroad company undertakes the carriage of passengers on freight trains, it owes such passengers the same high degree of care to protect them from injury as if they were on a passenger train. Hutchinson, Carr. p. 614; 1 Fetter, Carr. of Pass. p. 585; Erwin v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 94 Mo. App. 289, 68 S. W. 88; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Arnol, supra. Judge Thompson states the rule thus: "We find the courts agreed upon the proposition that, where a railway carrier carries passengers upon its freight trains, it thereby assumes toward them the relation of a carrier toward his passenger; and while, in such a case, it is a reasonable conclusion that the passenger assumes the increased risk incident to the operation and management of such trains, yet, subject to this qualification, the railway company becomes bound in favor of the passenger by all the obligations of a common carrier upon a regular passenger train." 3 Thomp. Neg. § 2901. Moreover, if it be held that it was the duty of the company to provide closets, the omission to do so cannot be said to have been the proximate cause of the injury complained of by appellant.

We think, however, that there was evidence from which the jury might have found the conductor knew of the perilous position of appellant, and could have prevented the injury, either by warning him of the danger, or by holding the train at a standstill. If the conductor was aware of his peril, and could by the exercise of ordinary care have warned him, and failed to do so, or could by the exercise of such care have prevented the sudden movement of the train which threw appellant off, and failed to do so, the company is liable for the injury. Appellant testified that the conductor saw him go down the steps, and said, "You are in a hurry." Whether the conductor meant that appellant was in a hurry to debark, or to relieve himself from the steps of the caboose, does not appear; but the testimony shows that the conductor went into the caboose, and the jury might have found that he knew appellant was in a position of danger on the steps with the caboose on a trestle 20 feet high. They might also have found that the conductor heard the brakeman direct appellant to "squat down on the steps," and knew that he was about to relieve his bowels in that position. If so, he should have warned appellant of the danger, or exercised some care to prevent the train from suddenly moving. At least the question of his knowledge of appellant's position and care exercised to protect him should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions. This court has repeatedly held that, notwithstanding the negligence of the injured person in putting himself in a perilous position, whether a passenger or a trespasser on the track, if the direct cause of the injury is the omission of employees of the railroad company, after becoming aware of his peril, to use a proper degree of care to protect him, the company is liable. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Pankhurst, 36 Ark. 371; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cavenesse, 48 Ark. 106, 2 S. W. 505; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Townsend, 69 Ark. 380, 63 S. W. 994; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Evans (Ark.) 86 S. W. 426; Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. Kimbro (Ark.) 87 S. W. 121, 644; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. McGinty (Ark.) 88 S. W. 1001.

The court erred in directing a verdict, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

JACOB ITZKOVITCH

v.

EDWARD STANLEY WHITAKER.

(.... La.)

1. Injunction—protection of personal right.

The civil courts have jurisdiction in in-

Headnotes by BREAUX, Ch. J.

Case Note.—The express declaration in the above case, that civil courts have jurisdiction in injunction proceedings to protect a personal right, is in conflict with the usual declarations of courts of equity respecting their power to protect personal rights. It has been commonly declared by the courts, junction proceedings instituted to protect a personal right.

2. Same—perpetual.

A rule nisi was issued and preliminary injunction granted on the allegations of the petition. The court, upon the allegations, decided that, if facts were as alleged, injunction should be issued; and it follows that in that case it should be made perpetual.

3. Hearing.

The case may be heard on the merits in order that it may be decided after having heard testimony.

(November 20, 1905.)

APPPLICATION by defendant for writs of prohibition and certiorari to prevent the judge of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division E, from proceeding to enjoin defendant from placing plaintiff's photograph in the rogues' gallery. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin Rice Foreman, with Mr. Samuel Louis Gilmore, for relator.

Messrs. Solomon Wolf and Gustave Lemle, for respondent Itzkovitch:

The inspector had no right to do what he did, and injunction will lie to prevent him from continuing in his illegal course.

and by writers on equity jurisprudence, that a court of equity will interfere to protect rights of property or rights in property only, and not to protect merely personal rights.

Authorities to this effect are quoted by the court in Chappell v. Stewart, 82 Md. 323, 37 L. R. A. 783, 51 Am. St. Rep. 476, 33 Atl. 542, and in that case the court refused an injunction to protect a person from annoyance, and from interference by being watched and followed by a detective. The annotation to that case reviews numerous cases showing that there have always been some clearly defined exceptions to the general theory that equity will not protect personal rights, as, for instance, to protect the rights of married women and children, and some cases of contract, trust, or breach of confidence relating to personal rights.

In a considerable number of cases the courts have based their jurisdiction nominally on an alleged property right, when in reality the only real right involved was one of reputation or other personal right. As, for instance, in the case of injunctions against publishing private letters, such as Woolsey v. Judd, 4 Duer, 379, where the letters had no property value, and the injunction was sought merely to protect the writer against pain and humiliation, yet the court placed the relief on the fictitious basis of alleged property right.

In a variety of similar cases courts of equity have granted relief ostensibly to protect a property right, but really to protect a personal right. In Bomeisler v. Forster, 154 N. Y. 229, 39 L. R. A. 240, 48 N. E. 534, an injunction against prosecuting actions on McDonogh v. Calloway, supra; Pierce v. New Orleans, 18 La. Ann. 242.

Mr. George H. Theard in propria persona.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff complained of the inspector of certain claims which had been released was granted, notwithstanding the sufficiency of the release as a defense to the legal actions. on the ground that the remedy would not be adequate because it would not prevent the humiliation or injury to the reputation of the complainant by making public certain scandalous matters, real or fabricated. The court, therefore, held that he was entitled to a specific performance of the contract by which he had obtained a release of the claims set up against him. Most obviously the entire basis of the equitable relief in this case was to protect the personal rights of the complainant; but the objection that equity could not protect a personal right does not appear to have been discussed by the court.

An injunction against the use of the name and portrait of a deceased person on a cigar label was denied in a suit by his widow, in the case of Atkinson v. John E. Doherty & Co. 121 Mich. 372, 48 L. R. A. 219, 80 Am. St. Rep. 507, 80 N. W. 285; but this was on the ground that there was no legal injury to be redressed, and not on the ground that equity could not protect the personal right if one existed.

So, in Schuyler v. Curtis, 147 N. Y. 434, 31 L. R. A. 286, 49 Am. St. Rep. 671, 42 N. E. 22, an injunction against exhibiting a statue of a deceased relative was denied on the ground that the complainants had no legal right to object, and not because, if a right existed, equity could not protect it. One judge dissented, and contended that there was a right in the relative to object, and said: "That the plaintiff is entitled, if anyone is, to a police, who had his photograph taken, and who was about, he said, to have it placed in the rogues' gallery. He prayed to enjoin the defendant, and he averred damages in a sum over $2,000. He averred substantially that he is an old resident of the city, has a family, is engaged in legitimate business, pays his taxes, and leads an honest life. The judge of the district court issued a rule nisi and directed the defendant to show cause why he should not be enjoined. An exception was filed to the rule nisi, in which he (defendant) stated that he had placed the picture in the rogues' gallery before plaintiff's petition had been filed and that he had forwarded copies to galleries in other states; that he was acting in the discharge of his duty as inspector of police; and that the civil district court had no jurisdiction to enjoin him while he was enforcing the criminal laws. In case this was overruled, he alleged, in substance, that defendant had been convicted of felony and that his character was notoriously bad.

The question of jurisdiction vel non is the first which presents itself for decision. The exception as relates to jurisdiction was properly overruled. For the purpose of the hearing of this exception, the allegations of plaintiff's petition for an injunction must be taken as true. They were not traversed in the original exception, and we conclude that the issues tendered in the original exception are those which the court passed upon in sustaining its jurisdiction. The plaintiff, for the said hearing, must be considered an honest man. We think that the publication of an innocent man's photograph in the rogues' gallery gives rise to sufficient grounds to sustain an injunction. There is a right in equity to protect a person from such an invasion of private rights. Everyone who does not violate the law can insist upon being let alone. In such a case the right of privacy is absolute. It must be said that there is some limit to this right, which it is not necessary to discuss in this case. A person may be arrested, imprisoned, and acquitted, without right to damages. All of this is true, but bears no application to the issue in hand.

Where a person is not guilty, is honest (and that is the only light upon which to consider this case with the issues before us), he may obtain an injunction to prevent his photograph from being sent to the rogues' gallery. He has the personal right to the remedy, has been heretofore mentioned, and it is the finding of the trial court, and that that remedy may be preventive in its character seems to me to be within the reason and principle upon which equity proceeds."

Similarly in the case of Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co. 171 N. Y. 538, 59 L. R. A. 478, 89 Am. St. Rep. 828, 64 N. E. 442, it was held that neither an injunction, nor an action for damages, could be had because of the unauthorized publication of one's likeness for advertising purposes, because of the invasion of an alleged "right of privacy," as the law did not recognize any such right. Three judges dissented, and in the dissenting opinion it is said: "When, as here, there is an alleged invasion of some personal right or privilege, the absence of exact precedent, and the fact that early commentators upon the common law have no discussion upon the subject, are of no material importance in awarding equitable relief. That the exercise of the preventive power of a court of equity is demanded in a novel case is not a fatal objection."

The utterances of the dissenting judges are quoted, not because they settle the law of the case, but because they show the point of view of at least a part of the court on the scope of equitable jurisdiction in the case of personal rights, though the majority of the court refused relief, but based it, not on the lack of power in equity to protect the right, but on the nonexistence of the right. Discussing this question of an alleged right of privacy, it is said in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 6, § 632: "If there is such a thing as a right of privacy, an injunction is certainly a proper remedy for its protection."

An unusual case of the exercise of such equitable power is that of Ex parte Warfield, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 413, 76 Am. St. Rep. 727, 50 S. W. 933. It was there held that an injunction in favor of a husband, who had brought an action for partial alienation of his wife's affections, could be granted to prevent the defendant from writing to, speaking to, or talking with her, or from visiting the house where she stayed, in order to prevent him from exercising undue influence over her; and for violating such an injunction the defendant was punished for contempt.

But, while the cases above referred to show a progressive tendency in courts of equity to protect personal rights, though in some instances they have done so under pretense of protecting a fictitious property right, it is not possible to say how far many of the courts are yet prepared to adopt frankly the sound doctrine declared by the dissenting judges in the Roberson Case as above quoted. Yet it can hardly be doubted that this doctrine will eventually be accepted and enforced without fiction or pretense of a property right where none exists.

The clear declaration on the question by the Louisiana court in ITZKOVITCH v. WHITAKER is that of a court in a jurisdiction which has inherited the civil law instead of common law of England; but it represents at least the spirit of the modern courts of equity in other states.

restraining order, at least for the time being. The theory in opposition to this view is substantially that the picture should be taken and exhibited for the public good. There can be no public good subserved by taking the photograph of an honest man for the purpose before mentioned.

The court had jurisdiction to issue the preliminary injunction, and to make it perpetual if the evidence justifies the decree. The difficulty consists in the fact that there is no evidence before the court. None was offered. We have only the bare allegations before us, and not a scintilla of evidence to sustain them. It follows that all the district court did was to assume that the allegations were true and that they set forth sufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction. There has been no final decision. The injunction is merely provisional. It having been finally decided that the court has jurisdiction, under the present state of the case it will be tried on all the issues presented, and a decision arrived at that will permanently decide all the issues. This cannot be done at this time.

The injunction is not strictly mandatory. If it were, under the jurisprudence of this state there are injunctions that have been sustained in exceptional cases, although slightly mandatory. The last utterance of this court was in State ex rel. Yale v. Duffel, 41 La. Ann. 518, 6 So. 512, in which the court held that, under the exceptional circumstances, injunction had properly gone forth to slightly undo that which had been done. We insert a list of decisions the weight of which sustains the injunction in hand, even if considered in the light of being slightly mandatory. We do not, we must say, concede that the injunction here is mandatory. McDonogh v. Calloway, 7 Rob. (La.) 442; Pierce v. New Orleans, 18 La. Ann. 242; Black v. Good Intent Tow-Boat Co. 31 La. Ann. 497; State ex rel. Behan v. Sixth Dist. Judge, 32 La. Ann. 1276; New Orleans v. Great Southern Teleph. & Tel. Co. 37 La. Ann. 571; Beebe v. Guinault, 20 La. Ann. 795; State ex rel. Gaynor v. Young, 38 La. Ann. 923; State ex rel. Jacobs v. Eleventh Dist. Judge, 40 La. Ann. 206, 3 So. 561.

Although mandamus may be the better practice from any point of view, we do not think that we should set aside the injunction on the ground urged on this particular point. The purpose is, so far as possible, to restore the status quo ante litem (temporarily, it may be).

The direction has gone to the defendant not to permit the photograph to be exhibited, for the time being at least. It must not be considered as part of the collection. The gallery will have a small space covered in 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

some way in order to screen this photograph from view. The exhibition will be suspended and the distribution of copies stopped. The provisional injunction is not an interruption in the administration of the criminal law. The defendant can certainly enforce all laws needful, without let or hindrance. There is on that score no ground for complaint.

There are decisions of recent date on the subject of the "law of privacy," especially Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co. 171 N. Y. 538, 59 L. R. A. 478, 89 Am. St. Rep. 828, 64 N. E. 442.

Gentle young persons of the opposite sex have objected to the free use made of their pictures, and, objecting, have appealed to the courts. The decisions to which it has given rise are lengthy and interesting. We have read them only to arrive at the conclusion that they are not germane to the subject to which we have here given attention.

The rule which issued in this case is recalled and discharged.

The remedy asked for at this time is not granted. The questions go to the hearing of the issues hereafter.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL FOUNDRY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

WILLIAM M. BENNETT, Admr., etc., of Turney Bennett, Deceased.

(... Ala.)

Damages for killing—evidence of possible earnings.

Evidence of the earnings of persons proficient in a trade is not admissible upon the question of damages for negligently killing an apprentice.

(November 30, 1905.)

Case Note.—Where the "line of promotion" in the occupation in which a party is engaged at the time of his injury or death is not so settled that advancement and higher wages may be regarded as fixed and certain, the courts generally agree with the holding in CENTRAL FOUNDRY CO. v. BENNETT, that evidence of the income of those in such positions is inadmissible as too remote and speculative to go to the jury upon the question of damages caused by an injury resulting in the incapacitation or death of the party in such alleged line of promotion.

It was held reversible error in Geary v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 73 App. Div. 441, 77 N. Y. Supp. 54,—an action by the representative of a fireman who had been killed through defendant's negligence,—to permit the introduction of evidence as to different grades of advancement open to deceased and

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Bessemer in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of his intestate. Reversed.

The question involved sufficiently appears from the facts stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walker Percy for appellant.

Messrs. Frank S. White & Sons for appellee.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right given a personal representative to sue for injuries resulting in the death of his intestate, as provided by § 1751 of the Code of 1896, is intended as a remedy for compensation to those having a pecuniary the salaries attached to each grade. While the jury had a right to consider his prospect of advancement and the probability of his attaining a higher position and earning a greater salary, it does not follow, says the court, that those salaries may be shown affirmatively. "There is not sufficient probability that the decedent would have advanced to these positions, to justify the reception of evidence showing the salaries. Evidence of specific salaries of higher positions would be misleading. It would unduly emphasize the right of the jury to consider the question as to whether the decedent would likely ever earn a larger salary or receive greater compensation, and tend to make them regard as probable what is, at most, only possible."

In Colorado Coal & I. Co. v. Lamb, 6 Colo. App. 255, 40 Pac. 251, cited by the court in CENTRAL FOUNDRY CO. v. BENNETT, the reception, over objection, of evidence offered by the representative of a deceased lad who was killed in the defendant's mine where he worked, of the different classes of employees that ordinarily worked in a mine, and the usual wages which they received, was held reversible error. "Such proof is altogether too problematical and uncertain as a basis of damages. There are always possibilities of promotion and advancement for every person. Whether any given person will reap the harvest depends on his personal qualities, his industry, his zeal, and the duration of his life. It is impossible, in the nature of things, for proof to be introduced which shall cover the various elements in the problem. As courts have held in similar cases, all evidence of this description is entirely inadmissible."

There is no distinction in principle as to the admissibility of this evidence where the defendant's negligence causes injury merely, and not death. It was applied in Chase v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 675, 39 N. W. 196, where, in an action by a railroad "car catcher" to recover for injuries occasioned by defendant's negligence, it was held improper to admit evidence that plaintiff was in "line of promotion" for higher 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) interest in the person killed, and the amount of recovery is limited to the value of such interest. 3 Wood, Railway Law, § 414, p. 1536. "That the jury may have proper data from which a pecuniary interest may be fixed, it is proper to admit evidence of the age, probable duration of life, habits of industry, means, business, earnings, health, skill of deceased, and reasonable future expectations; and perhaps there are other facts which should exert a just influence in determining the pecuniary damage sustained." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548, 8 So. 360. While under the rule laid down a jury would not be rigidly restricted in assessing damages to the earnings of intestate at the time of his death, and where intestate, as in this case, is shown to have positions with increased salaries, for which he had been incapacitated by the accident.

"It is enough to prove what the plaintiff has been in fact deprived of; to show his physical health and strength before the injury, his condition since, the business he was doing; . . . the wages he was receiving and, perhaps, the increase which he would receive by any fixed rule of promotion. Beyond that it is not right to go and introduce testimony which simply opens the door to a speculation of possibilities." Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Elliott, 149 U. S. 267, 37 L. ed. 728, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837, where it was held error to permit a switchman to testify as to his "standing a chance" of promotion to a position of greater responsibility for which he had become incapacitated by reason of the injury received.

Where no objection to the admission of such testimony was made, it was held not improper for the court to instruct the jury in regard to it. Atlanta Consol. Street R. Co. v. Owings, 97 Ga. 663, 33 L. R. A. 798, 25 S. E. 377.

The reception of similar evidence in the case of a railroad fireman was held improper in Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Davis, 32 Ind. App. 569, 69 N. E. 550, although judgment was not reversed, the court regarding it as of little weight compared with the rest of the proof of damage.

A distinction may properly be made where the advanced position and salary were contemplated by the contract under which plaintiff entered defendant's service. Thus, in Bryant v. Omaha & C. B. R. & Bridge Co. 98 Iowa, 483, 67 N. W. 392, where plaintiff, a stenographer, had been so seriously injured as to prevent her filling the advanced position contemplated by both parties to the contract of employment, evidence as to such position and its salary and plaintiff's probable promotion thereto was received.

But in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ford (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 77, in an action by the representatives of a locomotive fireman for damages for his death through defendant's negligence, the court permitted evidence that deceased at the time of his death been bright, economical, and industrious, the jury might consider the fact that these qualities, with age and experience, would bring increased earning capacity. We do not think, however, that it was permissible for the plaintiff to have proven the earning capacity of a man proficient in a trade, when the evidence shows the intestate was wearing the swaddling clothes of apprenticeship. Such evidence was speculative and remote, and the defendant's objection thereto should have been sustained. He had served but six or seven weeks at this trade, and the undisputed evidence was that it required a service of three years to become a skilled machinist.

In the case of Brown v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 656, 21 N. W. 195, the court says: "Plaintiff was permitted, against defendant's objection, to prove that firemen, employed on defendant's engines, when they had sufficient experience and had acquired the requisite skill, were sometimes employed as engineers, and when so employed they were paid an increased compensation for their services. This evidence was admitted for the purpose of showing what the earnings of the intestate would probably have been if he had lived the natural period of his life. In our opinion it was not competent. In determining the damages which the estate of a decedent will sustain in consequence of his death, it is proper to consider his calling at the time of his death, his ability, the amount of his earnings, and the like circumstances; and the estimate should be made with reference to such facts as actually existed at the time of his death, and such as it is reasonably certain would have occurred in the future but for his death. . . . It is not claimed that he possessed the skill requisite for that employment, and whether he ever would have acquired that skill was uncertain. The evidence should therefore have been excluded." In Bonnet v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. 80 Tex. 72, 33 S. W. 334, the court says: "Although it had been testified that the deceased, just before his death, was preparing himself to become a machinist and engineer, the court did not err in excluding evidence as to the wages that machinists and engineers ordinarily received for their services. The probability of his becoming an engineer or machinist was too remote, contingent, and speculative to throw any light on his probable future earnings. It was calculated to mislead rather than to aid the jury in determining the question of damages." For other authorities on this subject see Colorado Coal & I. Co. v. Lamb, 6 Colo. App. 255, 40 Pac. 255; Chase v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 675, 39 N. W. 196; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Elliott, 149 U. S. 267, 37 L. ed. 729, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837.

Since all of the assignments of error inwas in the line of promotion to the position of locomotive engineer, and that locomotive engineers earned from $150 to $275 per month. "This was proper testimony," says the court, "in reference to his reasonable future expectations, which the authorities agree are a proper element of damages in this class of cases. . . . It is true that there is no special evidence of Ford's aptitude or capacity with reference to the duties of engineer or anything else; but it appears that he had been retained in defendant's employ as fireman for about two years, which is some evidence that he was competent for that place and performed its duties satisfactorily. That firemen became engineers appears from the rule above quoted [a rule of the railroad company], which directs engineers to instruct them in the duties of that station, and it might be inferred that the engineers under whom the deceased had served had done what the rule required of them. We think the evidence referred to . . . was properly admitted."

This decision is based upon Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. John, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 342, 29 S. W. 558,—an action by the representatives of a deceased switch engineer,—where an isolated paragraph, in addition to which nothing appears upon the point in the opinion or statements of facts, states that "the exception to so much of said petition as charged the reasonable prospect of deceased for pro- 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) motion in the railway service, and the consequent enhancement of wages, was properly overruled, that being a matter for the consideration of the jury in estimating the damages."

In determining that a verdict was not excessive, the court, in Union P. R. Co. v. Young, 19 Kan. 488, adverted to the fact that the plaintiff "was engaged in an employment in which there is a regular system of promotions."

In Walters v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 71, which was an action by the father of an infant of two years, who had been killed on the railroad tracks of the defendant, it was held admissible, for the purpose of determining the amount of loss to the deceased's estate, to show the father's business, the compensation he received therein, and that in the course of time he came to own a mill,—all to show "what the business and earnings of deceased would probably have been, had he survived to manhood." This decision does not seem reconcilable with the later case of Chase v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., supra.

See also Howard Oil Co. v. Davis, 76 Tex. 630, 13 S. W. 665, where plaintiff, who was at the time of the accident an engineer, but unskilful, was permitted to give in evidence his intention to become a skilful engineer, such post commanding a much higher salary.

sisted upon are predicated on the admission of this evidence, we need not consider them separately.

The judgment of the City Court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF VERMONT

v.

W. H. STIMPSON.

SAME

v.

EDWARD LEE.

(.... Vt.)

1. Indictment—constitutional right to.

Indictment is not required by a constitutional provision that no one shall be deprived of his liberty "except by the laws of the land," even in case of common-law felonies; and the legislature may therefore authorize the institution of prosecutions by information.

2. Witness—discrediting—proof of wrongdoing.

It is not reversible error to refuse to permit one accused of statutory rape to cross-examine the prosecuting witness as to promiscuous intercourse with other men for the purpose of affecting her credibility.

(October 25, 1905.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Orleans County Court, made during the trials of informations against them for statutory rape and grand larceny respectively, which resulted in convictions. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—While the question involved in the above case has not been passed upon in a considerable number of the states, the law of the subject may be fairly deemed sufficiently established. Aside from the fact which the court finds, that the Constitution of the state has been practically construed by the legislature for a great many years in conformity to the present decision sustaining prosecutions by information in the case of common-law felonies, the question has been authoritatively settled the same way, so far as the Constitution is concerned, by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292; McNulty v. California, 149 U. S. 645, 37 L. ed. 882, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 959; Vincent v. California, 149 U. Mr. F. G. Bicknell for the State.

Rowell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case against Stimpson is an information for statutory rape, and the one against Lee is an information for grand larceny. The principal question in the former, and the only question in the latter, is whether § 1867 of the Vermont Statutes, as amended by act No. 46, p. 34 (Acts 1898), and act No. 64 (Acts 1904), is constitutional. It provides that state's attorneys may prosecute by information all crimes except those punishable by death or by imprisonment in the state prison for life. It is claimed that said section is in contravention of the declaration in the Constitution that no person can "be justly deprived of his liberty, except by the laws of the land, or the judgment of his peers." This claim is based upon the contention that the words "laws of the land," as there used, require prosecutions for common-law felonies to be by indictment, because it is said those words as used in Magna Charta, from which we borrow them, required that by settled judicial construction in England at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and that it is to be presumed that we took that construction with the words. As bearing on this question, it is important to consider whether that declaration in the Constitution has received a practical construction that has been acquiesced in for a considerable time; for, if it has, that will be a valuable aid, to say the least, in determining the intent and meaning of those words as there used.

U. S. 581, 44 L. ed. 597, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 448, 494; Davis v. Burke, 179 U. S. 399, 45 L. ed. 249, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210; and, in a case arising in Vermont, the same decision was rendered by that court in Hodgson v. Vermont, 168 U. S. 262, 42 L. ed. 461, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80. The same doctrine has been established in several of the state jurisdictions, among others, it was so held in State v. Tucker, 36 Or. 291, 51 L. R. A. 246, 61 Pac. 894; State v. Guglielmo (Or.) 69 L. R. A. 467, 79 Pac. 577; Re Lowrie, 8 Colo. 505, 54 Am. Rep. 562, 9 Pac. 493; State v. Boswell, 104 Ind. 543, 4 N. E. 676; State v. Brett, 16 Mont. 367, 40 Pac. 875; State v. Little Whirlwind, 22 Mont. 427, 56 Pac. 821; State v. Humason, 5 Wash. 501, 32 Pac. 112; Re Boulter, 5 Wyo. 333, 40 Pac. 521. While it has not been passed upon in all the states, there must be little doubt, therefore, of the correctness of the conclusion.

As early as 1779 state's attorneys were provided for, and authorized to prosecute, manage, and plead, in all matters proper, for and in behalf of the state. Slade's State Papers, 331. By an act passed November 10, 1797, it was made the duty of state's attorneys to file informations ex officio in matters proper therefor. Rev. Stat. 1797, chap. 64, § 1. By an act passed February 27, 1787, it was provided that no person should be held to trial, nor put to plead for a capital offense punishable with death, unless a bill of indictment was found against him therefor by a grand jury lawfully impaneled and sworn. Stat. 1787, p. 82. This was only ten years, after the adoption of the Constitution, and indicates that thus early the legislature thought that without such an enactment one might be prosecuted for a capital offense even otherwise than by indictment; for it is not to be presumed that the legislature thought it was passing a useless act. This provision was carried into Revision 1797, chap. 3, § 65, p. 106. By an act "for the punishment of certain capital and other high crimes and misdemeanors," passed March 9, 1797, it was provided that no person should be tried for any offense under said act until a bill of indictment was found against him by the grand jurors attending the supreme court of judicature. Revision 1797, chap. 9, § 36, p. 173. This act did not include larceny except horse stealing. On March 4, 1797, during the same session, an act was passed "for the punishment of certain inferior crimes and misdemeanors." Revision 1797, chap. 10, p. 175. This act included larceny of money, goods, chattels, bonds, bills, notes, etc., regardless of value, and divers other offenses, but did not provide how any of them should be prosecuted; and larceny is a felony at common law. These two statutes, taken altogether, point strongly to the conclusion that at that time it was not supposed that the Constitution required common-law felonies to be prosecuted by indictment, but that it was for the legislature to say what ones should be thus prosecuted, and what ones might be thus or otherwise prosecuted. The act of March 9, 1797, was re-enacted in 1818 with some additions, but not with the addition of larceny, and the act repealed. But the provision in respect of prosecuting by indictment was retained (Acts 1818, chap. 1, § 37, p. 19), and continued in force till the Revision of 1839, unless it was changed by chapter 9, § 1, p. 19, of the Acts of 1819, constituting state's attorneys "informing officers," which is doubtful, although it is said in State v. Magoon, 61 Vt. at page 47, 17 Atl. 729, that prosecution by information of all crimes was authorized by statute from 1819 to 1839. The act of March 4, 1797, was re-enacted in 1821, with an increased penalty for larceny, but was still silent as to the mode of prosecution, and continued so until the Revision of 1839.

Since 1816 it has been the law that, when a person is confined in jail on a complaint for a crime or misdemeanor, the supreme court may, on his application in writing, direct an information to be filed against him, whereon the court may receive and record a plea of guilty and award sentence. Vt. Stat. 1805. The act of October 30, 1828, provided that, whenever a person was in actual confinement in jail by virtue of a complaint for an offense against said act "for the punishment of certain capital and other high crimes and misdemeanors," the county court should have power and authority, on the application in writing of such person, to direct an information to be filed against him for the offense for which he stood charged, on the filing of which it was made the duty of the court to proceed in the trial in the same way and manner as if an indictment had been presented by the grand jury. Acts 1828, p. 4, No. 23, § 3. And that has been the law ever since (Vt. Stat. 1897), and has always been acted upon, except in homicide cases, probably, and without objection as far as we know. This, in effect, is a legislative construction that the Constitution does not require prosecution by indictment in any case, unless we say that the legislature thought the requirement, if it existed, could be waived by the accused with its consent, which we can hardly do, for the law seems to be otherwise. That mere rights and privileges guaranteed by the Constitution can be waived, to some extent at least, is probably true. But it would seem that constitutional requirements as to the mode and manner of instituting prosecutions involving the deprivation of life or liberty cannot be dispensed with by the legislature, nor waived by the accused, even with the consent of the legislature. Cooley, Const. Lim. 8th ed. 214 et seq., 390; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128; Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 579, 28 L. ed. 262, 265, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202. In 1839 it was enacted that no person should be held to answer in any court for an alleged crime or offense, unless upon indictment by a grand jury, except in case of proceedings before a justice and when a prosecution by information was expressly authorized by statute. Rev. Stat. chap. 93, § 1. This was but the act of March 9, 1797, as re-enacted in 1818, with some additions. By chapter 102, § 1, of the Revision of 1839, it was provided that state's attorneys might prosecute by information all crimes not capital and where the punishment was by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not exceeding seven years. Both of these statutes are still in force, with an enlargement in the latter of the authority of the state's attorney to prosecute by information all crimes not capital and not punishable in the state prison for life.

It was decided in State v. Leach, 77 Vt. 166, 59 Atl. 168, that statutory rape can be prosecuted by information. But the constitutionality of that mode of prosecuting was not raised nor considered, and the question has never been decided by this court, nor raised in it but twice before,—once in 1880, in State v. Haley, 52 Vt. 476, and again in 1888, in State v. Magoon, above cited, in both of which, strong judicial utterances were made in favor of the correctness of the long practical construction above shown. State v. Haley was an information for a liquor nuisance, a mere misdemeanor, and the respondent contended that the proceeding should have been by indictment. But the court held otherwise, and said that the statute had always been supposed to mean that all crimes, except capital and those for which the punishment exceeded seven years in the state prison, might be prosecuted by information, without regard to any distinction between felonies and misdemeanors, and without regard to the punishment prescribed, provided it did not exceed seven years in state prison and was not capital, and that such had been the construction and uniform practice by all courts, judges, state's attorneys, and lawyers down to that time. State v. Magoon was an information for grand larceny. The court said that, prosecutions by information for high crimes having been authorized by statute from a time reaching back to a period when many of those who framed and adopted our present Constitution were living, and those statutes having been acted upon unquestioned for nearly seventy years, it would 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) not be profitable to consider the respondent's contention of unconstitutionality; its consideration being unnecessary. The question was not involved. State v. Dyer, 67 Vt. 690, 32 Atl. 814, was an information for conspiracy, held to be a misdemeanor; and the contention was that the case did not come within the statute authorizing the state's attorney to prosecute by information, because the punishment might be by imprisonment in the state prison for more than seven years. Thus it appears that during substantially the whole time since the adoption of the Constitution the legislature has practically construed the clause in question not to require common-law felonies to be prosecuted by indictment, and this construction has been acquiesced in and accepted as correct by the courts and with great unanimity by the profession generally, many of the best of whom have revised the statutes from time to time, commencing with that great lawyer, Nathaniel Chipman, in 1797, who was prominently active in public affairs during the formative period of the Constitution and must have been imbued with its spirit and meaning.

There is abundant authority for saying that after this long acquiescence in that construction it should not be departed from, but should be accepted as correct beyond the permissibility of question. In State v. Bosworth, 13 Vt. 402, 413, it is said that questions arising under the Constitution, settled by a long and uniform practice, questioned in the judicial tribunals but once, and then sanctioned, should be considered at rest. "Where," the court asked, "then, is the security of individual or corporate rights, if these [constitutional] questions are to be considered as always open, if no acquiescence even though sanctioned by judicial decree, is to be considered as settling them?" There the construction had obtained only thirty-four years, while here it has obtained more than one hundred years. See also Boyden v. Brookline, 8 Vt. 284. In Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328, 345, this court adopted the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., at page 318, 9 L. ed. at page 733, that "a uniform course of action involving the right to the exercise of an important power by the state government for half a century, and this almost without question, is no unsatisfactory evidence that the power is rightfully exercised." In Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299, 2 L. ed. 115, it was objected that the judges of the Supreme Court had no right to sit as circuit judges, not being appointed nor commissioned as such. But the court said that practice and acquiescence under it for several years, commencing with the organization of the judicial system, afforded an irresistible answer to the objection, and had fixed the construction of the Constitution, which was too strong to be shaken or controlled. There are many more cases to the same effect, but they need not be referred to. The subject is pretty fully treated in Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 102, and following. See also Black, Constr. & Interpretation of Laws, 31; Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 476; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 527. But the aids of contemporaneous and practical construction must be resorted to with caution and reserve, and can never be allowed to abrogate, contradict, enlarge, nor restrict the plain and obvious meaning of the text.

As to the true meaning of the words "law of the land" and "due process of law," as used in the Constitutions of our states, there is a diversity of opinion; but all agree that they mean the same thing, whatever that is, and that, if they were combined to read, "due process of the law of the land" the meaning would not be changed. The Supreme Court of the United States had this question under consideration in 1883 in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292; and pretty much all that can be said on the subject was there brought out in the majority opinion by Mr. Justice Matthews and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan. The Constitution of California, adopted in 1879, provides that offenses theretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law, and that a grand jury shall be summoned at least once a year in each county. By the Penal Code of the state, where a defendant has been examined and committed as thereby provided, it is the duty of the district attorney to inform against him for the offense. The plaintiff in error having been thus examined and committed for murder, the district attorney informed against him for that crime, and he was convicted and sentenced to death, and the question was whether that was "due process of law" within the meaning of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, which forbids the states to "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," and it was held that it was; that an indictment or a presentment by a grand jury, as known to the common law of England, is not essential to that "due process of law," when applied to prosecutions for felonies, that is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and forbidden to the states to dispense with in the administration of criminal law; that those words refer to the law of the land in each state that declines its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice that lie at the foundation of all our civil and political institutions, the greatest security for which lies in the right of the people to make their own laws, and to alter them at pleasure. The court said that in this country written Constitutions were deemed essential to protect the rights and liberties of the people against the encroachments of power delegated to their governments, and so the provisions of Magna Charta were incorporated into bills of rights; that they were limitations upon all the powers of government, legislative as well as executive and judicial; that it necessarily happened, therefore, that, as these broad and general maxims of liberty and justice held in our system a different place and performed a different function from their position and office in English constitutional history and law, they would justify and receive a corresponding and more comprehensive interpretation; that they applied in England only as guards against executive usurpation and tyranny, while here they have become bulwarks also against arbitrary legislation; but in that application, as it would be incongruous to measure and restrict them by the ancient customary law of England, they must be held to guarantee, not particular forms of procedure, but the very substance of individual rights to life, liberty, and property. The court approved and commended as most accurate the language of Mr. Justice Johnson in Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 235, 244, 4 L. ed. 559, 561, when he said, speaking of those words from Magna Charta, incorporated into the Constitution of Maryland, that "after volumes spoken and written with a view to their exposition, the good sense of mankind has at length settled down to this: That they were intended to secure the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice."

Such is the oft-repeated and settled doctrine of that court. And this court approved that doctrine in State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt. 134, 157, 28 Atl. 1089, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hodgson v. Vermont, 168 U. S. 262, 42 L. ed. 461, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80. And such has been and is the prevailing opinion in this country, both judicial and individual. Chancellor Kent says that "the better and larger definition of 'due process of law' is that it means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice." 2 Com. *13. Webster's famous definition in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat.

518, 4 L. ed. 629, is often quoted. "By the law of the land," he says, "is most clearly intended the general law; a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society," etc. Judge Cooley says this definition is apt and suitable to judicial proceedings. He says that he has met in no judicial decision a statement that embodies more tersely and accurately the correct view of the matter than the language of Mr. Justice Johnson above quoted. He then goes on to say that "the principles, then, upon which the process is based, are to determine whether it is 'due process' or not, and not any considerations of mere form," which, he says, may change from time to time, with due regard to the landmarks established for the protection of the citizen. Const. Lim. *355. Again he says: "Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." Id. *356.

The supreme court of Tennessee says that, "when first adopted in Magna Charta, the phrase 'the law of the land' had reference to the common and statute law then existing in England, and when embodied in our Constitution, it referred to the same common law as previously modified, and as far as suited to the wants and conditions of our people in a new country. At present, 'the law of the land' embraces the same body of laws as still further modified; those parts validly cut off being now excluded, and those validly added being now included. Every valid statute of the state now in existence, whenever enacted, is the present 'law of the land' in respect to the subject-matter of that statute, and every existing enactment passed with due form and ceremony and not in conflict with some provision of the state or Federal Constitution is a valid statute; and no statute otherwise valid is unconstitutional because affecting one's life, liberty, or property, if, when being general, it embraces all persons who are or may be in like situation and circumstances, . . . or, when being special, it is, in addition, natural and reasonable in its classification." Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co. 103 Tenn. 421, 437, 56 L. R. A. 316, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682, 53 S. W. 955, Affirmed in 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

The supreme court of Mississippi says, in Brown v. Levee Comrs. 50 Miss. 468, speaking of the words "due process of law," that "the principle does not demand that the laws existing at any point of time shall be ir-repealable, or that any forms of remedies shall necessarily continue. It refers to certain fundamental rights which that system of jurisprudence, of which ours is a derivative, has always recognized. If any of these are disregarded in the proceedings by which a person is condemned to the loss of life, liberty, or property, then the deprivation has not been by 'due course of law.'"

The Constitution of Wisconsin originally declared that "no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury." Const. 1848. art. 1, § 8. That clause was amended in 1870 (Laws 1870, chap. 118, p. 180) so as to read: "No person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense without due process of law." The statute of 1871 provided that the several courts of the state should possess, and might exercise, the same power and jurisdiction to try prosecutions on information for all crimes as they possessed and might exercise in cases of like prosecution on indictment. Laws 1871, chap. 137, § 1, p. 202. Rowan v. State, 30 Wis. 129, 11 Am. Rep. 559, was an information for murder, and the question was whether the amendment changed the meaning of the Constitution, or, in other words, whether "due process of law" and "on presentment or indictment of a grand jury" meant the same thing; and it was held that they did not. The court said that the words "due process of law" did not mean, and had not the effect, to limit the powers of the state to prosecution of crime by indictment, but meant law in its regular course of administration according to prescribed forms and in accordance with the general rules for the prosecution of individual rights.

The supreme court of Texas says that, when the words "law of the land" were used in Magna Charta, they probably meant the established law of the Kingdom, in opposition to the Roman law, which was about being introduced into the land, but that now, in their most usual acceptation, they are regarded as meaning general public laws, binding all the members of the community in similar circumstances, and not partial or private laws affecting the rights of private individuals. Janes v. Reynolds, 2 Tex. 250.

The supreme court of California, in the judgment under review in the Hurtado Case, followed its previous decision in Kalloch v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 229, in which it held that the proceeding, as regulated by the Cou-stitution and laws of the state, was not opposed to any of the definitions of "due process of law" and "the law of the land," but was strictly within such definitions, as much as was a proceeding by indictment, and took from the accused no immunity nor protection to which he was entitled under the law.

In Utah, the words "due process of law" are held to mean law in the regular course of administration through the courts. Re McKee, 19 Utah, 231, 242, 57 Pac. 23. Indiana holds the same. State v. Boswell, 104 Ind. 541, 4 N. E. 675. It is said in Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 1, 25 Am. Dec. 688, 689, that the words "law of the land" do not mean merely an act of the general assembly, for, if they did, every restriction upon legislative authority would be at once abrogated; but that they mean that such legislative acts as profess in themselves directly to punish persons or to deprive the citizen of his property without trial before the judicial tribunals, and a decision upon the matter of right as determined by the laws under which it vested, according to the course, mode, and usages of the common law, are not effectually laws of the land for those purposes. Many of the other states adopt the view of the cases referred to, but some of them hold the other way, notably Massachusetts, in Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329. Mr. Stephen says, in the first volume of his History of the Criminal Law of England (p. 595), that "from the earliest times the King accused persons of offenses not capital in his own court by the agency of his legal representatives without the intervention of a grand jury."

But it is objected that Hurtado v. California is not in point here, because, the case coming within the Penal Code of that state, its Constitution expressly authorized prosecution by information, whereas our Constitution gives no such authority. But the objection is not well taken; for, if an information for a capital offense was forbidden by the 14th Amendment, the Constitution of the state could not authorize it in any circumstances. So the case is precisely in point. Thus it appears that the practical construction that our Constitution has so long received in this respect accords with the prevailing opinion in this country, which we think the better opinion, and therefore we the more readily hold that our Constitution does not require common-law felonies to be prosecuted by indictment, and that consequently the statute in question is constitutional.

In the rape case, it appeared that the girl consented in fact; but she could not consent 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in law, as she was under the age of consent. As bearing on her credibility as a witness, and as tending to show a motive to charge the respondent with the crime, the respondent offered to show by her on cross-examination that she was six or eight months gone with child, and was never pregnant before; and that ever since she was twelve years old, down to the time in question, she had had sexual intercourse with many different men. The state offered to admit her pregnancy, but objected to her being cross-examined as to her intercourse with other men; but the respondent did not want the admission of pregnancy unless he could cross-examine as to the intercourse, which was not permitted. As a general rule, particular acts of misconduct are not provable by extrinsic evidence. In this state you cannot prove by such evidence that a woman is a prostitute for the purpose of impeaching her credibility as a witness (Morse v. Pineo, 4 Vt. 281; State v. Smith, 7 Vt. 141; Spears v. Forrest, 15 Vt. 435), nor that a witness is a notorious counterfeiter (Crane v. Thayer, 18 Vt. 162, 46 Am. Dec. 142), nor the keeper of a house of ill fame (State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 270, 35 Atl. 178).

State v. Hollenbeck, 67 Vt. 34, 30 Atl. 696, relied upon by the respondent as expressly deciding this question, is not in point. That was an indictment for rape simpliciter, and the woman was of the age of consent as shown by the record in that case, and as is inferable from the case as reported. In such a case, there is no doubt but the respondent has a legal right to cross-examine the complainant as to her intercourse with other men, not to shake her credit as a witness, but to show her consent, and so no rape. What is said in that case about allowing the cross-examination to be as unrestricted and searching as consistent with the rules of law related to the refusal of the trial court to accord to the respondent his legal right to show by the complainant that her relations with him were friendly and cordial at the time of the alleged offense, and continued so afterwards. Whether in the case at bar the court could have allowed the cross-examination as matter of discretion is a question not before us. As to a motive to charge the respondent unjustly, the case as presented would afford no ground for such an inference, had the claimed intercourse with other men been shown.

JOHN BERRY et al., Respts.

Threshing machine—failure to file bond—action for services.

The owner of a threshing machine who fails to file the bond required by a statute making it unlawful to use such machine without executing and filing a bond cannot maintain an action to recover compensation for threshing grain, even for one having knowledge of such failure.

(November 1, 1905.)

Case Note.—The authorities are by no means agreed on the question of the validity of a contract made in the course of the business for which the law requires a license, or a compliance with some condition, when the statute has not been complied with. The question is one of statutory intent. Sometimes the statute clearly declares that such contracts shall be unlawful, and in that case there is no question; but in many cases the statutes merely provide that a license must be procured, or some other steps taken, without expressly declaring that for failure to do so the contracts shall be void.

If it appears from the statutes that the purpose of the requirement is to protect the public, the cases generally recognize the rule that failure to comply with the statute makes the contracts void. In 16 L. R. A. 423, the decisions on the question are collected, and most of them, at least, are consistent with this rule.

A good illustration of this rule is furnished in Randall v. Tuell, 89 Me. 443, 38 L. R. A. 143, 36 Atl. 910, holding that the failure of an innkeeper to procure a license prevented him from recovering for board and lodging furnished at his inn, under a statute providing that "no person shall be a common innholder or victualer without a license, under the penalty of not more than $50," while the license fee was fixed at $1.00. The court said it was satisfied that the purpose of the statute was not revenue, but the protection of the public.

Similarly, it was held in Smith v. Robertson, 106 Ky. 472, 45 L. R. A. 510, 50 S. W. 852, that, under a statute requiring a license fee to be paid by the owner of a stallion kept for hire, making him guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine for each offense for failure to procure the license, a contract for the use of the stallion was invalid. The court discusses the contention that the statute was for revenue only, but refuses to adopt it, and lays stress upon the fact that a penalty was provided for each offense.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. A. Keenan, for appellants:

The statute requiring the filing of bonds is intended merely for the protection of property from destruction by fire, and does not prevent collection for services rendered.

license tax required by ordinance was denied in Denning v. Yount, 62 Kan. 217, 50 L. R. A. 103, 61 Pac. 803, and in Yount v. Denning, 52 Kan. 629, 35 Pac. 207. The ordinance provided that no person should carry on the business without a license and payment of a semi-annual license tax of $10, subject to a fine of from $10 to $100, for violation of the ordinance. This seems to be for the purpose of revenue, and to be so considered by the court; but the decision was placed on the ground that the ordinance made the business unlawful unless the license was paid, and that, therefore, no cause of action could be based on a violation of the ordinance.

This case is supported by some of the other decisions respecting contracts of unlicensed brokers or agents, as, for instance, Stevenson v. Ewing, 87 Tenn. 46, 9 S. W. 230, where the court says that a contract in violation of statute requiring a license should not be upheld on the ground that the sole purpose of the act is to raise revenue, except when there is some doubt, from the language of the statute, whether or not the legislature intended to prohibit the exercise of the privilege without license.

The failure of an insurance agent to procure a license under a statute declaring that, if a person solicits insurance without a license, "or fraudulently assumes to be an agent, and thus procures risks and receives money for premiums, he forfeits not more than $50 for each offense," was held to preclude him from recovering commissions, in Black v. Security Mut. Life Asso. 95 Me. 35, 54 L. R. A. 939, 49 Atl. 51. The license fee was only $2, and the court held that the purpose of the statute was undoubtedly for the protection of the public, and not for revenue.

On the other hand, under a statute requiring a license tax for the business of loaning money, and making it a misdemeanor to do such business without a license, it was held, in Vermont Loan & T. Co. v. Hoffman, 5 Idaho, 376, 37 L. R. A. 509, 95 Am. St. Rep. 186, 49 Pac. 314, that the loan was not void because the license was not obtained. This

Fuller, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants prosecute this appeal from an order granting respondents a new trial in an action based upon an inseparable threshing contract, the performance of which was unlawful, and expressly declared to be a misdemeanor, because in direct violation of § 3145 of the Revised Political Code, enacted as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person to use a steam threshing machine in this state until he shall first enter into a bond with good and sufficient surety, in the sum of $500, payable to the state; said bond to be approved by and filed with the clerk of the circuit court of the county where he resides, in case he is a resident of this state; and if he be a nonresident, with the state auditor, conditioned to pay all damages arising from any fire caused by him in violation of the provisions of this article, and for any unlawful damages done or caused to any telegraph or telephone line by the moving of any traction engine, threshing machine, or other vehicle or thing along or across any public highway." That the foregoing section and other provisions of the same statute were designed for the protection of the general public is plain from the fact that a person owning or operating a steam threshing machine is obliged to thoroughly extinguish the fire before leaving his engine for any purpose, and for all loss occasioned by burning or otherwise injuring property while threshing grain or moving the outfit from place to place, he is expressly required to respond in damages to the owner. The exaction of a bond, payable to the state for the protection of her citizens, before any threshing by the use of steam can be lawfully done, is consonant with sound public policy, and the frequency of disastrous fires resulting from the negligent or unskillful use of these engines suggests the necessity of a statute prohibiting such threshing as that was placed on the ground that loaning money was lawful business, which was neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum; that the prohibition was for the protection of the public revenue only, with no declaration that the prohibited acts should be void; and, therefore, that it was not to be assumed that the legislature intended to make the contract void in addition to the penalty prescribed.

Under an ordinance imposing a penalty for the failure of a broker to procure a license, it was held, in Fairly v. Wappoo Mills, 44 S. C. 227, 29 L. R. A. 215, 22 S. E. 108, that failure to procure the license did not prevent the broker from recovering commissions, because the object of the ordinance was simply to enforce the payment of the license tax. The ordinance declared that every person engaging in the business "should obtain" a license, and be subject, for failure to do so, to a penalty for each and every offense; but the court pointed out that it was not expressly declared unlawful to do the business without a license, and that, if it had done so, the contract would be unlawful and unenforceable.

One of the rules laid down in Benjamin. Sales, Corbin's ed. § 825, Bennett's 1892

ed. § 598, is that it is material, in seeking the legislative intent, to consider whether a single penalty is imposed for doing unauthorized business, or a recurring penalty for each offense; and that, if but one penalty is imposed for carrying on the business, it will not make contracts void; but, if a penalty for each offense is imposed, it will show an attempt to prohibit the contract, and therefore make it void. But it will be seen from the cases herein referred to that such a rule for determining the legislative intent is not consistently recognized; though it may be considered to be a fairly settled rule of the courts to hold that, if they deem the purpose of the statute to be the protection of the public, a contract made in the course of the unauthorized business will be void. Where the purpose is chiefly for revenue, the decisions are not agreed.

In the case of JOHNSON v. BERRY it is entirely clear that the purpose of the statute requiring a bond as security for damages arising from fire or other causes was clearly for the protection of the public; and therefore, according to the general trend of the decisions, business done in violation of the law could not be a basis for a cause of action.

for which appellant seeks to recover by making the same a public offense. In holding that no recovery could be had on a contract, the execution of which is impliedly prohibited by the infliction of a penalty for the use of a threshing separator operated by horse power without boxing the tumbling rod, the Minnesota court quotes with approval from Lord Tenterden as follows: "Where a contract which a plaintiff seeks to enforce is expressly or by implication forbidden by the statute or common law, no court will lend its assistance to give it effect; and there are numerous cases in the books where an action on the contract has failed, because either the consideration for the promise or the act to be done was illegal, as being against the express provisions of law, or contrary to justice, morality, and sound policy." Ingersoll v. Randall, 14 Minn. 400, Gil. 304. In the case of Penn v. Bornman, 102 Ill. 523, the court says: "The general rule is that all contracts made in violation of an express statutory provision are inoperative and void, and no recovery can be had upon them though the defendant is a party to the violation of the law, in the absence of fraud or bad faith on his part upon which to found an estoppel."

For the most cogent reasons, the same doctrine has been recognized and universally applied to similar cases, and from one of such we quote as follows: "Questions upon illegal contracts have arisen very often, both in England and in this country; and no principle is better settled than that no action can be maintained on a contract, the consideration of which is either wicked in itself, or prohibited by law." Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. ed. 468. The following cases are to the same effect: Alexander v. O'Donnell, 12 Kan. 608; Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, 25 Am. Rep. 671; Griffith v. Wells, 3 Denio, 226; Short v. Bullion-Beck & C. Min. Co. 20 Utah, 20, 45 L. R. A. 603, 57 Pac. 720; Miller v. Post, 1 Allen, 434; Allen v. Hawks, 13 Pick. 79; Solomon v. Dreschler, 4 Minn. 278, Gil. 197; Springfield Bank v. Merrick, 14 Mass. 322. Although the evidence before us affords no reasonable ground for the claim that respondents were aware of appellants' failure to file the required bond, and the exact question is therefore neither presented nor decided, the foregoing cases and that of Dillon v. Allen, 46 Iowa, 299, 26 Am. Rep. 145, are authority to the point that full knowledge on respondents' part, together with the acceptance of the benefits of the contract, would not be sufficient to justify its enforcement, even though the statute does not declare the same void, but merely inflicts a penalty for the violation of its terms.

The doctrine of the foregoing cases applied to the facts in this case demonstrates error in reaching the verdict in favor of appellants, and the order of the court below granting a new trial is therefore affirmed.

Haney, J., concurs only in the conclusion that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

SWIFT & COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MATILDA JOHNSON, Admr. of Charles Benson, Deceased.

(138 Fed. 867.)

1. Action for death—abandonment of family.

When the legislature has created a right of action for wrongful death for the benefit of the next of kin of deceased, and has declared that the father, if living, is the next of kin of minor children who leave neither widow nor children, an action for the death of such child must be for the sole benefit of the father, although he has deserted his family, to whose support the deceased was, at the time of death, contributing, and has left the locality of their residence without apparent interest in what becomes of them.

2. Same—charge to jury.

When the recovery for the death of a minor child must, under the statutes, be for the sole benefit of the father, who has aban-

Subject Note.—Recovery by parent for death of child, where parent has abandoned the child.

While there are many cases in which the courts, in applying the general rule that damages for wrongful death are measured by the pecuniary loss resulting to the beneficiaries of the action from the death, hold that the recovery, under the facts shown, must be limited to nominal damages, only a few of these holdings have been based, like that in the SWIFT CASE, on the ground that the parent had abandoned and deserted the infant decedent. The different jurisdictions have not acted in entire harmony in determining what are the pecuniary losses sustained in applying the rule to the state of facts under discussion. The decision in the SWIFT CASE is in harmony with that of Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 104 Fed. 845, a case arising in Nebraska, where the rule is that not even nominal damages can be recovered by the next of kin under a general claim of damages, but that special damages, if they have been sustained, must be alleged and proved in order to justify any recovery.

In the Thompson Case the father had doned his family, it is reversible error to permit the jury to infer that the mother, to whose relief in supporting the family the deceased contributed, might share in the division of the recovery, and to refuse to charge the jury that no part of the recovery could be for her benefit.

3. Child's services—loss of right to.

A father forfeits his right to his son's services by abandoning him and compelling him to assume the burden of his own support when far within his minority, the abandonment extending almost to cessation of communication between them.

4. Loss of child's prospective services.

No reasonable expectation that the continued life of a boy will be of pecuniary benefit to his father, so as to enable the latter to recover substantial damages for the wrongful killing of the child, under statutes limiting the recovery under such circumstances to the pecuniary loss inflicted, can be indulged, where the father had abandoned the child, and for a period of seven years had remained insensible to his parental obligations, although there is some slight evidence that they retained some affection for each other.

5. Same—speculation as to possibility.

Speculation as to the possibility of restoration of the natural relations between a father and his child, whom he had abandoned for a period of seven years, and compelled to assume the burden of his own support, cannot be made the basis of a recovery by the father of substantial damages for the wrongful killing of the child.

6. Federal courts—rule as to damages for death.

A Federal court, in determining the damages which can be assessed under a statute allowing compensatory damages for a wrongful death, will follow the general law applied in the Federal courts, which excludes all consideration of matters which rest in speculation, conjecture, or fancy, although the courts of the state where the statute was passed may permit the damages to be assessed by such methods.

(June 24, 1905.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of her intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Van Devanter, Circuit Judge:

This was an action by an administratrix, on behalf of the next of kin, to recover damages for the death of her intestate. There was substantial evidence tending to show that the death resulted from an injury caused by the negligence of the defendant, which would have given the deceased a right of recovery, had he lived. The injury and death occurred at South St. Paul, Minnesota, March 13, 1903. The deceased was about seventeen years of age, and left surviving him a father, aged thirty-eight or thirty-nine years, a mother, and a younger sister, but no widow or child. In 1896 the father informed the mother that she must go out washing, and that he would not provide for her or the children. He then separated abandoned his wife and the deceased infant more than ten years prior to the death, and gave them no support or protection; and the court held that the father, having emancipated the infant, was no longer entitled to his earnings, and was not entitled to judgment for even nominal damages.

In Cook v. American E. C. & S. Gunpowder Co. 70 N. J. L. 65, 56 Atl. 114, the court did not pass directly on the question as to whether the father, who had abandoned his wife and family, including the decedent, three years prior to the death, and who had entered into a bigamous marriage with another woman, by whom he had a child at the time of the death of the son, was entitled to more than nominal damages, but in holding that the verdict for $2,500 damages in favor of such father was excessive, said, as to the amount of damages: "It is doubtful whether, under circumstances such as are here presented, a verdict for more than nominal damages could be sustained; but this question need not now be determined." The court, in discussing the facts of the case, said: "The deceased was about thirteen years of age, was living with his mother, and was earning 50 cents per day at the time of his death. His circumstances were such as to render it extremely R.A. (N.S.) improbable that he would have been able to earn, between the time of his death and his arrival at full age, anything more than would be barely sufficient for his own support. At the time of his death he was not only deserted, but in effect emancipated, by his father. There was no reasonable ground to anticipate a revocation of that emancipation, or to suppose that, in case of its revocation, the father would profit largely from the son's earnings during minority. As to any expectation that after the son's arrival at full age he would contribute anything voluntarily toward his father's support, such expectation was wholly speculative, in view of the father's abandonment of the boy, and was so contrary to what was reasonable and probable under the circumstances that it could hardly be taken at all into consideration in estimating the damages."

The question has arisen in New York, and there been decided contrary to the above decisions, but not without a dissenting opinion. The question was decided in Pineo v. New York, C. & H. R. R. Co. 34 Hun. 80, where the decedent was a young girl of about fourteen years of age, whose mother was dead. Her father had abandoned his from them, and did not thereafter contribute anything to their support, or have any communication with them, save that on one occasion he inquired of the son if he liked the work which he was doing, and told him to be good, and on another occasion gave him 50 cents. After the separation the children lived with the mother, who, for the next three or four years, supported them and herself from the proceeds of such employment as she could obtain. She then obtained a divorce and married again, the children continuing to live with her as before. From about that time the son had regular employment, and gave all of his earnings to his mother, who used them chiefly in supporting the children. At the time of his death he was earning $45 per month. He was a strong and industrious lad, of fair education for one of his opportunities, and with a strong affection for his mother and sister. The only evidence respecting the son's disposition towards his father was this: The mother testified: "I don't know if he gave him anything. I don't know; but he said, if his father was in need of anything, he should give him a dollar." "He would very seldom speak of him. He always said, if his father was in need of anything, he would give him something." And another witness, intimately acquainted with the family, and who had seen the son frequently, testified: "Q. Did you ever hear him express his feelings towards his father? A. Not until I spoke about how destitute his father was, and that I had got him some things. He said he would always carry money in his pocket, and, if he ever met his father, he would offer him money, if he would take it." When the father separated from the family he was a saloonkeeper at South St. Paul, was greatly addicted to the excessive use of liquor, and when intoxicated was inclined to use harsh and unkind language toward his wife and children. He was improvident and squandered whatever came into his hands. In 1901 he was still in South St. Paul, but doing nothing. In the spring of 1902 he was in destitute circumstances at Hastings, Minnesota, where he obtained employment until November of that year, when he received about $200 in wages, and went away with the purpose to engage in the saloon business elsewhere. What became of him after leaving Hastings is not shown. During his employment at that place he remained sober, and was heard to speak affectionately of his children, but he did nothing towards resuming his parental duties, or towards restoring between himself and his children the natural and usual relations of parent and child. It does not appear that he took any interest in the prosecution of the action by the administratrix, or that he even knew of the death of the son. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $2,500, which defendant seeks to have reversed upon this writ of error.

family some years before the accident, had not supported the daughter, and the family did not know whether he was dead or alive. On the trial it was assumed that the father, who was the next of kin, was living, and a verdict was rendered for $3,500, which the general term refused to set aside. This decision was affirmed by the court of appeals in 99 N. Y. 644, by a memorandum decision, so that that court did not discuss the question involved. The opinion of the general term, in holding that the fact that the father had abandoned his family did not render the verdict excessive, said that the most that could be claimed from the father's conduct was that he had emancipated his child, and that the latter had become entitled to the profits of her labor, but that that did not prevent the father from recovering. The court, in its reasoning, referred to the fact that collateral relatives, having no legal claim whatever to what the deceased might have earned, are entitled, under the statute, to recover, where they are the only next of kin, saying that the only basis on which they could claim to sustain pecuniary loss resulting from the death of the deceased would be that if the deceased had lived and accumulated property, they would have become entitled to her unbequeathed assets 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) on her death. Barker, J., who dissented on the ground that the father was not pecuniarily injured by the death of the child, said: "If we uphold this verdict, we do, in effect, say that the jury are omnipotent in this class of cases, and that there is no rule of law to be observed by them in assessing damages. The statute, in terms, restricts the damages to a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injury sustained by the person for whose benefit the action is brought."

The right of a father to recover for the death of a child whom he had abandoned and left with its grandparents, who supported and maintained it without his assistance, was denied in Southern R. Co. v. Flemister, 120 Ga. 524, 48 S. E. 160. This decision was based on the ground that, under the Civil Code of Georgia, the father's right to the services and proceeds of the labor of a child is lost by his voluntary contract releasing the right to a third person, or by his failure to provide necessities for the child, or by his abandonment of it; the court saying that the father necessarily lost the right to sue for and recover the value of such services.

Argued before Sanborn, Van Devanter, and Hook, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Frank B. Kellogg, C. A. Severance, and Robert E. Olds, for plaintiff in error:

Recovery could be had only for the benefit of the next of kin.

Rev. Stat. § 5913.

Such statutes will be strictly construed; for—

a. They are in derogation of the common law.

Higgins v. Butcher, Yelv. 89; Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 493; Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. 1 Cush. 475, 48 Am. Dec. 616; Mobile L. Ins. Co. v. Brame, 95 U. S. 756, 24 L. ed. 582; Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, §§ 1-18; Nash v. Tousley, 28 Minn. 5, 8 N. W. 875; Wilson v. Bumstead, 12 Neb. 1, 10 N. W. 411; Lexington v. Lewis, 10 Bush, 677; Board of Internal Improvement v. Searce, 2 Duv. 576; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yocum, 34 Ark. 497; Miller v. Southwestern R. Co. 55 Ga. 144.

b. Strictly speaking, the action provided is not a survival of the action which deceased would have had if he lived; it is rather a new action, brought, not for the benefit of the estate, but solely for the benefit of the beneficiaries named in the statute.

Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 137, 44 L. R. A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771; Blake v. Midland R. Co. 10 Eng. L. & Eq. 443; Robinson v. Canadian P. R. Co. [1892] A. C. 481; Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hooper, 35 C. C. A. 24, 92 Fed. 820.

In this case, the father of the deceased is to be regarded as his next of kin.

The words "next of kin," occurring in the statute, are properly construed as having reference to the next of kin under the statute of distributions.

Schwarz v. Judd, 28 Minn. 371, 10 N. W. 208; Robel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 35 Minn. 84, 27 N. W. 305; Barnum v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 Minn. 461, 16 N. W. 364; Sykora v. J. I. The damages recoverable are to be regarded as wholly compensatory for the father's pecuniary loss, and as exclusive of all punitive or exemplary elements, as well as all solace for loss of society, or compensation for his injured feelings, or for the suffering of the deceased.

Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 44 Minn. 5, 46 N. W. 79; Foot v. Great Northern R. Co. 81 Minn. 493, 52 L. R. A. 354, 83 Am. St. Rep. 395, 84 N. W. 342; Blake v. Midland R. Co. 18 Q. B. 93.

The father in this case had no pecuniary interest in the continued existence of deceased.

He had relinquished and abandoned all right to control or avail himself of the benefit of the earnings or services of the deceased.

No damages can in any event be awarded which are based upon loss of services for any period beyond that of minority of deceased.

If any recovery is to be had based upon other grounds than loss of services up to the time of majority, it can be predicated only upon a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit after majority; and then only after averment and proof of special damage; no damage can be presumed from the mere fact of kinship, unsupported by other evidence.

Evidence to the effect that the father might be necessitous and require assistance in the future cannot be considered in this connection.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

The conduct of the father was such as not only to rebut any possible presumption of pecuniary interest arising from the fact of his relationship to the deceased, but also such as to preclude, on the plainest principles of justice, any recovery whatever for his benefit.

Messrs. Alfred H. Veeder and Henry Veeder also for plaintiff in error.

Mr. S. C. Olmstead, for defendant in error:

The statute is to be construed as a remedial one, and must have a liberal interpretation to effectuate the evident purpose of its enactment.

The statute assumes that the widow and next of kin have a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit, as of right or otherwise, and to a greater or less extent, from the continuance of life, which they lose by the act or omission causing the death, and this expectation is taken as the basis of the damages.

Van Devanter, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal questions presented upon this record are: (1) For whose benefit was the action maintainable? (2) What was the proper measure of recovery?

By the common law no action lies for an injury resulting in death, but the state of Minnesota, like most or all of the other states, has enacted a statute modeled after Lord Campbell's act in England, which modifies the common-law rule, and authorizes the maintenance of such an action. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5913. Being entirely statutory, the action can be maintained only for the benefit of the persons specified in the statute, and then only for the recovery of such damages as are contemplated by it. Nash v. Tousley, 28 Minn. 5, 8 N. W. 875; Scheffler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 125, 19 N. W. 566; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham, 3 C. C. A. 129, 10 U. S. App. 339, 52 Fed. 371; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McGill, 21 L. R. A. 818, 6 C. C. A. 521, 12 U. S. App. 651, 57 Fed. 699; Sanders v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 49 C. C. A. 565, 111 Fed. 708. Repeated and uniform decisions of the highest court of the state have given to the statute a settled meaning and effect, which may be summarized as follows: The right of action which the statute creates is for the exclusive benefit of (a) those who have demands for the support of the deceased during the time, if any, intervening between his injury and his death; (b) those who have demands for his funeral expenses; and (c) the widow and next of kin. The damages recoverable for the benefit of the widow and next of kin are confined to compensation for their strictly pecuniary loss, excluding all consideration of punitive elements, loss of society, wounded feelings of the survivors, and suffering of the deceased; and the extent of the loss is to be determined solely with reference to the pecuniary benefit reasonably expected by the widow and next of kin, as of legal right or otherwise, from the continued life of the deceased. Shaber v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 28 Minn. 103, 107, 9 N. W. 575; Scheffler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 518, 21 N. W. 711; Robel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 35 Minn. 84, 89, 27 N. W. 305; Bolinger v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 36 Minn. 418, 1 Am. St. Rep. 680, 31 N. W. 856; Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 44 Minn. 5, 9, 46 N. W. 79; Gunderson v. Northwestern Elevator Co. 47 Minn. 161, 164, 49 N. W. 694; State ex rel. Krey v. Probate Court, 51 Minn. 241, 53 N. W. 463; Sykora v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 59 Minn. 130, 60 N. W. 1008; Sieber v. Great Northern R. Co. 76 Minn. 269, 275, 79 N. W. 95; Foot v. Great Northern R. Co. 81 Minn. 493, 52 L. R. A. 354, 83 Am. St. Rep. 395, 84 N. W. 342. As a matter of pleading, it is also settled by the decisions of the state court that a complaint does not show a right of recovery in respect of a widow or next of kin unless it alleges (stating names and how related) that the deceased left a widow or next of kin, who are entitled to compensation, and does not show a right of recovery in respect of demands for the support of the deceased or for his funeral expenses unless it alleges that there are such demands. Schwarz v. Judd, 28 Minn. 371, 10 N. W. 208; Sykora v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 59 Minn. 130, 60 N. W. 1008; Barnum v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 Minn. 461, 16 N. W. 364.

The deceased left no widow or child, but was survived by a father, mother, and younger sister. In these circumstances, the statutes of the state make the father the sole next of kin. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4477, cl. 6, § 4471, cl. 3. The complaint contains no allegation of the existence of any demand for the support of the deceased between his injury and his death, or for his funeral expenses, and no evidence upon that subject was offered at the trial. The action was maintainable, therefore, exclusively for the benefit of the father, and without any regard to the loss sustained by the mother or sister, because, as respects their loss, no right of recovery exists by the common law or by the statute.

It is said in the brief of counsel for the administratrix: "It was not questioned upon the trial, and is not questioned now, that a surviving father is the next of kin to his child, under the statutes of the state of Minnesota, and that the damages recoverable are to be regarded as wholly compensatory for the father's pecuniary loss."

But this statement is not fairly sustained by the record. The complaint alleges: "That at the time of his death said Charles Benson was an infant of the age of sixteen years on the 6th day of April, 1902. That he was unmarried, and left surviving him his father, August Benson, and his mother, Matilda Johnson. That his said father and mother, and each of them, have been damaged by and through the death of said Charles Benson in the sum of five thousand dollars."

And among the things occurring at the trial were these:

The plaintiff, over the defendant's objection, was permitted to introduce evidence of the mother's expectation of life. The defendant sought to show what had become of the father after his separation from the family, and in ruling upon the plaintiff's objection thereto, the court observed: "Generally the 'next of kin' means nearest of blood; and there certainly could be no person nearer to the plaintiff than his mother; and if the authority cited by the judge in the case (Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 104 Fed. 845) which I refer to is correct—that the father has ceased to have any right to the services of the son while the latter remains a minor, but that the mother, from the fact that she continues to perform her parental duties, is entitled to his services—it seems to me as though that ought to place her in the condition or position with reference to the child which the father has given up and surrendered. But it is not the duty of this court to distribute, or to indicate what should be the proper distribution of, the damages, if any are recoverable in a case of this kind. That is a matter for the court to which the administratrix is answerable. A verdict covering an amount which any beneficiaries may be entitled to recover under the statute is for a gross sum."

In that connection, counsel for the defendant inquired: "Do I understand your honor to rule upon this question whether the father is the next of kin in this case?" and the court responded: "No; I do not rule upon that. I think it is immaterial."

At the conclusion of the evidence, and before the instructions to the jury were given, these statements were made:

The Court: In this state, especially in view of the language in this very act,—that the recovery shall be distributed the same as the personal property of the deceased would be distributed under the laws of the state.—I think, under that statute, the father, if living, would be the next of kin.

Mr. Olmstead (for plaintiff): I think I will have to concede that, whatever money may be recovered in this action, the title to it would stand in the father.

The Court: I think, as far as the distribution of the money is concerned, that is a matter that the court which has charge of the administration can attend to.

Thus, by the allegations of the complaint, and by the introduction of evidence of the mother's expectation of life, the plaintiff asserted a right to have the recovery include compensation for the mother's loss, or at least to have the amount of the recovery computed and determined with some regard to her loss; and in the course of the trial this contention received the approval of the court to a degree which was well calculated to make a strong impression upon the minds of the jurors, to cause them to give attention to the testimony bearing upon the mother's loss, to arouse their sympathies in her behalf (she being the administratrix and a principal witness), and to produce an award of damages in an amount which would enable her to obtain some substantial benefit therefrom through a distribution which it was indicated would be made by the state court exercising probate jurisdiction. The jurors could hardly have failed to understand that "distribution" meant division; and yet there could be no distribution of the recovery, in the sense of a division, because there was but a single beneficiary (the father), and the recovery, whatever the amount, would be for his exclusive benefit, as compensation for his pecuniary loss, and none other. The concession made by counsel for the plaintiff was not calculated to correct the erroneous impression theretofore conveyed to the jurors, because, when considered with the observation made by the court at the time, the concession was to the effect that the title—counsel immediately spoke of it as "the legal title"—to the money recovered would be in the father, but that the money would still be subject to distribution; in other words, the jurors were still left to infer that there would be a disposition or division of the money, in which the mother would or might be a participant and beneficiary.

Conceiving that the admission of evidence of the mother's expectation of life and the recognition which had been given to her loss and claim to compensation would operate prejudicially to it, the defendant requested the court to affirmatively charge the jury that no damages could be given for any loss sustained by the mother, and that no part of the recovery would be for her benefit. The request was refused, and error is assigned upon that ruling. The request should have been granted. The admission of evidence of the mother's expectation of life was error, and the recognition which was given to her loss and claim to compensation plainly tended to operate prejudicially to the defendant. When, in the course of a jury trial, inadmissible evidence is admitted, or erroneous rulings are made, or incorrect opinions are expressed by the court, which are calculated to attract the attention of the jury to matters outside of the issues, or to otherwise operate prejudicially to either party, it is clearly the right of that party to have the jury plainly instructed in the final charge in a manner which will distinctly withdraw the objectionable evidence from their consideration, remove from their minds any erroneous impression arising from the mistaken rulings or opinions, and prevent any resultant prejudice. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Farr, 6 C. C. A. 211, 216, 15 U. S. App. 520, 56 Fed. 994, 1000; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 460, 26 L. ed. 141, 145; Waldron v. Waldron, 156 U. S. 361, 383, 39 L. ed. 453, 459, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; Washington Gaslight Co. v. Lansden, 172 U. S. 534, 555, 43 L. ed. 543, 551, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 296; Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 567, 45 L. ed. 663, 671, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 474. It is said that the error was corrected, the jury properly enlightened, and prejudice prevented, by the court's final charge, in which the jury were told that the statute gave a right of action to the administratrix for the benefit of the next of kin, that the amount recoverable was the pecuniary loss to the next of kin, and that the next of kin was the father. Probably this instruction would have been sufficient if the matter had not been previously put before the jury in a manner calculated to mislead them, but the circumstances required something better designed to protect the previous error or mistake,—something which the jury would plainly recognize as intended to entirely withdraw from their consideration the mother's loss, and all expectation that she would or might participate in the recovery through its distribution by another court.

Error is also assigned upon the court's refusal to give an instruction requested by the defendant limiting the recovery to nominal damages. The correctness of the ruling depends upon two questions: (1) Did the evidence conclusively establish that the father had lost his legal right to the services and earnings of the son during his minority? (2) Apart from this legal right, was there any substantial evidence of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit to the father from the continuance of the life of the son?

Generally, the father, as head of the family, is entitled to the services of his minor children, or to their earnings, if, by his permission, they are employed by others. He is also under obligation to support his children during their minority. The right and obligation are correlative; and where the father neglects or refuses to support his child, denies him a home, or abandons him, so that he is obliged to support himself, the law implies an emancipation, and recalls the father's right to the child's services and earnings. Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272, 8 Am. Dec. 101; Wodell v. Coggeshall, 2 Met. 89, 35 Am. Dec. 391; McCarthy v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 148 Mass. 550, 2 L. R. A. 608, 20 N. E. 182; Farrell v. Farrell, 3 Houst. (Del.) 633; McGarr v. National & P. Worsted Mills, 24 R. I. 447, 60 L. R. A. 122, 98 Am. St. Rep. 749, 53 Atl. 320; Nugent v. Powell, 4 Wyo. 173, 194, 20 L. R. A. 199, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17, 33 Pac. 23; Winslow v. State, 92 Ala. 78, 9 So. 728; Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Smith, 93 Ga. 742, 21 S. E. 157; Clark v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Wash. 139, 59 L. R. A. 508, 69 Pac. 639; Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 104 Fed. 845.

Without conflict, the evidence established these facts: The father had wilfully abandoned his family when the son was nine years of age, and the daughter six. He had wrongfully cast the burden of supporting the children upon the mother, whom he left in necessitous circumstances. He had thus obliged the son, when far within his minority, to obtain employment, and assist in the support of himself and sister. He had wholly neglected his paternal obligation for a period of seven years preceding the son's death. His neglect had been the same whether he was employed or unemployed, and whether he was free from the influence of intoxicants or under their influence; and his neglect had been intensified by an almost absolute cessation of communication with his children. No other conclusion was permissible under the evidence than that there had been an emancipation of the son, and that the father had forfeited and lost the right which otherwise he would have had to the son's services and earnings during his minority.

As the extent of the loss which is intended to be compensated under the statute is not to be determined solely by the legal rights of the beneficiary, but with reference to the pecuniary benefit which he may have reasonably expected, as of legal right or otherwise, it is yet to be considered whether or not there was any substantial evidence of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit to the father, otherwise than as of legal right. The law, in confining the compensation to the pecuniary loss, does not run along the lines of the imaginary and the possible, but rather along the lines of the actual and the probable; and therefore the reasonable expectation must be made to appear by the evidence. Conjecture, speculation, and fancy cannot supply the absence of evidence, or avoid the effect of the evidence which is presented. The conditions surrounding the beneficiary and the deceased at the time of the death, their past relations, and the law of human experience, are the sole criteria of the expectation and of its reasonableness. Other conditions or changed relations, not reasonably probable, cannot be conjectured and assumed merely because of the possibility of their accomplishment and their conformity to higher ideals. As was said by Mr. Justice Brewer, when a member of the supreme court of Kansas: "The enigma of the future of a life is not to be solved by the mere matter of faith and hope, or even by the natural possibilities of accomplishment, but mainly and chiefly by the experiences of the past, and what the life has already been." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brown, 26 Kan. 443, 460.

The natural influence or prompting of kinship is always an important factor in cases like this, and is to be carefully considered, but it is not controlling. A father can have no reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continued life of a son who, although possessing a strong filial love, is without property and is incapacitated from labor of all kinds, or who, although possessed of property or earning capacity, has unmistakably shown that he is insensible to the natural influence or prompting of kinship. So, also, a father who wilfully abandons a minor son, and for several years proves insensible to every legal, moral, and natural obligation to him, can have no reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from his continued life while that situation continues. The case before us is of this type. The evidence is without conflict, and has been already commented upon. The father not only wilfully abandoned his son, but the circumstances of the abandonment and of its continuance for seven years unmistakably show that he was insensible to the influence and prompting of kinship; that he was an unnatural father. More than that, the mother and sister, in consequence of their abandonment by the father, had naturally and deservedly become objects of the son's special consideration; and it was reasonably probable that he would be disposed to employ his surplus means, if any, in administering to their wants and comfort. He was without property, his opportunities had been restricted, and his earning capacity did not reasonably promise to be large. There was also the possibility, if not probability, that he would marry and have a family of his own, for whose support he would be obligated both legally and morally. These matters precluded a reasonable expectation that his continued life would be of pecuniary benefit to the father.

As is shown in the statement preceding this opinion, there was some evidence that the father and son retained some affection each for the other; and it is urged that, had the son lived, the natural relations of father and son might have been restored. A restoration was possible, but this evidence was too slight to overcome the effect of the seven years of wilful abandonment, neglect, and separation. It afforded a basis for conjecture, but not for belief. Notwithstanding these transient manifestations of affection, there was no resumption of communication between the father and the son. The father remained utterly indifferent to his legal, moral, and natural obligations, and the son continued to turn all of his earnings over to his mother. Contrasted with the character and duration of the abandonment, neglect, and separation, the evidence of continued affection was at best only a scintilla, and was not sufficient to make its effect a question for the jury. In the Federal courts, when the evidence upon a question of fact is so clearly preponderant or of such a conclusive character that the court would be bound, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, to set aside a finding in opposition to it, it is the duty of the court to withdraw the question from the jury, and direct their finding; and thus, before the question of fact is submitted to the jury, a preliminary question of law always arises for the decision of the court, and that question is not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any substantial evidence, the consideration of which is properly within the province of the jury. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Belliwith, 28 C. C. A. 358, 55 U. S. App. 113, 83 Fed. 437; Patillo v. Allen-West Commission Co. 65 C. C. A. 508, 131 Fed. 680; Schuykill & D. Improv. & R. Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442, 448, 20 L. ed. 867, 872; Marion County v. Clark, 94 U. S. 278, 24 L. ed. 59; Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 27 L. ed. 1003, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 322; Southern P. Co. v. Pool, 160 U. S. 438, 40 L. ed. 485, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 338; Coughnan v. Bigelow, 164 U. S. 301, 307, 41 L. ed. 442, 446, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 117; Patton v. Texas & P. R. Co. 179 U. S. 658, 45 L. ed. 361, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275.

Decisions of the supreme court of Minnesota are referred to as indicating that, notwithstanding the conditions surrounding the father and son at the time of the latter's death, and their past relations, it was permissible for the jury to speculate upon the restoration of the natural relations of father and son, and, because of its possibility, to award substantial damages for the father's benefit. There are expressions in some of the decisions of the state court which, taken by themselves, give slight color to the contention; but certainly the better, if not the only permissible, view of these expressions is that they refer, perhaps not happily, to the difficulty of getting at the amount of the damages with precision and accuracy, and are not at all intended to declare that the right to damages or their amount may be rested upon so uncertain a basis as mere speculation upon possible—not reasonably probable—occurrences in the future. The nature of the question justifies a statement of what has been said by the state court respecting it. In Scheffler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 520, 21 N. W. 711, it is said: "Any estimate of the pecuniary benefit which will be derived by the next of kin from the continuance in life of a child who dies at the age of eighteen months must be little, if any, better than mere guess work; yet the statute appears to authorize an action even in such a case."

In Robel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 35 Minn. 89, 27 N. W. 305, it is said: "Obviously and necessarily the amount of such damages must, in any case, be, to a great extent, conjectural, and much must be left to the judgment of the jury."

But it is to be observed that it is also said in that case: "But the statute contemplates an assessment of damages, and not a merely arbitrary award. Such assessment must be based upon the reasonable expectation of benefit to the surviving next of kin from the life of the deceased. Where such beneficiaries were so related to him that they would not have been legally entitled to support, service, or contribution from him, it may be accepted as the law that no substantial recovery can be had without proof of such facts and circumstances as render it probable that actual and substantial benefit would have accrued to them from his continued life. . . . Although the evidence in this case was exceedingly meager, yet, in view of the facts that the father of Robel would have been entitled to the fruits of his labor for a period of nine months subsequent to the time of his death, and that Robel was actually engaged in an active employment, presumably yielding compensation, we think that a recovery might have been had of more than a merely nominal amount."

It is said in Gunderson v. Northwestern Elevator Co. 47 Minn. 165, 49 N. W. 694, that "the question of damages must, in such cases, be committed largely to the sound practical sense and fair judgment of the jury;" and that "in the case of a minor child the recovery is not limited to the probable value of the services or earnings during his minority, but may also include the reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit beyond that period."

But it is to be observed that it is also said in that case: "It must, however, be determined judicially and upon the evidence, and the damages assessed must be reasonably appropriate to the case made by it, and are not left to the uncontrolled discretion of the jury."

And in Sieber v. Great Northern R. Co. 76 Minn. 275, 79 N. W. 95, it is said: "But at best the amount of damages must be largely a matter of conjecture; but in the same connection it is also said: "It is undoubtedly true that the reasonable character of the expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continued life of the deceased and of the probable amount of that benefit must appear from the facts in proof."

The true meaning of these decisions is indicated in Bolinger v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 36 Minn. 421, 1 Am. St. Rep. 680, 31 N. W. 856, where it is said: "The determination of the amount of damages, however, must be a judicial one, and is not left to the uncontrolled discretion of the jury;" and in Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 44 Minn. 10, 46 N. W. 79, where it is said: "But even in those cases the determination of the amount of damages is by no means left to the uncontrolled discretion of the jury. Their estimate must be based on facts in evidence." And also: "True, it is possible that he [deceased] might have become more thrifty in future, but this was not at all probable, in view of his age and past history. He might have met with some extraordinary streak of good luck, such as discovering a valuable mine or drawing a large prize in a lottery, but these contingencies are altogether too speculative to form any legitimate basis for an estimate of damages."

This statement of what has been said by the supreme court of the state shows the rule of that court to be that the right to substantial damages and their amount must be determined judicially, not arbitrarily, and must be determined upon the evidence, and not upon mere speculation, conjecture, or fancy. But if the decisions of that court were properly susceptible of the interpretation suggested, but not acceded to, they would not, in that respect, be obligatory upon this court. The state court has uniformly held that the statute authorizes the recovery of compensatory damages only, excluding all punitive elements, and this court is therefore controlled by the rule of general law applied by the Federal courts, which, in respect of the right to and the assessment of purely compensatory damages, excludes all consideration of matters which rest in speculation, conjecture, or fancy. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Elliott, 149 U. S. 266, 37 L. ed. 728, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837; Boston & A. R. Co. v. O'Reilly, 158 U. S. 334, 336, 39 L. ed. 1006, 1007, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 830; Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Hartman, 49 C. C. A. 244, 111 Fed. 96; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. De Clow, 61 C. C. A. 34, 124 Fed. 142.

Because the evidence conclusively established that the father had lost his legal right to the services and earnings of the son during his minority, and because, apart from this legal right, there was no substantial evidence of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit to the father from a continuance of the life of the son, the instruction limiting the recovery to nominal damages should have been given. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weber, 33 Kan. 543, 551, 52 Am. Rep. 543, 6 Pac. 877; Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Limb, 47 Kan. 469, 471, 28 Pac. 181.

By the common law an adult child is under no legal obligation to support either parent; but, by statute, the state of Minnesota imposes an obligation upon children, if of sufficient ability, to support dependent parents residing in that state. Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 1951, 1952. No reference to this statute, or claim under it, seems to have been made or considered in the court below, and none has been made in this court: nor has it been claimed that the father was a resident of Minnesota at the time of the son's death. Therefore the effect of the statute in a case to which it would be applicable has not been considered.

The judgment is reversed, with a direction to grant a new trial.

Hook, Circuit Judge, specially concurring:

I concur in the reversal of the judgment in this case upon the ground that, being influenced by the evidence and the ruling of the court, the jury probably included in their award of damages the pecuniary loss of others than the next of kin, and that it was not made sufficiently clear to them that they should not do so.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

J. WESLEY MYERS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

KNICKERBOCKER TRUST COMPANY.

(139 Fed. 111.)

Stockholders' liability—impairment of contract.

An unconstitutional impairment of contract is effected by the change of a law permitting individual creditors of a corporation to enforce their claims against individual stockholders to double the par value of their stock, so as to provide one suit in equity in behalf of all creditors, to which all stockholders may become parties, and abate suits pending under the former law.

(June 19, 1905.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce defendant's liability as a holder of stock in an insolvent corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—The holding of the court in MYERS v. KNICKERBOCKER TRUST CO. is, as stated therein, directly contrary to the previous decision of the highest court of Maryland in Miners' & M. Bank v. Snyder, 100 Md. 57, 68 L. R. A. 312, 59 Atl. 707, which, in considering the constitutionality of the same statute, held that no such change of remedy was made thereby as to impair the obligations of the contract as to a creditor who, before its passage, had commenced an action against a stockholder to enforce his statutory double liability for his own benefit.

Retroactive statutes changing the mode of enforcing stockholders' liabilities have been sustained in several cases where the change was much less pronounced than that made by the Maryland statute. Thus, the substitution of a proceeding by trustees in behalf of all creditors in equal ratio after the corporate assets have been exhausted, in place of previously existing remedies by an action at law by any creditor against any stockholder after the dissolution of the corporation, or by a bill in equity against all the stockholders to recover from each their proportionate share of the amount necessary to discharge the debt, was sustained in Story v. Furman, 25 N. Y. 214; Herkimer County Bank v. Furman, 17 Barb. 116; and Walker v. Crain, 17 Barb. 119. But, prior to such change, a court of equity could restrain any single creditor from prosecuting an action at law, and require the fund to be distributed ratably among the creditors in equity, so that no single creditor would be allowed to acquire priority of, or exclusive payment of, his claim. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Argued before Acheson, Dallas, and Gray, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. C. E. Ehrehart and J. H. McNeal, for plaintiff in error:

There can be no such thing as a vested right in a remedy.

S. 548, 45 L. ed. 994, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703; Cooley, Const. Lim. 442; Tennessee v. Sneed, 96 U. S. 69, 24 L. ed. 610; Fourth Nat. Bank v. Francklyn, 120 U. S. 747, 30 L. ed. 825, 7 Sup. Ct. Crowninshield*, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529.

A statute transferring the right of action to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders from the creditors to trustees is constitutional.

And the substitution of an action by the receiver of an insolvent bank in place of an action by any creditor, unless such receiver refused, on request, to bring the action, was sustained in Persons v. Gardner, 42 App. Div. 490, 56 N. Y. Supp. 822, 59 N. Y. Supp. 463, Affirming 26 Misc. 663, 56 N. Y. Supp. 822. In this case, also, the action by the creditor, under the previous law, was in behalf of himself and all other creditors.

Nor does the substitution of a proceeding, by an assessment, directly upon the stockholders of an insolvent bank by its receivers, under the approval of the court, on due notice to the parties, to be made ratably on all stockholders liable therefor, of an amount sufficient to make up the probable deficiency, in place of the previous remedy by bill in equity by one or more bill holders in behalf of himself and all other bill holders, impair the obligation of the contract as to stockholders of existing banks. Com. v. Cochituate Bank, 3 Allen, 42.

Perhaps the case most directly opposed to MYERS v. KNICKERBOCKER TRUST CO. is that of Hill v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 134 U. S. 515, 33 L. ed. 994, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 589, Affirming 86 Mo. 466, which affirmed 12 Mo. App. 148, in which the conditions were almost the exact opposite. Here a proceeding by notice and motion, in the action in which judgment was rendered against the corporation, for the amount of unpaid subscriptions of any stockholder, was substituted in place of a suit in equity against the stockholder, which was claimed by a stockholder to impair the obligation of his contract by depriving him of the right to

The act of 1904 is clearly constitutional and valid.

The interpretation given the statute by the courts of the same state in which the statute was passed should be accepted as the proper interpretation of the same.

Mr. W. Calvin Chesnut, for defendant in error:

If the highest courts of the state creating the corporation have decided that the liability imposed upon the stockholders is contractual in its nature, and may be enforced in a suit at law by a single creditor against a single stockholder, such liability may be enforced in the Federal courts sitting outside of the state creating the corporation.

obtain contribution from other stockholders, which he had under the law previously existing. The court, however, held that his liability to pay the amount of notes which he had given for such unpaid subscriptions had no such connection with the liability of other stockholders as to exempt him from an action at law for the amount which he had agreed to pay. In the court below, 12 Mo. App. 148, the court said that the change by which the creditor was given the direct and inexpensive remedy by motion, placing upon the stockholders the labor, delay, and expense of securing to themselves the equalization of their burdens as among themselves, instead of placing it on the moving creditor, who would not be benefited thereby, was not within the constitutional prohibition.

On the other hand, a retroactive statute, which, however, made a change much more pronounced than that made by the Maryland statute, has been held to impair the obligation of the contract in Woodworth v. Bowles, 61 Kan. 569, 60 Pac. 331. Here, before the law was changed, as in the case of the Maryland statute, individual creditors of a corporation were permitted to enforce their claims for their own benefit, against individual stockholders. The statute provided for an action by the receivers of insolvent banks to enforce the liability of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The retrospective feature of the act of 1904 is in conflict with article 1, § 10 of the United States Constitution, in that it impairs the obligation of the contract between the creditors of the corporation and the stockholders.

The liability of the stockholder to the creditor is contractual, and is not penal.

Norris v. Wrenschall, 34 Md. 492; Colton v. Mayer, 90 Md. 711, 47 L. R. A. 617, 78 Am. St. Rep. 456, 45 Atl. 874; 3 Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 809, p. 2522.

The liability of the stockholders to the creditors is a primary obligation; that is, it is not necessary for the creditor to exhaust his rights against the corporation before suing the stockholder.

Hager v. Cleveland, 36 Md. 476; Norris v. Wrenschall, 34 Md. 492; Fiery v. Emmert, 36 Md. 464; Garling v. Baechtel, 41 Md. 305; Colton v. Mayer, 90 Md. 711, 47 L. R. A. 617, 78 Am. St. Rep. 456, 45 Atl. 874.

An individual creditor may sue an individual stockholder at law.

Norris v. Johnson, 34 Md. 485; Garling v. Baechtel, 41 Md. 305; Cahill v. Original Big Gun Beneficial & Pleasure Assn. 94 Md. 353, 89 Am. St. Rep. 434, 50 Atl. 1044; Hammond v. Straus, 53 Md. 11.

stockholders for equal distribution among its creditors, and suspended all right to maintain such action for one year after the closing of the bank.

And another statute applicable to corporations generally, requiring the receiver immediately to institute proceedings against all stockholders for the entire amount of their statutory liability for the benefit of all creditors, and providing for the distribution among the stockholders of any amount remaining after paying all claims against the corporation, together with the costs and expenses of the receivership, was held, in Evans v. Nellis, 101 Fed. 920, to impair the obligation of the contract, not only as to the creditor in taking away his immediate right to collect the debt of any particular stockholder for his own exclusive use, and diverting part or all of the amount collected to paying the costs, expenses, and commissions of the receiver and the claims of other creditors, but also as to the stockholder, by requiring payment of the entire amount of his liability regardless of whether or not it was needed to pay debts, and taking away the previously existing right to interpose any defense available against the creditor bringing suit against him.

The same statute was also held to be invalid, for the same reason, in Webster v. Bowers, 104 Fed. 627.

The stockholders' liability is not a fund for the pro rata benefit of all creditors, but the stockholders are liable to only those creditors to whom debts were contracted by the corporation while they were stockholders.

Weber v. Fickey, 47 Md. 196; Colton v. Mayer, 90 Md. 711, 47 L. R. A. 617, 78 Am. St. Rep. 456, 45 Atl. 874.

A law which undertakes entirely to repeal a liability of this character impairs the obligation of the contract, and is unconstitutional.

Gray, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, a corporation of the state of New York (hereinafter called the plaintiff) brought suit against the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant) upon his statutory liability as a holder of 200 shares of the capital stock of the City Trust & Banking Company, an insolvent corporation of the state of Maryland, of which the plaintiff was a creditor to the extent of $65,000.

The suit, which was an action at law, was instituted on March 21, 1904, in the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and came on to be tried on June 13, 1904. The alleged liability was based upon an act of the general assembly of Maryland, of 1892, chap. 109, § 851, p. 156, of which enacts that "each stockholder shall be liable to the depositors and creditors of any such corporation for double the amount of stock, at the par value, held by such stockholder in such corporation." The charter of the said City Trust & Banking Company, by an express provision thereof, was made subject to this provision of the statute. It is a proposition of general law, and not here disputed, that, to quote the language of the learned judge of the court below, "the liability so imposed is absolute, direct, and several, and any stockholder may be pursued by action at the instance of a creditor, and judgment recovered to the full extent fixed by the statute, so far as it is necessary to satisfy his claim, provided the stockholder has not already paid other corporate debts, for which, so far as he has, he is entitled to credit pro tanto." [133 Fed. 764.] Nor is it denied that this is the law of Maryland, as evidenced by numerous decisions of its court of last resort. The relation between a creditor of a corporation and a stockholder therein who has become such subject to the statutory liability thus imposed is a contractual one, and the obligation arising therefrom, may be enforced by any appropriate remedy at law or in equity. The right of action is transitory, and may be pursued in a court of competent jurisdiction in any state where such stockholder may be found.

Such being the state of the law when suit in the present case was instituted, the general assembly of the state of Maryland, by the act of March 25, 1904, p. 179, chap. 101, repealed § 851 of the act of 1892, as above quoted, and re-enacted the same so as to read as follows:

"851. The stockholders of every such corporation shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another for all contracts, debts, and engagements of every such corporation to the extent of the amount of their stock therein at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such stock. Persons having stock entered on the books of the corporation in their names as executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, or pledgee, shall not be personally subject to any liability on such stockholders, but the persons pledging the stock and the estate and funds in the hands of such executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, shall be subject to the liability imposed upon the holders of said shares. And the liability of such stockholders shall be an asset of the corporation for the benefit ratably of all the depositors and creditors of any such corporation, if necessary, to pay the debts of such corporation, and shall be enforceable only by appropriate proceedings by a receiver, assignee, or trustee of such corporation, acting under the orders of a court of competent jurisdiction; provided that this act shall not affect the rights or remedies of any creditor or depositor under the existing laws of this state against the stockholders of any such corporation, who were liable to any such creditor or depositor at the date of the passage of this act."

It will be observed that this act, by its express terms, was not retrospective, by reason of the proviso at the close of this section, 851 as re-enacted. Eighteen days thereafter, however, to wit, April 12, 1904, an act of the said general assembly was approved (being chap. 337, p. 597, of the Acts of 1904), by which it was provided that "the exclusive remedy for the enforcement against stockholders of all rights existing under the Code of Public General Laws, article 23, § 851, as said section stood before the repeal thereof by the act of March 25th, 1904," and the re-enactment of the same, with amendments, and which rights "were declared by said act not to be affected by the terms thereof, shall be, as against stockholders residing in the state of Maryland, by bill in equity in the nature of a creditors' bill, filed against such stockholders by one or more creditors, on behalf of themselves and all other creditors of the corporation who may come in and make themselves parties thereto, in a court having jurisdiction within the limits of the county or the city of Baltimore in which, as the case may be, the principal office of the corporation is situated at the time of the filing of the bill, or in case any such corporation has, by reason of having been placed in the hands of a receiver, or from any other cause, ceased to have any principal office at the time of the filing of the bill, then the bill shall be filed in a court having jurisdiction within the limits of the county or the city of Baltimore, in which, as the case may be, the said corporation had its last and principal place of business; and to any such bill, stockholders residing beyond the limits of the state of Maryland may become parties defendant, and, upon so becoming parties, shall not be proceeded against in any other state or territory or in the District of Columbia in respect to any liability imposed by the said § 851, as said section stood before the repeal thereof, and which existed at the time of the passage of the act of 1904, hereinbefore referred to. This section shall become operative as of January 1st, 1903, and shall cause the abatement of all actions at law which shall have been brought against said stockholders since that date to enforce any liability created by § 851, as said section stood before the repeal thereof, and which existed at the time of the passage of the act of 1904, hereinbefore referred to: provided, however, that as to any plaintiff or plaintiffs in any of said abated suits who shall, within sixty days from the passage of this act, become a party or parties to a bill in equity of the character mentioned in this section, then, as regards the operation of the statute of limitations upon the claims so sued on, the time elapsed between the institution of said abated suits and the time of such plaintiff or plaintiffs becoming a party or parties to said bill in equity shall be excluded in ascertaining the period within which suits are required to be brought by the said statute of limitations. The costs taxable to any plaintiff or plaintiff in any action at law which shall be abated under the provisions of this section, the plaintiff or plaintiffs in which action shall become a party or parties to a bill in equity under the provisions of this section, shall become a part of the costs taxable in the proceedings in said equity case."

The court below permitted this act to be given in evidence by the defendant under the plea of non assumpsit, as also the fact that on June 9, 1904, four days before this case was called for trial, the defendant had become a party defendant to a bill in equity in Baltimore city, under the provisions of said act. At the conclusion of the case, the defendant, in several prayers, asked the court to withdraw the case from the jury, and rule that the plaintiff must be nonsuited, on account of the passage of this act and the fact that he had become a party to the equity suit pursuant to its provision in that behalf. The court, however, declined to do so, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to two points of law which were reserved, with the first of which only we are here concerned, to wit, "whether there was any evidence on which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, with leave to enter judgment in favor of the defendant, notwithstanding the verdict, if the court should be of the opinion that, upon the law, judgment should be so entered." The rule for judgment non obstante veredicto on the points reserved was afterwards discharged and judgment entered upon the verdict. There are several assignments of error, but, by stipulation of counsel, the only question for our determination is the constitutionality of chapter 337, p. 597, of the Acts of 1904.

It is to be observed that this act is entirely retrospective. It applies necessarily by its terms only to the rights of creditors against stockholders, as they existed under article 23, § 851 of the law of 1892, at the time of its repeal, which were declared by said repealing act not to be affected by the terms thereof. It is contended by the plaintiff, and so held by the court below, that this act impaired the obligation of the contract between it and the defendant as it existed at the time of its passage (April 12, 1904), and at the time of the institution of this suit for the enforcement of the same on March 21, 1904.

The liability of each stockholder to any creditor of the corporation, for double the amount of the par value of his stock, under the act of 1892, was statutory, but it was, as we have said, contractual in its nature, each stockholder voluntarily agreeing to incur the liability at the time of his becoming such. The creditor was authorized to sue and collect from any stockholder to the extent of such liability, without first exhausting his remedies against the corporation, the liability of the stockholder to the creditor being a primary obligation. The nature of the liability under the act of 1892, which we are now considering, is thus authoritatively stated by the court of appeals of Maryland, in the very recent case of Miners' & M. Bank v. Snyder (Md.) 68 L. R. A. 312, 59 Atl. 707, hereinafter referred to: The "act 1892, chap. 109, p. 153, which was then in force, created the liability of the stockholders of a trust company for its debts. That particular act has not heretofore been the subject of consideration by us, but we have several times had occasion to construe provisions of the Code and special charters imposing a liability of like nature upon stockholders in manufacturing and other corporations. In those cases we determined that such liability does not constitute a corporate asset, enforceable by a receiver of the corporation, but it is a debt due directly by the stockholder to those persons who became creditors of the corporation while he held its stock. We further held that any such creditor could enforce the liability by a separate action against any stockholder from whom it was due, and recover the debt from him to the extent of double the par value of the stock held by him at the time it was contracted. It was thus made possible for the creditor, by the exercise of superior skill and diligence, to secure payment in full of his debt from the stockholder sued by him, to the exclusion of the other creditors. Matthews v. Albert, 24 Md. 535; Norris v. Wrenschall, 34 Md. 501; Hammond v. Straus, 53 Md. 10; Attrill v. Huntington, 70 Md. 197, 2 L. R. A. 779, 14 Am. St. Rep. 344, 16 Atl. 651; Colton v. Mayer, 90 Md. 717, 47 L. R. A. 617, 78 Am. St. Rep. 456, 45 Atl. 874, and cases there cited."

Accepting this interpretation of the Maryland act of 1892, by the court of last resort of that state, we are relieved from the necessity of independent interpretation on our part. It was to enforce the debt thus directly due from the stockholder to the creditor, the corporation plaintiff, that the suit below was instituted. The contention of the defendant below was, and is here, that though the payment of this debt was admittedly enforceable, by the suit as instituted, prior to the enactment of the statute of April 12, 1904, it was no longer so after the enactment of the same, and that the suit, by force of this statute, must abate. It is clear that such was the intended operation of this statute.

Whether the passage of such a law is within the competence of the state legislature is the single question now before us. The force and effect of the provision of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, providing that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, has been considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases far too numerous for exhaustive citation.

In the earliest case in which the contract clause of the Constitution came up for direct and extensive discussion (Sturges v. Crownshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 197, 4 L. ed. 529, 549), Chief Justice Marshall's definition of the words "obligation of a contract," as used in this clause of the Constitution, is, perhaps, as satisfactory as any since formulated. He says: "In discussing the question whether a state is prohibited from passing such a law as this [an insolvent law], our first inquiry is into the meaning of words in common use,—

'what is the obligation of a contract?' and 'what will impair it?' It would seem difficult to substitute words which are more intelligible, or less liable to misconception, than those which are to be explained. A contract is an agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. The law binds him to perform his undertaking, and this is, of course, the obligation of his contract."

Distinction was early made between those acts of the state legislature which merely affected or modified the remedy upon a contract, without destroying the same, and those which affected its substantial obligation. In applying this distinction, however, the decisions of the Supreme Court show increasing care to protect the substantial obligation of a contract from impairment by subsequent legislation which changes or modifies the remedy for its enforcement.

Chief Justice Taney, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 311, 317, 11 L. ed. 143, 145, says: "It is difficult, perhaps, to draw a line that would be applicable in all cases between legitimate alterations of the remedy and provisions which, in the form of remedy, impair the right. But it is manifest that the obligation of the contract, and the rights of a party under it, may, in effect, be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether; or may be seriously impaired by burdening the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions, so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing."

In McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. 608, 611, 11 L. ed. 397, 398, the Supreme Court says: "The obligation of a contract consists in its binding force on the party who makes it. This depends on the laws in existence when it is made; these are necessarily referred to in all contracts, and forming a part of them as the measure of the obligation to perform them by the one party, and the right acquired by the other. . . . If any subsequent law affect to diminish the duty, or to impair the right, it necessarily bears on the obligation of the contract in favor of one party, to the injury of the other; hence, any law which, in its operation, amounts to a denial or obstruction of the rights accruing by a contract, though professing to act only on the remedy, is directly obnoxious to the prohibition of the Constitution."

In Seibert v. Lewis (Seibert v. United States) 122 U. S. 284, 294, 30 L. ed. 1161, 1165, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1190, 1194, the Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Matthews, says: "It is well settled by the decisions of this court, that the remedy subsisting in a state when and where the contract is made and is to be performed is a part of its obligation, and any subsequent law of the state which so affects that remedy as substantially to impair and lessen the value of the contract is forbidden by the Constitution, and is therefore void." Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 607, 24 L. ed. 793, 798. It had been previously said, upon a review of the decisions of the court, in Von Hoffman v. Quincy (United States ex rel. Von Hoffman v. Quincy) 4 Wall. 535, 553, 18 L. ed. 403, 409: "It is competent for the states to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise as they may see fit, provided no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. No attempt has been made to fix definitely the line between alterations of the remedy which are to be deemed legitimate and those which, under the form of modifying the remedy, impair substantial rights. Every case must be determined upon its own circumstances. Whenever the result last mentioned is produced, the act is within the prohibition of the Constitution, and to that extent void." . . . In Louisiana v. New Orleans, 102 U. S. 203, 206, 26 L. ed. 132, 133, Mr. Justice Field, in the opinion of the court, said: "The obligation of a contract, in a constitutional sense, is the means provided by law by which it can be enforced,—by which the parties can be obliged to perform it. Whatever legislation lessens the efficacy of these means impairs the obligation. If it tend to postpone or retard the enforcement of the contract, the obligation of the latter is to that extent weakened." In various forms, but with the same meaning, this rule has been often repeated in subsequent decisions by this court."

In Bryan v. Virginia, 135 U. S. 685, 693, 34 L. ed. 312, 314, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, 982, the Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, says: "It is well settled by the adjudications of this court, that the obligation of a contract is impaired in the sense of the Constitution, by any act which prevents its enforcement, or which materially abridges the remedy for enforcing it, which existed at the time it was contracted, and does not supply an alternative remedy, equally adequate and efficacious."

Let us consider, then, how the act of April 12, 1904, if given the effect claimed for it, operates upon the law of the contract, as it existed at the time it was passed. We have already seen that the right of the plaintiff, as a creditor of the corporation when this suit was instituted, was to demand from the defendant, as a stockholder, payment of or upon his debt, up to the amount of double the par value of defendant's stock; that by the exercise of diligence, this right might become, and in this case actually did become, exclusive of that of every other creditor as to this particular defendant, and that the right was enforceable in a common-law suit, such as was being proceeded with in the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Pennsylvania, at the time of the passage of the said act of April 12, 1904. But, by this latter act, it was provided that the exclusive remedy for the enforcement against stockholders of such rights as existed under the act of 1892, and which were saved by the repealing and re-enacting act of March 25, 1904, should be by a bill in equity against stockholders residing in the state of Maryland, by one or more creditors, on behalf of themselves and all other creditors of the corporation who should come in and make themselves parties thereto in a state court having jurisdiction within the limits of the city of Baltimore, and that to any such bill, stockholders residing beyond the limits of Maryland might become parties defendant, and, upon so becoming, should not be proceeded against in any other state or territory in respect of any liability imposed by said § 851 (being the law of 1892). This is indeed a change of remedy, but one so drastic that it operates directly upon the contract and clearly impairs its obligation. Before the passage of the act, the contract which the plaintiff was properly seeking to enforce was one by which the stockholder had incurred an obligation to the plaintiff to respond to his demand, in a suit prosecuted with the requisite diligence, in a sum twice the amount of the par value of his stock. The remedy to enforce this right, and which was being pursued by the plaintiff at the time of the passage of the obnoxious law, was the one decided to be appropriate by the court of last resort in the state of Maryland. It was something more, then, than a mere change of remedy, to say that the right thus described and defined as existing under the law of Maryland of 1892, as interpreted by the highest courts of that state, no longer existed, but that this liability of the individual stockholder to the individual creditor should be changed into a right vested in all the creditors, to proceed in one action against all the stockholders. As said by Judge Lowell, in Dexter v. Edmands, 89 Fed. 467, "It is a difference between two substantive rights." It is not a question of an alternative and equally efficacious remedy for the enforcement of a right, but a change in the essential nature of the right itself, and a clear impairment of the obligation of the contract out of which such right arose. The Maryland statute of 1892 gives this plaintiff, as an individual, a substantive right as against this individual defendant. The law of April 12, 1904, says that this substantive right can no longer be enforced. We have no difficulty, therefore, in deciding that this act of the legislature of Maryland, of April 12, 1904, entirely retrospective in its operation as it is, is void as being within the inhibition of article 1, cl. 10, of the Constitution, declaring that no state shall pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts.

With the policy of this later law, we are not here concerned. It may well be that it is wiser and more equitable to make this stockholders' liability an asset of the corporation, and either to allow a receiver to collect from all stockholders, and account pro rata to all creditors, or to accomplish the same result by a creditors' bill, in which all creditors may be parties and all stockholders defendants. But the law of the contract was not of this character at the time the liability of the defendant to the plaintiff accrued. The only question before us is whether the law of 1904 works an impairment of the contract existing between plaintiff and defendant at the date of its passage. Our attention has been called to the case of Miners' & M. Bank v. Snyder (Md. decided November 30, 1904, not yet officially reported) 68 L. R. A. 312, 59 Atl. 707, and above quoted from. In that case, the court of appeals of the state of Maryland had before it the very questions here presented, as to the effect of the law of 1904 upon the rights of creditors of an insolvent corporation as they existed under the law of 1892, and have come to an opposite conclusion to that which we have just stated as our own in the case before us. They held that this act does not impair the obligation of a contract, as the legislature had the power to alter and modify the remedy to enforce the contract, without impairing its obligation. We have read the opinion and judgment of the court in this case, with the interest and respect due to its high character, and with the deference to which it is entitled as the court of last resort in the state whose legislation is now under review. We are, however, compelled to adhere to the views we have expressed, and regret that they should be in opposition to those of that learned tribunal.

The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

E. W. WATSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

AUGUSTA BREWING COMPANY.

(.... Ga.)

1. Beverage—injury to consumer—liability.

A manufacturer who makes and bottles for public consumption a beverage represented to be harmless and refreshing is under a legal duty not negligently to allow a foreign substance which is injurious to the human stomach, such as bits of broken glass, to be present in a bottle of the beverage when it is placed on sale; and one who, relying on this obligation, and without negligence on his own part, swallows several pieces of glass while drinking the beverage from a bottle, may recover from the manufacturer for injuries sustained in consequence.

2. Damages—mental suffering.

One who, under the circumstances stated in the preceding headnote, swallows several pieces of glass, which are subsequently removed from his stomach, leaving apparently no permanent injuries, may recover on account of mental suffering caused by the fear of death while the glass was in his stomach; but a vague fear, after the removal of the glass and he has been restored to health,

Headnotes by CANDLER, J.

Case Note.—In Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 457, 5 L. R. A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324, 10 S. E. 118, upon which the decision in WATSON v. AUGUSTA BREWING Co. relies, it appears that the plaintiff, having purchased a proprietary medicine at a drug store, took the dose prescribed upon the bottle, with the result that he was injured by the effect of a dangerous drug which it contained, and of which he had no knowledge or means of knowledge except through a chemical analysis. The ingredients being secret, the court says that the consumer "has a right to rely upon the statement and recommendation of the proprietor, printed and published to the world, and if, thus relying, he takes the medicine, and is injured on account of some concealed drug of which he is unaware, the proprietor is not free from fault, and is liable for the injury thereby sustained."

This is in accord with the broad and settled rule of duty which the law imposes upon everyone to avoid acts which are in their nature dangerous to the lives or health of others.

Thus it is held in Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, that a wholesale dealer in drugs, whose agent erroneously labeled belladonna as "dandelion," is liable in an action of negligence, for an injury to a consumer who purchased from a retail dealer. "Nothing but mischief like that which actually happened could have been expected from sending the poison falsely labeled into the market, and the defendant is justly responsible for the probable consequences of the act."

(November 9, 1905.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Richmond County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Candler, J.:

The allegations of the petition were substantially as follows: The Augusta Brewing Company is a Georgia corporation, engaged in the manufacture of certain drinks, among them soda water, which it sold as a refreshing and harmless drink. On a named date it sold to a merchant in Thomson, Georgia, some of its soda water, which the merchant placed on sale, "relying on the implied warranty of defendant that said soda water was suitable for salable purposes as a refreshing and harmless drink. Some of this soda water was, with the permission of the merchant mentioned, taken from his stock by the plaintiff and drunk from the bottle. "While drinking said soda water, . . . plaintiff swallowed three

pected from sending the poison falsely labeled into the market, and the defendant is justly responsible for the probable consequences of the act."

Of the same character of negligence is the careless filling of a prescription, as in Peters v. Johnson (Peters v. Jackson) 50 W. Va. 644, 57 L. R. A. 428, 88 Am. St. Rep. 906, 41 S. E. 190, where a druggist was held liable to a third party, injured by the taking of saltpeter erroneously put up as epsom salts on an order by another party.

It thus appears that whether the negligence consists in negligently misnaming a dangerous drug, putting the wrong drug into a prescription, prescribing too large a dose of a medicine containing a dangerous drug, or, as in the case in hand, permitting dangerous substances to find their way into an otherwise harmless drink, the original vendor is held liable.

Contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, however, defeats his recovery. A party who takes "black drops" after a warning from the vendor that they are poisonous leaves no right of action surviving him. Wohlfahrt v. Beckert, 92 N. Y. 490, 44 Am. Rep. 406. See, however, Fisher v. Golladay, 38 Mo. App. 531, where it is held not enough to establish contributory negligence as a matter of law that, upon mixing the drug with another, its action "may have appeared queer or suspicious." And in Davis v. Guarneri, 45 Ohio St. 470, 4 Am. St. Rep.

pieces of glass, or perhaps more, without knowing it, and one large piece of glass lodged in plaintiff's throat. . . . Said glass which plaintiff swallowed and the said piece of glass which lodged in plaintiff's throat were in the said soda water which plaintiff was drinking." Plaintiff immediately went to a physician, who extracted from his stomach three pieces of glass; plaintiff having previously ejected from his throat the piece of glass which had lodged therein. The bottle from which plaintiff drank the soda water was in good condition, and had no rough edges or other peculiarities which could put plaintiff on notice of the presence of the glass inside the bottle. The pieces of broken glass which he swallowed were in the bottle when it was filled, and the defendant was grossly negligent in leaving fragments of glass in the bottle, and in offering for sale for drinking purposes soda water containing pieces of broken glass. The defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known of the presence of the glass in the bottle, while plaintiff did not know and had no means of knowing it. Plaintiff was entirely free from fault, and drank the soda water, thinking it was safe to do so. Plaintiff suffered great physical pain while the glass was in his stomach and in having it extracted therefrom, "and plaintiff suffered untold mental agony between the time he drank the soda water, when he swallowed the said glass, and before he could have the said glass taken from his stomach, fearing that an untimely death would be the result of the glass cutting him on the inside; and plaintiff still fears that he may yet suffer torture from injuries sustained by the glass cutting him on the inside, or, perhaps, from some of the glass which might not have been taken from his stomach, and which is still in plaintiff's stomach, and which may yet cause plaintiff's death. The suspense and agony which plaintiff suffers from what may yet be the dreaded results of this injury are great, and render plaintiff almost paralyzed with fear." Damages were laid in the sum of $2,000. By amendment it was alleged that it was customary to drink bottled soda water from the bottle, and that the defendant was aware of this custom. The defendant demurred generally and specially, the grounds of special demurrer being that the petition endeavors to join inconsistent causes of action,—one, an action on an implied warranty and the other, an action in tort; that no physical injury is alleged; that the petition fails to allege the size or kind of glass that it is alleged was swallowed; that it does not appear whether the plaintiff was a purchaser or a donee of the bottle of soda water drunk by him;

548, 15 N. E. 350, it is held that the negligence of a husband cannot be attributed to his wife, who was injured by reason of the wrong labeling of a drug.

In the case of food, there is, of course, an implied warranty by the vendor that it shall be fit for consumption; but this contractual liability extends no further than to the purchaser, or the one for whom it is understood that such purchaser buys. On the other hand, his liability for negligence may be asserted by anyone who eats such food, regardless of the vendor's knowledge that it was bought for him. Thus in Craft v. Parker, W. & Co. 96 Mich. 245, 21 L. R. A. 139, 55 N. W. 812, where the latter principle is applied under circumstances which would seem to justify the application of the former as well, it is held that a vendor of spoiled meat is liable for the poisoning of the husband of the vendee, which resulted from the condition of the meat. If it is found, says the court, that he was negligent in selling meats that were dangerous to those who ate them, he will be liable for the consequences of his act if he knew them to be dangerous, or, by proper care on his part, could have known their condition.

A caterer is held in Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 52 Am. Rep. 715, 1 N. E. 154, to be liable to an action for negligence in furnishing unwholesome food at a ball, whereby plaintiff was injured. The guests "have a right to assume that he will furnish for their consumption provisions which are not unwholesome and injurious through any neglect on his part. The furnishing of provisions which endanger human life or health stands clearly upon the same ground as the administering of improper medicines, from which a liability springs irrespective of any question of privity of contract between the parties."

Applying the same principle also are the cases of State use of Hartlove v. M. Fox & Son, 79 Md. 514, 24 L. R. A. 679, 47 Am. St. Rep. 424, 29 Atl. 601, and Skinn v. Reutter, 135 Mich. 57, 63 L. R. A. 743, 106 Am. St. Rep. 384, 97 N. W. 152. In the former it is held that one who sells a horse known to be infected with glanders to one who is ignorant of this fact is liable for the death of the latter's employee, who contracts the disease as the natural and probable consequence of his contact with the horse. In the latter the rule is broadened so as to render one who sells hogs, sick with an infectious disease, which may endanger human life, liable to persons not immediately connected with the transaction, whose hogs are infected by reason of their contact with the hogs of such vendor.

The liability of the immediate vendor to the purchaser in cases of tort for sale of unwholesome food or drugs has often been upheld, as shown in the note to 21 L. R. A. 139.

that there is no allegation as to the manner, time, or place of defendant's negligence, nor that the defendant intended the bottles containing the soda water to be used as drinking vessels; and that the allegations as to the plaintiff's apprehensions of what might have existed or developed, or might in the future exist or develop, "were irrelevant and illegal." The court sustained the demurrer generally, and dismissed the petition, whereupon the plaintiff excepted.

Candler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. When a manufacturer makes, bottles, and sells to the retail trade, to be again sold to the general public, a beverage represented to be refreshing and harmless, he is under a legal duty to see to it that, in the process of bottling, no foreign substance shall be mixed with the beverage, which, if taken into the human stomach, will be injurious. The case of Woodward v. Miller, 119 Ga. 618, 64 L. R. A. 932, 100 Am. St. Rep. 188, 46 S. E. 847, is hardly in point; for in that case the manufacturer knew of the defect, and fraudulently concealed it from the purchaser. Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 457, 5 L. R. A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324, 10 S. E. 118, while differing somewhat as to its facts, furnishes strong reasoning to support the principle announced. The composition of patent or proprietary medicines is usually shrouded in mystery, and it is generally understood that many such remedies contain ingredients which, if taken in sufficient quantities, will produce injurious results upon the person taking them. If, then, one who buys a patent medicine may rely upon the obligation of the manufacturer not to place therein ingredients which, if taken in prescribed doses, will injure his health, certainly the purchaser of an alleged harmless and refreshing beverage should have the right to rest secure in the assumption that he will not be fed on broken glass. It does not matter that the plaintiff in the present case did not buy the soda water from the defendant, or that there was no privity of relationship between them. The duty not negligently to injure is due by the manufacturer, in a case of the particular character of the one under consideration, not merely to the dealer to whom he sells his product, but to the general public for whom his wares are intended. On this subject, see, also, Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, supra.

2. It follows from what has been ruled that the court below erred in sustaining the general demurrer. We are equally clear that many of the grounds of the special demurrer are without merit. While the petition contains the wholly unnecessary allegation that the dealer who purchased the soda water from the defendant relied upon its implied warranty that the drink was harmless, the suit cannot, by any possibility, be construed as one upon a warranty, as it is plainly an action in tort. While there is no distinct allegation of permanent disability, the physical suffering of the plaintiff, growing out of the swallowing of the glass and its removal from his stomach, was set out with sufficient definiteness to furnish a basis of recovery; and there was no lack of the required definiteness as to the time, place, and manner of the defendant's negligence. In the latter particular the case differs from Hudgins v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. 122 Ga. 695, 50 S. E. 974, in that there the petition was entirely silent as to what constituted the negligence complained of, while here it is distinctly alleged that the defendant was negligent in leaving glass in the bottle when it was filled. A somewhat peculiar ground of demurrer is the one which seeks to place upon the plaintiff the onus of showing "the size and kind of glass" that he swallowed. Courts have gone far in requiring particularity of pleading; but we are not aware of any rule which would require a man who has unconsciously swallowed several pieces of glass to make a note of the shape, size, color, and character of the pieces after they have been removed from his stomach, in order to describe them in bringing suit to recover from the one who is responsible for his having swallowed them. It was not necessary to allege that the defendant intended that the bottles containing its soda water should be used as drinking vessels. It is sufficient for the purpose of this suit that such was the custom and it was cognizant thereof.

The only remaining point to be considered is whether or not the plaintiff in this case can recover for mental suffering growing out of his injury, and, if so, to what extent. It is a familiar principle that, where a physical injury has been sustained, the person injured may recover for mental suffering caused by or growing out of his bodily hurt. One may not recover, however, for mental suffering which is not reasonable, or which is merely fanciful. It can hardly be disputed that a reasonable fear of death constitutes mental suffering of a very keen sort. It is not unreasonable, we think, for one who has swallowed several pieces of glass to entertain a very vivid and poignant apprehension of an untimely end; and the mental anguish caused by this dread may constitute an element of damage in a suit for damages on account of the physical injury. But after the glass has been removed from his stomach, and he is apparently restored to his former condition of health and vigor, his fears, so far as a damage suit are concerned, should cease. He may not continue for an indefinite period to vex his soul with dread on account of having been "cut on the inside," and hold the defendant liable for his apprehensions. It follows, therefore, that so much of the petition as seeks to recover on account of mental suffering endured since the glass was removed from the plaintiff's stomach should be stricken; and direction is given that, when the case is tried again, the special demurrer be sustained in so far as it attacks this portion of the petition.

Judgment reversed, with direction.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

C. W. HODGES, Plff. in Err.,

v.

R. B. WATERS.

(.... Ga.)

Duty to pay rent to stranger.

One who goes into possession of land as the tenant of another cannot set up title adverse to the landlord, from whom he thus obtained possession, until there has been a surrender of the premises by the tenant to the landlord. However, if a tenant thus in possession expressly agrees to pay rent to another for a given time, he will be bound by these terms, if founded upon a sufficient consideration; but, after the expiration of the time fixed in the express agreement, no promise to pay rent will be implied, and such person may deny liability for rent after that time, although he still remains in possession of the premises as the tenant of the person who placed him in possession.

(November 13, 1905.)

ARROR to the Superior Court for Bulloch County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of rent. Reversed.

Defendant took possession of the property for the use of which the rent was alleged to be due under an agreement with Mrs.

Headnote by COBB, P. J.

Case Note.—The doctrine that a tenant in possession previous to the acceptance of the lease may dispute his lessor's title, which is the subject of many conflicting decisions, has been apparently seldom restricted in its application, as in HODGES v. WATERS, to cases where such lease has expired.

In Accidental Death Ins. Co. v. Mackenzie, 5 L. T. N. S. 20, 10 C. B. N. S. 870, it was held that a tenant in possession at the time of taking a lease might dispute the lessor's title after its termination without first surrendering possession, apparently in reliance on the rule stated in Co. Litt. 47 b, hereinafter stated. The court seems also to have been influenced by the argument that it would be idle to require the lessee to give up possession when he might make an entry upon the land or bring ejectment. But in Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. p. 532, it is said that it would seem to be a sufficient ground to sustain the foregoing case that a contemplated assignment between the original lessor and the party to whom attornment was made was never perfected.

In Fuller v. Sweet, 30 Mich. 237, 18 Am. Rep. 122, the question whether, where the tenant is in possession at the time of taking the lease, the title of the lessor covering and outlasting the period of the tenancy could be made a basis of an implied contract to pay rent after the expiration of the lease, Sarah Waters. She conveyed the property to R. B. Waters, her son, and subsequently defendant entered into a written contract to pay rent to Mr. Waters. At the termination of this contract it was not renewed, and this action was brought to recover the rent due for the time subsequent to the expiration of the contract, on the theory that defendant was holding over under its terms.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Brannen & Booth, for plaintiff in error:

Hodges could not, having once recognized Mrs. Waters as his landlord and entered the land as her tenant, attorn to any other person.

Mr. G. S. Johnston for defendant in error.

Cobb, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The rule that one who goes into possession of land as a tenant of another is estopped to deny the title of him who occupies the relation of landlord in the agreement is familiar law. In the application of this rule it is immaterial whether the landlord is the owner or has any legal interest in the premises. It is sufficient, as between him and his tenant, that he claims ownership, and, as a result of this claim, the tenant is put in possession and allowed to occupy the premises. Grizzard v. Roberts, 110 Ga. 41, 35 S. E. 291. Upon the question as to whether this estoppel operates where the tenant, at the time the contract of rental is made, is already in possession through another and former landlord, or another claim of title, the authorities are at variance. In Franklin v. Merida, 35 Cal. 558, 95 Am. Dec. 129, the supreme court of California held that, if one in possession takes a lease from a stranger, the lessee so in possession is not estopped to deny the title of the lessor, since the latter parts with nothing, and the former has obtained nothing, by the transaction. This decision seems to follow an older decision, and in both cases one of the judges dissented. The better rule seems to be that laid down by the supreme court of Colorado in Lyon v. Washburn, 3 Colo. 201, where it is said that an attornment by one in possession estops the tenant from denying his was alluded to, but not decided. It was held that a tenant in common, who, while in possession of the premises, took the lease of an interest therein from a claimant thereof, was not liable for rent, on the ground that attornment cannot be made to anyone not in privity to the title under which the possessor holds; and that, since no possession was given, the promise to pay rent was void for want of consideration.

The doctrine of the foregoing case is, however, to be limited to cases where the lessee was rightfully in possession, and has no application where such possessor is a mere trespasser. Campau v. Lafferty, 43 Mich. 429, 5 N. W. 648.

Further aid to the elucidation of the question decided in the case in hand may be derived from an examination of the general question as to the effect of possession previous to the acceptance of a lease on the right to dispute the title. The weight of authority seems to be that the lessee will be estopped from disputing the lessor's title. McConnell v. Bowdry, 4 T. B. Mon. 392; Prevot v. Lawrence, 51 N. Y. 219; Caldwell v. Smith, 77 Ala. 157; Parrott v. Hungelburger, 9 Mont. 526, 24 Pac. 14; Bowdish v. Dubuque, 38 Iowa, 341; Thayer v. Society of United Brethren, 20 Pa. 60; Farmer v. Pickens, 83 N. C. 549; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. p. 534. Jones, Land. & T. § 697, gives as the reason for this rule, that, although the party asserting the estoppel may not have lost the advantage of parting with possession, he may have been led into some admission or conduct prejudicial to his title, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which otherwise would not have been.—a view derived from Bigelow through Farmer v. Pickens, supra.

There is a class of cases which constitute an exception to the rule that the lessee is estopped to deny the title of his lessor, in which the lease was taken through force, fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake. Swift v. Dean, 11 Vt. 323, 34 Am. Dec. 693; Carter v. Marshall, 72 Ill. 609; Shultz v. Elliott, 11 Humph. 183; Claridge v. Mackenzie, 4 Mann. & G. 143; Doe ex dem. Higginbotham v. Barton, 11 Ad. & El. 307, 4 Jur. 432. And such is held to be the case even where the mistake was one of law. Lakin v. Dolly, 53 Fed. 333. This broad exception covers a multitude of cases which are sometimes regarded as holding that mere possession when a lease is taken will take a case outside the rule.

But in the cases of Tewksbury v. Magraff, 33 Cal. 237, and Franklin v. Merida, 35 Cal. 558, 95 Am. Dec. 129, it was held that the bare possession of the demised land when the lease is given is sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the general rule that the tenant cannot dispute the landlord's title. The court argues that the doctrine of estoppel is a harsh one, and is never to be applied except where to allow the truth to be told will consummate a wrong to one party, or enable the other to secure an unfair advantage; that the person who, while in possession, takes a lease, obtains no advantage, since the lessor obtains a legal equivalent for the possession; that he might have obtained in the rent/promlandlord's title, unless the attornment was brought about by fraud, force, or mistake of fact. In the opinion Wells, J., says: "To avoid the assertion of a hostile title, one may lawfully contract to pay for his own, and, if the threatened litigation be forborne, he is bound by his promise; and so the tenant, holding under a lord where title is unimpeachable, may, if he will, undertake to pay rent to every stranger who demands it. Such demand implies the threat of litigation and dispossession if the demand be refused; and if made in good faith, and without fraud or other improper practice to induce concession; and if the tenant yield to it with a full understanding of all the facts which are material to the question of his liability,—it is difficult to see why he should not be bound by his promise, even though he should become liable thereby to pay triple rent for the same premises." See also Carter v. Marshall, 72 Ill. 609; Lucas v. Brooks, 18 Wall. 436, 21 L. ed. 779. In Hamilton v. Pittock, 158 Pa. 457, 27 Atl. 1079, an instruction that "a man may, if he sees fit, where there are conflicting titles, take a lease from each of the owners of it, and, if he is not deceived by assertions in regard to the matter, he would have to pay both," was approved as sound law.

ised, and also gains, in the event of a controversy, a prima facie case as against the tenant, and possibly may have severed an adverse possession and stayed the running of the statute of limitations.

In Clary v. O'Shea, 72 Minn. 105, 71 Am. St. Rep. 465, 75 N. W. 115, and in Petterson v. Sweet, 13 Ill. App. 255, it was held that a parol promise by one in possession to pay rent to one out of possession, who had neither title nor right of possession, is void for want of consideration. See also Fuller v. Sweet, supra.

The argument that in such case there is no consideration for the attornment is answered in Lyon v. Washburn, 3 Colo. 201, as follows: "The argument omits from consideration the circumstance that every letting, and every acceptance of an attornment, involves an implied, if not an express, undertaking that the tenant shall peaceably enjoy the premises as against the landlord; that is to say, that proceedings for the assertion of the hostile title shall not be instituted. This undertaking to forbear suit, whether express or implied, is as effectual and sufficient a consideration for the promise to pay rent as an original delivery of the possession would be. It is no answer to say that the tenant may be liable to one landlord, by virtue of an original lease, and to another by virtue of a subsequent attornment; even if the law be assumed by the argument, it is still no answer. To avoid the assertion of a hostile title, one may lawfully contract to pay for his own; and, if 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hodges, under his admissions, was a tenant of Mrs. Waters; the contract being that he was to have the use of the place, and the rent was to be paid by furnishing her with support. It is immaterial whether Mrs. Waters had any interest in the premises as between her and Hodges. He recognized her as his landlord, and he obtained possession from her; and as between them he cannot raise any question as to her title. By express agreement under seal, in the year 1896 as well as the year 1897, he recognized the plaintiff as his landlord, and agreed to pay him a stipulated amount as rent; the written agreement between the parties having all the formalities required to create the technical relation of landlord and tenant. So far as those years are concerned, he occupied the relation of tenant to both plaintiff and his mother, and as against each he was estopped to deny this relation, certainly so far as the payment of rent was concerned. He could not defeat the claim of Mrs. Waters for rent by showing that the agreement between her and her son was invalid for any reason. Neither could he defeat the claim of her son for the rent of those years by showing that the title of the mother was superior. Having received possession of the land from Mrs.

the threatened litigation be forborne, he is bound by his promise."

It thus appearing that the general tendency of the courts is to hold that prior possession is insufficient to preclude an estoppel, the question next arises as to the extent of such estoppel,—whether it operates only during the term of the lease, or until the tenant surrenders possession. Such authority as there is on the question has been hereinbefore reviewed; and it therefore remains only to examine the principle on which the doctrine of such estoppel rests.

Under the early common law, the estoppel of a tenant to deny the title of his landlord was deemed to arise from the sealed lease, and terminated at its expiration. Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. 506. And see also Co. Litt. 47b, where it is said that, "if a man take a lease for years of his own land by deed indented, the estoppel doth not continue after the term ended. For by the making of the lease the estoppel doth grow, and consequently by the end of the lease the estoppel determines."

But the modern estoppel is deemed to rest, not upon the lease, but on permissive possession, and, hence, will prevail so long as such possession continues, and though the contract of lease is void. See Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. 511, and cases cited.

Upon this principle, if one who, while in possession, takes a lease from an adverse claimant, is to be considered as estopped at all to deny his lessor's title, it would seem that such estoppel should prevail so long as he continues in possession.

Waters, he could not by any act of his place himself in a position where, as against her, he could deny her title. So long as the possession thus acquired continued, he was estopped from denying her title as landlord. To deny her title it was necessary for him to surrender to her that possession which he had received from her, and re-enter after such surrender under some other person. Therefore an agreement to pay rent from year to year would arise between Hodges and Mrs. Waters until there had been an actual surrender of the premises to her. Hodges's possession having been in no way dependent upon any act of the plaintiff, to what extent the agreement between him and the plaintiff would create a liability for rent of the premises would depend upon the terms of the agreement. If Hodges, upon a sufficient consideration, agreed to pay the plaintiff rent for 1896 and 1897, he would be bound by this agreement, and must pay the rent. But after the expiration of the term fixed in the agreement, his obligation to pay rent depending upon the agreement alone, and his possession not having been obtained through the person to whom the promise was made, there would be no obligation upon him to attempt a vain and idle thing; that is, to surrender the premises belonging to one person to another who was not entitled to it. He was not compelled at the end of the year 1897 to abandon possession of the premises, which he at all times held under Mrs. Waters, in order to prevent a liability on his part to pay to her son rent in the future. Not having acquired possession from her son, the estoppel raised by the contract to pay rent was no broader in its operation than the contract provided for; and he was therefore not estopped from denying after 1897 that he was longer liable to pay rent as a tenant to the son of Mrs. Waters. If, at the time the defendant had made the contract to pay rent to the plaintiff, the plaintiff had been in possession claiming title to the property as his own, and no other person's rights were to be affected, then his entering into a contract to pay rent would have made the defendant a tenant of the person to whom the rent was payable, and render him liable to all the incidents of such a tenancy. See Johnson v. Thrower, 117 Ga. 1007, 44 S. E. 846; Willis v. Harrell, 118 Ga. 906, 45 S. E. 794 (9).

The defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the rent of the years 1896 and 1897, which he expressly agreed to pay; the consideration for such promise being the quieting of his possession from the threat of eviction made by the plaintiff. The defendant having testified that he had never agreed to pay rent for any other year than those named, the judgment must be reversed upon that assignment of error which complained that the court erred in charging the jury that, if at any time the defendant had recognized the plaintiff as his landlord, he could never thereafter be heard to deny his obligation to pay rent so long as he remained in possession of the premises.

Judgment reversed.

Case Note.—The nature and extent of the right acquired by the holder of a ticket to a theater or other public place of amusement are, by the weight of authority, to be determined by the rules of law applicable to licenses generally. See Collister v. Hayman, post, 1188, and cases therein cited; Elias, Law of Theater Tickets, chap. 1. A dictum to the contrary, in Drew v. Peer, 93 Pa. 234, is expressly disapproved by the Pennsylvania supreme court in the case in hand.

While the earlier cases have held that the license so conferred upon the holder of a ticket, though for a valuable consideration, is revocable at will (*Wood v. A theater ticket is a mere license, for the revocation of which before the holder has actually been given and has taken his seat, the only remedy is in assumpsit for breach of the contract.

(October 9, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful refusal to permit plaintiff to occupy a seat which he had purchased for a theatrical performance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry E. Lallou, Jr., W. H. G. Gould, and Ulysses S. Koons, for appellant:

The right of a proprietor to revoke a license to enter a place of amusement may also be limited by a statute making it unlawful to refuse admission to any person over twenty-one, not under the influence of liquor, or guilty of boisterous conduct, or of lewd or immoral character, who presents a ticket of admission acquired by purchase. Greenberg v. Western Turf Asso. supra.

Such is also the effect of the so-called civil rights acts, forbidding the discrimination against any person on account of color, as is shown by cases in which negro holders of tickets have been allowed to recover more than compensatory damages for their exclusion from such theater. Joseph v. Bidwell, 28 La. Ann. 382, 26 Am. Rep. 102.

But, in the absence of such a statute, colored persons to whom tickets for the orchestra of a theater are sold without a knowledge that the persons who are to use them are colored may be prevented from using them, and required to give them up for balcony tickets, or for the return of their money. Younger v. Judah, 111 Mo. 303, 16 L. R. A. 558, 33 Am. St. Rep. 527, 19 S. W. 1109.

Where a ticket is issued upon the condition that, if transferred, it shall be worthless, neither the transferee, nor the person to whom the ticket was originally issued, has a right of action, upon a refusal of the proprietor to admit the transferee. Purcell v. Daly, supra.

A person purchasing a reserved seat which has previously been sold to someone else does not acquire such a right to occupy it that his forcible removal therefrom, by persons connected with the theater, will necessarily constitute an assault. Com. v. Powell, 10 Phila. 180, 30 Phila. Leg. Int. 100.

The rule followed in HORNEY v. NIXON, as to the measure of damages recoverable by a ticket holder refused admission to a place of amusement, or to a seat purchased,

The tickets were more than a revocable license.

Drew v. Peer, 93 Pa. 234; Com. v. Powell, 10 Phila. 180, 12 Cent. L. J. 359; 1 Harvard Law Rev. 24; McGoverney v. Staples, 7 Alb. L. J. 219; MacGowan v. Duff, 14 Daly, 315, 12 N. Y. S. R. 680.

There is no distinction between an ejection from a theater and an ejection from a car.

In such cases there has always been the right of election, i.e., contract or trespass.

Laird v. Pittsburg Traction Co. 166 Pa. 4, 31 Atl. 51; Perry v. Pittsburgh Union Pass. R. Co. 153 Pa. 236, 25 Atl. 772; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Spicker, 105 Pa. 142; Light v. Harrisburg & M. Electric R. Co. 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 427; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Bambrey, 2 Monaghan (Pa.) 109, 16 Atl. 67; Duggan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 159 Pa. 248, 39 Am. St. Rep. 672, 28 Atl. 182, 186.

This trespass was aggravated by compelling plaintiff to leave the theater.

is also supported by a dictum in Purcell v. Daly, supra, that the proprietor would be compelled to refund only the price paid for the tickets, together with such other expenses as the party might have been put to in connection with the matter.

Exemplary damages are not recoverable by a person to whom tickets for another evening had been issued by mistake, who gave up his seats upon the demand of the usher and left the theater, the ejection being attended neither by violence nor by insults. MacGowan v. Duff, 14 Daly, 315, 12 N. Y. S. R. 680.

Consequential damages may be recovered for injuries resulting from the rude ejection of the ticket holder. Drew v. Peer, supra.

But in Smith v. Leo, supra, the recovery of compensatory damages for the indignity and disgrace resulting from the expulsion from a dance hall of a person who had paid the price of admission was sustained.

Where the cause of action is based on a civil rights statute, the amount recoverable is usually determined by the statute, as in Baylies v. Curry, 128 Ill. 287, 21 N. E. 595; although such a statute has been regarded as giving a cause of action ex delicto, as in Joseph v. Bidwell, supra, in which the court reduced the amount of damages awarded from $1,000 to $300.

The California statute hereinbefore referred to, which allows a person refused admission contrary to its provisions to recover his actual damages and $100 in addition thereto, has been held not to preclude the recovery of additional punitive damages. Greenberg v. Western Turf Asso. supra.

But under such statute the injury to plaintiff's business in publishing a paper devoted to racing news is not a proper element of damage for exclusion of a ticket holder from a race track. Ibid.

Herbst v. Hafner, 7 Pa. Super. Ct. 363; Farmakis v. Boyle, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 696; Kerr v. Sharp, 14 Serg. & R. 399; Brisben v. Wilson, 60 Pa. 452; Brown v. Stackhouse, 155 Pa. 583, 35 Am. St. Rep. 908, 26 Atl. 669; Brown v. Powell, 25 Pa. 229.

The mere fact that there was no written lease does not make any difference.

Moore v. Miller, 8 Pa. 272; Oakford v. Nirdlinger, 196 Pa. 162, 46 Atl. 374.

Messrs. J. Siegmund Levin and Arthur Straus Arnold, for appellees:

The conducting of a theater is a purely private enterprise, and the law does not, by implication, impose upon the proprietor thereof a mandatory requirement to serve the public.

A theater ticket is a revocable license, and the only remedy of a purchaser denied the enjoyment thereof is an action on the contract for such damages as are the immediate consequences of the breach of contract.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Lewis J. Somers, the father-in-law of the plaintiff, purchased from the Columbia Field Club eight tickets for a theatrical performance to be given on February 26, 1904, at a theater in the city of Philadelphia under the management of the appellees. They had issued a certain number of tickets to the club, to be sold by it, as the performance was to be for its benefit. After the tickets had been issued to it a fire commission, appointed by the mayor of the city, directed the aisles of the theater to be widened as a measure of greater safety to the public, by removing the end seat on each row of the center section. The eight tickets purchased by Somers were in the fifth row of this section and were numbered from 1 to 8; No. 1 being for the one along the aisle. Two of these eight tickets, Nos. 3 and 4, were purchased by plaintiff from his father-in-law. The order of the fire commission led to some confusion in connection with the sale of seats, as the appellees did not know who had purchased tickets from the club before the order was complied with; but arrangements were made to issue other tickets to the holders of those for the seats along the aisles which had been removed. By some oversight all of the eight seats called for by the tickets purchased by Somers were resold, and when he and his family presented their coupons to the usher they were informed that they could not, under the circumstances, be given the seats called for. They were offered eight together elsewhere, as they insisted upon being seated as a family, but these were declined as being too far back. They were then offered seats in two of the boxes, but these were refused, on the ground that, as they had come as a family, they insisted upon sitting together and in the seats called for by their coupons. In view of the alterations made in pursuance of the order of the fire commission, it was impossible for the managers of the theater to give the family these eight seats, but, according to plaintiff's own testimony, they courteously offered to seat them elsewhere. The party, however, refused every proposition and became noisy, to the annoyance of those witnessing the performance, which had commenced. They were told that they could not continue discussing the matter inside of the theater and were directed to go outside, where, according to the testimony of the treasurer of the appellees, they were tendered back the money they had paid for their tickets. After having so declined every offer to give them other seats to witness the performance, they left the theater; and the plaintiff shortly afterwards brought this action to recover the price of the tickets purchased by him, and "for the inconvenience and annoyance and mortification and indignity and humiliation suffered" by him.

Under the foregoing facts the court below directed a verdict for the defendants, for the reason that there could be no recovery in trespass,—the form of action adopted by the plaintiff; and the single question before us is the correctness of this ruling. It was so manifestly correct that the judgment might well be affirmed, without saying more. The case as presented by the plaintiff has not a single tortious feature. He had purchased a ticket, calling on its face for a seat which he insisted on having, and it was the duty of the defendants to give it to him; but their failure to perform that duty was simply a failure to perform their contract with the holder of the ticket, and for such failure the remedy, as in any other simple breach of contract, is in assumpsit for damages for the breach. The confusion resulting from the change in the rows of seats, which followed the order of the fire commission, was the excuse given for not being able to furnish the family the seats called for by the tickets, and it ought to have been accepted by any reasonable person. The plaintiff, if not willing to take any of the other seats offered to him, ought to have been content to have his money refunded.

In support of the contention that the appellant has a right of action in trespass, decisions in cases of common carriers are cited, in which trespass was held to have been the proper form of action for refusal to carry passengers, or for unlawfully ejecting them without force or violence. But the difference between the duty of a common carrier and that of a theater proprietor has been wholly overlooked. That of the former is absolute to carry whoever may wish to be carried. It is a duty growing out of no contract, but rests at all times on the common carrier in return for the franchises and privileges conferred by the state. If, in violation of this duty, it refuses to receive a passenger, or unlawfully ejects him from one of its conveyances, trespass will lie upon the disregard of the implied obligation to serve the public, or the tort may be waived and assumpsit maintained for a breach of the contract of carriage, if one has been entered into. The rule is thus stated in 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1121: "It may be stated as an abstract proposition that, where the duty of a common carrier to a passenger is not one which is implied by law by reason of the relation of the parties, but depends solely upon the fact that it has been expressly stipulated for, the remedy is in contract, and not in tort; but where the duty is implied by law by reason of the relation of the parties, or where the passenger sustains an injury by reason of the breach of a duty which the railroad owes to the public in general, the remedy is in tort." "When the gist of the action is a breach of duty, and not of contract, and the contract is not alleged as the cause of action; and when from the facts alleged the law raises the duty by reason of the calling of the defendant, as in the case of innkeepers and common carriers; and the breach of duty is solely counted upon,—the rules applying to actions ex delicto determine the rights of the parties." Frink v. Potter, 17 Ill. 406. "The liability of a carrier of passengers is a subject which has become of great practical importance since the introduction of railroads, and the subject of the measure of damages 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) for breach of contract of carriage of a passenger has been much discussed. The relation between carrier and passenger is more than a mere contract relation; indeed, it may exist in the absence of contract. It is clear that any person rightfully on the cars of a railway company is entitled to protection by the carrier, though he is a free passenger. Any breach of this duty owed by the carrier to the passenger would seem to be a tort. Recovery may be had either in an action of tort or in an action for breach of the contract. The contract made by a common carrier of passengers (and we shall see that the same is true of contracts made by all incorporated telegraph companies) is not a simply voluntary engagement, such as an ordinary contract inter partes, but an agreement made in pursuance of an obligation towards all the world, imposed either by his mere status as common carrier, or under his charter, or both. In other words, it is a contract which he is under a duty to make and under a duty to perform, so that a breach is not a mere breach of contract, but also, as we have said, a tort." 2 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 859.

The proprietor of a theater is a private individual, engaged in a strictly private business, which, though for the entertainment of the public, is always limited to those whom he may agree to admit to it. There is no duty, as in the case of a common carrier, to admit everyone who may apply and be willing to pay for a ticket, for the theater proprietor has acquired no peculiar rights and privileges from the state, and is therefore under no implied obligation to serve the public. When he sells a ticket he creates contractual relations with the holder of it, and whatever duties on his part grow out of these relations he is bound to perform, or respond in damages for the breach of his contract, if it is of that only that complaint can be made. Such is just the situation here. A courteous explanation was made why the contract with the plaintiff as the holder of the ticket issued by the defendants could not be specifically performed; other seats in different parts of the house were offered to him and the rest of the family, which could have been occupied by them together as one party, but were declined; seats in the proscenium boxes were refused, because the party would be separated, and even after all this they were not evicted from the building, but simply told that their loud discussion of what they conceived to be the great wrong done them could not be carried on inside the theater, to the annoyance to those who were witnessing the performance; and, without rudeness or violence, they were directed to go into the foyer, where they continued to discuss the situation. They could have had seats at any time, but would take none except those called for by their tickets. The allegation of the plaintiff, in his attempt to make out a case of trespass against the appellees, is that by their conduct he was unlawfully ejected from the theater, to his mortification, indignity, and humiliation. The proof is just to the contrary, and shows nothing but a simple breach of a simple contract, resulting from a cause which was explained to him and which ought to have been regarded as unavoidable. But he and some of the rest would listen to nothing but what their tickets called for. If the contract with him was broken, he is entitled to nothing more than the actual damages for the breach, and these, according to the testimony of the treasurer of the appellees, were tendered to him.

In affirming this judgment nothing more would be said, but for the citation of Drew v. Peer, 93 Pa. 234, as authority for the right of the plaintiff to maintain trespass. There is no analogy between the two cases. Peer and his wife, two colored persons, purchased tickets for reserved seats in the theater of the defendant. On the evening of the performance they passed through the street door and were within a few feet of the ticket taker at the entrance to the orchestra circle, when the man who was taking the tickets cried out, "Clear them niggers out!" and they were violently ejected from the building. In an action in case a recovery was had and sustained, and it was said by Sterrett, J.: "Whether the tickets conferred merely a license, or something more, is immaterial. If they gave only a license to enter the theater and remain there during the performance, it is very clear that the agents of the defendant had no right to revoke it as they did, and summarily eject Peer and his wife from the building in such a manner as to injure her. We incline to the opinion, however, that as purchasers and holders of tickets for particular seats they had more than a mere license. Their right was more in the nature of a lease, entitling them to peaceable ingress and egress, and exclusive possession of the designated seats during the performance on that particular evening." All that was decided was that the defendant had no right to revoke the license in the manner he did, and violently and rudely eject the plaintiff and his wife from the theater. The suit was for damages resulting from their rude ejection, and what is said about the tickets being more than a mere license is to be regarded as simply obiter dictum. Even as such it is certainly not in accord with the authorities in this country and in England. Licenses which are given by the sale of tickets to theaters and other places of amusement are revocable. Cooley, Torts. 2d ed. § 306. "A theater ticket, being a mere license to the purchaser, which may be revoked at the pleasure of the theatrical manager, upon such revocation, if the person attempts to enter, or if, having previously entered, he refuses to leave upon request, he becomes a trespasser, and may be prevented from entering or may be removed by force, and can maintain no action of tort therefor. His only remedy is by an action on the contract to recover the money paid for the ticket and damages sustained by the breach of the contract implied by the sale and delivery of such ticket." 21 Enc. Pl. & Pn p. 647. Among the cases sustaining this are Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 Mees. & W. 838; McCrea v. Marsh, 12 Gray. 211, 71 Am. Dec. 745; Burton v. Scherpf, 1 Allen, 133, 79 Am. Dec. 717; Pearce v. Spalding, 12 Mo. App. 141; Johnson v. Wilkinson, 139 Mass. 3, 52 Am. Rep. 698, 29 N. E. 62; Greenberg v. Western Turf Asso. 140 Cal. 357, 73 Pac. 1050. In the light of these and other authorities, a theater ticket is to be regarded as a mere license, for the revocation of which, before the holder has actually been given his seat and has taken it, the only remedy is in assumpsit for the breach of the contract.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAM H. COLLISTER, Appt.,
v.

ALBERT HAYMAN et al., Resp'ts.

(.... N. Y.)

1. Theater ticket—effect of license.

The licensing of theaters and ticket brokers neither imposes any duties upon the one, nor confers any rights upon the other, with reference to tickets, in addition

Case Note.—The right of the manager of a theater to impose whatever restriction he may see fit as a condition of admission to it appears to have been but little litigated outside of cases arising under civil rights acts. The doctrine of COLLISTER v. HAYMAN, that a license granted to a theater is not a franchise, and imposes no duty for the benefit of the public, is supported by the decision in Purcell v. Daly, 19 Abb. N. C. 301, where it is said that such license in no way changes the character of the institution from a private to a public one, or deprives the manager of the right to discontinue performances, or to use the theater property for other purposes, or to say whom he will, or will not, admit to the theater. As was said in Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Campb. 358, cited with approval in Pearce v. Spald- to those conferred by the contract under which the ticket is sold.

2. Same—conditions.

A condition upon a theater ticket that the ticket will not be honored if sold on the sidewalk is not against public policy.

3. Theater—right to control.

The operation of a theater is not a business affected with a public interest which deprives the proprietor of the right to control it as a private business.

4. Ticket broker—interference with business—injunction.

A ticket broker cannot enjoin the proprietor of a theater from warning intending purchasers that tickets purchased on the sidewalk in violation of the conditions printed thereon will not be honored, although such conduct interferes with his business and subjects him to loss.

(December 5, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County, Part 3, dismissing the complaint in an action brought to enjoin defendants from the alleged wrongful interference with plaintiff's business. Affirmed.

ing, 12 Mo. App. 141, theaters are not necessities of life, and the proprietors of them may manage their business in their own way; and, if that way is unfair or unpopular, they will suffer in diminished receipts.

In Purcell v. Daly, supra, it was held that the proprietor of a theater had a right to contract with an intending patron that the ticket, as evidenced by a notification printed thereon, should not be transferable.

In many states, including Arkansas, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Rhode Island, Iowa, Nebraska, Michigan, Minnesota, Colorado, and South Carolina, statutes have been enacted providing, in substance, that no citizen of a state shall, by reason of race, color, or previous condition, be accepted or excluded from the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations and privileges of places of public resort, including theaters and other places of public amusement. Such statutes have been held constitutional in Baylies v. Curry, 128 Ill. 287, 21 N. E. 595; Ferguson v. Gies, 82 Mich. 358, 9 L. R. A. 589, 21 Am. St. Rep. 576, 46 N. W. 718; Messenger v. State, 25 Neb. 674, 41 N. W. 638; Fruchey v. Eagleson, 15 Ind. App. 88, 43 N. E. 146; Rhone v. Loomis, 74 Minn. 200, 77 N. W. 31; Joseph v. Bidwell, 28 La. Ann. 382, 26 Am. Rep. 102. They do not take private property for public use without compensation (Donnell v. State, 48 Miss. 661, 12 Am. Rep. 375); and are within the police power of the state to regulate places of public resort (People v. King, 110 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Statement by Vann, J.:

The plaintiff brought this action to restrain the defendants, as proprietors of the Knickerbocker theater, in the city of New York, from interfering with his business of selling, on the sidewalk and outside of the prohibited limits, tickets of admission to that theater. He alleged in his complaint that at the times therein mentioned he was "a licensed theater-ticket speculator," while the defendants were managers of the Knickerbocker theater. In December, 1901, the defendants issued tickets of admission to their theater, and among others, two coupons attached, numbered, respectively, "aa5" and "aa7." The body of the tickets, printed in several lines, was as follows: "Knickerbocker Theater, Al. Hayman & Co., Proprietors. December 3, Tuesday evening. Orchestra, $2.00. If sold on the sidewalk, this ticket will be refused at the door. Evenings at 8:15." The coupons bore the number of the seats, the date, name of the theater, etc. The plaintiff further alleged that on the 3d of December, 1901, he came lawfully into possession of a large number of tickets of admission to various seats in said theater, including those above described, and on the evening of that day he was on the street

N. Y. 418, 1 L. R. A. 293, 6 Am. St. Rep. 389, 18 N. E. 245).

And damages have been held to be recoverable under such a statute, although the ticket expressly stated that it was agreed that the management should have the right to refuse admission to the holder upon returning the price of the ticket. Joseph v. Bidwell, supra.

But a similar Federal statute has been held unconstitutional as not being authorized by the 13th or 14th Amendment, the latter of which is regarded as applicable only to state, and not to individual, action. Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 9, 27 L. ed. 838, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18.

In the absence of any statute to the contrary, a discrimination against colored persons by permitting them to sit only in the balcony of the theater is not unlawful. Younger v. Judah, 111 Mo. 303, 16 L. R. A. 558, 33 Am. St. Rep. 527, 19 S. W. 1109.

An act (Cal. Stat. 1893, p. 220) making it unlawful to refuse admission to places of amusement to any person over twenty-one, not under the influence of liquor, or guilty of boisterous conduct, or of lewd or immoral character, who presents a ticket of admission acquired by purchase, was held a valid exercise of the police power, in Greenberg v. Western Turf Assn. 140 Cal. 357, 73 Pac. 1050.

On the question of the nature of a theater ticket and the remedy for breach of contract with the purchaser, see the case of Horney v. Nixon, ante, 1184, and the note accompanying it.

"more than 5 feet removed from any point of the entrance to the Knickerbocker theater," engaged in offering such tickets for sale. The defendants, however, interfered with him in carrying on the sale of tickets by warning persons about to purchase not to purchase from him, and by stating to them that the management would not recognize such tickets, and that those so purchasing would not be admitted to the theater. The defendants at the time and for at least a month before had stationed in front of their theater, at each side of the entrance thereto, large signs, 5 by 7 feet, with the following words conspicuously painted upon them: "Tickets purchased on the sidewalk will positively be refused at the door." Furthermore, the defendants, on the evening in question as well as previously, had stationed near the entrance to the theater private detectives to warn those intending to purchase tickets from the plaintiff not to do so, and informing them that, if they bought tickets from him, they would not be admitted to the theater, and that he had no right to sell any tickets of admission, even though they had been duly issued by the proprietors. The plaintiff finally alleged that by the methods thus described the defendants had prevented many people from purchasing tickets of him; that the selling of theater tickets was his sole business, from which he derived an income of at least $4,000 a year; and that by means of the premises, as well as by threats to continue such acts, he was prevented from carrying on a lawful calling. The relief demanded was an injunction restraining the defendants from doing the acts complained of and for the sum of $4,000 damages. The defendants answered, admitting many of the allegations of the complaint, and putting at issue the remainder. Upon the trial at special term, the motion of the defendants to dismiss the complaint upon the pleadings was granted, and the judgment entered accordingly was unanimously affirmed by the appellate division. The plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. Max D. Steuer, for appellant:

Defendants' business is not a private one in which the public has no concern or no control.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A theater may be licensed, like a circus: but the license is not a franchise; and does not place the proprietors under any duty to the public, or under any obligation to keep the theater open. The license of a "ticket speculator," so far as it has any validity, simply authorizes him to conduct his business on the sidewalk, within the limits prescribed. City Charter Laws 1897, chap. 378, §§ 50, 51, 1472, 1473, pp. 21, 22, 519. Neither the license to the owner of the theater, nor the license to the ticket speculator, adds to or takes from the rights of the parties to the contract made when the proprietor sells a ticket. The rights of the purchaser and the duties of the proprietor are measured by the terms of the contract as in fact made. "The privilege accorded by the city authorities cannot change the inherent nature of a theater ticket." The ticket is not the contract, although to some extent it is evidence thereof. The contract is implied from the circumstances, and is an agreement on the part of the proprietor, for the consideration mentioned, to admit the holder of the ticket, upon presentation thereof, to his theater at the date named, with the right to occupy the seat specified and to there witness the performance. A theater ticket is a license, issued by the proprietor, pursuant to the contract, as convenient evidence of the right of the holder to admission to the theater at the date named, with the privilege specified, subject, however, to his observance of any reasonable condition appearing upon the face thereof. The license, although granted for a consideration, is revocable for a violation of such condition by the holder of the ticket in the manner specified therein. Purcell v. Daly, 19 Abb. N. C. 301; Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 Mees. & W. 838; Burton v. Scherpf, 1 Allen, 133, 79 Am. Dec. 717; McCrea v. Marsh, 12 Gray, 211, 71 Am. Dec. 745; Greenberg v. Western Turf Assn. 140 Cal. 357, 73 Pac. 1050; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 124; Pingrey, Extraordinary Industrial & Inter- state Contr. § 509; Wandell, Law of the Theater, 221; Goddard, Bailments & Carriers, § 333.

The main question presented for decision is whether the defendants had the right to make a contract with the purchasers upon the condition printed in the ticket. There is no restraint by statute against such a condition, and it is not opposed to public policy. There is no tendency toward monopoly, for anyone can buy and sell theater tickets, provided the sales are not made on the sidewalk where the tickets themselves provide they cannot be sold. The law does not prevent the proprietor of a theater from making reasonable regulations for the conduct of his business, and imposing such reasonable conditions upon the purchasers of tickets as in his judgment will best serve the interest of that business. A ticket speculator is one who sells at an advance over the price charged by the management. Speculation of this kind frequently leads to abuse, especially when the theater is full and but few tickets are left, so that extortionate prices may be exacted. A regulation of the proprietor, which tends to protect his patrons from extortionate prices, is reasonable, and he has the right to make it a part of the contract and a condition of the sale. Unless he can control the matter by contract and by conditions appearing upon the face of the ticket, which is evidence of the contract, he may not be able to control it at all, but must leave his patrons to the mercy of speculators, such as the plaintiff, who as he alleges, was accustomed to make at least $4,000 a year from his business. That amount, of course, came out of patrons of the theater; and if other ticket speculators, carrying on the same business at various theaters in the city of New York, are equally successful, the additional expense to theater goers must be very large.

The defendants were conducting a private business, which, even if clothed with a public interest, was without a franchise to accommodate the public, and they had the right to control it, the same as the proprietors of any other business, subject to such obligations as were placed upon them by the statute hereinafter mentioned. Unlike a carrier of passengers, for instance, with a franchise from the state, and hence under obligation to transport anyone who applies and to continue the business year in and year out, the proprietors of a theater can open and close their place at will, and no one can make lawful complaint. They can charge what they choose for admission to their theater. They can limit the number admitted. They can refuse to sell tickets and collect the price of admission at the door. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

They can preserve order and enforce quiet while the performance is going on. They can make it a part of the contract and a condition of admission, by giving due notice and printing the condition in the ticket, that no one shall be admitted under twenty-one years of age, or that men only or women only shall be admitted, or that a woman cannot enter unless she is accompanied by a male escort, and the like. The proprietors, in the control of their business, may regulate the terms of admission in any reasonable way. If those terms are not satisfactory, no one is obliged to buy a ticket or make the contract. If the terms are satisfactory, and the contract is made, the minds of the parties meet upon the condition, and the purchaser impliedly promises to perform it. There is no rule of law that prevents the enforcement of the contract in the manner provided thereby, which is to refuse admission to the holder of a ticket who bought it on the sidewalk. Where the condition is part of the contract at its origin, it continues a part thereof as long as it exists, and binds all subsequent holders with notice.

The case would be very different if, after the sale of a ticket containing no evidence of the restriction, an attempt were made to enforce it against a purchaser without notice. The purchaser is warned in advance of what he is buying. He has notice before he buys of the condition which the proprietors saw fit to make a part of the contract. He acts with his eyes open, and if he does not like the condition he need not buy; but, if he buys, he impliedly assents to the condition, which controls, not only himself, but any purchaser from him. When the plaintiff came lawfully into the possession of the tickets in question, with others, as he alleges he had notice of the condition which appeared upon the face thereof, and was bound thereby. He bought subject to that condition, and every right he acquired was subordinate thereto. The ticket was assignable: for there was no restriction in the contract against selling it except in a particular place, and a transfer could be made by simple delivery. The plaintiff, therefore, took it with the right to sell to any person at any time and in any place that he saw fit, provided he did not violate the condition, which imposed no unreasonable restraint upon the assignability of property. When he tried to sell on the sidewalk, he clearly acted in defiance of the contract, and violated the condition to which he had given an implied assent. With notice that, if he sold the ticket on the sidewalk, it would be refused at the door, he was attempting to sell on the sidewalk, when the defendants, by their signs and agents, warned intending purchasers that the condition would be enforced and that the holder of a ticket purchased from him under such circumstances would be denied admission. The defendants did nothing but notify people, so that they could not be imposed upon by him and induced to purchase tickets which would be of no use, because sold in violation of the contract.

This is not a case involving the liberty of the plaintiff to sell his property; for he could sell it to any person and in any place, except in the one prohibited by the contract which constituted the property. The contract did not interfere with his absolute freedom of action, except to this limited extent, duly agreed upon in advance; while he attempts to interfere with freedom of contract on the part of the defendants by restraining them from enforcing an agreement which they had made and to which he had assented. Restraint by statute and restraint by contract are quite different. What the parties to a contract agree upon is valid almost without limitation, but what the legislature may prohibit parties from agreeing upon is subject to the limitations of the fundamental law. Those limitations do not bear upon the case now before us. Our recent decision in People ex rel. Tyroler v. Warden, 157 N. Y. 116, 43 L. R. A. 264, 68 Am. St. Rep. 763, 51 N. E. 1006, relied upon by the appellant, is not analogous. We there adjudged unconstitutional a statute which prohibited as a crime the selling of transportation tickets by any person except common carriers and their specially authorized agents, in so far as it undertook to prohibit citizens of the state from engaging in the business of brokerage in passenger tickets. This case involves not a statute, but a contract, which excludes no one from carrying on the business of selling theater tickets, but simply prevents a sale thereof on the sidewalk in violation of the express stipulation of the tickets themselves.

The statute entitled "An Act to Protect All Citizens in Their Civil and Legal Rights" has no application. Laws 1895, chap. 1042, p. 974; People v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 1 L. R. A. 293, 6 Am. St. Rep. 389, 18 N. E. 245. That act provides for the equal accommodation of all persons in "places of public accommodation or amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to all citizens." It makes it a misdemeanor to deny "to any citizens except for reasons applicable alike to all citizens of every race, creed, or color, and regardless of race, creed, and color, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges" enumerated in the statute including theaters by specific mention. This has no bearing upon the resale of tickets in violation of a contract made with the original purchaser. It was especially designed to prevent the exclusion from "places of public accommodation or amusement" of anyone on account of race, creed, or color, and apparently was also intended to prevent any discrimination founded on rank, grade, class, or occupation. The contract and tickets in question did not discriminate against any person on account of any reason named in the statute, for the same condition is imposed upon all, and all are treated alike. The holder is not excluded because he bought of the plaintiff, but because he bought in the prohibited place. The plaintiff was not excluded, for he could have used the tickets himself. No class of persons was excluded, such as lawyers, doctors, merchants, or mechanics, but simply those who bought in violation of the terms of the contract after notice thereof.

We think that the contract with the original purchaser of the tickets was valid, that the express condition named therein bound all subsequent purchasers, and that it could be enforced in the manner provided thereby. The judgment should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

2. Trade fixtures—right to remove—new lease.

A tenant who has placed trade fixtures on the leased premises loses his right to remove them by entering into a new lease which contains no recognition of his title thereto, but which binds him to surrender the premises in as good state and condition as reasonable use and wear will permit.

(July 25, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco denying a motion for new trial after judgment in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to enjoin the removal of certain fixtures from plaintiffs' property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles E. Nougues, also for appellants:

The renewal was not an independent lease-that a tenant loses his right to carry off trade fixtures by continuing the tenancy under a new lease silent on the subject, is that adopted in the main body of cases. Judge Cooley uttered a strong protest against it in Michigan nearly thirty years ago, and, while his words have had some effect, the rule was then too well rooted to be overturned even by the force of so eminent an authority.

The reason given for the rule is that the tenant, by accepting the new lease, is deemed to have surrendered or abandoned his rights under the old tenancy; that fixtures on the premises at the time of the new letting are a part of the thing demised; and that the tenant, by accepting a new lease of the soil without reserving the fixtures, acknowledges the right of his landlord to them.

In New York the present tendency is to limit the doctrine to fixtures savoring of the realty, and to hold it inapplicable to ordinary movable trade fixtures. But this has not been done elsewhere.

If the plain intention of the parties is that the fixtures shall belong to the tenant, it has several times been held that the tenant's title will not be affected by the execution of a new lease in which fixtures are not mentioned. And where the new tenancy is nothing but a renewal or extension of the old, all of the cases agree that all rights of the tenant under the first letting survive.

II. New lease as implied surrender of rights under old tenancy.

a. The prevailing rule.

It would seem, by a decision in 1881, that 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the question decided in WADMAN v. BURKE is not regarded as settled in England.

In Ex parte D'Eresby, 44 L. T. N. S. 781, an interesting case, reversing Ex parte Sheen, 43 L. T. N. S. 638, it appeared that a well-known artist, who was a friend of an innkeeper, painted on an old signboard a picture which was afterwards used as the sign of the inn, and soon became very valuable. After a while it was taken down, framed, and fastened to the wall in the main hallway of the house. Other tenants came and occupied the place under new leases in which neither the picture nor the sign was mentioned, and, one of them failing, his trustees claimed the picture as against the owner of the house; but it was decided that it belonged to the latter. At first the court said that on execution of the new leases the sign became clearly a part of the inn, and was entirely relieved of any right of any person to remove it; but afterwards, on reflection, stated that this opinion was obiter, and added that, when the simple question should arise of a tenant having removable fixtures, continuing his possession under a new or extended term, it desired to hold itself perfectly free to decide as to the question whether he retained the right of removal during such continuous possession.

The rule was recognized in Pronguey v. Gurney, 37 U. C. Q. B. 347, in which the court said there was no doubt that when a tenant took a lease, in the absence of any exception in the lease, the fixtures when attached to the land passed to the landlord as property of the landlord; but it was held that the mere agreement to increase or decrease rents was not a surrender of the tenancy. In the same case, on demurrer (36 U. C. Q. B. 53), it was held that the mere fact that a purchaser of the soil knew that the tenant in possession claimed certain fixtures would not prevent them from passing to him by operation of law, if they became part of the freehold through the acceptance of a new lease.

Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, is the leading American authority on the question. The court held that a tenant's right to remove buildings was at an end when he accepted a new lease of the premises, failing to reserve it, and containing a covenant to give up the premises at the end of the term in as good state and condition as a reasonable use, etc., would permit. The court said that the privilege of removal was conceded to the tenant for reasons of public policy, and that it was lost by the surrender after the term had run out. In reason and principle, the acceptance of a lease of the premises, including the buildings, without any reservation of right, or mention of any claim to the buildings and fixtures, and occupation under a new letting, were equivalent to a surrender of the possession to the landlord at the expiration of the first term. The tenant was under a new tenancy, and not under the old, and the rights which existed under the former tenancy and which were not claimed or exercised, were abandoned as effectually as if the tenant had actually removed from the premises, and after an interval of time, shorter or longer, had taken another lease and returned to the premises.

A lease of lands and premises carries with it the buildings and fixtures on the premises, and the tenant, accepting the lease of the premises without excepting the buildings, takes a lease of the lands with the buildings and fixtures, and acknowledges the title of the landlord to both, and is estopped from controverting it. Ibid.

In Talbot v. Cruger, 151 N. Y. 117, 45 N. E. 364, Affirming 81 Hun, 504, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1011, it was held that the purchaser of a tenant's buildings lost his title by taking the same premises himself under a lease 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A surrender is the restoring and yielding up of an estate or interest in lands to one who has an immediate estate in reversion or remainder.

silent as to the removal of fixtures. The court said the buildings in such an event were deemed abandoned to the landlord.

And in Stephens v. Ely, 102 N. Y. 79, 56 N. E. 499, Reversing 14 App. Div. 202, 43 N. Y. Supp. 762, it was held that the right to remove certain plumbing put in by tenants under their first lease was lost by taking a new lease without reserving it. The new lease contained the usual covenants to leave the premises in as good state and condition as reasonable use, etc., would permit. The court said the legal effect of accepting the new lease was to destroy the right of removal of the fixtures, which before the end of the first term existed in the tenants.

The last-mentioned case was followed in Nieland v. Mahnken, 89 App. Div. 463, 85 N. Y. Supp. 809, in which it was held that a tenant lost the right to remove a watering trough, plate-glass windows, tiling, plumbing, storm house, etc., by not reserving it in a new lease of the same premises, the lease containing the usual covenants to deliver it up at the end of the term, etc.

And in Hayes v. Schultz, 33 Misc. 137, 68 N. Y. Supp. 340, it was held that a tenant could not remove an extension to a building under a previous agreement, where a new lease was taken which failed to keep the right alive.

So it would seem, under this rule, where a tenant quits the premises leaving improvements behind him, and afterwards takes a new lease of the same place as an under-tenant, that the improvements would go to the owner of the ground. Scott v. Haverstraw Clay & Brick Co. 135 N. Y. 141, 31 N. E. 1102.

In Van Vleck v. White, 66 App. Div. 14, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1026, it was held that a trustee in bankruptcy lost the right to remove fixtures by taking a new lease of the premises, together with the buildings and the appurtenances, but silent as to fixtures.

The New York courts are, however, as before stated, not inclined to extend the rule to removable trade fixtures not savoring of the realty.

Judd, 14 Cal. 59; Marks v. Ryan, 63 Cal. 107; Board of Education v. Grant, 118 Cal. 39, 50 Pac. 5.

Van Dyke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The action was instituted April 28, 1897, to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from selling and removing certain saloon fixtures from a building belonging to the estate of the plaintiffs' testatrix. On the 26th of March, 1888, defendant Burke leased from Lawrence Kelly, then the owner, the premises at the northeast corner of Valencia and Twenty-sixth streets, in the city and county of San Francisco, for the term of five years from the 1st day of September following, at the monthly rental of $75 per month, payable in advance on the 1st day of each and every month during said term. Said lease also contained a covenant for the renewal for the further term of five years at the monthly rental of $100 per month. Before the expiration of the term created by this lease said Lawrence Kelly granted and transferred the premises described therein to Ellen Kelly, the testatrix of these plaintiffs. The court found that, after the said defendant Burke was let into possession of the premises in question under and in pursuance of said lease, and during the autumn of 1888, he caused to be permanently and securely attached, annexed, and affixed to said building, by physical connection, certain doors, front and back bars, and lunch counters,

In Lewis v. Ocean Nav. & Pier Co. 125 N. Y. 341, 26 N. E. 301, the court said the decision in Loughran v. Ross, supra, was placed on quite technical reasoning, supported, it was true, by some authorities; but that it was not one of those cases whose principle should be extended.

In Smusch v. Kohn, 22 Misc. 344, 49 N. Y. Supp. 176, the court refused to extend the rule to cover store fixtures, and said it would be a dangerous doctrine to hold that the ordinary removable store fixtures of a tenant passed to his landlord by the mere act of renewing the term, unless by express stipulation he reserved the right to remove them, Approving Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, 34 N. W. 514, infra.

And in Bernheimer v. Adams, 70 App. Div. 114, 75 N. Y. Supp. 93, Affirmed in 175 N. Y. 472, 67 N. E. 1080, it was said that the Loughran Case should be deemed not applicable to trade fixtures, not distinctively realty, designed to retain their character as personal property, and capable of removal without material injury to the freehold. It was therefore held that, where a tenant, having the right to remove fixtures, sold them and quit the premises, and the purchaser at the same time, or after the purchase, took a new lease, without reserving the right to the fixtures, he did not thereby lose the right to carry them away.

The court also held that the taking of a new lease did not necessarily and conclusively presume the surrender of a former lease and the transfer of ownership of fixtures to the landlord. The presumption might be rebutted by circumstances showing that it would be unreasonable to infer that such was the intention. Ibid.

The rule that where a lease is renewed the right to carry away the fixtures is gone, was approved in Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 59; and the court went on further, and said that the doctrine applied not only to a lease, but to other agreements which terminated the possession under it; and held that a tenant, after his lease had run out, had no better right to the fixtures under an executory contract of sale than he would have had under the renewal of his lease, which would have left them to the landlord. Upon the execution of the new lease, the tenant was in the same situation as if the landlord, being seised of the land, had leased both land and fixtures to him. The dispute in this case was over a small steam engine and pump.

In Marks v. Ryan, 63 Cal. 107, a tenant built a house and barn on the leased premises before his term had run out, and the tenancy continued under three other leases silent as to a removal of the buildings, but providing that at the expiration of the term, the tenant would quit and surrender the premises in as good state and condition as reasonable use, wear, etc., would permit. The court said the rights of the landlord and tenant must be viewed in the same light as they would be if the buildings had been erected before, and had been standing upon the land at the time of the execution of the first lease, or as if the second, or any subsequent, lease had been in fact first; and, viewed in that light, it was quite clear that the buildings standing upon the premises were a part of the realty, and would have passed with it by deed, although not specifically mentioned in it.

In Leman v. Best, 30 Ill. App. 323, where it appeared that a hotel and certain cigar stands in the hotel building had been the subject of frequent changes of ownership, the court said that, before the cigar stands could be carried off as removable fixtures, it must be shown that the property in the fixtures was, at the expiration of each tenancy of the cigar stands, by agreement between the lessee of the house and the tenant of the cigar stands, reserved to the latter; and that, at the expiration of each demise of the house itself, the landlord of the tenant of the house assented to this continuance of the property in the fixtures in the tenants or subtenants.

In an early special term case in New York, Devin v. Dougherty, 27 How. Pr. 455, glass cupboards chandeliers, and gas fixtures, etc. Shortly before the expiration of this lease negotiations were entered into between him and the then owner of the said premises, Ellen Kelly, for a new lease for the term of five years from September 1, 1893, at the monthly rental of $75 per month. This new lease, however, was not executed until November 1, 1893, although the possession of said Burke was not interrupted. Ellen Kelly died testate June 21, 1896, and thereafter, March 1, 1897, plaintiffs were appointed executrices of her will. There being no appeal from the judgment,—which was entered some four years before the appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial was taken,—the sufficiency of the complaint or findings to support the judgment or conclusions of law cannot be considered. The only question demanding consideration on this appeal is whether the evidence is sufficient to support the findings.

The appellants contend that the articles in controversy were affixed for the purposes of trade; that is to say, were trade fixtures, and were removable by the tenant, Burke, as belonging to him. The reply of respondents to this is that, conceding them to be trade fixtures, they must be removed before the expiration of the lease during the term of which the fixtures were annexed to the freehold. The evidence shows, and the court finds, that these fixtures were put in, or annexed to the building in question, before the expiration of the first lease; and it would

it was held that a tenant might move away a wood shed put up by him during his first term, although he had taken a new lease silent on the subject. The court held that the new lease was intended merely to provide for further occupation of the same premises for the same purposes, and that it was unnecessary for the tenant to reserve a right to a thing which was his own; that he was hiring the landlord's premises, and not also property on the premises belonging to himself. This, however, appears to be an outcast among the New York decisions, and was not noticed until long after the court of appeals had announced the opposite rule.

Sanitary District v. Cook, 169 Ill. 184, 39 L. R. A. 369, 61 Am. St. Rep. 161, 48 N. E. 461, is the leading case in Illinois on the subject. It held that the right of a tenant to certain buildings as fixtures was lost by the taking of a new lease simply containing covenants binding the lessees to keep the premises in good repair, and to deliver them up in as good condition as they were in when entered upon. The court said the great weight of authority was in favor of this rule. The reason given was that fixtures on the premises at the time of the lease were part of the thing demised, and that the tenant, by accepting a new lease without reserving his right to fixtures, acknowledged the right of his landlord to them, which he was afterwards estopped from denying.

In Gauggel v. Ainley, 83 Ill. App. 582, the rule was regarded as settled by the last-mentioned case.

And in Smyth v. Stoddard, 105 Ill. App. 510, it was held that the right of a tenant to move off a corn crib put up by him was lost by the taking of a new lease in which no mention was made of the crib and no reservation of any rights to remove buildings. The decision was affirmed in 203 Ill. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 314, 67 N. E. 980, but this point was not touched upon.

In Hedderich v. Smith, 103 Ind. 205, 53 Am. Rep. 509, 2 N. E. 315, the court, assuming that a tenant had the right to remove fixtures during his first term, held that it was lost by the taking of a new lease upon different terms in which the right of removal was not reserved. Without question, the court said, if there had been nothing but an extension of the old lease upon the same terms, the respective rights of the parties would have remained the same. The acceptance of a new lease upon different terms was, however, the creation of a new tenancy. The acceptance of the new lease was an effectual surrender of the old, together with the estate and all other rights which the old lease secured to the tenant. Thenceforth he was in as of a new estate which was to be measured by the condition of things existing when it commenced, and by the covenants, conditions, and reservations contained in the new lease, from which the rights of the parties must be determined and regulated.

In Unz v. Price, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 791, 58 S. W. 705, it was held that the right of a tenant to remove improvements, expressly reserved in the first lease, was lost by the taking of new leases at different rentals, silent upon the subject of improvements. If left to conjecture, said the court, we might expect that at the termination of the first lease the improvements were valued and paid for, or the rent reduced, to compensate for them. In the absence of proof, we must hold the improvements to be a part of the realty, and the right to remove them lost or waived, if not satisfied.

The question was said to be a new one in Maryland, in Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301. In that case it appeared that a tenant wanted to remove certain buildings, structures, and fixtures put up by him under a tenancy from year to year. After notice to quit, he took a written lease of the premises "together with all the rights, appurtenances, and privileges thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining," without reserving the right to remove the fixtures. It was held that the right was lost by the acceptance of the written lease. The court said that all the elementary writers agreed that the seem that the matter of the fixtures was in the minds of the parties to the second lease at the time it was entered into. The defendant Burke, in his testimony in reference to the negotiations with Mrs. Kelly, says: "She said she would consider the matter, and after a time said to me, 'So far as I am concerned, you are a very good tenant, and I have not anything to object to in you;,' and she said, 'In order to have you not leave and move the fixtures out, you can stay there at the old rental, $75 a month.' And thereupon we entered into the lease set forth in paragraph 4 of plaintiffs' complaint." The fact that defendant Burke did not exercise his right, under the old lease, of having a renewal at the rental of $100 per month, with the privilege of removing his fixtures, but entered into the lease under consideration at the reduced rate of $75 per month, without any reservation whatever of the right to remove the fixtures, would seem to show that the rent was reduced in view of having the fixtures remain as a part of the premises. Unless there is some understanding, express or implied, between the lessor and the lessee in the second lease, at the time it was executed, as to the fixtures, the rule of law is, as contended by the respondents, that the tenant, entitled to remove trade fixtures, must avail himself of that right before the expiration of the term of the lease during which they are affixed. In Watriss v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694, the court says: "When the same tenant continues in pos-tenant's right was gone in such a case, notwithstanding his actual possession had been continuous.

This case was followed in George Bauernschmidt Brewing Co. v. McColgan, 89 Md. 135, 42 Atl. 907, in which the dispute over the fixtures was between the landlord and a purchaser from the tenant. The fixtures had been put in under a prior lease. The court said that the tenant, if he had stood upon his rights under the first lease, might have held over under it, but that, as he did not do so, but surrendered the first lease and all the rights he had under it, and accepted a new lease, which made no reference to the first, nor contained any reservation whatever of any interests he may have had in the fixtures, the right to sell them was lost.

In Shepard v. Spaulding, 4 Met. 416, a tenant for years reconveyed to the owner of the soil by lease like that under which he held, without reserving the right to take away a movable house which he had put up. He then took a new lease of the same premises. The court held the conveyance by the tenant to the landlord to be a surrender, and that the house, by the surrender and conveyance without reservation, became permanently annexed to the freehold as effectually as if it had been built by the owner of the soil; and that the new lease was a demise of the whole estate, including the building.

In Watriss v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694, a leading authority for the rule, it was held that when the same tenant continues in possession under a new lease containing different terms and conditions making no reference to the old lease, reserving no rights to the lessee in fixtures annexed during the previous term, and not removed before its expiration, and containing the covenant to deliver up the premises at the end of the term in the same condition, this was not an extension of, or holding over under, an existing lease, but the creation of a new tenancy. The court said it followed that whatever was a part of the freehold when the lessee accepted and began his occupation under the new lease must be delivered up at the end of the term, and could not be severed on the ground that it was put in as a trade fixture under a previous lease which had expired. The dispute was over the removal of a bank vault. The case was said by the court to differ from that of Shepard v. Spaulding, last mentioned, only in the fact that in the former case there was an interval between the surrender of the interest under the first lease and the granting of the second, when the lessor was in actual possession. But the court held that the acceptance of the new lease and the occupation under it were equivalent to a surrender of the premises at the end of the term.

The failure of the lessee to exercise the right to remove during the former term, or to reserve it in his new contract, precludes him from denying the title of his landlord to the estate and the fixtures annexed, which have become part of it. Ibid.

In McIver v. Eastabrook, 134 Mass. 550, leased premises were surrendered upon which a building of the tenant, used as a trade fixture, still stood. The landlord took possession, and, soon after, the tenant again hired the premises. It was held that the latter had lost the right to take away the building, and the court said the fact that the landlord knew and assented to the erection of the fixtures could afford no inference that he had agreed that it should not be a fixture.

The Missouri decisions are in favor of the rule. In Williams v. Lane, 62 Mo. App. 66, it was held that the right of a tenant to carry off shelving put up during the first term was lost by accepting a new lease silent on the subject.

In Anthony v. Rockefeller, 102 Mo. App. 326, 76 S. W. 491, it was held that, although a tenant for a certain term might remove fixtures put up by himself if he did so during his term, or while he held as tenant, if he took a new lease from another landlord without reserving the right, he lost it. The court said it had been disputed whether this rule was sound where the new lease was a session under a new lease containing different terms and conditions, making no reference to the old lease, reserving no rights to the lessee in fixtures annexed during the previous term, and not removed before its expiration, and containing the covenant to deliver up the premises at the end of the term in the same condition,—this is not the extension of, or holding over under, an existing lease. It is the creation of a new tenancy. And it follows that whatever was a part of the freehold when the lessee accepted and began his occupation under the new lease must be delivered up at the end of the term, and cannot be severed on the ground that it was put in as a trade fixture under a previous lease which has expired. The failure of the lessee to exercise his right to remove during the former term, or to reserve it in his new contract, precludes him from denying the title of his landlord to the estate, and the fixtures annexed, which have become part of it." This case is cited with approval in Marks v. Ryan, 63 Cal. 107. In Marks v. Ryan this court, after referring to the cases of Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 60, and Jungerman v. Bovee, 19 Cal. 355, said: "According to the doctrine of those cases, upon the execution of a new lease, the lessee 'is in the same situation as if the landlord, being seised of the land, had leased both land and fixtures to him.' In that case we do not think that anyone would claim that the lessee could remove the buildings, or that they were not fixtures annexed to the land."

Under the evidence and findings of the court, the fixtures attached by the lessee to the leasehold property became a part of the mere renewal and continuation of the same landlord and tenant, citing Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, infra; but that there was no ground to question it where the lease was an independent contract with a new landlord.

In Champ Spring Co. v. Roth Tool Co. 103 Mo. App. 103, 77 S. W. 344, the reason for the rule was said to be that the new lease evidenced a new contract of tenancy defining the mutual rights and obligations of the lessor and lessee.

To the same effect is St. Louis v. Nelson, 108 Mo. App. 210, 83 S. W. 271. The court said that the acceptance of the new lease in that case was equivalent to a surrender of the possession to the landlord, and the re-entry under the new, in lieu of the old, tenancy. A lessee's right of removal of improvements attended the life of the lease creating it and expired with the lease; and that, under a new lease, where such right was not reserved, it could not subsist.

In Gerbert v. Sons of Abraham, 59 N. J. L. 160, 69 L. R. A. 764, 59 Am. St. Rep. 578, 35 Atl. 1121, it was held that, upon the renewal of a lease without any provision as to buildings put up by the tenant, such buildings became incorporated with the real estate, and were then the property of the lessor and remainderman.

And in Spencer v. Commercial Co. 30 Wash. 520, 71 Pac. 53, it was held that the right of a tenant to take away a hydraulic press, certain floors and partitions, put in under an old tenancy, was destroyed by the taking of a new lease not mentioning fixtures.

b. The contrary doctrine.

Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, is the leading case on the other side of the question. The dispute there was over the removal of certain tenant's buildings. The second lease was, for some reason, given to cover the same term as the first; and in the report of the case it is not 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said whether the right of removal was reserved, but it probably was not. It was not disputed that, as between landlord and tenant, the buildings would in general have been removable. The contention, however, was between the tenant and a mortgagee of the landlord. It was claimed that, by taking the new lease, the old leases were, in contemplation of law, surrendered, and, the tenants not having asserted and exercised a right to remove erections made previously, they had abandoned them to their landlord. In discussing the question, Judge Cooley, after calling attention to the rule which permitted a tenant to remove his fixtures before surrendering possession and during the time he has a right to regard himself as occupying in the character of a tenant, said: "But why the right should be lost when the tenant, instead of surrendering possession, takes a renewal of his lease, is not very apparent. There is certainly no reason of public policy to sustain such a doctrine; on the contrary, the reasons which saved to the tenant his right to the fixtures in the first place are equally influential to save to him on a renewal what was unquestionably his before. What could possibly be more absurd than a rule of law which should, in effect, say to the tenant who is about to obtain a renewal: 'If you will be at the expense and trouble, and incur the loss, of removing your erections during the term, and of afterwards bringing them back again, they shall be yours; otherwise you will be deemed to abandon them to your landlord.'" He also said that, unless the new lease in terms, or by necessary implication, included the buildings, it was begging the whole question to assume that the lease included the buildings as part of the realty.

The reasoning in the Michigan case is approved in Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, 34 N. W. 514, which holds that, where it is understood that trade fixtures are to be the sole property of the tenant, the right to remove them is not lost realty, and remain so until severed. San Francisco Breweries v. Schurtz, 104 Cal. 421, 38 Pac. 92; Commercial Bank v. Pritchard, 126 Cal. 605, 59 Pac. 130, and cases there cited; Civil Code, §§ 658, 660. At the time the said lease between Ellen Kelly and defendant Burke was entered into, the fixtures sought to be removed in this case, and to prevent which the injunction was granted, were part of the realty, and when Burke accepted said lease, as lessee, he covenanted to "well and sufficiently keep in repair the said premises, with their appurtenances, when and as often as the same shall require, damages by fire alone excepted, and that at the expiration of said term the said party of the second part will quit and surrender the said premises in as good state and condition as reasonable use and wear thereof will permit [damages by the elements excepted]." And the lease, as already stated, contained no covenant or agreement permitting the lessee to sever and remove the fixtures from said premises.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; McFarland, J.; Henshaw, J.; Angellotti, J.

Shaw, J., dissenting:

I dissent. I think, in substance, the new contract was a renewal of the old lease, and was so understood and intended.

Lorigan, J., dissenting:

I concur in the dissent of Justice Shaw, for the reason given by him.

by the signing of a new lease silent on the subject. The plain intention of the parties, the court holds, must rule.

The Michigan and Wisconsin cases were approved in Wittenmeyer v. Board of Education, 10 Ohio C. C. 119, where the right to remove school buildings was held not to have been lost by the acceptance of a new lease of the premises by the school board. In this case the board wished the new lease expressly to reserve the right to the buildings, and, the agent of the landlord not having authority on that part, the question was left open. The lease contained no covenant to leave the premises in the same condition in which they were at the time of assigning of the new lease, and in this respect the court distinguished the case from Laughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, and Watriss v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694.

But the Ohio cases are not in harmony. In Cook v. Scheid, 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 867, it was held in the Superior Court of Cincinnati that the right of a tenant to take away an engine boiler which he had put up during his term under a written lease was lost by parol renewals silent as to fixtures. The court refused to follow Kerr v. Kingsbury, but fell in line with the authorities the other way. This case was dismissed, for the want of preparation, by the supreme court commission, in 1884.

In Union Terminal Co. v. Wilmar & S. F. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 392, 90 N. W. 92, the court said it seemed to be the rule in some states that the renewal of a lease terminated the right to remove the fixtures erected during the original terms; but that it had not yet been adopted in Iowa, citing McCarthy v. Trumacher, 108 Iowa, 284, 78 N. W. 1104 infra. The point was, however, not directly decided in either case.

III. Effect of special covenants in new lease.

In deciding whether a tenant loses the right to carry off his fixtures by a new letting of the premises, the courts have been 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

moved somewhat by the effect of special covenants in the new lease.

In Thresher v. East London Waterworks Co. 2 Barn. & C. 608, it appeared that, after two lime kilns had been put up on ground held under an old lease, tenants, under a new letting, covenanted to repair, uphold, and maintain the ground, erections, buildings, etc., and to leave and yield up at the end of the term. The last tenants pulled down the buildings, and were sued for a breach of the covenants in the new lease, and the case turned upon the construction of the lease. The court said that under such a lease, containing no exception, the buildings erected for purposes of trade could not be removed, and that this was highly reasonable, because the expectation of buildings to be erected during the term, and to be left at its expiration, was often one of the inducements to the granting of a lease, and formed a considerable ingredient in the estimate of the rent to be reserved; and that, if buildings for trade erected during a lease could not be removed without breach of such covenant, neither could the buildings erected before and existing at the date of a lease be removed without a breach of the covenant, unless there should be very special matter to take them out of the operation of the covenant; and that the lessees under the new letting, having accepted a lease of ground and buildings thereon, could not be allowed to say that the ground only, and not the buildings, should be deemed to pass by that lease.

In Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, the court said that a covenant in a new lease to surrender the premises at the end of the term in as good state and condition as reasonable use, etc., would permit, included the buildings then on the premises, put up by the tenant, and not reserved by the new letting. The court said it followed that the tenant, becoming a party to the lease and occupying under it, was estopped from claiming the buildings as his own. Such was also, the implied undertaking of a tenant taking a new lease by parol.

In Jungerman v. Bovee, 19 Cal. 355, it was held that the right of a tenant to remove buildings under a written lease was lost by the taking of a new lease, by which the premises were to be surrendered at the end of the term, "reasonable use and wear thereof and damages by the elements excepted."

And in Sanitary District v. Cook, 169 Ill. 184, 39 L. R. A. 369, 61 Am. St. Rep. 161, 48 N. E. 461, the court, after holding that the tenant's right to certain buildings was lost by accepting a new lease, stated that a covenant in the new case, binding the lessees to keep the premises in good repair and deliver them up in as good condition as they were in when entered upon, would seem to put the question beyond the realm of reasonable controversy. The case of Thresher v. East London Waterworks Co., supra, was said to be directly in point.

In Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301, there was no express covenant on the part of the lessee of a new term to keep the premises in repair and restore them in good condition; but this did not take the case out of the general rule. The court held it to be well settled that, independently of any express agreement on the part of the tenant to that effect, and in the absence of the landlord's undertaking to repair, the law imposed upon every tenant, whether for life or for years, the obligation to treat the premises in such a manner that no substantial injury should be done to them, so that they would revert to the lessor at the end of the term, unimpaired by any wilful or negligent conduct on his part.

In George Bauernschmidt Brewing Co. v. McColgan, 89 Md. 135, 42 Atl. 907, the decision that the tenant's right to fixtures was lost by the new letting was partly put upon the ground that the new lease contained a covenant to surrender the premises in the same order and condition "as they now are, wear and tear excepted;" and also that all improvements, alterations, and repairs which might be put on the premises should become the property of the lessor at the expiration of the term.

In Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, however, the court said the fact that the lease provided that all improvements, alterations, repairs, and additions upon the premises by the tenant should be left for the benefit of the landlord at the end of the term made no difference.

IV. Construction of leases and agreements, intention of parties.

Some of the cases have gone on the construction of special agreements, and of the terms of the new leases; and in others the intention of the parties gathered from the circumstances of the case has been given effect.

Fitzherbert v. Shaw, 1 H. Bl. 258, decided in 1789, which is often cited as the earliest authority on the general subject of the note, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

turned upon the effect to be given a special agreement for an extension of the term. It there appeared that the purchaser of land gave notice to a year-to-year tenant upon it to quit, and brought ejectment against him. The parties then agreed that judgment should be signed for the plaintiff, with a stay until the Michaelmas following, until which the defendant was to keep in. No mention was made of fixtures. Before the stay expired the defendant took off certain movable buildings which he had put up, and the question was whether he had the right to do so. The court held the agreement to mean that the tenant, while holding under it, should do no act to alter the premises, and should deliver them up in the same situation they were in when the agreement was made.

And in Heap v. Barton, 16 Jur. 891, after ejectment had been brought against a tenant, he entered into an agreement with the landlord by which, in consideration of the tenant's not appearing in the action, the landlord extended the time he might occupy the premises. In this agreement nothing was said about certain buildings and other trade fixtures of the tenant, and the court held that the right to remove them was gone.

In Mansfield v. Blackburne, 6 Bing. N. C. 426, where a tenant took a new lease in renewal of the old, the new lease containing a demise of all salt works, buildings, and other things enumerated, it was held that salt pans and pipes put in by the tenant passed to the landlord so that the tenant lost the right to remove them.

In Sharp v. Milligan, 23 Beav. 419, tenants in possession under a parol lease took a contract for a written lease for the same premises, "with steam engine and engine and gas houses, out buildings, and appurtenances of the same belonging and as the same are now occupied by them," etc. The tenants wanted a schedule of their own fixtures put into the lease so that they could remove them at the end of the term. The court would not order the exception, saying that the tenants ought to have put exceptions into the contract for the lease, if they intended that only a part of the fixtures were to be treated as the landlord's property.

In Thorpe v. Milligan, 5 Week. Rep. 337, where a tenant, who had put up certain gas works on the premises, entered into an agreement with his landlord for a new lease at a rack rent of the mill and factory and the steam engine, gas house, out buildings, and appurtenances to the same belonging, it was held that the words "gas works" which had been put up by the tenant were properly added to the lease.

In Ex parte Hemenway, 2 Low. Dec. 496, Fed. Cas. No. 6,346, the question was whether certain fixtures which could have been taken out during the term of the tenant who put them in, and who held under a written lease, could be claimed by a tenant's assignee in bankruptcy under a parol renewal.

After the written lease had run out, several tenants held under parol tenancies without any agreement with the landlord as to the fixtures. Each tenant transferred the fixtures to his successor by a bill of sale. It was held that the right of removal continued under the parol renewals of the first lease. The case turned upon the evident intent of the parties, which was found from the fact that there had been no agreement between the landlord and a succeeding tenant as to the fixtures, and that the fixtures had been passed from one tenant to another without notice to the landlord.

In Jungerman v. Bovee, 19 Cal. 355, it was held that the right of a tenant to remove buildings under a written lease was lost by taking a different lease for the accommodation of a new owner. The court said the inference from the new contract, and from the change of the terms of the old, was irresistible to show that the intent was to surrender the old lease. Effect could not otherwise be given to the express provisions of the last contract.

In McCarthy v. Trumacher, 108 Iowa, 284, 78 N. W. 1104, it was held that the tenant's right to certain buildings and fences put up during his first term under an oral agreement was not lost by signing a written lease without reserving the right to remove the improvements, because, by express agreement between the landlord and tenant, these improvements were determined to be chattel property with a right of removal in the tenant. The greater number of cases, the court said, held that the taking of a new lease which contained no agreement as to the fixtures operated as a surrender, and deprived the tenant of his right of removal, but that there were some well-considered cases the other way, citing Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 302, and Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, 34 N. W. 514, supra. It was held that when the written lease was executed it covered only the realty, and no more included the improvements than any other personalty belonging to the tenant upon the demised premises at the time; that the taking of the new lease did not in any way wise affect the tenant's right to personalty belonging to him. This view, the court said, had direct support in Wright v. Macdonnell, 88 Tex. 140, 30 S. W. 907, infra.

The Carlin and Bauernschmidt Cases, supra, were distinguished in O'Brien v. Mueller, 96 Md. 134, 53 Atl. 663, in which it appeared that the landlord had sold the tenant certain fixtures, giving him at the same time the right to carry them off at the end of the term. In a new lease no reservation was made of the fixtures. In Carlin's Case, as well as Bauernschmidt's, said the court, the decision was made on the principle that a lease ordinarily carries with it whatever is attached to the property, and that, when a tenant accepts such a lease, he acknowledges the title of the landlord to both the building and fixtures, and is therefore estopped from controverting it thereafter; but that such an estoppel could not arise, obviously, where the landlord himself had done some act which admitted that the articles in question were not a part of the realty, but personalty belonging to the tenant. "If, on the one hand, a tenant may do some act which will prevent him from setting up a claim as against the landlord," continued the court, "on the other hand, the landlord may also, by his agreement, equally estop himself from claiming that the fixtures are a part of the realty." It was held that the acceptance of a new lease therefore did not affect the right to take away the fixtures.

In Chaffee v. Fish, 2 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 89, the question was as to the tenant's right to take away a temporary wire fence after he had accepted a second lease in which the fence was not mentioned. The court held that he could, because it was the plain intention of the parties from the beginning to the end that the fence was not to become a part of the realty. No authorities as to the effect of the taking of a new lease or the right to remove fixtures were referred to by the court.

In Abell v. Williams, 3 Daly, 17, it was held that, independent of the question of surrender, the right of a lessee to remove buildings was gone when he accepted a new lease expressly demising them to him, and not reserving to him the right to take them away. The court said that, when a tenant accepted a new lease, and the privilege to remove the fixtures was not given by it, the right was gone; and that he was in the same situation as if the landlord, being seised of the land and fixtures, had expressly demised both to him.

Livingston v. Sulzer, 19 Hun, 375, was said to be taken out of the rule laid down in Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, because the new lease excepted such portion of the property as was owned by the tenant.

In Wright v. Macdonnell, 88 Tex. 140, 30 S. W. 907, Reversing (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 1024, it was held that, where the plain intention was that such structures as a house, railroad track, and coal chutes built on leased land should remain the property of the tenants, the right to remove them would not be lost by the acceptance of a new lease; and the court said that a tenant, making a new lease in lieu of a former one, might, as a part of the consideration proceeding from him, expressly or impliedly stipulate that fixtures theretofore or thereafter placed by him upon the land should, at the end of the term, become the property of the landlord. Where such was the proper construction of the contract, it was proper to hold that the tenant had surrendered his right to remove. "But," said the court, "whether it ought, as an original proposition, to have been held that the mere taking of a new lease without mention of the fixtures has such an effect, may be gravely doubted. There seems to be a vice in the argument, for the reason that it assumes that the tenant, in leasing the land, thereby also leases the fixtures. So long as the tenant has the right of removal, the fixtures are his; and, to assume that, by leasing the land upon which they are placed, he leases them of his landlord, is to assume that he intends to lease his own property. Whether it is or is not the intention of the parties in any particular case to make them the property of the landlord is the very point to be determined. An intention on part of the tenant to surrender a valuable right ought not to be lightly implied, though such intention might be made manifest by the circumstances of the particular case." The court showed a decided leaning to the views of Judge Cooley in the Michigan case, but held it unnecessary to determine the question; stating that the rule must yield to the intention of the parties to the lease, and construing the lease in that case in favor of the tenant. In the court of civil appeals it was held that a tenant's right to remove fixtures was lost by the taking of the new lease.

In a later case, Hertzberg v. Witte, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 320, 54 S. W. 921, the lower court still adhered to the soundness of the rule laid down in the majority of the cases, but held that a tenant should be allowed to show that, by special agreement, he had the right to remove buildings which he had put upon the soil. Upon the main question, the court said: "As the rule that a lessee loses his right to remove his fixtures by renewing his lease without reserving the fixtures on the premises has come down to us from the year books, . . . one of the great sources of the common law, undisturbed until questioned in Kerr v. Kingsbury, and passed the opinion of the great judges in that case with increased force and strength, it is not for us, upon an intimation of its disapproval by the supreme court of this state, to give it question."

The court, in Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, 34 N. W. 514, supra, said that there ought to be something more than the mere taking of a new lease extending the term to divest the tenant of his right to remove fixtures. If he accepted a lease which in express terms recognized the right of the landlord to the fixtures, and he agreed to pay rent for their use thereafter, and keep them in repair, and surrender their possession at the end of the new term, a strong case would be made out in favor of a surrender of the fixtures to the landlord by the acceptance of such new lease, and it would require very clear evidence that, notwithstanding the acceptance of such new lease, there was an agreement that the title to the fixtures should remain in the tenant; but it should be admitted that, if the general words of description in the new lease would, under ordinary circumstances, be deemed a lease of the fixtures as well as of the land and buildings, still the lease only raised a presumption that it was intended to cover the fixtures, and it was open to proof whether it was in fact intended to cover such fixtures, or whether they were intended by both parties to be excepted therefrom.

For the other cases on the question of intention, see the following heading.

V. Renewal or extension of old term.

Where the new agreement does not amount to the making of a new lease, but is merely a continuation or renewal of the old tenancy, the tenant's right to remove fixtures survives.

In Ross v. Campbell, 9 Colo. App. 38, 47 Pac. 465, after certain fixtures had been put in, a lease was extended for four years by indorsement on the back of the instrument. During the running of the extension, a fire made it necessary to remodel the building, and a new lease was made out for the balance of the term. It was contended that the acceptance of the new lease by the tenant operated as an extinguishment of the first tenancy, a surrender of the premises to the landlord; that, having failed to remove the fixtures under the first lease, the right to do so was gone; that, immediately upon the surrender, they became part of the freehold, and were included in the second lease as the property of the landlord. The trial court found that the tenant's occupancy of the premises after the execution of the second lease was, in effect, merely a continuation of the old tenancy; and the appellate court refused to disturb it, holding that the tenant's right to the fixtures was therefore not lost.

In Rovce v. Latshaw, 15 Colo. App. 420, 92 Pac. 627, it was also held, on the authority of Ross v. Campbell, supra, that a new lease was merely a continuation of the old tenancy; but the same question was not up, as the new lease gave the tenant the right to remove fixtures, and the dispute was between him and the purchaser at a foreclosure sale of the real estate under a trust deed executed before the second lease.

In Baker v. McClurg, 96 Ill. App. 165, it was held that where a partnership lease was canceled as to one partner, and a new lease, silent as to partnership fixtures, was made out for the balance of the term to the other partner, this amounted to a continuance of the old term; and that, therefore, the tenant's right to carry away the fixtures was not lost by accepting the new lease. The case was affirmed in 198 Ill. 28, 59 L. R. A. 137, 92 Am. St. Rep. 261, 64 N. E. 701, on the opinion of the court below.

In Hedderich v. Smith, 103 Ind. 205, 53 Am. Rep. 509, 2 N. E. 315, the court intimated that it would consider the rights of the parties to remain the same under an extension of the old lease upon the same terms.

In Howe's Cave Asso. v. Houck, 66 Hun. 205, 49 N. Y. S. R. 5, 21 N. Y. Supp. 40, Affirmed in 141 N. Y. 606, 36 N. E. 740, it was held that the right of a tenant to take off buildings put on the soil for trade purposes was not lost by an extension of the letting, the case turning upon the construction of the terms of the lease. Nothing was said as to the continuation of the tenancy under a new lease.

In Clarke v. Howland, 85 N. Y. 204, it was held that the continuance in possession by a tenant after the expiration of a written lease and the acceptance of rent by the landlord was a recognition of the covenants of the written lease, and an implied renewal of it; and that the tenant's right to remove buildings, reserved in the first lease, continued.

In Radey v. McCurdy, 209 Pa. 306, 67 L. R. A. 359, 103 Am. St. Rep. 1009, 58 Atl. 558, it was held that, where a tenant "took an extended and renewed lease" of certain premises, the right to take away trade fixtures was not destroyed. The court said that abandonment of fixtures was a question of intention, and that, under the undisputed facts of the case, the tenants had never intended to abandon their trade fixtures. To have removed them one day, said the court, and put them back the next, would have been a vain and useless thing which the law required of no one; and it offended reason to say that the landlord had a right to regard his tenant's property as abandoned to him because one of two tenants who was to continue as such for another year, needing the same fixtures in his unchanged business, had not, when the lease was extended and renewed, inserted a clause giving the tenants the right to remove the fixtures at the end of the extended term. The case was decided partly on the authority of the following stray statement of the court in Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346: "If a tenant remain in possession after the expiration of his term, and perform all the conditions of the lease, it amounts to a renewal of the lease from year to year; and I take it he would be entitled to remove fixtures during the year."

In Young v. Consolidated Implement Co. 23 Utah, 586, 65 Pac. 720, it was held that the right of the tenant to remove improvements was not lost where the new agreement did not amount to the making of a new lease. It was an extension merely of the terms and conditions of the old lease for a longer period of time. The facts of the case, the court said, took it out of the rule laid down in Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173.

RÉSUMÉ

GIVING a brief and comprehensive view of the points of special interest and importance in this volume.

- I. PUBLIC MATTERS AND RELATIONS.
- II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.
- III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.
- IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.
- V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.
- VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; NUISANCE.
- VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS.
- VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE.
- IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

I. PUBLIC MATTERS AND RELATIONS.

Appropriation of public money. A novel case involving the validity of legislative appropriation of money to pay the expense of attendance by the whole body of the Pennsylvania legislature on an excursion to New York to attend the dedication of the Grant monument held it valid. 409.

Branding or labeling goods. The California statute requiring fruit packed for shipment to be marked or branded to show the locality of its growth was held unconstitutional because not properly within the police power. It is in harmony with the cases in the note therewith. 184.

Conflict of laws. An attempt to enforce the exemption law of another state was unsuccessful in a West Virginia case, on the ground that such a law pertains to remedy. The note to the case shows that it is in accordance with the weight of authority, though there are some decisions to the contrary. 195.

Drains and sewers. The rule exempting municipalities from liability for consequential damages from its sewerage system held not to apply where the system was not constructed according to any regularly and properly adopted plan. 952.

Elections. The failure to number ballots under the Alabama statute requiring it is held not fatal; and this is in harmony with decisions in other states. 656.

Eminent domain. The irrigation of private lands is held, in Utah, to be a public purpose, for which land may be taken by condemnation. As shown by the note, this goes beyond the decisions in most other jurisdictions. 206. Another case in the same state holds that the construction of mining roads and tramways is also a public use.

1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

On this the authorities are divided, as shown by the note. 977. Power to confer the right of eminent domain to secure a right of way for a private railway is denied in a North Carolina case. 969. See also infra, III., Corporations.

Fire escapes. The effect of an official certificate of approval of fire escapes is held conclusive in favor of the property owner, as against civil liability to a person injured on account of alleged defects in them; and the weight of authority seems to support it. 1091.

Food. Police regulations to preserve the purity of milk appear in a series of St. Louis cases. One fixed the standard or quality of milk sold at 7-10 of 1 per cent ash. This was upheld, and the note shows it fully supported by the authorities. 918. Another provision of the ordinance prohibits the sale of milk with less than 3 per cent by weight of butter fat, to be estimated by a specified process. This was upheld; and the note shows other cases upholding the validity of particular tests. 926. The prohibition of preservatives in milk, though not deleterious to health, is also sustained. 928. Regulating the kind of food that cows may be fed, as a condition of the sale of their milk, is also sustained. 932. As one of the means of proper regulation of milk supply, it is also held that milk dealers may be compelled to register and pay the registration fee. The authorities are well agreed on this point. 936.

Intoxicating liquors. An attack on local-option law on the ground that its taking effect could not be made to depend upon a popular vote was unsuccessful, as it was held to become effective, by its enactment.

(CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.)

and not by a vote. 483. Questions as to possession of liquor as evidence of intent to sell, and of sales on vessels engaged in commerce, appear infra, IX.

License. A physician's claim that his license to practise could not be constitutionally revoked was unsuccessful in a Kansas case; and the decision logically follows from those in the note to the case, which upheld statutes requiring physicians to obtain a license. 811. The right of a city to require a license for the use of streets by a telephone company is denied in Wisconsin, where the statute authorizes the company to use the streets. 581. The revocability of a license to erect a building is denied in a Massachusetts case, in the absence of any reservation of such right; and the authorities in the note are to the same effect. 458. A New York case denies that the licensing of theaters and ticket brokers imposes any duties upon the one, or confers any rights upon the other, with reference to tickets, in addition to those conferred by the contract under which the ticket is sold. 1188.

Municipal corporations. Municipal power to legislate on subjects covered by statutes is denied in a Georgia case; but the note shows that the authorities are in hopeless conflict on the subject. 382. The right of local self-government in Rhode Island, which has been strongly urged in view of the peculiar origin of that state, is denied, as against the statute regulating the police force of the state. 512. The distinction between private and public functions of a municipality is considered in a Massachusetts case, which denies municipal liability for negligence of the city superintendent of the lamp department in respect to an unsafe lamp post. 664. An ordinance requiring certain kind of fenders on street cars, or some others, equally as good, approved by certain officials, is held invalid in Indiana because of the arbitrary discretion given to the officials. This seems to go somewhat further than the earlier decisions. 940.

Statutes. A statute to cure a constitutional defect in a previous statute is upheld in an Iowa case; and the cases in the note seem to support it in the main. 431.

An enactment that a C. O. D. sale of liquors shipped to a local-option territory shall be deemed to be made there is held void in Texas on the ground that the state Constitution, commanding the enactment of certain local-option law, impliedly prohibited further legislation on the subject. As to such implied prohibition by constitutional mandate, the note shows decided conflict in the cases. 489.

Taxes. The taxability of an easement acquired by laying pipes in a street under a franchise is upheld in a Maryland case, on the ground that the easement is property distinct from the franchise. Cases in the note show various instances in which similar easements are held taxable as real estate. 263. Probate fees based on the value of the estate are held unconstitutional in a Washington case. 152. The collateral inheritance tax is upheld in a Pennsylvania case as to real estate in other states, which the executors must sell to pay legacies. On the doctrine of equitable conversion, here applied, the decisions appear to be in conflict. 400. A suit against a state officer to cancel a tax title is held in a New York case to be within the rule that a state cannot be sued. 727. In opposition to the rule generally accepted, a Kentucky case holds that property of a water company owned by a city is not used for a public purpose, but is taxable. 766.

Water rates. Unpaid water rates of an occupant of premises were held in an Illinois case not to be collectible from a subsequent occupant after a lien therefor is lost. 770.

Waters. The power of the Federal government to grant tide lands lying between high and low water marks within a territory is sustained in a Washington case. 745. A consumer's right to maintain a suit to compel a water company to furnish water at rates stipulated in a contract with a municipality was upheld in a New York case. 958. That a water company may be compelled by mandamus to supply an individual applicant with water at reasonable rates is held in a Maine case. 963.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Failure to file bond. Recovery for threshing grain was denied for failure to file the bond required by the South Dakota statute, making it unlawful to use a threshing machine without executing and filing a bond. The note to the case shows a considerable conflict of authority on the general question as to the effect of failure to procure a statutory license upon the validity of contracts. 1159.

Mutuality. A written contract, signed by both parties, appointing plaintiffs defendant's exclusive agents to sell the latter's product held not wanting in mutuality as to prevent an action for damages for its breach. 445.

Rescission. The general rule requiring a party, seeking to rescind a contract for non-performance by the other, to restore or tender back what has been received from the latter, held not to apply where defendant agreed to teach plaintiff, and, after beginning the course of instruction, refused to proceed further. 379.

Duress. Refusal to pay money admitted to be due, except upon receiving a certain kind of receipt, held not to constitute such duress as to render the receipt void. 867.

Services by relative. An exception to the rule denying an implied contract to pay for services rendered to relatives was made in case of a woman claiming against her brother's estate for nursing and other menial services performed for him, after he had been taken into her home, without benefit to her. 819.

Banks. A claim of preference on account of a special trust fund held by an insolvent bank was denied because the only cash assets in the bank at the time it closed its doors were the identical currency and checks received from depositors on that day. 252. A gift inter vivos held not to be established by depositing a fund in a bank with the statement that it was intended for the donee, and the delivery to the latter of a certificate of deposit with an indorsement indicating that it was his. 790. The right of a bank to apply to the personal obligations of a commission merchant money received for produce sent him for sale and deposited by him in his general account in the bank was denied in a Wisconsin case. 1110.

Bills and notes. The rule making certainty as to payment a condition of negotiability was applied by denying the negotiability of a note payable upon the confirmation by Congress of a certain land grant. 1120. A purchaser of an interest-bearing certificate of deposit payable to and indorsed by one as "trustee" held, under uniform negotiable instrument law, to be prima facie and presumptively charged with actual knowledge of the trustee's want of authority to dispose of the paper for his own benefit. 188. One whose indorsement was secured upon a note by the trick of inducing him to sign his name to a paper placed upon the note in such a way that the ink penetrated through to the note was held not to be liable. 1075.

Bill of lading. A bank purchasing a draft with bill of lading attached making goods deliverable to order of consignor held to have assumed the obligation of the seller to deliver the property, according to the contract, to the drawee of the draft. 242.

Carriers. What is a reasonable time to keep a station platform lighted prior to the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

arrival of a train held to present a question for the jury. 851. Injuries caused by gross negligence held to be included in a release, by a sleeping car porter, of the railroad company from liability for negligent injury. 674. A railroad company was held liable to a passenger thrown to the ground by the starting of a freight train with a jerk while he was on the platform, to which, with the knowledge of the conductor, he had gone for a necessary purpose, the conductor having neither warned him of the danger, nor taken any measures to prevent the starting of the train. 1145. A father paying full fare was allowed to recover for loss of articles of his infant child, packed and carried with his baggage, although the child paid no fare. 353. The approval by the state commission of a freight rate based upon limited valuation of the property held not to have absolved the carrier from liability for full value of the property if lost through its negligence. 985.

Guaranty. A guaranty of payment for property shipped held not to be effected by a warehouseman's reply to a letter requesting information about a broker, that he considered him reliable,—especially as all shipments would come to the warehouse, and payment "would be made by us to you for all sales." 305.

Insurance. A marine underwriter held not liable for a loss occurring through the deliberate act of the master in pushing through dangerous ice for the purpose of reaching his destination quickly. An exhaustive note as to the effect of voluntary exposure to peril upon liability under a marine insurance policy is added to this case. 1095. An injury to the hand, superinduced by numbness resulting from using it as a head-rest during sleep, held to be covered by insurance against injuries through external and accidental means. 422. The right of the holder of an assessment policy from a company having the right to issue policies on both the assessment and reserve plans, to require the company to continue the issuance of assessment policies, is denied in a North Carolina case. 623. The adoption of a by-law by a fraternal insurance order, excluding from membership persons engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors, held not to avoid the certificate of a member already engaged in that business, and who continued therein after the adoption of the by-law. 1064.

Judgment. An assignment of judgment held not to carry with it a right of action against an officer and sureties on his bond for failure properly to return a forthcoming bond upon the judgment. 149.

Partnership. An agreement by a partner that the goods of the firm may be paid for by the customer in commodities furnished for the partner's own benefit held to be void as beyond the scope of the partner's apparent authority. 650. An exception to the rule denying a surviving partner compensation for his services applied by holding that he is entitled to compensation for the part of the work in completing a construction contract which the deceased, according to the agreement between them, would have contributed had he lived. 643.

Property in custody of law. A sale under a power in a chattel mortgage while the property was in the custody of sheriff, under levy made after advertisement of the mortgage sale, held to be void and ineffectual. An exhaustive note on the right to sell property while in custody of law is appended to this case. 1055.

Sale. Notice of the failure of a machine to work was held to be waived by the continued efforts of the seller's agent to make the machine work after the expiration of the time limited for the notice. 142.

Salvage. The owners of a tug, whose fault caused the wreck of its tow, were denied salvage for services rendered by another vessel belonging to them, in raising and bringing the wreck into a port of refuge. 873.

Theater tickets. A right of action for trespass for failure to provide the seat called for by a theater ticket was denied in a Pennsylvania case upon the ground that the owner of the theater was under no implied obligation to serve the public, and that the only remedy was assumpsit for breach of contract. 1184. A New York case holds that the licensing of theaters and ticket brokers imposes no duties upon one, and confers no rights upon the other, with reference to tickets, in addition to those conferred by the contract under which the ticket is sold. The last case also holds that a condition of a theater ticket, that it will not be honored if sold on the sidewalk, is not against public policy. 1188.

Time. The word "noon," denoting the beginning and termination of risks under an insurance policy, was, in accordance with the prevailing custom in the community, interpreted by standard, and not by sun, time. 364. The legal fiction that there are no fractions of a day held to have no application to cases where the statute expressly requires that notice shall be taken of the precise time an official act is done, and a record thereof made. 835.

Trademark. A trademark held not to be assignable apart from the good will of the business to which it was attached. An exhaustive note on the subject of sale of trademarks is appended to the case. 704. A limitation upon the right of one to use his own name in his own business was applied in a California case, holding that one who had established a business under a particular name, which he placed on the hats of his agents to inform customers that they were his representatives, could enjoin another of the same name, engaged in the same business, from using such name as a hat label in substantially the same way as the former, so as to deceive the public. This limitation of the right to use one's own name in his business seems to be sustained by the authorities. 660.

Umpire's decision. Fraud or mistake on the part of an umpire, so great and palpable as to imply bad faith, or his failure fairly and honestly to perform the function assigned to him, held to invalidate his decision. 1050.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Corporations. A North Carolina case upholds the right to take, by eminent domain, the stock of dissenting stockholders in a railroad company for the purpose of effecting a consolidation of the road with others to create a through line. An exhaustive note on the condemnation of shares of minority stockholders is appended to the case. 604. One who organized a corporation for the transaction of his personal business was held personally liable for money received by him for investment, in return for which he delivered a worthless obligation of the corporation. 176. A stockholder, who was also a secretary of a corporation, was denied the right to recover against other officers for representations by which he was induced to dispose of his stock 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) at a loss. 258. The constitutionality of a statute requiring foreign corporations doing business within the state, and nonresident domestic corporations, to appoint the auditor as attorney to accept service of process and notice, is, in accordance with the weight of authority, upheld in a West Virginia case. 558. A Kansas case holds that contracts made with a foreign corporation before it has obtained permission to do business in a state are not, for that reason, invalid, or subject to cancellation at suit of one of the contracting parties. 1041. The right of a state to revoke the license of a foreign insurance company for refusal to perform its agreement not to remove suits against it to the Federal courts is upheld in a Kentucky case; and, as shown by the note to the case, this appears to be in harmony with the position of the Federal Supreme Court. 1019. An unconstitutional impairment of contract was held to be effected by a change of the law permitting individual creditors of a corporation to enforce their claims against individual stockholders, so as to provide one suit in equity in behalf of all creditors, to which all stockholders may become parties, and abate suits pending under the former law. 1171.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

Legitimation. That illegitimate children were the result of adulterous intercourse was held not to prevent the subsequent intermarriage of their parents, and their acknowledgment by their father, from effecting their legitimation under the Illinois statute; and it was further held that the acknowledgment by the father, required by the statute, was not necessarily such as to show an intention to include the children among his heirs. 773.

Infant's contract. A minor was held bound by a stipulation that suit for breach of contract to transmit telegram must be brought within sixty days. This appears to be a case of first impression. 525.

V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.

Executors; trust. A right of action for negligently killing a person held, in accordance with the preponderance of authority, to be an asset of his estate, sufficient to warrant appointment of an administrator. 885. That nonresidents may be denied permission to act as executors of local estates is affirmed in an Illinois case (341); but a Michigan case holds that a nonresident alien is not an incompetent executor, under a statute which provides that, if any executor shall reside out of the state, the court may remove him (349). An exhaustive note on the right of nonresidents to act as executors or administrators is appended to the Illinois case. The right of equity to change the number of trustees from that designated by the creator of the trust, when changed conditions render it necessary, is upheld in a New Hampshire case. The note to this case discloses a decided conflict of authority upon the question. 802.

Power of attorney. The common-law rule that notice to the agent is necessary to revoke a power of attorney to convey real estate is held not to be abrogated by the Wisconsin statute merely authorizing the recording of such power, and providing that, if recorded, the instrument of revocation must also be recorded to be valid. 577.

Principal and agent. The right of an agent, in the absence of objection by the principal, to enforce a contract made in his own name for an undisclosed principal, was upheld, notwithstanding that the signature to the contract was actually affixed by a subagent. 303. The authority of an agent to collect a mortgage indebtedness was held, presumptively and in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, to continue until he obtained the money, the securities having remained in his possession. 891.

Commission merchant. The right of a bank to apply to the personal obligations of a commission merchant money received by him for produce sent him for sale, and deposited by him in his general account in the bank, was denied in a Wisconsin case. 1110.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; NUISANCE.

Electric wires. The violation of a municipal ordinance as to the manner of stringing the electric-light wire which charged a broken telephone wire, or the imperfect insulation of the wire, held not to be the proximate cause of an injury to a boy who seized the broken telephone wire to receive a shock. 822.

Death. It is held, under the Minnesota statute, that an action for the death of a minor child must be for the sole benefit of the father, although he has deserted the family, to whose support the deceased was, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) at the time of his death; contributing. The note shows that there are but few cases directly in point. 1161.

Enticement. Hiring, at his own request, without notice of the father's objection, a minor who has been hired out by the father to work for another, was held not to support an action for enticement. 205. The right of a woman residing with her husband to maintain an action for the enticement of her minor child was denied. 302.

Assault. Assisting in the elopement of a minor girl held not to justify the father in administering a whipping to the one so doing, after the lapse of a sufficient cooling time. 137.

Fires. The owner of a threshing-machine engine was held not to have fulfilled his duty to guard against fires by merely adopting a spark arrester in general use, where he had been in the habit of using an additional spark arrester, which he had allowed to become out of order at the time the fire occurred. 530. A railroad company was held liable for setting fire to lumber stacked with its consent on its right of way at the place usually occupied by lumber awaiting transportation, although the lumber in question had not been delivered to it for that purpose. 533.

Railroad crossings. An overhead bridge crossing of a highway held to be within a statute requiring signals to be given when a train approaches a place where the railroad crosses a highway. 307.

Surgeon. A surgeon who had undertaken to perform an operation upon a patient's right ear held to be liable for injuries resulting from the performance of an operation on her left ear, which he deemed to be in greater need of an operation than the right ear, unless he had her express or implied consent; and whether she had impliedly consented was for the jury. 439.

Nuisance. The power of the legislature to authorize a railroad company to create a private nuisance with immunity from liability to the owners of property damaged thereby is denied in two Tennessee cases. 49, 97. A contrary position is taken in a Kansas case. 113. A note to the first case shows a great conflict of authority and divergence of views on this important subject. A public official, intrusted with the custody of a government building, held to be bound to obey the provisions of a statute forbidding the emission of dense smoke from chimneys. 878.

Escape of water. The owner of an irrigation ditch was held not exempted from liability, under the Wyoming statute, for injury to adjoining land through seepage caused by negligence in constructing and grading the bottom of the ditch, because the statute contained no specific requirements in that respect. 596.

Manufacturer's liability. A company manufacturing and bottling a beverage held to be liable to one injured by swallowing pieces of glass while drinking from one of such bottles, which he procured from a merchant, who had purchased the same from the manufacturer. 1178.

Liability of proprietor of place of entertainment. The measure of duty of the owner of a place of amusement with respect to safety of places provided for the patrons is declared to be the exercise of reasonable care, and not the high degree of care analogous to that which a carrier is bound to exercise at common law. 427.

Fellow servants. The assignment of servants of the same master to separate departments of the same general enterprise held not to affect their relation as fellow servants, unless the departments are so far disconnected that each may be regarded as a separate undertaking. 682. The degree of care which a master is required to use to keep himself informed as to the habits and characters of servants employed with due care is declared by the circuit court of appeals. 288. It was held in a Massachusetts case that a master's direction to a servant to do a certain act obviously dangerous to fellow servants, unless preceded by an adequate notice, must be interpreted as a direction to perform the act in a proper way; and that the failure of the master to warn the servant of the necessity of giving such notice did not render him liable to a fellow servant injured in consequence of the failure to give the notice. 669. Railway employees engaged in operating a steam shovel in a gravel pit held not to be engaged in operating a railway within a statute abrogating the fellow-servant rule. 696. A barnman of a street railway company, charged with the duty of substituting a perfect car for one which has become disabled, held not to be a fellow servant of the conductors on the road. 670.

Assumption of risk. One who engages to work in saving property from the débris left by a fire held to assume the risk of injury from falling walls where the peril is open and obvious. 272. A youth sixteen years old held to have assumed the risk of injury plainly apparent from coming in contact with exposed gears, though not expressly warned of the danger. 278.

Contributory negligence. An engineer of a work train held not to be guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in placing his engine on the main track on the time of a fast train. 1014.

Duty to furnish and inspect appliances. A railroad company which purchased lantern globes of standard make from reliable manufacturers held not bound to inspect them to protect employees from injuries by their breaking while being cleaned. 944. The right of an employee to hold his master liable for injuries caused by the latter's breach of duty to furnish an independent contractor with safe appliances for the performance of the work was denied in a Washington case. 283.

Automobiles. Various questions respecting the statutory and common-law rights, duties, and liabilities of persons operating automobiles are discussed and decided in an Illinois case and an Indiana case, and an exhaustive note on the subject is appended to the first case. 215, 238.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS.

Bankruptcy. A discharge in bankruptcy held not to release an unliquidated liability for damages for abandoning a leased house without locking the doors, so that it was entered and damaged by a stranger. 201. It is held that the Federal courts, in a bankruptcy case, will apply the general rule that a loan by a wife to her husband upon her separate estate creates an equity in her favor notwithstanding decisions of the local state courts to the contrary. 321. An adjudication of bankruptcy, upon a petition alleging that the debtor had made an unlawful preference to a firm held not to estop the firm, in a subsequent suit by the trustee in bankruptcy, to show that, prior to the bankruptcy proceedings, they sold certain goods to the bankrupt relying on representations made by him, and, upon discovering that they were false, rescinded the sale and retook their goods. 386.

Adverse possession. A grantee from a mortgagor who took possession of a strip beyond the true boundary line was held not to be in adverse possession as against the mortgagee until the mortgage became due. 1036. Inclosure of a right of way held not sufficient possession to ripen into an adverse title. 565.

Finder. Property hidden in the earth near a marked tree was held not to have been lost, so as to vest title in the finder as against the owner of the soil, although it had remained so long as to indicate that the owner was dead or had forgotten it. 477.

Homestead. A constructive trust held not to have arisen under a deed, by a man to his wife, of the homestead property, with a proviso that after her death it was to go to another, she being entitled, on his death, to the absolute title to the property by right of survivorship. 312.

License. Right to display a sign on the wall of a building, given in writing for a definite time for a valuable consideration, was held not to be revocable at will. 359.

Deeds. The naming, as grantee, of a partnership the members of which had died, but the name of which had been perpetuated and the property kept together by consent of all parties interested, held not to render a deed void. 157. It was held in a California case that no estate is granted by a clause in a deed, which, after granting a life estate, declared that it was the purpose of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the grantor that, after the death of the life tenant, the lands should become and be the property of a certain institution. 315. A grant to the "heirs" of a living person construed as meaning his children. 318. Property conveyed to a railroad company for a right of way, by a general warranty deed, held to revert to the adjoining owner upon the abandonment of its use for that purpose. 806.

Mortgage. The right of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale to the income of the property before the title became perfect in him was denied, notwithstanding a stipulation in the mortgage that, in case of foreclosure, "a receiver shall be appointed to collect the income, which shall be paid to the person entitled to a deed under the certificate of sale." 1079. That an assignment of real estate in the nature of an equitable mortgage may, by agreement of the parties, be kept alive after payment, so as to be valid security for a larger loan subsequently made, is affirmed in a Pennsylvania case. 405. Taking possession of after-acquired stock in trade, under a chattel mortgage, held to give the mortgagee precedence on a subsequent attachment. 451.

Fraudulent conveyance. The right to cancel a voluntary conveyance of real estate, made to place it beyond the reach of a judgment in an anticipated action, was denied as against the heirs of the grantee, although the threatened action had no foundation in law, and the grantee upon being notified of the conveyance, promised to reconvey on demand. An exhaustive note on the recovery of nonexempt property conveyed to avoid nonexistent or unfounded demands is appended to this case. 1007.

Landlord and tenant. One who took possession of premises under an arrangement with the grantor, and subsequently agreed to pay rent to the grantee for a certain period, held not to be estopped to deny liability to the latter for rent after the expiration of the term of such agreement although he remained in possession of the premises. 1181. A tenant was held to have lost his right to remove trade fixtures placed on the premises by entering into a new lease containing no recognition of his title to the fixtures, and binding him to surrender the premises in as good state and condition as reasonable use and wear would permit. An exhaustive note as to the effect of renewing tenancy without reserving the right to remove fixtures is appended to this case. 1192.

Wills. That there may be a valid devise to one for life with power of disposition, which will not affect the remainder over unless the power is exercised, is held in a Maryland case. This, as shown in the note, is in accord with the great weight of authority. 782. The right of an heir, under a will directing the residue to be divided between the testator's heirs, held not to be cut down by a subsequent codicil giving him a specific legacy, "and no more." 397. A vested remainder held to be created by a will giving the testator's widow authority to spend the principal and income, and providing that, at her death, all of the testator's property which she may possess shall be disposed of equally among his surviving children. 1005. The California statute providing that foreign wills admitted to probate in other states may be allowed probate in the county in which the testator left real estate held not to permit the will of a resident to be probated in another state, and then brought into California for secondary or ancillary administration. 996. Attestation of a will in another room, out of range of the testator's vision, held not to be within a statutory requirement that it shall be in his presence; and the defect is not cured by the subsequent acknowledgment by the witness, or ratification and approval by the testator. 393.

Waters. The unrestrained exercise, for thirty years, of the right to cast sawdust in a stream, held to create no prescriptive rights which will restrict the public right to regulate the use of the stream for such purpose, in order to preserve food fishes. 752. Water flowing in one direction over the surface without a well-defined channel, from a swamp fed by springs, to the channel of a stream, held to be a water course which cannot be diverted to the injury of a riparian owner. 756. An important decision is rendered in Nebraska, to the effect that the title to the bed of a navigable river is in the state, and the rights of the riparian owner are bounded by the banks of the river. The note calls attention to the tendency to ignore the distinction between navigable and tidal rivers. 762.

Street railway. The laying of a street-railway track under municipal authority so near a sidewalk, at a point where the streets intersect at an acute angle, that passing cars will overhang it a few inches, held to give an abutting owner no right of action, the title to the street being in the municipality. 981.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE.

Appeal; review. An exception to the general rule that an appeal does not lie from a decree for costs applied in case of a decree for costs not in the discretion of the court. 1083. The right to supersedeas pending appeal held not to extend to an appeal from an order enjoining continued operation of a shooting gallery. 554. A supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review held to be a proper proceeding to bring before the court new matter discovered by defendant while the decree is in process of execution. 1029. The failure of the court, in a criminal case, to interpose objections to improper questions made by a journeyman, held not to be necessarily reversible error in the absence of objection or exception by counsel. 839.

Evidence; witnesses. Rule res ipsa loquitur held not to make a prima facie case, or raise a presumption of negligence, but merely to furnish an element to be considered by the jury as a part of the plaintiff's case. This case observes distinction often overlooked by the courts. 298. A deduction that declarations were made under a sense of impending death, without hope of recovery, held to be warranted, although they were made several hours after the statement of the declarant that he did not believe he could get well, he having grown continually weaker in the meantime. 419. A waiver with respect to confidential disclosures made to physician by insured concerning his last sickness held to have been effected by a stipulation in a contract of life insurance to the effect that proofs of death shall consist in part of the affidavit of attending physician, which shall state the cause of his death, and such other information as may be required by the insurer. 1068.

Pleading. Naming defendant individually in the title, and stating a cause of action against him as trustee, held to render the complaint demurrable. 161.

Damages. Evidence that a boy injured by another's negligence was obedient and economical held admissible upon the question of damages. 198. Evidence of earnings of persons proficient in trade held not admissible upon question of damages for negligently killing an apprentice. 1150. A bank guilty of negligence in making a collection so that the rights on the paper are lost held not to be liable for the face of the paper.

but only for the amount lost through the neglect. 246.

Replevin. A seller held to have the right to maintain replevin against the purchaser on the ground of special ownership and right of possession, where the property has been set apart and identified, and the title vested in the purchaser, whose tender of the balance due on the purchase price is insufficient in amount owing to fraud or mistake in measurement; but further held that the seller cannot maintain such action under the claim of absolute ownership, without rescinding the contract of sale, and tendering back the amount paid. 474.

Judgment; divorce. A decree of divorce rendered against a nonresident on service by publication held to be void and subject to collateral attack where the record failed to show that there was an affidavit of nonresidence, as required by statute. 740. A decree of divorce held not to be subject to be vacated after the death of one of the parties. 551.

Preference; exemptions. The state held to have no preference over other creditors for payment of losses and unearned premiums out of assets in hands of receiver of an insolvent insurance company. 254. The right to have personal property exempted from forced sale held not to be forfeited on the ground of nonresidence until removal has commenced, although the intention to leave the state permanently has been formed, and the property delivered for shipment to a point outside the state. 778.

Limitation of actions. A legacy reciting that it was in consideration of the legatee's care for the testator's invalid mother held not to be an acknowledgment of a legal obligation which would remove the bar of the statute of limitations. 1117. A holder of a demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank held to be under no obligation to demand payment within the period of the statute of limitations. 1130. The statute of limitations held not to begin to run against an unpaid subscription until demand is made for payment, where, by the terms of the contract, it is not payable until called for. An exhaustive note on the question as to when the statute of limitations begins to run against the unpaid balance of a stock subscription is added to this case. 900. A statute providing that no action shall be brought on a claim for usury after two years from the time the cause of action arose, held not to affect rights of action which accrued prior to its passage. 528.

Injunction. The jurisdiction of civil courts over injunction proceedings instituted to protect personal rights is declared in terms, in a Louisiana case. The note shows that, while the contrary declaration is common ly made by courts and text writers, such jurisdiction has not infrequently been exercised in actual cases. 1147. The power of a court of equity to prevent majority stockholders from exercising their statutory power to reduce the capital stock in order to relieve defaulting stockholders from meeting their obligations was asserted in a Wisconsin case. 571. An injunction to restrain a lessee from continuing to mine ores on the leased property after a forfeiture of the lease for breach of conditions was upheld, although the title was disputed, and no action had been instituted at law. 332. An exception to the rule that equity will not specifically enforce, as between parties in pari delicto, a contract which is opposed to public policy, was applied in a Washington case by restraining the breach of a contract to furnish a supply of electricity to a street car and electric lighting company upon the ground that such breach would result in a great public inconvenience. 1032.

Mandamus. Mandamus held to lie to compel payment of salary to a public officer alleged to have been removed from office. 588.

Prohibition. A writ of prohibition to prevent proceedings under a statute providing for the removal of an incumbent from a public office held not to be prevented by the fact that the statute is unconstitutional, relief having been denied petitioner in the lower court, and there being no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. 843.

Quo warranto. The district court held to have no discretion to refuse leave to the attorney general to file an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, directed to a municipal corporation, requiring it to show cause why its franchise should not be declared null and void. 826.

Removal of cause. A nonresident joined as defendant in an action to recover damages for negligence held to have no right to a removal of the case to the Federal court by putting in issue the fact of negligence on the part of his codefendant. 370. The state, and not the Federal, court, held to be the proper tribunal to determine the question of the right to remove to the latter an action begun in the former, against a nonresident railroad company and its resident employee jointly. 375.

Self incrimination. A witness was denied the privilege against self incrimination by virtue of a statute affording him a coextensive immunity from prosecution. 167.

Profert and oyer. The well-established rule that neither profert can be made, nor oyer demanded, of an instrument, is applied in a West Virginia case. 777.

RESUME.
(CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.)

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

Imprisonment of person acquitted on ground of insanity. The constitutionality of a statute providing for the imprisonment of one acquitted of the charge of murder on the ground of insanity is upheld in a Washington case. An exhaustive note on the subject is appended to this case. 540.

Credit for good behavior. The authority conferred on a board of commissioners to fix the credits to be allowed to convicts for good behavior held to be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. 520.

Information. The power of the legislature to authorize the institution of prosecutions for common-law felonies by information without indictment is upheld in a Vermont case. 1153.

Contempt. The jurisdiction of a committing magistrate to punish for contempt a witness who refused to obey a subpoena duces tecum is denied in a South Dakota case. 1135.

Bail. The authority of a clerk of a district court to take a bail bond was denied in an Oklahoma case. 849.

Intoxicating liquors. The power of a state to require the keeper of a bar on a ferryboat making regular trips from another state, where it is owned, to pay a license tax for the privilege of selling liquors while the boat is in the former state, is upheld in a Tennessee case. 639. The constitutionality of a statute making the possession of liquor prima facie evidence of intent to violate the statute against illegal sales is upheld in a North Carolina case. 626.

Bastardy. A dismissal, without prejudice, of a bastardy proceeding before a justice of the peace, held not to be a bar to a subsequent proceeding before another justice upon the same issue. 470.

Forgery. Uttering a letter with a forged signature for the purpose of falsely representing the bearer to be a friend of the writer, and giving him standing with persons to whom it may be presented, held to be forgery under the New York statute. 730.

Homicide. Mere violation of a statute making it a misdemeanor to hunt on another's property without a permit held not to be such an unlawful act as to render an accidental homicide committed while so doing a criminal offense. 991.

Larceny. One who induced another to part with money as a wager on a pretended event which was not to take place, with the intention of appropriating it to his own use, held to be guilty of larceny in making such appropriation. 862.

Robbery. Officers were held guilty of robbery where, after arresting a person, they forcibly searched him, and took from him valuables, with the intention of keeping them. 1024.

1. The owner of a threshing machine who fails to file the bond required by a statute making it unlawful to use such machine without executing and filing a bond cannot maintain an action to recover compensation for threshing grain, even for one having knowledge of such failure. Johnson v. Berry (S. D.) 1159

2. A contract made by an agent in his own name, without disclosing his principal, is not void, but may be enforced by the agent in the absence of objection by the principal; and it is immaterial that the signature to the contract is actually affixed by a sub-agent, where his act was authorized by all parties in interest. Shelby v. Burrow (Ark.) 303

3. A consumer may maintain a suit to compel a water company to furnish water at the rates stipulated in the contract between the company and the municipality, made at the time the right to lay mains in the streets was granted to the company. Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co. (N. Y.) 958

Conditions precedent.

4. A proceeding in equity to set aside the decision of an engineer, which, by the contract, is to be final and conclusive between the parties, is not a condition precedent to an action at law to recover the money due under the contract, where the work has been satisfactorily completed by the one party and accepted by the other. Edwards v. Hartshorn (Kan.) 1050

Election of remedies.

5. A theater ticket is a mere license, for the revocation of which before the holder has actually been given and has taken his seat, the only remedy is in assumpsit for breach of the contract. Horney v. Nixon (Pa.) 1184

6. One who sells goods in reliance upon material misrepresentations by the purchaser may, on rescinding the sale on discovery of the fraud, reclaim all the property which can be recovered, and he has a right of action against the purchaser as to 1229

that which he cannot recover, based on the theory of the conversion by the purchaser of the goods not found, or an action based on the contract implied by law, where the purchaser has disposed of the goods for money and the seller has waived the tort; but he cannot proceed both under the contract of sale and against it. Silvey v. Tift (Ga.) 386

7. If one of two contracting parties claims that the other has committed a breach of the contract, he cannot, in the same action, both treat the contract as rescinded and sue for the amount paid by him to the other party, and at the same time rely on the contract as existing. Timmerman v. Stanley (Ga.) 379

Joinder.

8. A railroad company may be sued jointly with the servant whose negligence caused an injury, although it was not independently at fault. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

9. A servant whose negligent act while conducting his employer's business causes injury to another, and his principal, may be sued jointly to recover damages for the injury. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley (Ky.) 370

10. Although a claim for expenses in attending school, expenses pending suit, and for delay in being prepared for business cannot be joined with a claim for the return of money paid on an agreement to teach the plaintiff in certain lines of instruction until he is proficient therein on the ground that such contract has been rescinded, the entire suit should not be dismissed, but such formal claims for damages should be stricken out, and the case left to stand on the suit for the return of the money so paid out. Timmerman v. Stanley (Ga.) 379

Necessary parties.

Signer of Contract to Purchase Machine as, see EVIDENCE, 15.

11. Parties necessary to the administration of substantial justice may be directed to be brought in at any time, either before or after judgment. Walker v. Miller (N. C.) 157

12. A surety on a contract for the purchase of a machine is not a necessary party to proceedings by cross petition on behalf of the purchaser, when sued by an assignee on the purchase-money notes, to recover against the seller for breach of his warranty of the machine. First Nat. Bank v. Dutcher (Iowa) 142

Venue.

13. The residence of the personal representative of one killed by negligence, and not that of deceased, is referred to in a statute permitting an action for negligent injuries by a railroad company to be brought in the county of the plaintiff's residence if the carrier passes into it. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Stith (Ky.) 1014

1. Mere possession under a deed which includes a strip belonging to a stranger for a right of way, but which the grantor had a right to fence in, is not sufficient to ripen into an adverse title, since it is consistent with the title of the true owner. Pritchard v. Lewis (Wis.) 565

2. Where a mortgage is a mere security, a grantee, from a mortgagor, of land adjoining the mortgaged premises, who takes possession of a strip beyond the true boundary line, cannot be regarded as in adverse possession against the mortgagee until the mortgage becomes due. Thornely v. Andrews (Wash.) 1036

3. Where a mortgage is a mere security, the lien of which expires if not enforced or renewed in six years, failure to enforce the lien against the grantee, from the mortgagor, of land adjoining the mortgaged tract, who took adverse possession of a strip of the mortgaged property along the boundary between the two tracts, until the lien of the mortgage expires as to it, places the grantee in the same situation as though no mortgage had existed, and his possession is adverse from the time it begins, and not from the maturity of the mortgage. 1d.

2. The owner of a place of amusement is not liable for injury to a patron by a bottle carelessly dropped by a musician from a band stand erected over seats provided for patrons. Id.

3. Reasonable care is the measure of duty under which the owner of a place of amusement rests with respect to the safety of places provided for patrons. Id.

Privilege of Witness Subpoenaed to Testify as to Violations of, see WITNESSES, 1, 2.

1. The provision of the Kansas anti-trust law of 1897, § 5, that every person, company, or corporation violating any of the provisions of the act be denied the right of, and prohibited from, doing any business within the state, contemplates the prohibiting of the continuance of, or the engagement in, business, only when such business is in violation of the act. State v. Jack (Kan.) 167

2. The provision of the Kansas anti-trust law of 1897, § 7, that in any civil action there may be pleaded in defense that the plaintiff, or any person interested in the prosecution, has, within one year, been guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of the act, contemplates only civil actions relating to and growing out of transactions prohibited by the act. Id.

3. The Kansas anti-trust law of 1897 is not in contravention of the provisions of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., but is a valid exercise of legislative power. Id.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

What cases appealable.

1. Although an appeal will not ordinarily lie from a decree for costs only in a chancery suit, there are exceptions to the rule, depending on the question of the discretionary power of the trial court as to costs. Nutter v. Brown (W. Va.) 1083

2. A decree for such costs as are discretionary is not appealable; but a decree for costs not in the discretion of the court is appealable under W. Va. Const. art. 8, § 3, if they amount to more than $100. Id.

3. A decree allowing expenses and compensation of a receiver out of the fund, with a provision that it shall ultimately be paid to the party entitled to the fund by his adversary, is appealable. Id.

4. Extraordinary costs, such as allowances of expenses and compensation of receivers, either as between the receiver and the fund in court and parties, or as between 1 L.P.A. (N.S.)

party and party, are not discretionary, and a decree respecting such costs is appealable. Id.

Supersedeas.

5. The right to supersedeas pending appeal does not extend to an appeal from an order enjoining continued operation of a shooting gallery and mechanical musical instruments. State ex rel. Gibson v. Pierce County Super. Ct. (Wash.) 554

6. The filing of a supersedeas bond upon appealing from an order refusing to proceed with a case as an equitable action does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to proceed with the trial as one at law. First Nat. Bank v. Dutcher (Iowa) 142

Record on appeal.

7. An abstract of the declaration is included in a rule of court requiring an appellant to furnish the court with a complete abstract of the record. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

8. A statement in a proposed statement of facts for appeal that certain depositions or exhibits were offered in evidence is sufficient to permit their attachment to the statement as finally settled, under a statute which provides that written evidence on file shall be appropriately referred to in the proposed statement, and "when it is certified, the same or copies thereof, if the judge so directs," shall be attached to the statement and become a part thereof. Thornely v. Andrews (Wash.) 1036

Exceptions.

9. A general exception to a conclusion of law that plaintiff is entitled to judgment raises a question of law with respect to the right to maintain the action. Falk v. American West Indies Trading Co. (N. Y.) 704

10. A single exception to a refusal to give a number of requests to submit to the jury several propositions of law and of fact is futile, if any of those propositions is erroneous or inapplicable. Southern P. Co. v. Hetzer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 288

11. Exception to instructions stating the law to be as established by a statute raises the question of the constitutionality of the statute,—at least, if the instructions are expressly challenged on that ground on the motion for new trial,—so as to bring the appeal within the jurisdiction of the court taking cognizance of appeals involving constitutional questions. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

Presumptions on appeal.

12. The court of appeals will not presume that any fact was found not embraced within the scope of the pleadings, the findings, as they appear in the record, and the proofs upon which the decision was made, for the purpose of upholding a judgment, although it was a short decision, unanimously affirmed. Falk v. American West Indies Trading Co. (N. Y.) 704

13. That accused was found guilty of involuntary manslaughter does not show that an instruction was harmless which permitted a conviction on an indictment for striking, wounding, and throwing the victim into a well, although the evidence shows the frightening of him into insanity so that he jumped into the well. Gipe v. State (Ind.) 419

What matters reviewable generally.

14. An appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial does not bring up for review the sufficiency of the complaint or findings to support the judgment or conclusions of law. Wadman v. Burke (Cal.) 1192

Questions not raised below.

15. A party cannot complain of the omission from an instruction, which is right so far as it goes, of elements which he deems material, unless he calls the court's attention thereto. Williams v. Mineral City Park Asso. (Iowa) 427

16. An award of damages, although erroneous according to the evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal if not complained of by the parties. Harrington v. Demaris (Or.) 756

Decisions on party's request.

17. A party cannot complain of the admission of evidence in response to his own questions. Johnson v. Walker (Miss.) 470

18. A party cannot complain of the giving of an instruction which is substantially similar to one requested by himself. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley (Ky.) 370

Abuse of discretion.

19. Whether a new trial upon the ground of excessive or inadequate damages should be granted or refused, or whether the verdict should be reduced where excessive, rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court, in reviewing which this court will be guided by the general rule applicable to other discretionary orders. Mohr v. Williams (Minn.) 439

20. An abuse of discretion in refusing to compel a production in court of articles alleged to have been injured by another's negligence is not shown, where defendant's witnesses have been permitted to examine them, and it is not clear that the jury would have been aided by personal examination of them. Withey v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (Mich.) 352

21. A provision in a decree for plaintiff, in a suit in equity in which a receiver has been appointed and ordinary costs awarded against all the defendants, that one of the defendants, who had claimed five sixths of the property in dispute, should pay the extraordinary costs of the suit, will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it appears that he has been required to pay more than his due proportion of costs. Nutter v. Brown (W. Va.) 1083

Review of facts.

22. A new trial will not be granted because the appellate court believes that the jury erroneously decided a question of fact on conflicting evidence. Earle v. Berry (R. I.) 867

23. The supreme court will weigh for itself the testimony in an equity case where it is practically undisputed, and draw its own conclusion as to the rights of the parties, notwithstanding the finding of the trial court. Harris Bkg. Co. v. Miller (Mo.) 790

Grounds for reversal.

24. Where a plaintiff set up in his petition three counts based on the same transaction, and at the close of the testimony elected to stand on one of the counts, and the case was submitted to the jury as a single cause of action, the refusal of the court to require an earlier election was not prejudicial error. Edwards v. Hartshorn (Kan.) 1050

25. Merely bringing the child into the court room in a bastardy proceeding is not reversible error, if it is immediately removed without the attention of the jury being called to it, or any reference to it being made in the presence of the jury. Johnson v. Walker (Miss.) 470

26. Where questions improper in form are asked of and answered by a witness in a criminal case, and no objection is made nor exception taken, no error is saved which is subject to review by an appellate court as a matter of right; and if such inquiries are made by a jurymen with the court's permission, failure of the court to interpose objections is not necessarily reversible error. State v. Crawford (Minn.) 839

27. Error, if any, in admitting testimony of the wife of one insured against accidents as to communications made to her by her husband in his last sickness, is not prejudicial where the matter was fully covered by other uncontradicted evidence, and the communication consisted simply of complaints of suffering from pneumonia, which would have been the same whether the disease was brought on by accident as alleged or otherwise. Western Travelers' Acci. Asso. v. Munson (Neb.) 1068

28. The admission in evidence of a memorandum of bills furnished a person for the detection of robbers, upon the trial of persons apprehended for that offense, is not reversible error where the identity of the bills found in possession of the accused with those taken from the person robbed is abundantly proved. Tones v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 1024

29. Exclusion of testimony which is but a repetition of what has previously been admitted without objection is not reversible error. Johnson v. Walker (Miss.) 470

30. Refusal to admit evidence, in an action to recover for the conscious suffering prior to death of one injured by another's negligence, that members of the family had died of tuberculosis, for the purpose of raising the presumption that the injured person died of that disease, is not reversible error. Dickinson v. Boston (Mass.) 664

31. The exclusion, in a bastardy proceeding, of evidence that complainant denied up to the date of her confinement, that she was pregnant, is not error. Johnson v. Walker (Miss.) 470

32. It is not reversible error to refuse to permit one accused of statutory rape to cross-examine the prosecuting witness as to promiscuous intercourse with other men for the purpose of affecting her credibility. State v. Stimpson (Vt.) 1153

33. When the recovery for the death of a minor child must, under the statutes, be for the sole benefit of the father, who has abandoned his family, it is reversible error to permit the jury to infer that the mother, to whose relief in supporting the family the deceased contributed, might share in the division of the recovery, and to refuse to charge the jury that no part of the recovery could be for her benefit. Swift & Co. v. Johnson (C. C. App. 8th C.) 1161

1. The use of an automobile on a public highway is not negligence as matter of law. Indiana Springs Co. v. Brown (Ind.) 238

2. There may be a recovery for common-law negligence in handling an automobile on a highway, if properly pleaded, although the use of such vehicles has become a matter of statutory regulation. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

3. The driver of an automobile, and the driver of a horse upon a highway, are each required to regulate his own use by the observance of ordinary care and caution to avoid receiving injury, as well as inflicting injury on another. Indiana Springs Co. v. Brown (Ind.) 238

4. The driver of an automobile, upon meeting upon the highway a horse which is frightened and in such a situation that its driver cannot extricate himself from danger unless the machine is stopped, is bound to stop, and will be liable for the injuries inflicted by his failure so to do. Id.

5. A statutory requirement that the driver of an automobile shall stop it upon approaching a horse which appears to be frightened will apply in case, "by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the driver," it would have appeared that a horse was frightened. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

6. No signal from the persons in a carriage drawn by a horse, that the animal is about to be frightened by an approaching automobile, is necessary to charge the driver of the latter with the statutory duty to stop the machine, if it appears that a horse approaching on the highway is about to become frightened by the machine. Id.

2. Money received by a commission merchant for produce sent him for sale, and deposited by him in his general account in bank, belongs to the owners of the produce, and cannot be applied by the bank to the obligations of the merchant. Boyle v. Northwestern Nat. Bank (Wis.) 1110

3. A consignor, the proceeds of whose property have been deposited by a broker in his general bank account and checked against, can hold the bank liable only for the lowest amount remaining in the account at any time when he was the sole equitable owner of the account, as against the rights of other consignors, the proceeds of whose property subsequently swelled the account. Id.

4. Where funds belonging to several consignors are deposited by the broker in his general bank account, which is checked against, and thereby reduced below the aggregate amount of the claims, the claim represented by the last deposit which remains intact, except as to charges properly made against it at the time the fund is brought into court for distribution, is entitled to payment of its net balance in full. Id.

5. Funds in a bank account belonging to several beneficiaries, which were deposited by a trustee who reduced the account below the aggregate of the claims, will, except as to such deposits as remain intact, be distributed ratably. Id.

6. Money known to have been deposited by other parties on the day of the failure of the bank cannot be appropriated in repayment of a special fund which had been deposited by a customer to indemnify the bank for its guaranty of the performance of a contract by the one making the deposit. *Italian Fruit & I. - 4. That a land grant is, as a matter of fact, confirmed long after the making of an instrument agreeing to pay a specified amount upon the confirmation of such land grant, does not make the instrument negotiable, since certainty of maturity must be of the date of the instrument, and cannot derive support from any subsequent event. Id.

Injury to Servant by Fall of Standing Walls, see MASTER AND SERVANT, 7, 8, 16, 17.

1. Under a provision in a statute requiring the placing of fire escapes on buildings, that it shall be the duty of certain officers to test escapes, and, if they prove satisfactory, to give a certificate of approval, such certificate, when properly issued, must be taken as conclusive evidence of compliance with the law. Bonbright v. Schoettler (C. C. App. 3d C.) 1091

2. The provision of a statute requiring fire escapes on buildings, that a certificate by the proper official approving a particular fire escape shall relieve the owner of the building from liability for the penalty provided for noncompliance with the statute, without any mention of civil liability, does not prevent its also relieving him from the latter. Id.

3. A provision in an act amending a statute requiring the placing of fire escapes on buildings, that nothing in the act shall interfere with fire escapes now in use, approved by the proper authorities, saves from the operation of the statute fire escapes which had been officially approved under the former statute. Id.

4. A certificate of approval of a fire escape granted to the owner of a building operates in favor of his successor in title. Id.

Injury to passenger.

1. What period of time will be reasonable for a railroad company which has agreed to stop a night train at a station where night trains are not scheduled to stop, to keep its station platform lighted for the accommodation of intending passengers prior to the arrival of the train, is for the jury to decide. Abbot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (Or.) 851

2. A railroad company is liable for injury to a passenger on a freight train, who, to the knowledge of the conductor, has, in the absence of a closet, gone to the platform to answer a call of nature during the stopping of the train upon a trestle, where the conductor neither warns him of the danger, nor takes any measures to prevent the starting of the train with a jerk while he is in a dangerous position, in consequence of which he is thrown to the ground and injured. Rodgers v. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. (Ark.) 1145

3. That no express contract between a railroad and sleeping car company is shown, does not prevent the railroad company from taking the benefit of a provision in a contract between the sleeping car company and its employees releasing railroad companies over whose tracks the cars are drawn from liability for negligent injuries to such employees. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler (Ill.) 674

Negligence of passenger.

4. A passenger is guilty of contributory negligence which will bar his recovery for injuries received by a fall from a station platform, where, having been provided by the carrier with a well-lighted car in which to await the arrival of his train, he leaves it on a very dark night to walk, merely for exercise, on an unlighted platform, knowing that the slope of the land is such that some portions of the platform must be some distance above the ground. *Abbot v. 1. Taking possession of after-acquired stock in trade covered by a chattel mortgage, according to its provisions, will give the mortgagee, precedence on a subsequent attachment, although the property was not purchased with the proceeds of stock sold, and the mortgagor did not expressly assent to such possession after acquiring the property. Burrill v. Whitcomb (Me.) 451

2. The doctrine that taking possession of after-acquired chattels according to the provisions of a mortgage covering them gives precedence of liens over a subsequent attachment is not affected by a statute providing that no mortgage of chattels is valid against strangers, unless possession of such property is delivered to and retained by the mortgagee, or the mortgage is recorded. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Power of Legislature to Prohibit Sales of Liquor Outside of Local Option Districts, see INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Privilege of Witness, see WITNESSES, 1-3.

1. Where the legislature has exercised control over the police of a municipal corporation, the further right to do so is not denied by the adoption of a constitutional provision that it shall continue to exercise the powers it has hitherto exercised. Horton v. Newport (R. I.) 512

Ex post facto or retrospective laws.

See also DRAINS AND SEWERS, 1, 2.

2. Where the statute prescribes the qualifications of a physician, and proscribes the grossly immoral, and authorizes the cancellation of any certificate issued to such persons, the application of this law to one whose habits were grossly immoral before the passage of the law is not in the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nature of a punishment, and therefore the statute is not ex post facto, but has in view only the qualifications of the physician and the protection of public morals. Metfert v. Packer (Kan.) 811

3. A provision in a statute of limitations that it shall not affect pending actions is nugatory, since the legislature has no right to interfere with rights of action after suit has been brought on them. Slover v. Union Bank (Tenn.) 528

Delegation of power.

4. The taking effect of a law cannot be made to depend upon the vote of the people under a constitutional provision that the taking effect of no law shall be made to depend upon any authority, except as provided by the Constitution, which merely authorizes the ratification by the people of the bill adopted by the legislature. Fouts v. Hood River (Or.) 483

5. The intentional omission of prohibitory liquor laws from the list of laws the taking effect of which the Constitution permits to depend upon the vote of the people does not prevent the legislature from passing a statute providing the machinery by which license laws may be suspended by vote of the people. Id.

6. A statute providing the machinery by which the suspension of the law providing for the issuing of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquor in cities and in incorporated towns may be secured, so that a majority of the voters of the precinct, ward, or district involved may determine that such sale shall be absolutely prohibited in the district, becomes effective by the act of the legislature, and not by the vote of the people, and is not, therefore, prohibited by a constitutional provision that no law shall be passed the taking effect of which shall be made to depend upon any authority except as provided by the Constitution. Id.

7. The legislature may delegate to a board having peculiar knowledge upon the subject the selection of the streams in which fish are of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition of the casting of sawdust into the stream. Com. v. Sisson (Mass.) 752

8. The legislative power to fix the boundaries of taxing districts for the construction of local improvements may be delegated to minor municipalities. Ross v. Wright County Supers. (Iowa) 431

9. Conferring on a board of commissioners the power to fix the credits which shall be allowed convicts for good behavior is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. Fite v. State ex rel. Snider (Tenn.) 520

Local self-government.

See also supra, 1.

10. The right of local self-government is not infringed by a statute regulating the police force of a city. Horton v. Newport (R. I.) 512

11. Legislative control of the local police, and requiring the payment of their salaries out of local funds, are not forbidden by the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution. Id.

Usurpation of judicial power.

12. A statute making possession of more than one quart of liquor prima facie evidence of intent to violate the statute against illegal sales is not unconstitutional as invading the province of the judiciary and depriving accused of the presumption of innocence, or as making prima facie evidence of guilt a fact which has no relation to, or does not tend to prove, the criminal act. State v. Barrett (N. C.) 626

Equal protection; discrimination.

Uniformity in Taxation, see TAXES, 1, 2.

13. The equal protection of the laws is not denied to citizens of a certain county by a statute providing that having in possession in that county more than a quart of liquor without license to sell the same shall be deemed prima facie evidence of intent to make an illegal sale thereof. Id.

14. The provision of W. Va. Acts 1905, chap. 39, p. 401, requiring every foreign corporation doing business in the state, and every nonresident domestic corporation doing business in the state, to appoint the state auditor its attorney in fact to accept service of process and notice in the state for it, is not invalid as taking property without due process of law, or as denying such corporations the equal protection of the law. State v. St. Mary's Franco-American Petroleum Co. (W. Va.) 558

15. That a statute limiting speed on the highways applies only to horseless vehicles does not render it void under a constitutional provision that no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, as making an unjust discrimination against the manufacturers and owners of such vehicles. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

Due process of law.

16. A proceeding before the district court, or a judge thereof, upon the written application of the county attorney, or attorney general, under Kan. Laws 1897, chap. 265, § 10b, Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7873, to subpoena witnesses to testify of their knowledge of violations of provisions of the anti-trust law, is of the nature of an investigation or preliminary proceeding, and is a valid exercise of judicial power; the procedure being due process of law within the meaning of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. State v. Jack (Kan.) 167

17. Refusing a judicial review of the action of the board of supervisors of a county in including land in a drainage district does not offend the constitutional provision forbidding deprivation of property without due process of law. Ross v. Wright County Supers. (Iowa) 431

18. The provision of U. S. Const. art. 14, § 1, against any state depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, is not a limitation upon the police power of the state to pass and enforce such laws as, in its judgment, will inure to the health, morals, and general welfare of the people. Meffert v. Packer (Kan.) 811

19. Seizure of necessary milk for inspection without a warrant may be authorized under the police power. St. Louis v. Liesing (Mo.) 918

20. The police power of the state extends to the prohibition of the sale of milk from cows fed by still slop, although there is nothing to show that such milk is not a pure and wholesome article of food, since the court may assume that the legislature had sufficient information to justify the belief that milk from cows fed on such food had ample opportunity to become impregnated with elements dangerous to public health. Sanders v. Com. (Ky.) 932

21. Requiring milk dealers to register with the health commissioner and pay a registration fee is a valid police regulation. St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (Mo.) 936

22. The police power extends to the prohibition of the sale of milk containing any preservative, although there may be preservatives which are not deleterious to health. St. Louis v. Schuler (Mo.) 928

23. The marking of fruit packed for shipment, with the locality in which it is grown, cannot be required under the police power of the state. Ex parte Hayden (Cal.) 184
Impairing obligation of contracts.

24. An alteration of the charter of a corporation, impairing the obligation of the contract, is not effected by authorizing a majority of the stockholders to consolidate with another, and acquire the interests of dissenting stockholders under the right of eminent domain. Spencer v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (N. C.) 604

25. An unconstitutional impairment of contract is effected by the change of a law permitting individual creditors of a corporation to enforce their claims against individual stockholders to double the par value of their stock, so as to provide one suit in equity in behalf of all creditors, to which all stockholders may become parties, and abate suits pending under the former law. *Myers v. Consideration.

2. Continued employment as a porter on a sleeping car is a sufficient consideration for the signing of a release of liability for personal injuries caused through the negligence of the railroad company hauling the car. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler (Ill.) 674

Mutuality.

3. A written contract, signed by both parties, whereby a corporation appoints certain persons its exclusive agents for a definite term to sell 85 per cent of its entire pack of fish at an agreed commission, and such persons obligate themselves to use their best efforts to sell such pack, in pursuance of which they in fact perform services and incur expenses in introducing and selling it, is not invalid for want of mutuality of obligation; and an action for damages will lie upon an unjustifiable breach of such contract. Emerson v. Pacific Coast & N. Packing Co. (Minn.) 445

Statute of frauds.

4. A promise by one who has given the obligation of a corporation of which he is president, for his own debt, to pay the same, is not void under the statute of frauds, as 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a promise to pay the debt of another. Donovan v. Purtell (Ill.) 176

Construction.

5. A confirmation of a land grant for allotments merely, with a rejection of claims for outlying pasture lands, is a "confirmation" within the meaning of an agreement to pay a specified amount upon the "confirmation" of such land grant. Joseph v. Catron (N. M.) 1120

6. A confirmation of a land grant by the court of private land claims created by an act of Congress is a confirmation by Congress, within the terms of an agreement for the payment of a specified amount upon the confirmation of such land grant by Congress. Id.

7. A contract by one employed as porter on a sleeping car to release railroad companies, which may haul such car, from liability for injuries which may result to him from their negligence, is valid. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler (Ill.) 674

8. A condition upon a theater ticket that the ticket will not be honored if sold on the sidewalk is not against public policy. Collister v. Hayman (N. Y.) 1188

Conclusiveness of umpire's decision.

Decision as Condition Precedent to Action, see ACTION OR SUIT, 4.

9. A provision in a contract between a principal contractor and a subcontractor for the grading of a railroad that the work should be done under the supervision of the chief engineer of the former, who should make estimates as a basis for the payment of the work done; and that his decision as to all matters of dispute which arise between the parties should be final and conclusive,—is valid; and the decision of such an umpire is prima facie conclusive upon all matters submitted to and fairly and honestly decided by him. Edwards v. Hartshorn (Kan.) 1050

10. The decision of a chief engineer whose estimates are made final and conclusive by the contract will have no binding force where there is fraud or mistake so great and palpable as to imply bad faith, or he fails fairly and honestly to perform the functions assigned to him. Id.

11. The decision of a chief engineer whose estimates are made final and conclusive by the contract will not be binding if, by subsequent agreement of the parties, such decision is not to be relied on, but other full and correct estimates are to be made. Id.

12. The fact that a person whose decision is, by the contract, made final and conclusive in case of dispute between the parties, is an employee of one of them, does not, of itself, weaken the force of his decision; but the law requires of a person so situated the utmost diligence and good faith in the performance of his duties. Id.

Rescission.

Remedy on, see ACTION OR SUIT, 5-7.

13. The general rule that where one party asserts a right to rescind a contract for nonperformance of his covenant by the other, the party seeking rescission must restore or tender back to the other party what has been received from him, so as to restore the status quo, does not apply to a case where one agrees to teach another a certain thing, and, after beginning the course of instruction, refuses to proceed further, whereupon the other party treats the contract as rescinded, and brings suit to recover the amount which he has paid under the agreement. Timmerman v. Stanley (Ga.) 379

14. If one agreed to teach another in certain lines of instruction until the pupil was proficient in them, and, after beginning the course and receiving payment in full, abandoned the contract and refused to teach the student longer, the latter would have a right to treat the action of the teacher as a rescission, and bring suit for the amount which had been paid by him. Id.

2. Courts have a right to determine whether or not ordinances sought to be upheld as police regulations were in fact passed for the purpose of raising revenue. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Milwaukee (Wis.) 581

3. A board appointed to hear and determine any complaint made against any person holding a physician's license, and revoke such license for specified causes, is, while so acting, not a judicial tribunal, nor governed by the technical rules applied to law courts; and its findings are, in the absence of fraud, corruption, or oppression, conclusive upon the court. Meffert v. Packer (Kan.) 811

Federal courts following state decisions.

4. The Federal courts will apply the general rule that a loan by a wife to her husband from her separate estate creates an equity in her favor, notwithstanding decisions of the local state court to the contrary. James v. Gray (C. C. App. 1st C.) 321

5. A Federal court, in determining the damages which can be assessed under a statute allowing compensatory damages for a wrongful death, will follow the general law applied in the Federal courts, which excludes all consideration of matters which rest in speculation, conjecture, or fancy, although the courts of the state where the statute was passed may permit the damages to be assessed by such methods. *Swift & Co. v. Delegation of Power to Fix Credits for Good Behavior, see CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 9.

5. Sentence to imprisonment according to the provisions of a statute that, when one is acquitted of the charge of murder on the ground of insanity, and that fact is stated by the jury, he may be sentenced to imprisonment, does not deprive him of his liberty without due process of law, nor of the benefit of the constitutional rights, to appear and defend in person or by counsel, and to trial by jury, where he has had a fair trial upon the issue of insanity, tendered by him in support of his plea of not guilty, and he has produced no evidence of a return of a lucid interval. Ex parte Brown (Wash.) 540

6. No cruel punishment is inflicted by committing one who has been acquitted of the crime of murder on the ground of insanity to prison, where it appears to the court that his discharge from custody will be manifestly dangerous to the peace and safety of the community. Id.

7. The committal of a person acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity to prison until the further order of the court is not void for uncertainty. Id.

8. The courts will not recognize a deduction from the sentence of a criminal of time for good behavior which has been allowed under authority of an unconstitutional statute. Fite v. State ex rel. Snider (Tenn.) 520

Credit, to the depositor, of a check received for collection, followed by negligence in making the collection, so that the rights on the paper are lost, does not make the bank liable for the face of the paper, but only for the amount lost through the neglect. *Jefferson County Sav. 2. In fixing the damages for a personal injury, the jury may consider the testimony of plaintiff and some of his witnesses that his leg was injured, although there is evidence in the case that there was no injury to the leg further than an enlargement of glands in the groin. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

3. Ten thousand five hundred dollars is an excessive amount to be awarded for personal injuries inflicted by another's negligence, where the evidence leaves the extent of the injuries uncertain, and also the question as to what the condition of the injured person will be permanently. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

Nuisances.

Evidence as to, see EVIDENCE, 40-42.

4. The measure of damages in case of injury to neighboring property by the careless operation of a railroad, so that the presumption is that the evil will be remedied and recurring damages for injuries to the use and enjoyment of the property may be recovered, is to be governed to a large extent by the rental value of the property, and to what extent that value is diminished. Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett (Tenn.) 49

5. The injury to the fee or permanent value of the property is the proper measure of damages where neighboring property is injured by the location and operation of railroad terminals which are intended to be permanent, and, notwithstanding their careful and proper operation, constitute a nuisance diminishing the value of the property. Id.

6. The allowance of $4,000 as damages for injury to the rental value of a $7,000 house for thirty-two months by the maintenance of a nuisance in the vicinity is excessive. Id.

Mental suffering.

7. One who swallows several pieces of broken glass contained in a bottle of a beverage placed on sale, which are subsequently removed from his stomach leaving apparently no permanent injury, may recover from the manufacturer of the beverage for mental suffering caused by fear of death while the glass was in his stomach, but not for the vague fear, after the removal of the glass and his restoration to health, that at some time in the future he may again suffer as the result of his injuries. Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. (Ga.) 1178

8. One suing for personal injuries may recover for the bodily suffering and mental pain which are inseparable, and which necessarily and inevitably result, from the injury, but not for the mortification and distress of mind from the contemplation of his crippled condition and its effect upon the esteem of his fellows, as it is too remote, indefinite, and intangible. *Southern P. 9. The damages for breach of a contract to appoint certain persons exclusive agents for a specified time to sell a designated per cent of the entire pack of fish of the other party at an agreed commission includes such loss of profits, past and future, as are shown to have approximately resulted from the breach of the contract, excluding all uncertain and conjectural profits. Emerson v. Pacific Coast & N. Packing Co. (Minn.) 445

DEATH.

Father's Sole Right to Recover for, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 33.

Of Party to Divorce, Effect of Right to Vacate Decree, see JUDGMENT, 9.

1. When the legislature has created a right of action for wrongful death for the benefit of the next of kin of deceased, and has declared that the father, if living, is the next of kin of minor children who leave neither widow nor children, an action for the death of such child must be for the sole benefit of the father, although he has deserted his family, to whose support the deceased was, at the time of death, contributing, and has left the locality of their residence without apparent interest in what becomes of them. Swift & Co. v. Jonnson (C. App. 8th C.) 1161

2. No reasonable expectation that the continued life of a boy will be of pecuniary benefit to his father, so as to enable the latter to recover substantial damages for the wrongful killing of the child, under statutes limiting the recovery under such circumstances to the pecuniary loss inflicted, can be indulged, where the father had abandoned the child, and for a period of seven years had remained insensible to his parental obligation, although there is some slight evidence that they retained some affection for each other. Id.

3. Speculation as to the possibility of restoration of the natural relations between a father and his child, whom he had abandoned for a period of seven years, and compelled to assume the burden of his own support, cannot be made the basis of a recovery by the father of substantial damages for the wrongful killing of the child. Id.

2. A grant to the "heirs" of a living person will be construed as having meant children, and upheld, if such plainly appears to have been the intention of the grantor. Roberson v. Wampler (Va.) 318

3. Naming as grantees in a deed of real estate a partnership the members of which have died, but the name of which has been perpetuated, and the property kept together by consent of all parties interested, after a sale of the business to strangers, for the purpose of collecting the accounts and settling up the partnership affairs, does not render the conveyance void. *Walker v. 4. A deed to a railroad company describing the land conveyed as a certain part of a quarter section "lying within 50 feet of the main track of the railroad" is not void for indefiniteness in the description, where, at the time of its execution, the line of the road had been surveyed and staked out, and within a few days thereafter a map and profile of the railroad was made by the company and subsequently filed, although at the time of its execution no part of the railroad had been built. *Abercrombie v. 5. No estate is granted by a clause in a deed which, after granting a life estate, declares that it is the purpose of the grantor, by this deed, that, after the death of the life tenant, "said described lands shall become and be the property of" an institution named. McGarrigle v. Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum (Cal.) 315

6. The fee will pass to the second grantee where, in one deed, land is granted to one person, "excepting and reserving" therefrom a strip of certain width, "to be used as a right of way," which strip is granted to another, reserving the timber thereon to the grantor; where it appears that the grantor removed the timber therefrom, the second grantee paid the taxes thereon, and the wife of the grantor refused to sign the first deed until the strip had been conveyed to the second grantee. Pritchard v. Lewis (Wis.) 565

7. A deed of trust signed by a man and his wife, conveying, all and singular, the real and personal estate, and all other property of every nature, kind, and description, "of us," is not limited to their joint estates, but will convey her separate property. Roberts v. Roberts (Md.) 732

Liability of City for Injury by Defective Sewer, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 11-15.

1. Authority to continue existing proceedings for the construction of a drainage ditch, which have been declared void because of the invalidity of the statute under which they were instituted, for failure to provide for notice to owners of land not touched by the improvement, but which may be assessed for the cost, may be conferred by a statute correcting this defect by providing such notice, in the absence of any constitutional prohibition of retroactive laws. Ross v. Wright County Supers. (Iowa) 431

2. Pending proceedings for a drainage improvement need not be expressly legalized in order to permit their completion, by a statute enacted to provide for notice to persons liable to assessment, for want of which the statute has been held unconstitutional; it is sufficient if the statute assumes that the pending proceedings will continue, and would be idle and meaningless unless that intention was imputed to the legislature. Id.

3. Proceedings for the construction of a drainage ditch cannot be avoided by property owners properly served with notice because one owner of property affected was not served,—at least, where he subsequently appears, and presents and establishes his claim for damages by reason of the improvement. Id.

4. A landowner is not entitled to a hearing upon the question whether or not his land shall be included in a district which shall bear the cost of a drainage improvement, if provision is made for a hearing as to the assessment. Id.

What may be taken.

1. The stock of dissenting stockholders in a railroad company may be taken by right of eminent domain upon payment of just compensation, for the purpose of effecting a consolidation of the road with others to create a through line and subserve the interests of the public. Spencer v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (N. C.) 604

For what purpose.

Conclusiveness of Legislative Determination as to, see COURTS, 1.

2. A statute granting the right of eminent domain will be upheld against a claim that it is for a private use, unless it clearly appears that the use is private and in no sense public. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. v. Strickley (Utah) 976

3. The mere development of a locality by the establishment and maintenance of a private enterprise therein is not a public use for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised. Cozad v. Kanawha Hardwood Co. (N. C.) 969

4. The construction of roads and tramways for the development of the mining industries of a state is a public use for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. v. Strickley (Utah) 976

5. The reclamation of land by irrigation is such a public purpose that the legislature may rightfully authorize the condemnation of rights of way over private property, or through the ditches of private individuals, to R.A. (N.S.)

convey water for that purpose onto land belonging to a private individual. Nash v. Clark (Utah) 208

6. The right of eminent domain cannot be conferred to secure a right of way for a private railway to transport timber to market. Cozad v. Kanawha Hardwood Co. (N. C.) 969

7. The fact that only an easement for a limited time is to be taken for a private railway does not change the rule forbidding the exercise of the right of eminent domain for that purpose. Id.

Recovery for consequential injuries.

8. A property owner is not entitled to damages for every inconvenience or discomfort caused by the operation of a railroad near his property, even though it may be material or considerable; but he can recover only where the usable and rental or permanent value of his property is injured. Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lelleyett (Tenn.) 49

Remedy at law.

1. An action for forcible entry and detainer to recover possession of property leased for mining purposes is not an adequate remedy, so as to defeat the jurisdiction of equity, where the mining operations are being carried on in such a way as to remove the supports of the surface and cause it to subside. Bix Six Development Co. v. Mitchell (C. C. App. 8th C.) 332

2. The right to maintain suits against the individual stockholders of an insolvent corporation to enforce their liability on unpaid stock subscriptions does not constitute such a plain, full, and adequate remedy at law as to defeat a suit in equity against all the stockholders for the collection and administration of the corporate assets as a trust fund for the benefit of creditors. Cook v. Carpenter (Pa.) 900

3. The necessity of an accounting does not determine equitable jurisdiction of a suit against the stockholders of an insolvent corporation to enforce payment of unpaid stock subscriptions as an asset for the benefit of creditors. Id.

Retaining jurisdiction.

4. Having acquired jurisdiction to prevent a destruction of mining property by wrongful methods of operating the mine under a lease, equity may retain the case, and cancel the lease as a cloud on title. Big Six Development Co. v. Mitchell (C. C. App. 8th C.) 332

ESTOPPEL.

1. A stockholder of a railroad company, dissenting from an attempt to consolidate the road with others, who, instead of taking prompt steps to prevent such consolidation waits until after it is an accomplished fact and vast public and private interests have attached under the new conditions, will not be permitted to come into a court of equity for a forfeiture of the corporate charter, the appointment of a receiver, and the rescission of the merger, but will be remitted to his action under the statute for compensation for his stock. Spencer v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (N. C.) 604

By relation of parties.

2. One who goes into possession of land as the tenant of another cannot set up title adverse to the landlord, from whom he thus obtained possession, until after he has surrendered the premises to the landlord. Hodges v. Waters (Ga.) 1181

3. A tenant in possession, who expressly agrees to pay rent to a third person for a given time, will be bound by such agreement for the time specified if founded upon a sufficient consideration; but, after the expiration of such time, no promise to pay rent will be implied, and he may deny liability for rent thereafter, although he still remains in possession of the premises as the tenant of the person who placed him in possession. Id.

2. The rule that where a person executes an instrument leaving blank spaces therein to be filled, and delivers it in such imperfect condition to another for use, he will be presumed to have intended, in the absence of anything to the contrary, to confer on such other person authority to complete the instrument, applies to instruments required by law to be executed under seal, and to be witnessed and acknowledged in order to be entitled to record, as well as to simple contracts. Friend v. Ward (Wis.) 891

3. Mere proof of facts which call into action the rule res ipsa loquitur in an action for negligent injuries does not make a prima facie case, or raise a presumption of negligence, but merely furnishes an element to be considered by the jury as part of the plaintiff's case. Ross v. Double Shoals Cotton Mills (N. C.) 298

4. That loss of goods delivered to a carrier for transportation was due to its negligence will be presumed where the receipt of the goods and failure to deliver are shown, and both loss and responsibility are admitted. Everett v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. (N. C.) 985

5. A presumption of negligence arises from a violent impact of a train against another which it is following upon the same track, so as to telescope several cars, and start a conflagration which sets fire to neighboring property, which shifts the burden of showing care to the railroad company. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. South Fork Coal Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 533

6. Setting fire by sparks escaping from a threshing-machine engine raises the presumption of negligence, and casts the burden of showing care upon the owner of the engine. Martin v. McCrary (Tenn.) 530

7. The official survey of government land will be presumed to be correct after the lapse of many years, where its disturbance would upset titles and destroy rights of those who have in good faith relied on it. Kneeland v. Korter (Wash.) 745

8. In a collateral proceeding, requisite notice to a ward to bind him by acts of his guardian in his behalf will be presumed to have been given. Ross v. Wright County Supers. (Iowa) 431

9. There can be no presumption in favor of an assessment for taxation which is arrived at, not by an exercise of judgment, but by an arbitrary manipulation of figures. Consolidated Gas Co. v. Baltimore (Md.) 263

10. A loan by a married woman to a firm of which her husband is a member, in the absence of any evidence as to its source further than that the loan was made, will be presumed to have come from her separate estate, where the statute provides that a woman's property shall, upon her marriage, remain her separate estate, and that she may receive property in the same manner as if she were sole. James v. Gray (C. C. App. 1st C.) 321

Documentary evidence.

11. Evidence of professed tests printed in a book of instructions as to the use of a patent brake is not admissible upon the question as to the distance within which a train can be stopped. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Stith (Ky.) 1014

12. The American Table of Mortality is admissible in evidence upon the question of expectation of life. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

Parol evidence.

As to Intention of Testator, see WILLS, 16.

13. Where, by deeds executed the same day, land is granted to one person, "excepting and reserving therefrom a strip of land" of certain width, "to be used as a right of way," and this strip, "being the same premises as described in the other deed as a right of way," is granted to another, reserving the timber thereon, sufficient ambiguity exists as to grantor's intention to admit extraneous evidence in explanation. Pritchard v. Lewis (Wis.) 565

14. Parol evidence is admissible to identify the true owners of property granted by a deed in which a partnership is named as grantee. Walker v. Miller (N. C.) 157

15. That one who signed a contract to purchase a machine was a surety only may be shown by parol for the purpose of showing that he was not a necessary party to a cross petition by the purchaser when sued on the purchase-money notes, filed to bring in and hold the seller liable for breach of warranty of the machine. First Nat. Bank v. Dutcher (Iowa) 142

17. Serving a notice of accident on a city, as required by statute, is not a bringing of an action, within the meaning of a statute permitting the admission of evidence of declarations of an injured person made before action brought. Dickinson v. Boston (Mass.) 664

18. An admission by a servant whose negligence caused injury to another, made long after the accident, is not admissible in evidence against the master, but is admissible against the servant himself. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

19. A conspiracy may be proved by showing the declarations, acts, and conduct of the conspirators. State v. Ryan (Or.) 862

20. Upon trial of one accused of getting money from another by means of a conspiracy to steal, evidence is admissible of declarations by one of the conspirators which induced the victim to go to the desired spot, where the others carried out the scheme, although no conspiracy was shown to have existed at the time they were made. Id.

21. Statements of fact fairly indicative of a relevant bodily condition of the declarant at the time of the declaration are admissible as evidence of the existence of such condition, although made a considerable time before.

after the injury was received. Western Travelers' Acci. Asso. v. Munson (Neb.) 1068

Dying declarations; during travail.

22. Declarations of the mother of a child, made during travail, as to its paternity, are admissible in support of her testimony in a bastardy proceeding. Johnson v. Walker (Miss.) 470

23. The conclusion of a trial court that dying declarations were admissible in evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is manifest that the facts did not warrant the conclusion. Gipe v. State (Ind.) 419

24. The deduction that declarations were made under a sense of impending death, without hope of recovery, is warranted where the person making them, after great shock and exposure, declared that he did not believe that he could get well, and made them several hours later, having been sinking all the time, and having reached a state of extreme weakness. Id.

Asso. v. Munson* (Neb.) 1068

26. The prohibitions in Neb. Code, § 333, against a physician testifying to confidential disclosures made to him in the course of his professional employment, are for the benefit of the patient, who can, under the express provisions of § 334, waive the same. Id.

27. A stipulation, in a contract of life insurance, to the effect that the proofs of death shall consist in part of the affidavit of the attending physician, which shall state the cause of death and such other information as may be required by the insurer, constitutes a waiver within the meaning of said sections, and renders the attending physician a competent witness as to the confidential disclosures made to him by the assured concerning his last sickness. Id.

29. In an action to compel the restoration of a building destroyed by fire, tion of money by one to whom it was taken for investment, and who gave therefor worthless obligations of a corporation of which he was president, evidence is admissible of the confidence which the customer had in him, and of his method of transacting business in the name of corporations to avoid his personal obligations. Donovan v. Purtell (Ill.) 176

30. Evidence that a boy injured by another's negligence was obedient and economical is admissible upon the question of damages, in an action by him to recover for the injuries. Cameron Mill & Elevator Co. v. Anderson (Tex.) 198

31. The expectation of life of one injured by another's negligence may be shown as a basis for the estimation of damages. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

32. In an action to recover for the conscious suffering prior to death of one injured by another's negligence, evidence is admissible that he was suffering, and finally died, from an intercurrent disease. Dickinson v. Boston (Mass.) 664

33. The fact that plaintiff, an adjoining landowner, had not notified defendant, the owner of an irrigation ditch, of a claim for damages for casting water upon his property, is admissible in evidence upon a disputed question as to the existence of plaintiff's consent thereto. Howell v. Big Horn Basin Colonization Co. (Wyo.) 596

34. The fact that the injurious results of seepage from an irrigation ditch may be obviated by drainage may be shown, as affecting the measure of damages. Id.

35. Evidence of sales made subsequently to breach and during the pendency of the contract term, although made by the principal, through other agents than the plaintiffs, are admissible in evidence, and, under proper direction by the court, may be weighed by the jury in estimating prevented gains. Emerson v. Pacific Coast & N. Packing Co. (Minn.) 445

36. Evidence of the earnings of persons proficient in a trade is not admissible upon the question of damages for negligently killing an apprentice. Central Foundry Co. v. Bennett (Ala.) 1150

37. The general reputation of an employee among those acquainted with him or his work is competent, after proof of his incompetence has been introduced, to show notice to the master of his habit of incompetency; but reputation among a particular class, which obviously includes only a part of those who know his character or work, is inadmissible for such purpose. Southern P. Co. v. Hetzer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 288

38. Specific acts of negligence, lack of skill, or incompetence, of which the master had no notice, are inadmissible to prove the incompetence of a servant employed with due care; but the proper proof of habit and character in such a case is the testimony of witnesses qualified to speak of them, subject to proper cross-examination in relation to the facts upon which their testimony is based. Id.

39. Evidence of specific acts of negligence known to the master, and of acts of negligence like those which cause the death of passengers, so notorious that the master must have known of them if he had exercised reasonable diligence, is admissible to prove the habit or character for incompetence of a servant who is employed with due care. Id.

40. How other neighboring property was affected by the maintenance of a nuisance cannot be shown in an action to recover for injury to a particular tract. Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett (Tenn.) 49

41. Upon the question of injury to property by the maintenance of a nuisance upon it, evidence is admissible to show that it is injuriously or prejudicially affected by similar causes from other sources, but not the effect thereof on other property near or contiguous to it. Id.

42. Upon the question of nuisance to adjoining property in the maintenance and operation of a railroad terminal, no comparison is proper between the noise in its vicinity and in other portions of the city; nor is evidence admissible that the city is generally a dirty, smoky, and noisy place. Id.

43. Upon the question of fraud in securing an indorsement upon a note by means of a trick, evidence is admissible that the same trick was employed by the same persons to secure the signatures of other persons, the effect of which is to show a general scheme to perpetrate this particular fraud upon the people of the neighborhood at the same time, to effect a common purpose. Yakima Valley Bank v. McAllister (Wash.) 1075

Sufficiency.

44. That stock was resold at a profit several months after it was purchased by one who is alleged to have acted fraudulently is not sufficient to show that it was worth that amount at the time of the alleged fraudulent purchase, for the purpose of forming a basis for damages. Boulden v. Stilwell (Md.) 258

Variance.

45. An indictment for killing by striking, wounding, and throwing the victim into a well is not supported by evidence of frightening him into insanity by an attempted burglary, so that he jumped into the well. Gipe v. State (Ind.) 419

Appointment; disqualification.

1. The appointment, by a court of competent jurisdiction, of an administrator, is not open to collateral attack in a suit by the administrator to collect assets, on the ground that it was void because of lack of assets in the state. Jordan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Wis.) 885

2. The right to act as executor is not a privilege or immunity within the protection of the Federal Constitution. Re Mulford (Ill.) 341

3. Nonresidents may be denied permission to act as executors of local estates. Id.

4. A nonresident alien is not an incompetent executor under a statute which provides that if any executor shall reside out of the state, the court may remove him. Re Breen (Mich.) 349

5. Indebtedness to the estate does not disqualify one from acting as executor. Id. What constitute assets.

6. A right of action for negligent killing of a person is an asset of his estate, sufficient to warrant the appointment of an administrator. Jordan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Wis.) 885

7. Crops on the land at the time of the owner's death are assets for payment of debts, under a statute directing the executor to sell for cash such crops, and account for the proceeds as assets, notwithstanding his will may imply that they shall belong to the devisee; nothing short of an express direction will avoid the application of the statute. Gordon v. James (Miss.) 461

8. Dividends on stocks and bonds, declared after the death of the owner, belong to the specific devisee of the stocks and bonds, and are not assets for the payment of the debts of the estate, in the absence of statutory direction to the contrary. Id.

2. The owner of a threshing-machine engine must make at least daily inspection of his spark arresters when he is working near combustible material. Id.

3. The owner of a threshing-machine engine does not fulfil his duty in regard to precautions to avoid setting fires by merely adopting a spark arrester in general use, and showing that the engine did not emit sparks any more copiously than was natural for an engine of similar kind and construction, where he had been in the habit of making use of an additional spark arrester when working near material of the kind to which fire was set, and which was allowed to become out of order at the time the fire occurred. Id.

1. The secretary of a corporation who is also a stockholder cannot maintain an action against the other officers for fraudulent representations upon which he acted, and which were alleged to have been made to induce him to dispose of his stock to them at a loss, where they amount merely to representations that the corporation was going down, that one had bought the other's shares and was going to run the business as a family affair, and would depose the secretary, and that this was his last chance to get his money out; and the fact that he was not permitted to keep the books down to date, so that he did not know the actual state of the business, is immaterial. *Boulden v. Equity treats personal estate vested in a married woman in accordance with statutory provisions permitting her to receive and hold such estate for all substantial purposes the same as an estate vested for separate uses according to equity rules, and will protect it substantially to the same extent and in the same manner as it would the latter. James v. Gray (C. C. App. 1st C.) 321

2. A statute permitting a married woman to make contracts, except with her husband, the same as though sole, which does not relate to her separate estate, does not affect the equity rule governing contracts affecting separate estates. Id.

Actions.

3. A woman residing with her husband cannot maintain an action for the enticement from home of her minor child. Seper v. Igo (Ky.) 362

4. A man has such special interest in the property of his wife, which she had not

2. A ticket broker cannot enjoin the proprietor of a theater from warning intending purchasers that tickets purchased on the sidewalk in violation of the conditions printed thereon will not be honored, although such conduct interferes with his business and subjects him to loss. Collister v. Hayman (N. Y.) 1188

3. An injunction will be granted to prevent the photograph of an innocent person from being sent to the rogues' gallery. Itzkovitch v. Whitaker (La.) 1147

4. Injunction will lie to restrain a lessee from continuing to mine ores on leased property after a forfeiture of the lease for breach of conditions as to manner of performing the work, although the title is disputed, and no action has been instituted at law; since a continuation of the alleged wrongful acts will tend to destroy the property. Big Six Development Co. v. Mitchell (C. C. App. 8th C.) 332

Contract rights.

5. Although equity will not specifically enforce a contract to furnish a supply of electricity to a street car and electric lighting company, which creates a monopoly contrary to the terms of a franchise given the company which has contracted to furnish the power, it may enjoin the breach of the contract until such time as an adequate supply can be procured elsewhere, where such breach will result in great public inconvenience. Seattle Electric Co. v. Snoqualmie Falls Power Co. (Wash.) 1032

As to corporate matters.

6. After a foreign corporation has complied with the law, and has received permission to do business in the state, it cannot be enjoined, at the suit of the state, from performing contracts made before such permission was obtained. State v. American Book Co. (Kan.) 1041

As to trade names; unfair trade.

7. Insolvency of one attempting to make fraudulent use of another's trade name need not be shown to entitle the latter to an injunction. Morton v. Morton (Cal.) 660

8. One who has established a business under a particular name, which he places on the hats of his agents to inform customers that they are his representatives, may enjoin another of the same name, who has engaged in the same business, from using such name as a hat label in such a way as to deceive the public into believing that the one bearing it is connected with the former's business. Id.

9. An injunction to restrain a person and his agents from representing themselves to be connected with another's business, and from wearing his badge on their hats, is prohibitive, and not mandatory, and therefore may be granted pendente lite. Id.

As to legal proceedings.

10. The fact that a person is sued or garnished by different persons on distinct and separate demands having no connection, or the fact that the same question of law may arise in all the cases, does not give equity jurisdiction to enjoin the suits on the principle that equity takes jurisdiction to avoid multiplicity of suits. National Tube Co. v. Smith (W. Va.) 195

11. Injunction does not lie against a garnishment, in an action before a justice, of money owing by the garnishee to a nonresident debtor, on the ground that such money is exempt by the law of the state of residence of such debtor. Id.

12. Injunction will not lie to restrain the prosecution of a garnishment in an action for debt before a justice of this state on the ground that, in another state, an injunction is later sued out, and is pending, enjoining the garnishee from paying the money under any judgment of such justice. Id.

13. Equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin a justice of the peace from acting in an action before him, because of his interest in the result. Id.

Insolvency of company.

2. The state has no preference over other creditors for payment of losses and unearned premiums out of the assets in the hands of a receiver of an insolvent insurance company with which it has insured state property. State v. Williams (Md.) 254

Revocation of foreign company's license.

3. A statute directing the revocation of the license of a foreign insurance company to do business within the state for refusing to perform its agreement not to remove suits against it to the Federal courts is not in conflict with the Federal Constitution. Prewitt v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Ky.) 1019

Termination of risk.

4. The word "noon" used to denote the beginning and termination of the risk under an insurance policy will be interpreted by standard, and not by sun, time, where the use of the former system of reckoning time has been the prevailing custom in the community for a long period. Rochester German Ins. Co. v. Peaslee-Gaulbert Co. (Ky.) 364

5. The beginning of a fire in a building which contains insured property, before the policy expires, will, if it continues to burn until it destroys the property, render the insurer liable for the loss, although the property is not actually destroyed before such expiration; but the same rule does not apply in case the property is merely imperiled at the time of the expiration of the policy, by a fire in an adjoining building, although it eventually reaches and destroys the property. Id.

By-laws of fraternal society.

6. The adoption, by a fraternal insurance order, of a by-law declaring that no person shall be admitted or retained as a member who is engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors, does not, in the absence of a specific provision to that effect, avoid the beneficiary certificate of a member who is already engaged in that business in a state where it is not unlawful, who continues therein, and against whom no action is taken. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Haddock (Kan.)

1064

7. A by-law of a fraternal insurance order, which provides that any member who shall, after the date of its adoption, have entered, or who shall thereafter enter, into the business of selling intoxicating liquors, shall stand suspended from his rights to participate in the beneficial fund, and that his certificate shall become void from the date of his engaging in such occupation, does not, in terms, apply to a member who, before the adoption of such by-law, was engaged in such business, and who has remained in it continuously thereafter. Id.

Cancellation of policy.

8. One who voluntarily ceases to pay his insurance premiums and abandons his policy cannot maintain an action for damages for its cancellation. Green v. Hartford L. Ins. Co. (N. C.)

623

Waiver.

9. Failure to give notice of loss within a reasonable time, as required by the terms of the policy, is not waived by subsequent denial of all liability on the ground that the loss is not covered by the policy. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Fitzgerald (Ind.)

422

Cause of injury or loss.

10. An insurance against loss of business time resulting from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means covers loss of time by disease, if it was proximately caused by a bodily injury through the stipulated means. Id.

11. Periostitis of the metacarpal bones, caused by placing the hand, during sleep, between the head and the edge of the bed rail, and using it as a headrest until it becomes numb and bruised, is covered by an insurance against injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means. Id.

12. A marine underwriter is not liable for a loss occurring through the deliberate act of the master of the vessel, who represents the insured, in pushing through dangerous ice for the purpose of reaching his destination quickly, and thus realizing the object of his principal's undertaking. *Standard Marine Ins. 1095

14. To recover under a marine policy covering partial loss if it amounts to 50 per cent of the property covered, such loss must be shown to have resulted from a peril of the sea, and cannot be created by a forced sale. Id.

15. The cost of getting boats which are part of a vessel's cargo from the point where she is wrecked to a place of safety may be recovered under a marine insurance policy upon them, although they are not injured by the disaster, where the policy requires insured to labor to secure the property insured, and binds the insurer to contribute to the expense thereof in proportion as the sum insured is to the whole sum at risk, while the policy covers the whole value of the property. Id.

16. Rightful consumption of property covered by a marine insurance policy in salvage claims constitutes a total loss for which the insurer is liable. Id.

17. The owner of property covered by a marine insurance policy cannot claim a recovery as for a constructive total loss, although the property was in a situation where it might have been lawfully abandoned to the underwriter, if no attempt was made to abandon it, but it was sold as the property of the insured. Id.

INTEREST.

1. A surviving partner who continues a deposit of partnership funds in bank, awaiting a settlement of the partnership affairs, without realizing any interest or profit therefrom, is not liable for interest thereon. Condon v. Callahan (Tenn.)

643

JUDGMENT.

1. It is not error to fail to provide, in a final decree, for a matter which has not been put in issue, and for the settlement of which the necessary parties are not before the court. Roberson v. Wampler (Va.) 318 Effect and conclusiveness.

See also infra, 6, 7.

2. A void decree of divorce will not affect the property rights of the parties. Nolan v. Dwyer (Wash.) 551

3. A dismissal, without prejudice, of a bastardy proceeding instituted before a justice of the peace, is no bar to a subsequent proceeding before another justice upon the same charge. Johnson v. Walker (Miss.) 470

4. A finding of nonresidence on a suggestion and motion to require security for costs in a pending action is not res judicata in another action between the same parties, as such a proceeding is a collateral one, not reaching the merits of the case. Brown v. Beckwith (W. Va.) 778

5. Where creditors filed a petition to have a debtor adjudged an involuntary bankrupt, alleging several acts of bankruptcy, among them being that, while insolvent, he made a preference to a firm, named as creditors, within four months before the filing of the proceedings, and, after adjudication in bankruptcy, the trustee brought suit against such firm, alleging that they received a preference with reasonable ground for believing that it was such, the adjudication in bankruptcy, duly made, was conclusive of the status of the bankrupt as such, but did not estop the defendants from setting up, by way of defense, that, some time prior to the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

proceedings in bankruptcy, they sold to the bankrupt goods, relying on certain representations made by him, and that they discovered that such representations were untrue, and rescinded the sale on account of fraud, and retook their goods. Silvey v. Tift (Ga.) 336

Effect of Proving Will in Other State, see WILLS, 2-4.

6. The validity of a decree of divorce cannot be attacked in another state for absence of grounds of divorce, or for false allegations and proof, if the court had jurisdiction to enter it. Forrest v. Fey (Ill.) 740

7. Where the record of a divorce proceeding against a nonresident fails to show that there was an affidavit of nonresidence, which is by the statute a necessary prerequisite to publication of notice, and contains a form of affidavit neither signed nor sworn to, while there is no finding by the court that such affidavit was in fact made, the decree based on such published notice is void, and may be collaterally attacked in another state. Id.
Assignment.

8. The assignment of a judgment does not carry with it a right of action against an officer and the sureties on his bond for failure, prior to the assignment, properly to return a forthcoming bond upon the judgment, notwithstanding a statute making choses in action assignable, and authorizing the assignee to maintain any action which the original obligee might have brought. Com. v. Beckwith (W. Va.) 778

2. An order of attachment is "process" within the meaning of W. Va. Code 1899, chap. 41, §§ 23, 24, against which the right to exempt personal property may be exercised. Id.

3. An affidavit claiming an exemption, which establishes the claimant's character as a female parent and resident of the state, sufficiently specifies the character in which she claims, notwithstanding another allegation in the affidavit that she "is entitled to have and claims all the above-listed property claimed by her as husband and parent, exempt from execution or other process" in the cause. When statute begins to run.

1. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a right to recover usury, in case of a series of usurious transactions, until they are closed. Slover v. Union Bank (Tenn.) 528

2. A demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank is not a demand promissory note, within the rule that the statute of limitations begins to run upon it as soon as issued. Elliott v. Capital City State Bank (Iowa) 1130

Necessity of demand to set statute running.

3. Demand for payment of the amount due under a demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank is necessary to set in motion the statute of limitations,—at least where, by its terms, it is payable on its return properly indorsed. Id.

4. There is no obligation to demand payment of a demand certificate of deposit issued by a bank, within the period of the statute of limitations. Id.

5. Demand for unpaid stock subscriptions need not be made within six years to prevent the right to make the demand from being barred by the statute of limitations, under a contract of subscription to the stock of a corporation which is payable from time to time, as called for. Cook v. Carpenter (Pa.) 900

6. The statute of limitations does not begin to run upon an unpaid stock subscription until demand is made for payment, where, by the terms of the contract, it is not payable until called for. Id.

2. Mandamus lies to compel a water company to supply an individual applicant with water at reasonable rates, as part of its public duties, although the relation between the water company and the town and its inhabitants has been the subject of contract. *Robbins v. When relation exists.

1. A porter hired, paid, and subject to the orders of a sleeping car company is not the servant of the railroad company which hauls the car in which he works, within the rule that a contract between master and servant for release of liability for negligent injuries is void. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler (Ill.) 674

Duty as to inspection and supervision.

2. A master is not bound to give continual attention to a servant to protect him from situations made dangerous by occurrences unusual and unexpected by either master or servant. Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (Wash.) 283

3. A railroad company which purchases lantern globes of good and standard make, from reliable manufacturers, is not bound to inspect them to protect employees, to whom they are delivered for use, from injury by their breaking while being cleaned. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Larkin (Tex.) 944

Duty to warn servant.

4. A master is not bound to inform his servants that a portion of the work is under the charge of an independent contractor for whose conduct he is not responsible. Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (Wash.) 283

5. Failure to warn a servant as to the danger of throwing an ice pick over a partition into a room where others are working without giving adequate notice, upon giving him a direction to do so, is not negligence on the part of the master which will render him liable for personal injuries caused by absence of such notice, since the servant had such knowledge, and the order must be interpreted as a direction to perform the service in a proper way. Desautels v. Cloutier (Mass.) 669

Duty as to place and appliances.

Question for Jury as to, see TRIAL, 10, 11.

6. The master contracts to exercise reasonable care in the selection of his servant. L.R.A. (N.S.)

ants, and to furnish them all with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe materials, tools, and appliances with which to work, and is liable for injuries resulting from breaches of such duties, regardless of the ordinary duties, or the rank or grade, or department, of the servant to whom their performance has been delegated. Atchison & E. Bridge Co. v. Miller (Kan.) 682

7. That the cellar of a burned building was unsafe as a working place for salvors is not shown by the mere fact of the fall of a square brick stack placed in the building to provide safety vaults on the different floors, and which was left standing after the fire. Gans Salvage Co. v. Byrnes (Md.) 272

8. The mere fall of a square brick stack, erected in a building to provide safety vaults on different floors, after the building has been destroyed by fire and while salvors are at work in the débris, is not sufficient to show negligence on the part of the master salvor, so as to render him liable for injury thereby caused to his employee. Id.

9. Negligence of a street car company in delivering to a crew a car without any, or with a defective, controller handle, will render it liable for injuries thereby caused to an employee on the road. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Sawusch (Ill.) 670

Duty as to selection and discharge of fellow servants.

Evidence as to Servant's Incompetency, see EVIDENCE, 37-39.

See also supra, 6.

10. It is the duty of the master to exercise reasonable care to employ competent servants; and, when he has exercised this care, this duty is discharged. Southern P. Co. v. Hetzer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 288

11. The reasonable diligence and care which a railroad company is required to exercise towards its employees in discharging an incompetent fellow servant is that degree of care which prudent railway officials charged with the duty of discharging servants employed with due care commonly exercise as soon as they know, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence would know, that such servants have become incompetent. Id.

12. The diligence required of the master to learn the habits or characters of servants employed with care is not of that degree demanded in his employment of servants, or in the inspection of machinery, as careful and skilful men grow more careful and skilful, and servants once competent are generally presumed to continue so; upon which presumption he is entitled to rely until he has notice or knowledge to the contrary. Id.

13. A master owes his employees the duty of discharging a servant when he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence would know, that he has contracted the habit or character of negligence, drunkenness, or lack of skill, so that he is incompetent. Id.

Assumption of risk.

14. A servant assumes the risk of injury from remaining without necessity under a heavy steel plate while it is being hoisted in the air by means of a tackle. Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (Wash.) 283

15. A servant cannot hold his master liable for injuries caused by the fact that the working place was unsafe, if he was in as good position to ascertain and understand the situation, and does equally well know and appreciate the existing conditions, as the master. Id.

16. One who engages to work in saving property from the débris left by a fire assumes the risk of injury from falling walls, where the peril is open and obvious. Gans Salvage Co. v. Byrnes (Md.) 272

17. An employee of one engaged in salvaging property from the débris of a fire cannot hold his employer liable for injuries caused by falling walls; since, if the danger was obvious, he assumed the risk of injury; and, if it was not obvious, the master did not violate his duty to use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe working place. Id.

18. A youth sixteen years old, upon taking employment in a mill, assumes the risk of injury which is plainly apparent from coming in contact with exposed gears upon machines adjoining a passageway, notwithstanding he is not expressly warned as to such danger. Mundhenke v. Oregon City Mfg. Co. (Or.) 278

19. A sixteen-year-old boy, in taking employment in a mill, assumes no risk of injury from defective machinery and passageways that would not have been avoided by the precaution common to other boys of like age and experience, and cannot be charged with negligence for conduct which is common to such boys. Id.

20. Fellow servants assume the risk of injury from each other in their common conduct of the master's work. Atchison & E. Bridge Co. v. Miller (Kan.) 682

21. Servants assume the risk of the occasional acts of negligence of their fellow servants, and the master is not liable for them; but the servants may, by notice, cast the risk of the habitual negligence of their coemployees upon the master. Southern P. Co. v. Hetzer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 288

22. A street car conductor does not assume the risk of injury from the failure of a barn man, charged with the duty of substituting a perfect car for one which has become disabled, to furnish a controller handle which fits the motor, so that the car is partially uncontrollable. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Sawusch (Ill.) 670

Contributory negligence of servant.

See also supra, 19.

23. Want of care, precaution, and foresight will not, as matter of law, be imputed to a youth sixteen years old, who is employed in a mill to distribute bobbins into boxes which are in close proximity to exposed cog gearing, when, in the performance of his work, he slips on the floor, which is covered with a variable quantity of grease from day to day, and falls against the uncovered gears, to his injury. Mundhenke v. Oregon City Mfg. Co. (Or.) 278

24. A railroad engineer who places his train on the main track on the time of a fast train having the right of way, after placing the proper signals to stop the train, may recover for injuries caused by a resulting collision if those in charge of the other train see, or by the exercise of ordinary care could see, the engine in time to avert the collision. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Stith (Ky.) 1014

25. An engineer of a work train does not, as matter of law, cut himself off from recovery for resulting injuries by placing his engine on the main track on the time of a fast train having the right of way, where he places the proper signals to stop the expected train, and, in his judgment, his course of action is necessary to protect the property and interests of his employer. Id.

Fellow servants.

See also supra, 5, 6, 10-13, 20-22.

26. A master is not absolved from liability for injury to an employee which would not have occurred without his negligence, by the fact that the negligence of a fellow servant of the injured person contributed to the accident. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Sawusch (Ill.) 670

27. All employees of the same master, engaged in the same general business, and whose efforts tend to promote the same general purpose, and accomplish the same general end, are fellow servants. Atchison & E. Bridge Co. v. Miller (Kan.) 682

28. The assignment of servants of the same master to separate departments of the same general enterprise does not affect their relation as fellow servants, unless such departments are so far disconnected that each one may be regarded as a separate undertaking. Id.

29. It is not essential to the fellow-servant relation between employees of the same master that they should have an opportunity to become acquainted with each other, or to observe each other's conduct, or to take precautions against each other's negligence, or to influence each other in the formation of habits of foresight and care. Id.

30. The engineer in charge of the operation of a steam shovel in a gravel pit is a fellow servant of a pitman whose duty it was, with the assistance of other pitmen, to take up a 6-foot section of track from the rear of the outfit used in operating such shovel, and carry it forward and fasten it in position in front of the shovel as the work progressed. Jemming v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.) 696

31. Employees of a railroad company engaged in operating a steam shovel in a gravel pit, the outfit consisting of the shovel, the engine house containing the engine operating the shovel, an engine tender, and a caboose, all located on a short track, taken up and relaid as the work progressed, and unconnected with any other track, are not engaged in operating a railway; and the danger to which such servants are subjected is not one of the hazards peculiar to the operation of a railroad, within Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2701, enacted for the purpose of abolishing, under certain conditions, the common-law rule exempting employers from responsibility for injuries due to the negligence of a fellow servant. Id.

32. A member of a pile-driving crew, engaged in driving piling for the erection of false work essential to the reconstruction of a bridge, is a fellow servant with a machinist employed by the same master to repair stationary engines located in the midst of the work upon barges, upon the bridge, and upon the false work, and used for hoisting material and driving piling in the progress of the general enterprise of building the false work. Atchison & E. Bridge Co. v. Miller (Kan.) 682

33. A barn man of a street car company, who is charged with the duty of substituting a perfect car for one which has become disabled during a run, represents the company so far as the selection of the car and its fittings is concerned, and is not a fellow servant of conductors on the road. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Sawusch (Ill.) 670
Liability for acts of independent contractor.

34. The retention, by the master, of general supervision of the work to be performed by an independent contractor will not change the contractor's relationship to the work. Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (Wash.) 283

35. An employee cannot hold his master liable for injuries caused by the master's breach of duty to furnish to one who has taken an independent contract to perform a certain portion of the work in which the master is engaged, safe appliances for the performance of such work. Id.

36. Letting work which involves a dangerous excavation in a public highway to an independent contractor will not absolve the principal from liability for injuries to a traveler, caused by the contractor's negligence in failing to maintain proper guards and lights. Cameron Mill & Elevator Co. v. Anderson (Tex.) 198

Liability of servant.

Joint Suit against Master and Servant, see ACTION OR SUIT, 8, 9.

37. One who takes an independent contract to perform a portion of the work which his employer has undertaken to do is responsible for injuries caused to the employer's servants by his negligent use of appliances in the performance of his work. Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (Wash.) 283

38. A railroad engineer is personally liable for negligently running his engine against a traveler at a railroad crossing. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley (Ky.) 370

2. Where one, acting for himself or another, acquires for value a promissory note before maturity, secured by a mortgage on land, the title to such mortgage being taken in the name of another by his consent, evidenced by a general power of attorney, but without his knowledge as to the particular transaction; and such other person thereafter, by consent of the third person, evidenced by such power of attorney, but without his knowledge as to the particular transaction, assigns his security in writing to a fourth person, the assignment being neither witnessed nor acknowledged, the final holder of the legal title to the security can rely on the bona fides of the transaction between the vendor and the persons dealing with him in the first transaction. Id.

3. If a person acting for himself or another, for value acquires a promissory note before maturity, secured by a mortgage upon real estate, taking the title to such mortgage in the name of another by his consent, evidenced by a general power of attorney, but without his knowledge as to the particular transaction; and thereafter such other, by consent of such third person, evidenced by such power of attorney, but without his knowledge as to the particular transaction, assigns his security in writing to a fourth person, the assignment being neither witnessed nor acknowledged, the bona fides of the transaction as to the latter, or as to such first person, is not affected by the mere use of the third person's name as assignee and subsequently as assignor, nor by the fact that he was not pecuniarily interested in the transaction, nor by the circumstance that the second instrument of assignment was not so executed as to be entitled to record. Id.

4. 5. If a person intrusted with authority to collect a mortgage indebtedness enters upon the execution of such authority, and continues efforts in that regard until he obtains the necessary money therefor, nothing appearing to the contrary the agency to collect and possession of the securities by the agent is to be presumed to continue correspondingly; and the legal effect of obtaining the money is the extinguishment of the note and mortgage, regardless of whether such money in due course, or otherwise, reaches the rightful owner. Id.

6. Payment of an indebtedness on a note secured by a mortgage on real estate extinguishes the mortgage lien without any satisfaction thereof of record or in writing. Id.

7. A mortgage having been extinguished by payment of the indebtedness, it is not necessary to valid record evidence thereof that a satisfaction piece shall be executed by the actual or apparent owner of such indebtedness for delivery to the mortgagor, or that there should be such delivery. Id.

8. An assignment of real estate in the nature of an equitable mortgage may, by agreement between the parties, be kept alive after payment, so as to be valid security for a larger loan subsequently made, which will take priority over an assignment afterwards made to secure a loan from another person having notice of the prior agreement. Girard Trust Co. v. Baird (Pa.) 405

Rights of purchaser on foreclosure.

9. A purchaser at foreclosure sale under a mortgage of real estate is entitled to the rights conferred by the decree of foreclosure, and cannot claim additional rights under the provisions of the mortgage. Schaeppel v. Bartholomae (Ill.) 1079

10. A provision in a mortgage that, in case of foreclosure, a receiver shall be appointed to collect the income, which shall be paid to the person entitled to a deed under the certificate of sale, or in reduction of the redemption money, in case the property is redeemed, does not, even in the absence of redemption, entitle a purchaser at foreclosure sale to the income of the property before the title becomes perfect in him. Id.

Redemption.

11. A notice of intention to redeem from a mortgage foreclosure sale as a judgment creditor, by one whose judgment was not docketed for four hours after the filing of such notice, does not entitle him to redeem; and an attempt to do so thereunder is void. Brady v. Gilman (Minn.) 835

1. The generality of the title of an ordinance is not objectionable so long as it is not made to cover legislation incongruous in itself. St. Louis v. Liessing (Mo.) 918

2. A provision requiring the registration of venders and the payment of a registration fee is within the title of an ordinance "regulating the sale of milk and cream." St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (Mo.) 936

3. The court will not examine provisions of an ordinance alleged to be invalid, where the section under which the prosecution is instituted is valid and severable from the rest. St. Louis v. Liessing (Mo.) 918

4. An ordinance requiring payment of a fee to the "city collector" is not void because the statute designates the one who is to receive it as the "license collector." St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (Mo.) 936

5. An ordinance requiring the use on street cars of a particular fender, or "some other fender equally as good, to be approved" by certain officials, is invalid as vesting an arbitrary discretion in the officials. Elkhart v. Murray (Ind.) 940

6. Provisions of an ordinance requiring milk dealers to register in the office of the health commissioner and pay a fee therefor, and those requiring them to pay a license fee, are severable, so that one may be sustained although the other fails. St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (Mo.) 936

7. A municipal ordinance prohibiting the sale of milk containing less than 3 per cent of weight of butter fat, to be estimated gravimetrically by the Adams paper-coil process, cannot be declared void for unreasonableness as matter of law. St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (Mo.) 926

8. Charter authority to provide for the inspection of milk empowers a municipal corporation to require venders to register in the office of the health commissioner. St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. (Mo.) 936

9. The power to exact from a telephone company authorized by statute to erect its lines in the streets of a city a license fee for the use of such streets is not given to a municipal corporation by a charter conferring upon it general police power and the right to control and regulate its streets and 1 L.R.A. Liability for damages.

11. A city is not exempt from liability for injuries to private property produced by defects in its sewerage system, where such system was constructed by the city without any plan therefor, passed upon and adopted by its governing body. Hart v. Neillsville (Wis.) 952

12. A city which has, by its governing body, duly adopted a plan for a sewerage system, and executed the same, is not liable for injuries caused thereby to private property, not involving an unconstitutional taking thereof, produced by defects in such plans, as the due adoption of the plan requires the exercise by the governing body of discretionary authority of a quasi-judicial nature. Id.

13. Though a city is not liable for damages to private property caused by mere defects in the plan of its duly adopted and executed sewerage system, if it acquires knowledge of such defects, and that, unless they are remedied, they will produce direct injury to private rights, it should exercise ordinary care to prevent such a result, and is responsible for damages caused by failure in that regard. Id.

14. An injury to private property by the discharge thereon of water accumulated in a sewer with which it has been connected as a matter of right is a direct result of defects in the plan of sewerage, for which the city is liable, although such injury would not have occurred if the connection had not been made. Id.

15. Where, as a matter of right, a private drain is constructed, connecting private property with a main sewer through an opening left by the city therefor, and damages result to such property by accumulated sewage flowing from such sewer to such property, the mere circumstance that without such drain no such result would have happened will not save the municipality from liability for such damages. Id.

16. A superintendent of the lamp department of a city, whether appointed by the mayor or elected by the city council, is not a public officer, for whose negligence the city is not liable, where the maintenance of street lights is not required by statute, but is undertaken by the city for its own convenience. Dickinson v. Boston (Mass.) 664

17. A municipal corporation is liable for injuries caused by the negligent management by its agents of lamp posts erected for the lighting of its streets, where the duty of street lighting is not imposed by statute, but is undertaken under statutory authority, to lessen its liability to actions for unsafe highways. Id.

18. The property of a water company the stock of which is all owned by the municipal corporation is subject to municipal taxation where the company was organized to sell water to private consumers, and the Constitution limits tax exemptions to public property used for public purposes, while the statutes provide for taxation of all property not exempted by the Constitution, and require municipal corporations to tax for local purposes all property subject to state tax. Louisville v. McAteer (Ky.) 766

Officers.

19. Appointment of a city chemist under a provision of a municipal ordinance requiring the approval of the board of health to the act of the mayor and common council is not ineffectual, although the charter places the appointing power in the mayor and council. St. Louis v. Liessing (Mo.) 918

20. The state may require municipal corporations to pay the salaries of local police officers, although such officers are officers of the state, and appointed under its authority. Horton v. Newport (R. I.) 512

No distinction between the degrees of negligence of which a railroad company is guilty can be founded on speculation, so as to avoid the effect of a contract releasing it from liability for negligent injuries in case the negligence is found to be gross. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler (Ill.) 674

2. A manufacturer who makes and bottles for public consumption a beverage represented to be harmless and refreshing is under a legal duty not negligently to allow a foreign substance which is injurious to the human stomach, such as bits of broken glass, to be present in a bottle of the beverage when it is placed on sale; and one who, relying on this obligation, and without negligence on his own part, swallows several pieces of glass while drinking the beverage from a bottle, may recover from the manufacturer for injuries sustained in consequence. *Watson v. Imputed negligence.

3. 2. In criminal cases, the granting or refusing of a new trial for errors of law should not be determined by mere technical conformity with, or infringement of, rules of practice and evidence. Id.

3. A new trial of one convicted of murder in the first degree for killing a fellow traveler in a box car while defendant and another were engaged in holding up the inmates of such car, will not be granted because a juror was permitted by the court to ask a witness questions involving a conclusion or opinion as to whether defendant stepped aside to take aim at his victim, to which no objection was made and no exceptions taken, where four eyewitnesses to the shooting testified, without attack, impeachment, or inconsistency, to every detail of the homicide, the revolver from which the bullet was fired, and the bullet itself, which was taken from the brain of the murdered man was produced, identified, and connected with defendant, and he himself took the stand in his own defense and admitted the robbery and shooting, although he denied an intent to kill. Id.

1. A hearing is not necessary to enable the legislature, on a particular state of facts, to declare a thing to be a nuisance per se. Com. v. Sisson (Mass.) 752

2. The legislature cannot authorize railroad and terminal companies, in locating station houses, roundhouses, and terminal facilities, seriously to impair or destroy property not taken, but which becomes impaired or is destroyed by the use of that which is taken. Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett (Tenn.) 49

3. The owner of an authorized railroad properly conducted at an authorized place is not liable in damages to one whose residence is permeated by smoke, cinders, and gas emitted from its engines to such an extent as to be injurious to the health and comfort of the inhabitants, as such a business is not a nuisance. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Armstrong (Kan.) 113

Remedies.

4. A terminal company, in exercising the discretion conferred by the legislature to locate its yards and terminal facilities, acts at its peril not to create a nuisance to neighboring property. Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett (Tenn.) 49

5. A landowner who is driven from his home by the maintenance of a nuisance on adjoining property, or whose comfort is so interfered with as to lessen the desirability and usable value of his home, is entitled to recover damages therefor. Gossett v. Southern R. Co. (Tenn.) 97

6. Mere occupants of property adjoining that where a nuisance is being maintained have no right of action, where they are merely disquieted and kept in a state of alarm and apprehension, if it does not result in sickness or physical injury. Id.

7. One whose residence is rendered uncomfortable or unhealthy to the occupants by smoke, cinders, and gas emitted from the locomotive engines of a railway company cannot recover damages therefor, in the absence of any special constitutional or statutory authority, where it appears that such company has not abused or exceeded its authority in locating or constructing its line, or in the operation of its engines. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Armstrong (Kan.) 113

8. Where, under the police power, a legislature declares a thing to be a nuisance per se, and orders it to be abated, no compensation is due. Com. v. Sisson (Mass.) 752

2. There is no property right in a public office, so as to require notice and a hearing before a removal therefrom, under a constitutional provision that no one shall be deprived of property without due process of law. Id.

3. A superintendent of a water division, who is appointed by the governor with the consent of the senate, may be removed from office in any manner provided by law, under constitutional provisions for the impeachment of the governor and other state officers for high crimes and misdemeanors, or malfeasance in office, and that all officers not liable to impeachment shall be subject to removal for misconduct or malfeasance in office in such manner as may be provided by law. Id.

4. A public official intrusted with the custody of a government building must obey the provisions of a statute forbidding the emission of dense smoke from chimneys into the atmosphere. Palmer v. District of Columbia (D. C. App.) 878

5. A public official charged with a violation of an act of Congress forbidding the emission of dense smoke from chimneys into the atmosphere cannot escape liability on the ground that Congress has not supplied him with the necessary apparatus to prevent such emission, if he has made no effort to procure it. Id.

6. That Congress has approved the estimate of a custodian of a public building for a supply of soft coal for a season does not absolve him from liability for violation of an act of Congress forbidding the emission of dense smoke from chimneys into the atmosphere. Id.

Powers of partners.

1. An agreement between a customer and a member of a partnership, that its goods may be purchased and paid for by the customer in commodities furnished by him, for the private use and benefit of such member of the firm, is void, as being beyond the scope of the partner's apparent authority. Eady v. Newton Coal & Lumber Co. (Ga.) 650

2. Although articles of partnership may be enlarged by implication from a general custom of the firm, acquiesced in by all the partners, such a custom will not bind a partner who did not expressly authorize it unless the circumstances are such as to indicate that he not only knew of the course of dealing in particular instances, but contemplated and tacitly assented to a regular course of dealing with the public, rather than a departure from the partnership articles in the excepted cases. Id.

Division of profits.

3. Under a contract for the formation of a partnership to engage in railroad construction, which entitles either partner, under certain conditions, to subcontract portions of the work, in which case the one taking the subcontract should be dealt with as other subcontractors, the profit upon a subcontract taken by one of the partners is to be treated as profits of the partnership, and divided under the partnership contract. Condon v. Callahan (Tenn.) 643

Rights of surviving partner.

4. Where partners who have undertaken to perform a construction contract have agreed that each shall contribute his services without compensation, one who, upon the other's death, performs the entire work of supervision, is entitled to compensation for that part of the work which deceased would have contributed had he lived. Id.

5. The rule that a surviving partner is not entitled to compensation for winding up the affairs of the partnership does not apply where the affairs are not immediately wound up, but the work in which the partnership was engaged is carried to completion with the consent of the personal representatives of the decedent. Id.

6. Personal representatives of a deceased partner in a firm which has taken a contract for railroad construction cannot compel the surviving partner to contribute the entire amount paid to the engineer of the railroad company for services rendered by him to the enterprise, where the services were engaged and utilized with knowledge of the deceased partner and of his representatives, and there was nothing in the transaction in violation of the rights of the railroad company, or without its consent. Id.

7. A rejected offer by a surviving partner to take a certain amount in payment for his services in completing the enterprise in which the partnership was engaged does not prevent his recovering a reasonable allowance therefor in case he applies to the courts, although it is in excess of the amount named in his offer. Id.

Admissions by pleading.

5. A denial of the validity of an instrument sued on, agreeing to pay a specified amount upon the confirmation by Congress of a specified land grant, on the ground that such land grant had never been confirmed by Congress, is not an admission of a valuable consideration for such instrument. *Joseph v. 6. 7. Allegations of injury to health may be inserted in a complaint for injuries to real estate by the maintenance of a nuisance, as specifications of damage done to the property as a place of residence. Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett (Tenn.) 49

Sufficiency of plaintiff's pleadings.

8. Proper allegation and proof of a consideration are necessary to a recovery of a non-negotiable instrument not under seal, which contains no recital of a consideration. Joseph v. Catron (N. M.) 1120

9. A party cannot always anticipate what the testimony in a case may develop;

Sufficiency of defendant's pleadings.

13. An accord and satisfaction cannot be set up under the general issue or plea of not guilty. Gossett v. Southern R. Co. (Tenn.) 97

Demurrer.

14. A demurrer to a declaration on the ground that no copy of the contract sued on was attached as an exhibit is not well founded, where it does not affirmatively appear that the contract was in writing. Timmerman v. Stanley (Ga.) 379

15. A demurrer to a declaration for inconsistency in joining certain claims which treat a contract as still in force with other claims previously made, and which it is claimed determine the character of the action as one in which the contract had been rescinded, does not put the plaintiff upon his election between the two. Id.

16. A pleading which alleges ultimate facts constituting a cause of action or defense is good as against a demurrer for insufficiency of facts to constitute a cause of action or defense; and the remedy is by motion if the facts as alleged do not make the pleading sufficiently definite and certain. Western Travelers' Acci. Asso. v. Munson (Neb.) 1068

17. Naming defendant individually in the title, and stating a cause of action against him as trustee, render the complaint demurrable. Leonard v. Pierce (N. Y.) 161

18. A complaint seeking to charge a bank with the amount of a check deposited for collection, which is not effected because of its negligence, cannot be upheld against demurrer on the theory that it cannot be deemed bad merely because it makes a claim of damages which is erroneous only as to amount and form, since the only damages to which plaintiff is entitled are those actually suffered by the bank's neglect, and the form of the complaint would authorize a recovery though no such damages were proved. Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Hendrix (Ala.) 246

PROHIBITION.

The fact that a statute providing for the removal of an incumbent from a public office is unconstitutional will not prevent the issuance of a writ of prohibition to prevent proceedings under it, if relief has been denied petitioner in the lower court, and there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. *Bell v. QUO WARRANTO.

1. The district court must grant leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto as a matter of course, and direct a writ to issue when the attorney general of the state, acting in his official capacity as the chief law officer of the state, exhibits such an information, and asks that a writ issue, directed to a municipal corporation, requiring it to show cause why its franchise should not be declared null and void; but, upon the return, it is the duty of the court to try the issues of law and fact presented thereby, and to determine the same upon the merits according to the rules of law applicable thereto. State ex rel. Young v. Kent (Minn.) 826

2. The supreme court will, when an application for issuance of a writ of quo warranto to a municipal corporation requiring it to show cause why its franchise should not be declared null and void is made to it by the attorney general, exercise the discretion given it by statute; and if, in its judgment, the application should have been made to the district court, will deny the information. Id.

Seaboard Air Line R. Co.* (N. C.) 604

2. Authority of a railroad company to consolidate with another for the purpose of forming a through line across the state may be found in the provisions of the statute authorizing the latter company to form a consolidation with others, and need not of necessity be inserted in its own charter, or a statute passed with special reference to it. Id.

3. In determining whether or not a particular railroad company has been empowered to consolidate with others, the expressed purpose of the legislature to create a through line across the state, and to connect with roads in other states, is to be taken into consideration. Id.

2. An action against a resident employee of a foreign railroad company and the company jointly is not removable by the latter to the Federal court, although a joint suit cannot be maintained in that court. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

3. A nonresident joined as defendant in an action to recover damages for negligence cannot secure a removal of the case to a Federal court by putting in issue the fact of negligence on the part of his codefendant. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley (Ky.) 370

4. The state, and not the Federal, court should determine the question of the right to remove to the latter an action begun in the former, against a nonresident railroad company and its resident employee jointly. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

5. The state court may determine whether or not a resident of the state has been joined in a suit to prevent its removal to a Federal court, and is not bound, at the instance of the nonresident defendant, to remove the case to the Federal court to permit it to determine that question. *Illinois C. 2. A supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review cannot be filed to bring to the attention of the court, in an action for breach of contract to purchase a certain quantity of manufactured articles in which the defense had been the unmerchantable character of the articles and consequent loss and injury to business credit and reputation, in attempting to dispose of them, matter showing a breach of the contract by the seller in selling the articles to other merchants within the territory which the contract awarded exclusively to the buyer. Id.

When title passes.

1. The general rule is that, when the terms of sale of personal property have been agreed on, and the bargain is struck, and everything the seller has to do with the goods is complete, the contract of sale becomes absolute as between the parties without actual payment or delivery, and the property and the risk of accident to the goods vest in the buyer. Baker v. McDonald (Neb.) 474

2. Where the amount to be paid is to be determined by measurement of the property, to be made by the parties, a measurement which is grossly unfair, as the result of fraud or mistake, is not binding, and a tender based thereon does not entitle the purchaser to possession. Id.

3. The sale is completed where the order is received and filled, where a person in one place sends an order for intoxicating liquor to another place, to be sent C. O. D. Keller v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 489

4. Where the time of payment is not fixed by the contract of sale, the law presumes a cash sale; and, while title may have passed to the buyer, he is not entitled to possession until the full purchase price has been paid or tendered. Baker v. McDonald (Neb.) 474

5. One who sells goods in reliance upon a false representation by the purchaser as to a material matter may, upon discovering the fraud, elect to continue the contract, or he may rescind the contract and reclaim his property, or so much of it as is still in the hands of the purchaser; in which case he must give notice to the purchaser of his election to rescind, and of his determination to reclaim the goods sold, and return or tender back anything received by him in payment. Silvey v. Tift (Ga.) 386

6. A purchaser has a right to return the machine, and his remedy is not limited to an action for damages, under a contract for the purchase of a machine warranted to do good work, and requiring the purchaser to give written notice if, after two days' trial, it appears not to be as represented. First Nat. Bank v. Dutcher (Iowa) 142

7. The requirement of a contract for sale of a machine that notice of its failure to work must be given within two days of its receipt is waived by the continued and persistent efforts of the seller's agents, including the one who made the sale, to make the machine work after the expiration of the time limited. Id.

8. Delay in returning a machine which does not fulfil the warranty is justified so long as the seller's agent continues to work upon it and hold out encouragement to the buyer that it will be made as warranted; and its return within a few days thereafter is sufficient. Id.

1. The owners of a tug whose fault causes the wreck of its tow are not entitled to salvage for services rendered in raising and bringing the wreck into a port of refuge, although such services are rendered by another vessel belonging to them. The Pine Forest (C. C. App. 1st C.) 873

2. A formal agreement will not entitle a vessel in fault to salvage for services rendered to one injured. Id.

3. The owners of a vessel whose fault causes a wreck cannot, by taking advantage of the statute for the limitation of liability after they have rendered services in raising and taking the sunken vessel into a port of refuge, entitle themselves to salvage, although the entire value of the ship in fault is consumed in satisfaction of the claim of the injured vessel, and the denial of the salvage claim will in effect give the injured party the value of the salvage services in addition to the amount allowed by the statute. Id.

4. A towage contract cannot be converted. under the admiralty law, into a salvage service under conditions brought about by the fault of the tug. Id.

5. The captain of a United States revenue cutter has no authority, even in a port where no court is sitting, to determine a question of salvage, unless the matter is submitted to him, by the parties, as arbitrator. L.R.A. (N.S.)

A statute requiring payment of fees upon property coming before the probate court in proportion to the value of the estate, which are to be turned into the county treasury, and become part of the public funds, provides a tax on property within the meaning of a constitutional provision that the rate shall be equal and uniform. State ex rel. Nettleton v. Case (Wash.) 152

2. The principle of equal taxation requires the taxation of the property of a water company organized to sell water to private consumers at the lowest rates, although all its stock is owned by the municipal corporation itself, where only a fraction of the inhabitants of the city patronize the company. *L.R.A. Question for Jury as to Adoption of System for Reckoning, see TRIAL, 6.

The legal fiction that there are no fractions of a day has no application to cases where the statute expressly requires that notice shall be taken of the precise time an official act is done, and that a record thereof be made. Brady v. Gilman (Minn.) 835

Questions for jury.

2. A case cannot be taken from the jury if there is evidence which would warrant a recovery on the part of plaintiff. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

3. Whether the consent of a patient to an operation upon her left ear should be implied from the circumstances is a question for the jury, where the evidence shows that she consulted a physician concerning a difficulty with her right ear; that he examined the same and advised an operation, to which she consented; that after being placed under the influence of anesthetics defendant examined her left ear, with which she had not previously experienced any difficulty, and found it in greater need of an operation than the right ear; that he called such fact to the attention of her family physician, who attended the operation at her request, and finally concluded to operate upon the left instead of the right ear, to which the family physician made no objection. Mohr v. Williams (Minn.) 439

4. Whether or not a warranted machine is returned within a reasonable time after the seller's abandonment of attempts to make it fulfil the warranty is a question for the determination of the jury. First Nat. Bank v. Dutcher (Iowa) 142

5. The question of breach of warranty that a machine is of good material and workmanship, and will, when properly adjusted and operated, do good work, is, upon conflicting evidence, for the jury. Id.

6. The question whether or not a system for reckoning time in a particular locality has been adopted by such universal custom as to raise the presumption that a particular contract was made with reference to it is for the jury. Rochester German Ins. Co. v. Peaslee-Gaulbert Co. (Ky.) 364

7. Whether or not insured has made the effort required by a marine insurance policy to minimize the loss is a question for the jury. Standard Marine Ins. Co. v. Nome Beach Lighterage & Transp. Co. (C. C. App. 9th C.) 1095

8. The jury must determine the question of the duty of the keeper of a place of amusement to keep clear of articles which will fall therefrom, the platform of a band stand which is erected above seats, provided for patrons. Williams v. Mineral City Park Asso. (Iowa) 427

9. The jury must determine what is ordinary care to avoid setting fire from a threshing-machine engine, under all the circumstances of the case. Martin v. McCrary (Tenn.) 530

10. Whether or not it is negligence for a manufacturer who employs boys to perform part of his work to permit the floor to become so slippery in close proximity to exposed gears as to afford insecure footing is a question for the jury. Mundhenke v. Oregon City Mfg. Co. (Or.) 278

11. An employee who shows that, having shifted the belt running the machinery which he was operating, he attempted to clean the machine by putting his hand inside, when the machine suddenly started from a cause of which he has no knowledge, and injured him; and who further shows that the belt shifter was imperfect, the accident being one which, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management of the business use due care,—has a right to have the jury say whether, in the light of the rule res ipsa loquitur, he has made out actionable negligence on the part of his employer. Ross v. Double Shoals Cotton Mills (N. C.) 298

Instructions.

12. A person cannot complain of the refusal of an instruction, if the court, at his instance, gives another which embodies all that is material in the one refused. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

13. In admitting evidence which is competent against one party to a joint action, but not against the other, the court should caution the jury as to its proper limitation. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

14. The court should, upon request, instruct the jury that a mortality table introduced in the evidence upon the question of expectation of life shows merely the probable duration of life, and should be considered in connection with the other proof in the case for what it is worth. Id.

15. The court cannot, in instructing the jury, single out and give undue emphasis to particular evidence upon a matter in controversy, where there is as much testimony on one side of the question as on the other. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.) 215

16. In an action by a trustee in bankruptcy against defendants as preferred creditors, who had taken with reasonable ground to believe that a preference was made, the jury should not be instructed that they could consider, only for the purpose of impeaching the bankrupt who was a witness for the plaintiff, a statement by him to the defendants prior to the appointment of the trustee, that he had made a material misrepresentation on purchasing goods from them, whereupon they rescinded the sale and retook the goods. Silvey v. Tift (Ga.) 386

17. When an instruction is given on punitive damages in an action for a personal injury, the court should clearly tell the jury that the allowance of such damages is a matter for their discretion. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins (Ky.) 375

18. The right to consider the wealth or poverty of the parties is not included in an instruction, in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by the fright of a horse by an automobile, to the effect that the jury might, in determining whether defendant was exercising reasonable care and diligence, take into consideration the situation and condition of the parties, where there is no evidence of the financial condition of the parties in the case. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.)

19. Mentioning in an instruction one precaution which a railroad company might take in backing a train over a street crossing, to warn travelers on the highway, does not interfere with the province of the jury to determine what precautions were required, where the instruction immediately continues, "or use some other reasonably safe means" to give warning. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coley (Ky.)

370

20. The court may explain to the jury what constitutes ordinary care as matter of law, and instruct them that, to recover for alleged negligent injury, plaintiff must show that he was exercising reasonable care and diligence for his own safety. "as explained in the instructions;" and such instruction cannot be regarded as making the question of negligence one of law. Christy v. Elliott (Ill.)

Title to land under water.

1. Prior to the admission of a state into the Union, Congress has power to grant tide land lying between high and low water marks within its boundaries. Kneeland v. Korter (Wash.) 745
2. Land to which a right to a patent has attached, as well as that actually patented at the time of the admission of a state into the Union, is included in a constitutional provision disclaiming title to tide land which has been patented by the Federal government. Id.
3. The title to the bed of a navigable river in Nebraska is in the state, and the rights of a riparian proprietor on such 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stream are bounded by the banks of the river. Kinkead v. Turgeon (Neb.) 762 Rights as between individuals generally.

Prohibition against Casting Sawdust into Stream, see COMMISSIONERS; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 7; FISH-ERIES.

4. That the act of public authorities in forbidding the casting of sawdust from a particular mill into a particular stream is not a general regulation does not make it a judicial act, which will entitle the mill owner to a hearing. Com. v. Sisson (Mass.) 752

5. Water flowing in one direction over the surface of the ground without a well-defined channel, from a swamp fed by springs, to the channel of a stream, is a water course, which cannot be diverted to the injury of a riparian owner on the stream. Harrington v. Demaris (Or.) 756

6. Where the owners of several parcels of land on a stream remove a barrier, and turn water from another source into the stream, it becomes subject to the rules of law applicable to riparian ownership. Id.

7. A riparian owner has no ground to complain of a decree awarding him one half the water flowing in the stream, as against the claims of a lower riparian owner, where the matter is settled solely by the riparian rights of the parties. Id.

Irrigation ditch; injury by leakage or discharge from.

Evidence as to, see EVIDENCE, 33, 34.

8. A portion of a gulch, which, by means of a dam, is converted into a section of an irrigation ditch, in which the water stands over an area 2,000 feet long, nearly 400 feet wide and in places 12 or 15 feet deep, and the connection between which and the outlet ditch can be closed so that it can be used as a storage place, is a reservoir, within the meaning of a statute providing that owners of reservoirs shall be liable for leakage therefrom. Howell v. Big Horn Basin Colonization Co. (Wyo.) 596

9. The owner of an irrigation ditch is liable for the injury done by wilfully and knowingly discharging water therefrom through spillways upon adjoining property. Id.

10. The liability of insurers does not attach to persons conveying water in ditches for irrigation purposes; nor are they liable for injuries to adjoining property, not attributable to some fault or neglect on their part. Id.

11. Failure of a statute specifically to require the observance of care in constructing and grading the bottom of an irrigation ditch will not exempt the owner from liability for injury to adjoining lands through seepage caused by negligence in that respect. Id.

12. Constructing an irrigation ditch through sand banks, and forming the bottom by sand and gravel loosely scraped together, and permitting such condition to continue after notice of its insufficiency, by reason of which the water seeps through the bottom to the injury of adjoining land, is evidence of negligence. Id.

13. A landowner waives his right to recover for the injury done to his land by the casting of water thereon by authorizing and directing the defendant to cast it there. Id.
Title by adverse user.

Prescriptive Right to Cast Sawdust into Stream, see FISHERIES, 2.

14. Use of water by a lower riparian owner without a recognition by the upper owner of the right is not adverse to the latter. Harrington v. Demaris (Or.) 756

15. The right of a riparian owner to the flow of the stream through his land is not affected by adverse use where the use shown is not sufficient to enable the one making it to invoke the statute of limitations in his favor. Id.

16. A water company taking the benefit of a contract between a town and its promoters is bound by the obligations of the contract. Robbins v. Bangor R. & Electric Co. (Me.) 963

17. One who, for the purpose of securing a hydrant contract with a town for fire purposes, agrees to furnish water to its inhabitants at certain rates after obtaining the benefit of the contract is bound to fulfill the agreement as to service and rates to individual water takers. Id.

18. The quantity of water used, and the cost of the individual service, are the principal elements for consideration in fixing the charges for water supply, as between individual takers or classes of takers. Id.

19. To make the original classification of a building for purposes of water rates, which was continued for a long period of time, controlling as to the rate to be applied at a particular time, on the ground of usage, the circumstances must appear to have remained the same. Id.

20. A water company may change from a flat to a meter rate if no contract prevents, and the new rates are reasonable and do not discriminate. Id.

21. For unnecessary waste of water, a consumer may be required to pay reasonable meter rates. Id.

22. A contract for water supply, at specified rates, to a dwelling house containing a family, does not apply to a building used primarily as a boarding house, although the family of the keeper lives in it. Id.

23. A water company taxed for municipal purposes may credit upon the tax bills the reasonable price of water which has been furnished to and used by the city for the years for which the tax is asserted. Louisville v. McAteer (Ky.) 766

Attestation.

1. Attestation of a will in another room, out of range of testator's vision, is not within a statutory requirement that it shall be in his presence; and the defect is not cured by a subsequent acknowledgment by the witnesses, or ratification and approval by the testator. Calkins v. Calkins (Ill.) 393

Probate; foreign wills.

See also STATUTES, 7.

2. Under statutes providing that wills must be proved in the county of which the deceased was a resident at the time of his death, and that foreign wills allowed in other states may be allowed in the county in which testator left real estate, the will of a resident cannot be probated elsewhere than in the state, and then brought into the state for secondary or ancillary administration. Re Clark (Cal.) 996

3. The duty of a state to give full faith and credit to the judgments of other states does not require it to permit the will of one of its residents to be probated first in another state, and then grant ancillary administration within the state on the foreign record. Id.

4. The probate of the will of a nonresident who dies, leaving property within the state, extends only to its effect upon property within the jurisdiction, and has no effect upon the validity of the will itself. Id.
Effect of codicil.

5. A gift once made by will is not to be cut down by a subsequent codicil, unless the intention of the testator to that effect appears clearly or by necessary implication. Re Sigel (Pa.) 397

6. The right of an heir under a clause in a will directing the residue to be divided between testator's heirs is not cut down by a subsequent codicil giving him a specific legacy. "and no more." Id.

Remainder over.

7. There may be a valid devise to one for life with power of disposition, which will not affect the remainder over unless the power is exercised as authorized. Roberts v. Roberts (Md.) 782

Vested or contingent interests.

8. The remainder created by a clause in a will which, after giving the estate to testator's wife for life with power of disposition, disposes of the estate "remaining at her death," is not necessarily contingent. Id.

9. An intention to create a contingent remainder is not shown by a clause in a will which, after giving an estate with power of disposition, and providing that the estate remaining at the death of the life tenant shall be distributed among testator's children, share and share alike, directs that the child or children of a deceased child shall stand in its or their parent's place and stead, and receive and have the share its or their parent would have been entitled to if living. Id.

10. A vested remainder is created by a will giving testator's widow authority, for the maintenance of herself and children, to spend principal and income of the estate, and providing that at her death "then that all of my property which she may possess shall be disposed of equally among all of my surviving children," where a preliminary clause of the will gives the property therein provided for "to my sons and daughters, should they be living at the time of my decease, or any of them that may be alive." Ball v. Holland (Mass.) 1005

11. Vested, and not contingent, remainders are created by a will which gives testator's estate to his wife during life in trust for the use of herself and "her children," with power to sell property and invest the proceeds, and lease real estate, and use whatever is necessary for support and education, and make advancements; and directs that all property "remaining at her death" shall be divided among such children, share and share alike, the child of a deceased child to stand in its parent's stead and receive and have the share which its parent would be entitled to if living. Roberts v. Roberts (Md.) 782

Election.

12. The renunciation, by the widow, of the provision made for her in her husband's will, entitles her to her share of the estate after the debts are paid from the entire estate, under a statute providing that she shall be entitled to such part of the estate as she would have been entitled to if he had died intestate; and it does not make only the property going to her intestate, so as to throw the entire debts upon it. Gordon v. James (Miss.) 461

13. A statutory provision that, in case a widow renounces the provision made for her in her husband's will, she may have the difference between her separate estate and what she would be entitled to in case of intestacy made up to her notwithstanding the will, does not deprive her of her rights in the separate parcels of property, and require her portion to be made up to her in money, where the further provision for the distribution of the estate declares that she shall have her lawful portions of the lands 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and her distributive share of the personality. Id.

14. A devisee of land, who, before the renunciation by the widow of the provisions of the will, has accepted the devise with the condition that he pay the encumbrance on the property, cannot compel the widow to share in the satisfaction of such encumbrance, but she will recover her share of the property free from the encumbrance; the doctrine of purchase for value not applying in favor of the devisee. Id.

Contribution between legatees.

See also supra, 14.

15. Specific devises of land do not share with specific bequests of personalty, in contribution towards payment of the debts of the estate, where the statutes plainly indicate that the land is to stand charged only for such debts as the personalty may not be sufficient to pay. Id.

Lapse of legacy.

16. A legacy given in payment of a debt by the express terms of the will does not lapse by the death of the legatee before the testator; but when, by the terms of the will, it appears that the intention of the testator was to confer a bounty, it is not competent to show a different intent, and to prevent a lapse by proof that the legacy was given in payment of a debt. McNeal v. Jack (Kan.) 167

2. A witness subpoenaed in a proceeding or inquiry to testify of his knowledge of violations of the Kansas anti-trust law cannot refuse to give his evidence on the ground that the immunity provided by § 10 of such act does not afford protection against the use of his evidence in a prosecution against him for violations of the Federal anti-trust laws. Id.

3. The exemption provided by the Kansas Bill of Rights, § 10, Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 92, that no person shall be a witness
